In several passages a period of 12 years is referred to. The woman healed by touching the fringe of the Lord's garment had been ill for 12 years (Mt 9²⁰, Mk 5²⁵, Lk 8⁴³). The daughter of Jairus was 12 years old (Mk 5⁴², Lk 8⁴²). Jesus was 12 years old when found in the Temple (Lk 2⁴²). In all these cases the number must be understood literally, but the second and third admit of illustration from Oriental life. At 12 childhood ceased for the Jewish boy. In the addendum to the fifth chapter of 'Abôth two of the rules run: 'At 10 the Mishnah, at 13 the Commandments.' A boy of 12, therefore, was on the threshold of manhood. A tradition recorded by Josephus affirms that Samuel was 12 years old when he received the Divine call (Ant. v. x. 4). Another tradition, found in a Christian writing, but probably of Jewish origin, represented Solomon as 12 years old when he gave his famous judgment about the child (pseudo-Ignatius, ad Magnesios, iii.). At 12 a girl was marriageable. According to the Book of Jubilees (30²), Dinah was 12 years old at the time referred to in Gn 34².

One more passage remains: 'Are there not twelve hours in the day?' (Jn 11⁹). Here, no doubt, Babylonian influence can be traced, although in the time of Christ most of the Jews living in Palestine will have been wholly unconscious of the fact. The full day was divided by the Babylonians, who in this matter as in so many points set the rule for all their neighbours, and through the Greeks for the whole Western world, into 12 parts. As this day consisted of two halves, the daylight portion and the night portion, the division into twelve was applied to each, without regard to the season of the year. An hour was one-twelfth of the day or the night (KAT [ZW] 328, 335 f.). The old way of speaking still survives in Syria. The day is regarded, as in the time of Christ, as consisting of 12 hours (Bauer, Volkleben im Lande der Bibel, pp. 274 f.).

Sixty.—The use of the number 60 in the parable of the Sower (Mt 13^{8. 23}, Mk 4^{8. 20}, not in Lk 24¹³) may possibly have indirect connexion with the sexagesimal system of Babylonia (for this, cf. Bezold, Ninive und Babylon, 90, 92), which must have been current throughout western Asia, especially through its use in the subdivision of the talent (talent=60 manels; manel=60 shekels), and would naturally lead to the employment of the number with more or less significance. There are many passages in the OT and other Jewish literature in which 60 can hardly be accidental: Nu 7⁸⁸ (60 rams, 60 he-goats, 60 he-lambs of the first year), Dt 3⁴ (60 cities, cf. Jos 13³⁰, 1 K 4¹³, 1 Ch 2²³), 1 K 6² (Solomon's temple 60 cubits long, cf. 2 Ch 3³), 1 K 4²², 2 Ch 11²¹, Jer 52²⁵ (60 men of the people of the land found in Jerusalem by the Babylonians, cf. 2 K 25¹⁹), Ca 3⁷ 6⁸, Test. of Judah, ch. 3 (stone weighing 60 lbs.), ch. 9 (60 men slain), Test. of Abraham, text A 10 (cherubic chariot attended by 60 angels). The many examples in the Babylonian Talmud (fire the 60th part of Gehenna, Berak. 57^b etc.) will be largely due to the Babylonian atmosphere of the compilation.

Thirty.—Thirty, the half of sixty, may be used in the same context (Mt 13^{8. 23}, Mk 4^{8. 20}) in somewhat the same way, through the same association. In Lk 3²³, where it is said that Jesus was about 30 years of age at the beginning of His ministry, there is probably an allusion to the belief that 30 years marked the attainment of manly vigour. Joseph entered on his career as a statesman at 30 (Gn 41⁴⁶), and David was 30 when he ascended the throne (2 S 5⁴). In the appendix to the fifth chapter of 'Abôth, 30 is defined as the age of strength (בן שלשים לה). The 30 pieces of silver paid to Judas (Mt 26¹⁵ 27^{3, 9}, cf. Zec 11^{12a}) would remind every Jew of the average value of a slave as fixed in the Law (Ex 21³²), 30 shekels. The Babylonian average was lower, but the Assyrian coincided with the Hebrew (Johns in Babylonian and Assyrian Laws, Contracts, and Letters, p. 182 f.). In the remaining passage, Jn 6¹⁹, the number is purely historical.

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

NUNC DIMITTIS (Lk 2²⁹⁻³²), so called from the opening words in the Latin version, is the third and shortest of the hymns of the Incarnation preserved to us by St. Luke. Like the other two, it speaks of Christ; but whereas Benedictus, the Song of the priest Zacharias, is naturally of His Priesthood, and Magnificat, the Song of the royally-descended Virgin Mary, of His Kingdom, this, the Song of Simeon (wh. see), as befits the utterance of a prophet, is of Messiah fulfilling the prophetic function assigned to Him in the OT (cf. Dt 18¹⁵), and especially by Isaiah.

The feature in Simeon's character which is to the Evangelist the climax of his virtues is that he was 'waiting for the consolation of Israel.' The words are a reminiscence of Jacob's, 'I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord' (Gn 49¹⁸); and they describe what was precisely the attitude of Abraham in regard to God's promise of the land (Ac 7⁹ and He 11¹³), and of David in regard to the kingdom (1 S 26⁹⁻¹³), both of whom did not 'fret themselves in anywise to do evil' (Ps 37⁸), but waited till the Lord would give what He had spoken. So our Lord, speaking of those in danger of being led away by false Christs, bids His followers 'in patience possess their souls' (Lk 21¹⁹). This was part of the faith of Simeon: his waiting for 'the Lord's Christ' (Lk 2) saved him from going after any turbulent pretender, or accepting, with the Herodians, a mere king of this world. The 'consolation of Israel' was a phrase with the Rabbis for the times of Messiah: Lightfoot (Hor. Heb.) gives five illustrations of its use.

The repeated mention of the Holy Spirit guiding Simeon at each successive step evinces the fact that prophecy, silent since the days of Malachi, is again about to stir (de Wette, Oosterzee); yet the difference also is to be observed between the repeated comings of the Spirit upon Simeon, and His abiding on Jesus (Jn 1³³) and remaining with the Church (14¹⁶). By what sign Simeon was taught of the Spirit to recognize the child of Mary as the Christ we are not told: perhaps the Virgin's poverty, evidenced by her offering of doves, was the token to him, as the manger-cradle had been to the shepherds (Lk 2¹²). Anyhow the Child was pointed out to him; he went up to Him, received Him in his arms, and, as he held Him, he 'blessed God,' and uttered his Nunc dimittis. There are no different readings in the text of it; but the Syriac renders the verb in the first clause, which in Greek, Latin, and English is in the indicative mood, by an optative, 'My Lord, now release thou thy servant in peace.' The mistake has been followed by several in this country who should have known better: e.g. by Logan, in the Scottish Paraphrases (Par. 38):

'Now, Lord, according to thy word,
Let me in peace depart.

At length my arms embrace my Lord,
Now let their vigour cease.'

and even by John Keble, usually so accurate:

'Whose prayers are struggling with his tears,
Lord, let me now depart.'

As a matter of fact, Simeon does not pray for death. He thanks God for permitting him to see, what many prophets and kings had desired to see and were not permitted (Lk 10²⁴), the salvation He had promised; and having seen it he says that he is ready to go when God wills.

The hymn is in three couplets:

(1) Thanksgiving for permission at last to leave his post, as the sentinel when the hour of his watch is over (Godet). Death will be to him as sleep to a labouring man (Bruce).

'Now thou art letting thy servant depart, O Lord,
According to thy word, in peace.'

The 'word,' of course, is the promise of v. 26⁹ that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord's [own] Christ; and the fulfilment of the promise has brought him peace, because in Christ there is sure salvation for him and for all God's people.

There are two fine Patristic comments—Cyprian's (On the Mortality, 3), 'He bears witness that the servants of God have peace, are free, and tranquil when, withdrawn from the whirlwinds of this world, they reach the port of the eternal home, and pass through death to immortality'; and Ambrose's (Exposition of St. Luke, Bk. ii. li. 50), 'Let him who wishes to depart come into the Temple; let him come to Jerusalem; let him wait for the Lord's Christ; let him take in his arms the Word of God, embracing Him by the arms of faith.' Servant (δούλος), Lord (διστορα)—'slave,' 'master' are terms appropriate at all times to express the relation between God and men, yet savouring of the Law (Bruce).

(2) The reason of Simeon's peace in the prospect of death:

'For mine eyes have seen thy salvation,
Which thou preparedst before the face of all peoples.'

What we see with our eyes is sure (cf. Jn 1¹⁴ 19³⁵ and 1 Jn 1²). And Jesus Christ is salvation (Is 49⁶), for salvation is in Him and in none other (Ac 4¹²). Moreover, He is the salvation which God Himself provided, not which man might have fancied. 'Preparedst' is a more correct rendering than AV 'hast prepared,' for the tense refers to a definite historical fact (cf. Lk 1⁴⁷); and this God means for all peoples (2¹⁹) (plural)—both the sections of mankind of whom, in the next verse, Simeon is to speak, viz. the Gentiles and Israel. The Greek word used (λαός) usually means Israel only, the people [of the Lord]. But now the privilege is extended, and they who were not a people are to be the people of the living God (Hos 2¹, Ro 9^{25, 26}, 1 P 2¹³).

(3) The different prophetic functions Christ is to discharge towards the Gentiles and the Jews respectively:

'A light to lighten the Gentiles,
And the glory of thy people Israel.'

(a) To the Gentiles who sat in darkness (Is 9²) He is to be a Light (49⁶); but not only by giving them light. The thought is greater than merely that Christ is to reveal truth to the Gentiles. He is a Light 'for their revealing' (εις αποκάλυψιν εθνών)—to show what the Gentiles are, how dear to Almighty God (cf. Ro 3²⁹), and how capable they are through His grace of producing saints. The prophecy of Simeon is thus akin to that of John the Baptist (Mt 3⁷), and has its OT roots in such passages as Is 25⁷ and Hos 2². How wonderfully has it been fulfilled—that out of Judaism He could bring a Peter, a John, a Paul; out of decadent Rome an Augustine and an Ambrose; out of the wild Irish a Columba; out of the Saxon 'knifemen' a Wilfrid and a Bede! We have yet to see what He will make of China and Japan, when they are Christianized. (b) Of Israel, who had produced so many saints, prophets, and teachers, the 'lights of the world in their several generations,' Christ is to be the supreme Glory, of more honour than Moses (He 3^s), with a better priesthood than Aaron (7²⁷), Himself the very Brightness of the Father's glory (1³), which was beheld in Him (Jn 1⁴). St. Paul saw, in the 1st cent., how true is this prophecy of Christ (Ro 9⁴⁻⁶), and all subsequent history is its confirmation.

A parallel is given by Carpenter (The Synoptic Gospels) from Buddhist legend of one who, discerning in a babe the signs of perfection, predicted, 'Thou wilt be a Buddha, and remove the veils of sin and ignorance from the world.' But the Indian seer could not rejoice with Simeon, he could only weep that he would not be alive to share the light; which reminds us that Simeon's peace is through the Christian hope of a better life to come, when we shall be with Christ.

Simeon's attitude towards the Gentiles, while in full accord with that of the OT (Gn 22¹⁸ 49¹⁰, Ps 98³ 100¹, Is 42⁶ 49⁶ 60³), is in striking contrast to that of the nearest contemporary Jewish writings, the Psalms of Solomon, in which, though there is the same longing for Messiah and His kingdom, the lot of the heathen is not light or salvation, but only judgment (Ps-Sol 16⁴).

The singular sweetness—the calm beauty, as of a perfect pearl—of the Song of Simeon has always been recognized; and for ages it has entered into the evening service of the Church. Both the Roman Catholic and the Anglican Churches have appointed it as a hymn at Vespers, teaching us (as it does) to live each day as if we knew it to be our last; and, embracing Christ by faith, to thank God for Him and be ready in peace to depart in Him. In the Church of Scotland, while Knox's Prayer-Book held its place, and again after the introduction of the Paraphrases (1781), it became customary to use it at the close of the Communion Service; while in a few churches, both Episcopal and Presbyterian, it is sung at funerals when the body is being carried out of the church.

O

OATHS.—Christ's teaching on the subject of oaths is set forth in one of the sections of the Sermon on the Mount, in which He contrasts His doctrine with that of the earlier dispensation (Mt 5³³⁻³⁷). The position of the Law on the subject is summed up in the statement, 'Thou shalt not swear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths.' This is a combination of different passages in the Law (Lv 19¹², Nu 30³, Dt 23²²), of which the first deals specially with oaths, the others with vows. But in point of obligation oaths and vows were recognized in the Rabbinical schools as on the same footing (Wünsche, Neue Beiträge zur Erläuterung der Evangelien aus Talmud und Midrasch, p. 57), and the statement in which Christ here represents the position of the Law was, no doubt, the current formula in which, in these schools, the doctrine of the Law on the question was summed up. In opposition to this dictum of the Law, Christ lays down an absolute prohibition, 'Swear not at all' (v. 34), and proceeds to draw out the full meaning of the 'at all' (ὅλως) by showing that His prohibition covers every appeal to anything beside us in confirmation of our word, and not merely such as expressly introduce the name of Jehovah. The casuists among the scribes made a distinction between more and less binding oaths. The former class consisted of those which invoked the name of God; the latter used such forms as 'by heaven,' 'by earth,' 'by Jerusalem,' 'by the life of my head.' An oath by heaven and earth, for instance, was not considered to be binding, because one did not require to think of the Creator; whereas if one swore by one of the letters of the Divine name, or by one of the Divine attributes, that was regarded as binding, and he who treated such an oath lightly was punishable (Wünsche, op. cit. p. 59; Schürer, HJP II. ii. 122).

Our Lord Himself gives other examples of such casuistical distinctions in the matter of oaths in Mt 23¹⁶⁻²². He refers to them here because the full import of His prohibition of oaths might not be realized by those who were familiar with such distinctions. It might be thought that He was merely forbidding a direct appeal to the name of Jehovah. And so He proceeds to show how utterly different is His standpoint on the question of oaths from that of the Rabbinical authorities. They endeavoured to empty the oath of reference to God, so as to narrow the scope of the commandment against perjury. Christ sought to make explicit the reference to God virtually contained in every asseveration, so as to widen the scope of His prohibition of swearing. With this object He takes some of the common forms of oaths which were regarded as less binding, and shows how, though the name of God be not expressly mentioned, they are meaningless unless they involve an appeal to Him. Thus to call heaven or earth to witness our statement is an empty form, unless we be thinking not merely of heaven or earth, but of the Power they suggest, who will punish unfaithfulness (vv. 34^a, 35^a), i.e. God, of whom heaven is the throne and earth the footstool (Is 66¹). To appeal to Jerusalem (v. 35^b) is meaningless unless we be thinking of the great King, who has made Jerusalem His city (Ps 48²). And to swear by one's head (v. 36) involves an appeal to Him in whose hands our destiny lies, and who alone can bring upon our heads the punishment of perjury. For ourselves, we cannot make one hair black or white. Black hair is here used as the symbol of youth; white, of old age. The very colour of our hair, Christ would say, reminds us that we are in the hands of a higher Power. It is to that Power we appeal when we swear by the life of our head. Every form of asseveration, then, Christ concludes, every appeal to anything beside us in confirmation of our word, is an oath, for it virtually involves an appeal to God. All such forms come under Christ's prohibition. His command is: 'Swear not at all; but let your speech be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay' (vv. 34, 37).

These last words have received different interpretations. Beza renders them, 'Let your affirmation be yea, and your negation nay,'—an attempt to bring the present verse into harmony with Ja 5¹² at the sacrifice of grammar. Equally unjustifiable grammatically is Grotius' attempt to secure the same object by his translation, 'Let your yea and nay of speech correspond to a yea and nay of fact,' with the additional fault that it is questionable whether that is the meaning of the passage in James. The simplest way of taking the words is to regard the vai vai, ov ov, as a repetition, such as was common in actual speech (cf. 2 K 10¹⁵, 2 Co 1¹⁷), to confirm a statement. 'Let your speech,' says Christ, 'be a clear and forcible yes or no. For whatsoever is more than these,' He continues, 'cometh ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ.' Again there is difference of opinion as to these last words. Many take them as equivalent to ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου. But B. Weiss (Matthäusevangelium, ad loc.) contends that such a view is incompatible with the fact that the OT requires oaths (Ex 22¹¹), and even puts them into the mouth of God (Gn 22¹⁶ 26³). It is better to take the πονηροῦ as the gen. of the neuter; so that the statement will mean that the oath springs from evil, either in the sense that it is the presence of evil in the world that leads to the oath in confirmation of one's word, and that in the Kingdom of God, in which truth prevails, the oath must altogether disappear (so Weiss), or that the practice of confirming one's statement by an oath springs from the tacit assumption that when one does not so confirm it, one is not bound to speak the truth (so Wendt, Lehre Jesu, ii. 210).

Before proceeding to discuss the conclusion to be drawn from the passage, we must note an interpretation of vv. 34-36 which has gained considerable acceptance, but which puts quite a different meaning upon Christ's prohibition in v. 34 from what we have given above. It is suggested that the prohibition is not meant to embrace all oaths, but merely the thoughtless swearing of everyday life whereby the name of God is profaned (so Calvin, Ewald, Tholuck, and many others). The ὁμοσαι ἄλως of v. 34, it is contended, does not include swearing by God; for, as Ewald (Die drei ersten Evangelien, p. 267) says, that was done only in courts of law, and Christ is not referring to this at all. If He had meant to forbid oaths absolutely, He would certainly have mentioned the direct oath in which the name of God is expressly invoked. As He has not done so, we must conclude that His prohibition is not meant to apply to it, i.e. that He means to forbid only such thoughtless oaths of common life as He proceeds to exemplify.

This attempt to empty the ἄλως of its meaning does not commend itself. It is evidently inspired by fear of the consequences which seem to ensue from the absolute prohibition Christ lays down, and such a motive does not tend to sound exegesis. It fails to do justice to the original. The only permissible translation of μὴ ὁμοσαι ἄλως is that which regards it as an absolute prohibition. Only thus does Christ's position present a proper contrast to that of the Law. The Law forbids swearing falsely; Christ forbids swearing at all. Thus we have a sufficient contrast to, and advance beyond, the position of the Law. But on the present interpretation Christ sets over against the commandment against perjury in the name of God a prohibition merely of frivolous swearing, and that of a kind which does not mention the name of God at all, which is somewhat of an anti-climax. It is true, as the supporters of this interpretation point out, that Christ does not expressly mention the oath by the name of God in the instances He adduces. But it is much more reasonable to suppose that He omits it because it is evident that it is included under the swearing He prohibits, while there may be doubt as to these indirect oaths He specifies, than to argue that, when He prohibits swearing ἄλως, He includes under the prohibition only those forms of oath which were hardly regarded as oaths at all by His contemporaries, and omits the one oath that was universally so esteemed.

We conclude, then, that Christ's word in v. 34 is to be understood as an absolute prohibition of swearing, and that it cannot be restricted to the thoughtless, irrelevant oaths of common life. And it remains to consider in what spirit this absolute prohibition is laid down, and what are the conclusions that follow from it. Christ has Himself given the reason for His prohibition of swearing. Whatsoever goes beyond the distinct and forcible affirmation and negation, He says, cometh of evil (v. 37). As we saw above, this saying may be interpreted in different ways. It may be taken to mean that it is the presence of evil among our fellow-men that necessitates oaths, to convince them of the good faith of the speaker. So Augustine (Sermon on the Mount): 'Tu autem non malum facis, qui bene uteris juratione, quæ, etsi non bona, tamen necessaria est, ut alteri persuadeas quod utiliter persuades, sed a malo est illius, cujus infirmitate jurare cogeris.' But, as Tholuck (Sermon on the Mount, Eng. tr. p. 252 f.) remarks, this is open to a twofold objection—first, that in such a case the evil in question rests with him who requires the oath, whereas all the stress of the prohibition is directed against taking oaths; and, second, that on this interpretation the fulfilment of our Lord's command would be deferred to the realization of that ideal state in which no evil exists, in which case the present command would stand on a different footing from the others of the Sermon on the Mount, which plainly apply to a world in which evil is prevalent. For this reason we accept the other interpretation of the words given above—that whatever goes beyond the plain affirmation and negation cometh of evil, in the sense that behind it is the tacit assumption that, when our word is not confirmed by an oath, we are not bound to adhere strictly to the truth. This brings the present passage into harmony with the general spirit of the Sermon on the Mount. The theme of that Sermon is righteousness of the heart. When Christ opposes His commands to those of the Law, it is to show that He requires more than the Law demanded, that He insists not only upon righteousness of outward conduct, but upon righteousness of the heart. The Law required strict truth whenever an oath was taken. The tendency of the Pharisaic formalism of Christ's day was to keep the letter of the Law by strict fulfilment of one's promise and scrupulous adherence to the truth whenever the Divine name was invoked, but to break its spirit by assuming that whenever such an oath was not taken, greater latitude was allowed. Christ insisted upon such a regard for truth that the absence of the oath should make no difference. To feel that one is more bound by an oath than by one's simple word is to have the spirit of falsehood in one's heart. In such a case whatsoever is more than the direct yea and nay cometh of evil.

Once we realize what is the spirit in which Christ's prohibition is given, we are in a position to decide some of the questions raised as to the practicability of the observance of the command in existing social conditions. If the prohibition is absolute, on what ground can the practice of taking oaths in courts of law be defended? The answer is that the spirit in which the oath is taken in such a case is very different from that which our Lord condemns in the present instance. In a court of law we take the oath to convince our fellow-men, who cannot see our heart and judge of our regard for truth, of our good faith. That is a very different thing from thinking that we are not required to speak the truth unless bound by an oath; and it is the latter view that Christ condemns in His dictum upon swearing. We may still keep the spirit of our Lord's command though we break the letter of it by taking an oath in court, just as we may keep the spirit of many other injunctions of the Sermon on the Mount, e.g. that with regard to praying in private (Mt 6⁶), though we break them in the letter. Christ Himself, according to the Gospel in which the present passage occurs, did not refuse to answer when the high priest adjured Him by the living God (26⁶³). And though Mark omits the adjuration, so that we cannot with confidence appeal to the conduct of Christ Himself on this occasion, all the Gospels represent Him as frequently strengthening His declarations by the solemn ἀμήν, which in the Fourth Gospel becomes ἀμήν ἀμήν. In a word, while the prohibition of swearing is absolute, and is on no account to be modified in the manner we have referred to above, we must remember that what Christ is aiming at is not the mere outward oath, but the spirit of evil which inspired it, and regard as an infraction of His command only such conduct as cometh of the evil He seeks to destroy. When we regard the commandment in that light, there is no need to defer the fulfilment of it to an ideal state. It does not describe the conditions which should prevail between the members of the Kingdom of God only in their relations to one another, but lays down a principle which should guide the member of the Kingdom in his relation to all with whom he comes in contact. And though, owing to the conditions of the society in which he lives, he may have to depart from the strict letter of the precept by taking a solemn oath on occasion, so long as he does not do so from the unworthy motive which inspires the oaths against which Christ contends, he may still claim to remain faithful to the command of Christ.

OBED.—Father of Jesse, mentioned in both genealogies of our Lord (Mt 1⁵, Lk 3²²).

OBEDIENCE.—i. The Obedience of Christ.—1. Christ as a man (see HUMANITY OF CHRIST) came under the obligations of men, and principal among these was the obligation of obedience. This He Himself recognized explicitly. His parents had Him circumcised (Lk 2²¹), and brought Him to Jerusalem according to the custom, to observe the law of the Passover (possibly every year, Lk 2⁴¹⁻⁴²), which custom He subsequently continued personally (Jn 2^{23 51}, cf. 7²⁻¹⁰, Mt 26^{17 17}, etc.). He felt Himself called upon to join in the great religious movements of His day, though not commanded by the Law (Mt 3¹⁵), as well as to observe the political customs (Mt 17²⁷). It was therefore more than a mere expression as to a definite example when He said: 'It becometh us [me] to fulfil all righteousness' (Mt 3¹⁵).

2. The fact of His obedience.—If we test this by the Ten Commandments as substantially embracing the whole moral law, we find His obedience complete. They are mostly prohibitions, and we do not find Him infringing them. It cannot be said that this silence of the Scriptures as to transgressions does not prove His entire conformity to them, and leaves room for the doubt whether His obedience was perfect; since He was surrounded by watchful enemies who magnified variations that were not disobedience, and would have mentioned any real disobedience with eagerness. The honour which He paid to God was as perfect as His perception of the spiritual nature of His worship was clear (Jn 4²⁴). He observed the Sabbath, being found regularly in the synagogue on that day (Lk 4¹⁶ 'as his custom was'). The fact that He did no work that was contrary to the Sabbath commandment, is shown clearly by the fact that He was repeatedly attacked for immaterial things and for exercising His healing power upon that day, for which He successfully defended Himself (Mt 12^{5, 7, 11, 12}). To those of another race and time He may seem to have been lacking on one occasion in respect for His mother, viz. at the marriage in Cana of Galilee (Jn 2⁴). But the appellation 'Woman' was not disrespectful, for it was used in the tenderest way at the cross (Jn 19²⁶); nor was it disrespectful to reprove officious interference; nor was Mary left unsatisfied (v. 5), but expected His compliance with her hinted request. So much for the negative side of the moral law. On its positive side, as comprehensively stated by Him in the words, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself' (Mt 22³⁹), none was ever so zealous of God's honour, or of preserving His own communion with Him (Jn 10^{30 17 11, 21-23, 25}), as Jesus. And love of neighbour, as interpreted first fully by Himself (Lk 10^{30ff.}), He exemplified in all His contact with suffering and needy humanity. Nor did He fail in that harder sort of obedience which consists in quick response to the personal will of God manifested in providence (Mt 4⁴, Lk 2⁴⁹, Jn 12^{27, 28}). His care for the ceremonial law, besides the cases already cited, may be seen by His recommending the lepers whom He cleansed, on two occasions, to observe the law of Moses provided in their case (Lk 5^{14 17 14}).

3. His sinlessness.—We thus see in the life of Jesus no offence against the law of right. There is no evidence of sinfulness. But this would not in itself establish His sinlessness. Many a man gives the impression of a perfect life, is, according to the Scripture phrase, 'blameless,' who is not 'sinless,' because he sees sin in himself, and charges himself with it. But Jesus claimed sinlessness for Himself. He challenged the Jews to convict Him of sin (Jn 8⁴⁶); and He affirmed of Himself that the 'prince of this world' had nothing in Him (Jn 14³⁰). True, this sinlessness was first attained through conflict (cf. Mt 4¹, Jn 12²⁷, Mk 15³⁴), and 'learned' (He 5³), and Jesus Himself shrank from the application to Him of the word 'good' in the absolute sense (Mk 10¹⁸); but it was attained and learned, and this without the experience of failure. Its necessity to the work of redemption gives it its complete dogmatic establishment (cf. He 9^{7, 14 5 9 4 15}); but the proof of its actuality depends, finally, upon the word of Jesus Himself. Were this the testimony of the Jews, who were self-righteous, and thus incapacitated for judging of their true spiritual condition, it would have no value; but it is the testimony of a specially sensitive conscience, one which saw deeper into the meaning of the Law than others, which enjoyed perfect communion with God (Jn 14^{9 12 45}). As such it stands, and is subject to no diminution from our ability to point out defect in Him. As a challenge, it was not met by His adversaries, evidently because they could not meet it. See, further, art. SINLESSNESS.

4. His superiority to the Law.—His obedience may be conceived, on the one side, as His perfect subjection to the Law. But, on the other side, He was superior to the Law. In respect to infringements of the law of the Sabbath with which He was charged, He did not simply defend Himself by saying that He alone rightly interpreted the law, but He proclaimed His superiority to it. 'The Son of Man is Lord even of the sabbath' (Mk 2²⁸). He set aside certain of the provisions of the Law (Mt 5²⁸); but He did a more significant thing in deepening the meaning of others (Mt 5^{27ff.}). He revealed the true meaning of the Law when He brought it back to its foundation in the all-embracing law of love. The element of the Law which He modified was, therefore, the external, the scaffolding or clothing of the legal principle, not the fundamental meaning of the Law. He came also to 'fulfil' the Law (Mt 5¹⁷); and this meant to fill out (πληρώω), and hence to set it aside as completed and its design accomplished. In the later form of the Apostolic doctrine Jesus was called the 'end of the law' (Ro 10⁴), in the sense that He provided a new way of salvation, which had formerly had to be attained through the observance of the Law. This was particularly through the sacrifice of Himself (He 10⁶⁻¹⁴) by which He brought the whole OT system to an end, and for ever cancelled the ceremonial law. When the same idea appears in St. John's Gospel (3¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 6⁵¹ 10¹⁷), it may be thought to belong to the same stratum of later teaching; but it is reflected in the earliest form of the Gospel (Mk 10⁴⁵), it appears in the institution of the Lord's Supper (Mt 26²⁸), and is accordingly to be regarded as the primal and unvarying substance of the Gospel. The Law, then, is abrogated because its object has been attained, and its definite and peculiar prescriptions may give way to more general and spiritual forms of precept. The emphasis is hereafter to be laid not upon the letter, but upon the spirit (2 Co 3³). See LAW, LAW OF GOD.

5. The capital article of His obedience—the Death upon the Cross.—The later strata of the Gospel history lay emphasis upon the fact that the death of Christ was a subject of the Divine command. Thus Jesus says, according to St. John, 'This commandment [viz. to lay down my life] I received from the Father' (10¹⁸). In 12²⁷, shrinking from the foreseen suffering of the cross, He says, 'For this cause [viz. to suffer the death of the cross, cf. v. 32] came I unto this hour.' The same idea, that His death upon the cross was the essential part of His work which He came into the world to do, and which was laid upon Him by the Father, appears in many other texts in this Gospel, implied where not explicitly stated (cf. 3¹⁴ 6³⁸, 50, 51, 58 8²¹ 10¹¹ 14³⁰, 31 17¹³ 19³⁰). The same conception is fully developed in the other portions of the NT which belong to the same period of development with this Gospel, particularly in Philipians (2⁸) and the Epistle to the Hebrews (5⁷⁻⁸ 10¹⁰). But it is also indicated in the earliest strata. In Mk 10⁴⁵ Jesus Himself says that He has come, 'not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.' The whole Gospel story is displayed, as it were, upon the black background of the darkness and sufferings of Calvary. Prophecies by Jesus Himself of His own death begin to appear at an early period by intimation (Mt 10³⁸, cf. 16²⁴), and at a period still long before the final Passion in more explicit and frequent utterance (Mt 16²¹⁻²⁸ ||; 17³⁰, according to || Lk 9³¹; 17²², 23 ||; 20¹⁷⁻¹⁹ ||). There is evidence in these passages, taken as a whole, and regarded as containing the concurrent and consistent Evangelical idea of the death of Christ, that to Christ the burden of death consisted partly in its physical pain, from which One shrank who possessed the instinct of life among other human qualities (see HUMANITY OF CHRIST), but still more as something unbecoming to the pure and holy Son of God, associated, as it was in human history, with the idea of sin and condemnation. Or, as St. Paul expresses it (Gal 3¹³), it was a curse which He did not lightly take upon Himself. Two things result from this method of considering the death of Christ: (1) that it measures the highest degree of devotion to the salvation of men; and (2) that it was effective because it lay in the will of God, to which Christ was obedient, not assuming it Himself, as a desperate and uncertain remedy, but accepting it as the God-designed path of propitiation and redemption.

6. The relation of Christ's obedience to the salvation of men.—The relation of the sacrifice, which was the main article of His obedience, to the salvation of men is considered elsewhere (see ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION, SACRIFICE, etc.). No text of the Gospels presents the obedience of Christ, strictly considered, as having a connexion with our salvation, except as His moral perfection was among the qualifications for the office of Saviour. The inference which has been made, that the obedience of Christ itself formed a part of His saving work, has been drawn from such texts as Ro 5¹⁹ ('through the obedience of the one shall the many be made righteous'). But this idea receives no support from the Gospels, and none from the text cited itself, when carefully interpreted. The thought of the Apostle is unfolded here in a series of parallel expressions, in which, on the one side, Adam's 'trespass,' 'sin,' 'disobedience,' and, on the other side, Christ's 'grace,' 'gift by grace,' 'free gift,' 'righteousness,' 'act of righteousness,' 'obedience,' are mentioned as equal to one another, and as contrasted, the one side with the other. The obedience of Christ here considered is, therefore, His act of obedience, or His atoning death. The act of obedience saves, not as obedience, but as atonement.

7. The significance of Christ's obedience for religion arises from the exaltation which it affords of the Person of Christ. As the victorious contestant and the perfect character, He calls out the veneration and enthusiastic loyalty of His followers, incites them to greater efforts, and fills them with loftier courage than any imperfect prophet could do, however excellent otherwise, and thus becomes the true 'exemplar and leader' (ἀρχηγός, He 12²) of our faith.

ii. Our obedience.—Christ came not only as a Teacher and Redeemer, but also as an Example. It might be said of all His life, as He said when He washed the disciples' feet, 'I have given you an example, that ye also should do as I have done to you' (Jn 13¹⁵). As the object of all His work was to reveal the Father, and he that had 'seen him had seen the Father' (Jn 14⁹), so he who did as Jesus did obeyed the will of the Father, which was perfectly exemplified in Him (Jn 8²⁹). Indeed, this was the necessary consequence of His teaching office, for He always said in fact if not by word, 'Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me' (Mt 11²⁹). It was His purpose in the world to bear witness to the truth (Jn 18³⁷), and to do this not merely by word, but by right deed. Hence the obedience of Christ is the standard of our obedience. We are to be 'perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect' (Mt 5⁴⁸), and that perfection is the perfection which is manifested in the Son. At the same time, as performance falls far short of ideal in other human things, so here. There is no example given us in the Gospels of the attainment by a disciple of such perfection as was in the Master. Peter who denied Him, Thomas who could not believe His resurrection, John and James who were fired by an unholy ambition, were the chief among the Twelve, and doubtless as successful as the others. Even after Pentecost, Paul and Barnabas had a sharp contention. All had 'the treasure in earthen vessels.'

The obedience which Christ asks of us is an obedience of the spirit rather than of the letter. He says in one place, 'If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love' (Jn 15¹⁰); but when we ask what the commandments of Jesus are, we find few which, in the form in which they are given, have direct application to the conditions of modern life. He refers to the Ten Commandments when the young man asks what he shall do to inherit eternal life (Mt 19¹⁶); but when the young man is not satisfied, He gives him a test which was not in any of the Commandments nor of any general application to men, 'Go, sell, and give to the poor' (Mt 19²¹). His own observance of the Sabbath was not according to the customs of the Jews (Mt 12⁸). He went beneath the letter of the Law to its spirit, and this was His demand of men, that they should obey the spirit of the Law. Hence He reduces the Law to its essential and comprehensive element of love (Mt 22³⁷⁻³⁹), which, if a man observe, will constitute the fulfilling of the Law (cf. Ro 13⁸). And thus the attitude of one who is evangelically obedient is not that of an anxious inquirer as to every specific commandment and consequent duty, but that of one who freely wills to do the will of God, is animated by the spirit of love, and out of its abounding fullness, by the indwelling Spirit (Ro 8⁴, cf. Jn 16¹³ 17¹⁷), does what is well-pleasing to God. Such a person might conceivably err as to duty in some specific case, because of lack of enlightenment, but if he has the spirit of obedience, he has substantially obeyed. The spirit will bring him into eventual accord with the objective demands of reason and conscience.

At the same time, none of the specific commands of the Decalogue are set aside. Even the Sabbath was observed by Jesus Himself and by His disciples after Him. The ethical results of the Jewish development were, therefore, conserved by Jesus, who added to them the more spiritual interpretation of the facts of history and experience, and to this extent made them richer and more comprehensive. Not merely judicial false witness (Ex 20¹⁶ לֹא תִשָּׁבַע), but every form of lying (ψεῦδος, as the absence of all ἀλήθεια, Jn 8⁴⁴), come under His disapproval (as already in Pr 26²⁸).

The great standard and guide of our obedience therefore becomes the will of God as manifested both in His written word and in His providence. It is not so much the general will of God that we are to seek to learn. This is generally easy to understand and recognize. It is His specific will, as manifested in the course of events, in the unfoldings of our personal history, that we are to learn how to understand and fulfil. Thus obedience rests upon the study of history both general and individual to ourselves (Mt 26³⁹, cf. Jn 4³⁴ 5³⁰), and consists fundamentally in submission to the Divine will.

Sin is therefore not to be conceived of as merely disobedience to specific precepts of the Law. It is this; but it has its secret in the failure to adjust oneself to the will of God as such. Obedience is not profession empty of definite good works (Mt 7²¹); it is not even always to be found with those who 'prophesy' and perform miracles (Mt 7²²). The emphasis in the Gospels is laid upon 'faith' in Jesus Christ as fully as it is in the Epistles. This granted, as the important and controlling element of the religious life, obedience follows from it as a matter of course. Such obedience, however defective in form, is genuine obedience, acceptable in God's sight. This is because God wants the man, not his acts; his heart, and not any material gift. With the heart will naturally be given to God every other desirable service.

Hence the penalty of disobedience, since this is essentially difference with God, is first of all separation from Him. It is 'darkness' because men refuse the 'light' (Jn 1¹¹ 3¹⁸⁻²¹). The sinner is in his 'own place' (Ac 1²⁵), the place fit for him because he is what he is. The penalty involves pain (Mt 13⁵⁰, cf. Rev 14¹¹), is judicial (Mt 25³¹ etc.), and involves the personal disapproval of God (Mt 25⁴¹); but it is, in a high sense, natural and inevitable. The wicked man, being what he is, cannot meet with any other lot than what he has. Obedience, on the other hand, leads to reward. This is not 'deserved,' and so given as a matter of justice.

Sinners will always 'deserve' punishment. But God freely rewards the forgiven sinner whose heart is right with Him, because of His own goodness, that He may express His favour. Thus the lot of the saved man is the reverse of the sinner's, and is a state of blessedness in the presence of God.

OBSCURITY.—Those who are called from darkness to light do not perform the journey instantaneously, and so must be conscious of obscurity, in various ways and to different degrees, in their progressive apprehension of the gospel of Christ. Yet we are assured that nothing is hid, save that it should be manifested (Mk 4²²); and the Holy Spirit is promised us for guidance into all the truth (Jn 14²⁶ 16¹³). All four Gospels speak of a clouding of the eyes and dulling of the ears of the perverse (Mt 13¹³, Mk 4¹², Lk 8¹⁰, Jn 12⁴⁰). To the heedful and amenable the teaching will be made plainer and plainer (Lk 8¹⁸ 10²¹). To the haughty and cunning nothing clear can be vouchsafed (Lk 13³²). In teaching by parables there was necessarily an element of obscurity; but this stumbling-block Christ frequently removed (Mt 13³⁵), and promised the clearance of all hindrances to the perfect knowledge of God (Jn 16¹³, 25). Obscurity was not infrequently felt by the Apostles in their efforts to discern the meaning of the Lord's other utterances. The teaching about the eternal food of His flesh and blood for the life of the world was felt to be 'a hard saying' (Jn 6⁶⁰). The foretelling of His cruel death and glorious resurrection was not at first understood (Lk 18³⁴). Indeed, the Apostles experienced a signal opening of mind after the Resurrection in respect of the prophecies implying His Passion (Lk 24⁴⁵). Thus in the Last Discourse they are found exclaiming, 'We know not what he saith' (Jn 16¹⁸); and a little later they gratefully confess, 'Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no proverb' (Jn 16²⁹). Obscurity there must often be when spiritual realities are expressed by the inadequate vehicle of human vocabulary. Such an instance may be: 'This is your hour, and the power of darkness' (Lk 22⁶³). The living spirit cannot be expressed by the dead letter except in similitudes and allegories (Jn 3⁹). When the Infinite strives to find portrayal in the finite, there must be what we call obscurity. Richness of significance and application attaches to heavenly truths which might at first seem obscure (Jn 3³¹). Obscurity must disappear more and more, for the darkness cannot confine the Light of the world within any bounds (Jn 1⁵ 8¹² 9⁵). The steadfast disciple will learn to understand His speech (Jn 8⁴³), and release from obscurity will convey increase of freedom (Jn 8³²). The gospel is not meant to remain obscure (Mt 5¹⁶).

OBSERVATION.—This word occurs only once in the NT, viz. Lk 17²⁰ 'The Kingdom of God cometh not with observation' (μετὰ παρατηρήσεως). The verbal form (παρατηρέω) is used: (a) for watching carefully, especially in a bad sense, as a spy or with the object of finding fault (e.g. Lk 20²⁰); (b) for keeping a religious ordinance (Gal 4¹⁰). This second sense is impossible in the place where the substantive occurs; nor can the malignant sense of (a) be here suggested. The meaning seems to be that the Kingdom will come in such a way that even the close watchers may not discover its approach. The reason given for this assertion is that 'the kingdom of God is within [(ἐντός) or "among" (so Syr^{sin})] you' (Lk 17²¹). Whichever meaning we give to the preposition, a spiritual and therefore invisible presence is indicated. This statement appears to be contradicted by v.²⁴, where 'the Son of Man in his day' is compared to 'lightning when it lighteneth out of the one part under the heaven' and 'shineth unto the other part under the heaven.'

Four explanations of the apparent contradiction have been proposed: (1) that the earlier verse refers to the Pharisees, who are blind to the signs of the new age, and the later to the disciples, who will have their eyes opened to see it (cf. 2 K 6¹⁷); (2) that the coming of the Kingdom is a different event from the Parousia of Christ, 'the Son of Man in his day'; (3) that there is no contradiction between the two passages; because while, on the one hand, there will be nothing for the watcher to discern as indicative of the drawing near of the great event, this being sudden as a flash of lightning, when it has come it will be universally apparent; (4) that the reference to the lightning manifestation is an apocalyptic element from a foreign source that has been inserted, with other similar elements, among the genuine teachings of Jesus. Against (1) is (a) the lack of any discrimination between two classes of hearers, and (b) the breadth of the lightning-like manifestation, which does not indicate a secret revelation for the few, but what all the world can see. Against (2) is the fact that elsewhere the coming of the Kingdom and the coming of Christ are regarded as the same event (e.g. cf. Mt 16²⁸ with Mk 9¹). Against (3) is the indication of signs, such as, 'Now learn a parable of the fig-tree,' etc. (Mt 24³², Mk 13²⁸, cf. Lk 21²⁹). Explanation (4) is to cut the knot, and against it is the fact that not this passage only but many other equally inconvenient passages would have to be removed by an arbitrary process. Thus all four proposed explanations are beset with difficulties.

H. Holtzmann points out that παρατήρησις should be understood in an active sense; it is not to be regarded as a conceivable attribute of the Kingdom, but as associated with the bringing about of the Kingdom. Accordingly, perhaps, we should reconcile the sayings thus: Sharp, critical watching will not bring it. They who busy themselves with this unsympathetic action will neither hasten its coming nor perceive the first signs of its appearance. In its beginning it is already present (ἐντός ὑμῶν ἐστίν). Yet those who practise παρατήρησις do not perceive this. Nevertheless, the complete revelation of the Christ in His Kingdom will be universally manifest.

OCCUPATION.—This word is not found in the Gospels. It occurs elsewhere twice in the AV (Ac 18³ [τέχνη] and 19²⁵ [περὶ τὰ ροαῖα]). 'Occupy,' in the sense of 'do business,' 'traffic,' 'trade' (so RV), is found in AV of Lk 19²³ as the rendering of παραματεύομαι. Christ, as well as His reputed father, was Himself an artificer in wood, or a carpenter (τέκτων). Every Jewish boy, indeed, had to learn a trade (τέχνη), that it might stand between him and destitution if other resources failed. And however far removed our Lord might be in later life from quondam fellow-craftsmen, this technical education kept Him in touch with His industrial compatriots.

Our Lord's attitude towards the various occupations in which men are engaged is of more interest than details regarding the occupations themselves.

Judaism in Christ's day had lost hold of the masses, because its ministers urged a law viewed by themselves in false perspective. Christ denounced them for tithing mint, anise, and cummin, while omitting the weightier matters, judgment, mercy, and faith (Mt 23²³). Hence work and worship were largely divorced. People indulged in pagan-like worry over the question, What shall we eat, and what shall we drink, and wherewith shall we be clothed? instead of seeking first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness (Mt 6^{31ff.}). But Christ's strenuous example proved the possibility of being diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. 'I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work' (Jn 9⁴). He never allowed danger to interfere with duty—'Are there not twelve hours in the day? If any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world. But if a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him' (Jn 11⁹⁻¹⁰). Christ poured contempt on that monastic spirit which creates artificial distinctions and exalts religious officials, devoid of religious motives, at the expense of those who, though engaged in less responsible callings, are more devout. He reproached the Pharisee who thanked God for his superiority to other men; and justified the Publican who was a butt for his fellow-worshipper's sneers (Lk 18^{10ff.}). He rebuked Simon, haughtily hospitable, and commended the kindly woman, whose love exceeded her pride (Lk 7^{44ff.}). He held up the priest and Levite to perennial scorn; and crowned with approbation that Samaritan who proved more humane, if he did not profess to be as holy as they (Lk 10^{30ff.}). St. Luke relates with professional delight how Jesus defended His own act of healing on the Sabbath day, against the false spirituality that saw in it a breach of the Fourth Commandment (13¹⁶, 14^{2ff.}).

A legitimate inference from all this is that our Lord—with His healthy outlook on life—would encourage all the honest occupations which ministered to man's varied needs. The Apostles' teaching surely reflected the mind of their Master on this subject. If eating and drinking could contribute to the glory of God (1 Co 10³¹), then all the occupations which provided food and drink could be pursued in the same spirit. St. Paul enjoins on bishops and other teachers of the gospel to inculcate upon Christians that they should maintain good works for necessary uses (Tit 3¹⁴). That means for the support of themselves and families, and relief of the needy. This is a duty as imperative in its own place as the duty of the ministry, and the Apostle lays great stress on it. 'This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men' (Tit 3⁸), i.e. of general benefit and advantage to mankind. Thus a man's occupation, instead of being a hindrance to religion, is a part of it,—that sphere in which he can prove himself a doer of the word,—and faithfulness is required there as much as anywhere else (Lk 16¹⁰). OFFENCE.—This article deals with the ideas connected with the words σκάνδαλον and σκανδαλίσειν, and, in so far as they are applied in the same moral sphere, with those suggested by προσκόπτειν, πρόσκομμα, and ἀπρόσκοπος. The literal meaning of σκάνδαλον, which is probably the Alexandrian form of σκανδάληθρον, may be the part of a trap to which the bait is fastened, and which, when it is touched, springs up and catches the victim; but in Scripture the sense is not so definite. It may be questioned, indeed, whether it is ever used literally; and the figurative or ethical use of it, which is peculiar to Scripture, is what we are now to investigate. The one idea which is constant in every use of the word, literal or figurative, is that of hurt sustained; it may even be of ruin incurred, by the person who encounters the σκάνδαλον. It will be convenient to exhibit the Scriptural view of the subject by referring (1) to the experience of Jesus; (2) to the teaching of Jesus; and (3) to the application of this in the Apostolic Church.

1. Experience of Jesus.—When Jesus visited Nazareth, and taught in the synagogue so that all were astonished, astonishment soon passed into a kind of carping criticism. 'Whence hath this man these things, and what is the wisdom that has been given to him? And these mighty works that are being done by him? Is not this the carpenter?' And so on (Mk 6²⁴ ||). The people had been used to Jesus in one aspect or character, and they could not adjust themselves to Him in another. There was something in His present appearance and claims which they could not get over: as the Evangelists put it, ἐσκάνδαλιζόντο ἐν αὐτῷ. Jesus Himself was the σκάνδαλον with which, for the time at least, they collided: it was to their hurt even at the moment (He could do no mighty work there because of their unbelief, 6⁵), and it would be their ruin if it were their final attitude. Probably before Jesus can become a σκάνδαλον, men must have felt the attraction in Him: it is only when closer acquaintance reveals something in Him, or in the consequences of attachment to Him, which is repellent to the natural man, that He becomes a σκάνδαλον, and those who were once attracted fall away. They stumble at something which attachment to Him involves; they cannot get over it, and so they desert Him. This is the connexion in which σκανδαλιζεσθαι occurs in Mk 14²⁷⁻²⁹ and ||. Jesus on the last night of His life recalls to the Twelve the prophecy of Zechariah (13⁷): 'I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered,' and applies it by adding, 'All ye σκανδαλισθήσεσθε ἐν ἐμοί ἐν τῇ νυκτὶ ταύτῃ.' They had felt the charm of Jesus, and continued with Him in His temptations so far; but a Messiah who should be seized, tortured, and crucified by sinners would be too much for them. In spite of all they had seen and felt in Him, they would stumble at this, and leave Him in the lurch. It is the same idea, mutatis mutandis, which is found in Mk 4¹⁷ and || Mt.; the rocky ground hearers, who have shown a warm appreciation of the word, are taken aback when they find that they have to endure persecution because of it, and 'immediately they are offended.' Lk 8¹³ gives the correct interpretation: 'in time of temptation they fall away.' The parable of the Sower, standing where it does, is not so much a prophecy, though it is prophetic, as a summary of the disenchanting experiences of Jesus. He had seen many enthusiasms chill, the moment fidelity to Him exacted any sacrifice. In one sense this is 'the offence of the cross,' though it is not what St. Paul means by this expression. We are in the same circle of ideas in Mt 24^{9f}, Jn 16^{1f}. Jesus warns His disciples of coming persecutions; they as well as He have the cross to bear; and while many will stumble at it,—that is, find it too much for them, a thing which they cannot get over, and must simply decline,—He tells the Twelve beforehand, that being forewarned they may be forearmed against the peril of apostasy.

One of the most striking instances of σκάνδαλον in the experience of Jesus is that which is connected with John the Baptist. John was evidently disappointed somehow in Jesus. He had had reason to regard Him as the Messiah, but He was not the Messiah John had expected. Where were the axe and the fan and the consuming fire? Why, if the Messiah had really come, were not all wrongs irresistibly righted? Why was a true servant of God like himself left to suffer for fidelity to his Master? It is to this temper in John that Jesus says, 'Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me' (Mt 11⁶, Lk 7²³). We must not impose our preconceptions on God, and dictate to Him the terms on which He may have recognition from us. This always implies the risk that we may stumble at what He actually does—refuse to recognize Him in Jesus because the manifestation does not square with our demands. The Baptist here is a perfect illustration of St. Paul's words, written in immediate connexion with his idea of Christ as σκάνδαλον: 'Jews claim signs.' They say, Let God signalize His presence; let Him make bare His holy arm, and break in pieces the oppressor, and we will see and believe Him; and when they see nothing of this in Jesus, they stumble at Him. He becomes a σκάνδαλον to them. And just as Jesus in His acts may become an offence to those who anticipated something quite different, so may He be by anything disconcerting or too challenging in His teaching. Thus the Pharisees in Mt 15¹² were offended by the word in which He seemed to abolish the distinction between clean and unclean meats: they could not get over the idea that a distinction on which so much of their sanctity depended should be so summarily swept away. It finally repelled them from Jesus. And in Jn 6⁶¹ we find disciples put out, as it were, by the hard sayings about eating the flesh of the Son of Man, and drinking His blood: it is almost more than they can stand, and Jesus asks τοῦτο ὑμῶς σκανδαλίζει; 'Doth this cause you to stumble?' Almost anything in Jesus may become a ground of stumbling—the demands He makes, the sacrifices which fidelity to Him entails, His disappointment of our expectations, the paradoxical and apparently impossible elements of His teaching. And all these become grounds of stumbling to those who have made some acquaintance with Him, been to some degree attracted and held by Him. To be offended in Him is the sin of those who have had the opportunity of being disciples.

Even though the words σκάνδαλον, σκανδαλιζω, are not used at every point, the whole of the central division of the Gospel according to Matthew (chs. 11–18) may be read as a series of illustrations of them. In ch. 11 we have the Baptist, the whole generation (v. 16^{ff}), the favoured cities (20^{ff}), and especially the wise and prudent (v. 25), offended in Jesus. In ch. 12 we have first the Pharisees, and then His mother and brothers. In ch. 13 the parable of the Sower gives the keynote: it is the experience of one who knows what it is to be an offence: cf. vv. 21, 41. In ch. 14 there is the miraculous feeding with which the great 'offence' proved in Jn 6^{14f}. 66 is connected. Then cf. 15¹² 16²³ 17¹⁷. 27 18^{6ff}.

There is another side to the experience of Jesus, that in which the σκάνδαλον is not found in Him, but presented to Him. In Mt 16²³ He says to Peter σκάνδαλον εἶ ἐμοῦ. He had been telling His disciples for the first time of the necessity of His death, and Peter had made a vivacious remonstrance. He had tried, in short, to put Jesus at fault about the path appointed for Him by the Father. He had the human temper which avoids suffering at all costs, not the Divine love which at any cost is faithful to its calling; and in yielding to his human temper he had made himself a stumbling-block in Jesus' way. It is a signal illustration of 'a man's foes shall be they of his own household.' But Jesus does not stumble: in ὑπάγε ὀπίσω μου, σατανά, He sweeps the σκάνδαλον from His path.

2. Teaching of Jesus.—It is remarkable that almost the only thing approaching to a discourse of Jesus in our earliest Gospel (if we omit the chapter of parables (ch. 4) and the eschatological discourse (ch. 13)) deals with the subject of offences, and this in both the aspects in which we have seen 'offence' appear in the experience of Jesus: Mk 9²⁵.

(a) There is first the giving of offence to others. The others are conceived as disciples—'little ones who believe' (Mt 18⁶ says 'who believe in me'). To 'offend' such means to be responsible for leading them into sin; and when we think what and whose they are, it means to be responsible for their separation by sin from Christ. Thus to mislead 'the little ones who believe' is for Jesus the sin of sins: all the Evangelists record the terrific words in which He denounced it (Mk 9², Mt 18⁶, Lk 17²). It is singular that side by side with this both Mt. and Lk. preserve a saying in which the inevitableness of offences coming is admitted, while unabated woe is pronounced on him through whom they come. Nothing is said by Jesus about how they come, that is, about the ways in which the little ones who believe are led into sins which put them at fault about Him; but what has been said above about Jesus as a σκάνδαλον has its application here. What is meant is in principle to seduce them to ways of thinking or acting such as led men to stumble at Jesus while He lived. It is only in the Christian society that this sin can be committed, and there is something peculiarly solemn in the picture of the Last Judgment in Mt 13⁴¹: the Son of Man shall send His angels, and they shall gather out of His kingdom πάντα τὰ σκάνδαλα. There is in the life of Jesus one very interesting illustration of His own care in avoiding what might cause others to stumble (Mt 17²⁴⁻²⁷). Here we see—what will repeatedly come up later—that an inconsiderate use of our spiritual liberty as children of God may prove a stumbling-block to those who do not understand it; and we are taught by the example and word of Jesus that conduct is never to be decided merely by the abstract principle that this or that is in itself legitimate; part of the motive on which a Christian must always act is consideration for others, and the moral significance of his conduct for them. Of course, there is the complementary consideration of what the principle requires, and though it is not to be pressed to the hurt of 'little ones who believe,' it is not to be sacrificed to obscurantists or hypocrites (see for an illustration of this Mt 15¹²⁻¹⁴). All this will reappear in what is sometimes regarded as the characteristically Pauline part of NT teaching.

(b) Equally important with His sayings on causing others to stumble are those in which Jesus warns His disciples against allowing anything to cause themselves to stumble. There are three of these in Mk 9^{43, 45, 47} (vv. 44, 46 are spurious), and they are found twice in Mt. (5^{29, 30}, 18⁶). It is a fair inference from this that, though Lk. does not give them, they were found in the collection of discourses used by him and Mt. as well as in Mk. (Mt. inserting them in his Gospel from both sources), and therefore that they belong to the most surely authenticated words of Jesus. What Jesus contemplates is that one's hand or foot or eye may cause one to stumble—in other words, that something in his nature, something which is in itself legitimate, may mislead one in the spiritual region and alienate him from Christ; and He declares that to prevent such a catastrophe no severity to nature can be too great. The right eye is to be plucked out, the right hand or foot cut off and cast away: it is better to enter into life halt or maimed or with one eye, than to go with two eyes and feet and hands into the everlasting fire. It is easy to argue against this from the point of view of self-realization and the development of all sides of our nature, but the peremptory and vehement tone of Jesus does not suggest arguing. For men whose nature is what ours is, living in the world in which we live, and called to discipleship to Jesus, situations will emerge in which salvation depends simply on whether we have it in us to subject nature to summary and surgical treatment. If a man will do no violence to his nature, but claims liberty for it on every side,—if he will go wherever his feet can carry him, do whatever his hands itch to do, look at whatever his eyes long to see,—the end will not be a complete and rounded character, it will be the forfeiture of all character; it will not be an abundant entrance into life, it will be hell fire. This is the philosophy of Puritanism. It is relative no doubt to human nature as Jesus knew it and as we know it; but as that is the only human nature we have to do with, it is absolute enough. It is as much a matter of life and death in the teaching of Jesus that we should not allow natural impulses to put us at fault about Him, as that we should not become responsible for putting others at fault. The most passionate words that ever fell from His lips deal with σκανδαλίζειν and σκανδαλίσσθαι in both these vital aspects.

3. The Apostolic Church.—When we pass from Jesus to the Apostolic writings, we find new illustrations and applications of His teaching, but no new ethical ideas. Thus the conception recurs (a) of Christ Himself as σκάνδαλον. In the gospel which presented a crucified man as the power and the wisdom of God, there was something which people could not get over; they stumbled at it and turned away. This was especially true of the Jews (1 Co 1²³). They could not accommodate themselves to a Messiah who had been hanged, especially when they thought of Dt 21²³. As the act of striking against an obstacle is often painful and irritating, it was this offence of the cross which explained the persecution of St. Paul by the Jews, and even by Christians who did not know what Christianity meant (Gal 5¹¹): it was the reaction of their soreness against what caused it. The early Christians, who had naturally difficulty in understanding how Christ could be, a stumbling-block, found relief for their minds in this as in similar perplexities by discovering that the disconcerting fact had been predicted in the OT. It lay not outside of, but within the Divine counsel and plan. In Ro 9³³, 1 P 2⁸, Christ is spoken of as λίθος προσκόμματος (a loose stone on the road against which the traveller strikes his foot = פּוֹרְקָן) and πέτρα σκάνδαλον (a rock projecting through the soil, over which he falls = עֲבָרָה). [On the relation of these two passages to each other and to Is 8¹⁴ 28¹⁶, see Sanday and Headlam on Romans, and Hort on 1 Pet.]. What it was in Christ over which men stumbled, Peter does not say: but in Paul it is clear that what the Jews could not get over was the demand involved in Christ's atoning death, that they should renounce the pursuit of a righteousness of their own, and humble themselves to receive in faith the gift of a Divine righteousness. It was the cross that was a stumbling-block, and it was a stumbling-block to pride.

(b) In the main, however, σκάνδαλον is discussed in the Apostolic writings in connexion with the possibility that Christians may cause others, especially weaker Christians, to stumble, and so to forfeit their connexion with Christ. The danger of doing this is the more serious that it is possible to do it (so to speak) with a good conscience. It comes up mainly in 1 Co 8-10 and Ro 14. In both these passages the central idea is that of Christian liberty, and the problem is what are the Christian conditions of its exercise. There are minds which are intoxicated by it, and will not hear anything of conditions. They know what the Christian principle is, and to determine their conduct they do not need to think of anything else. They know, for example, that an idol is nothing in the world, and that is enough to answer all questions about their relation to idolatry—about buying and eating meat which had been sacrificed in a pagan temple, about attending a pagan friend's feast in the temple, and so forth. They know that the earth is the Lord's, and all that it contains; and that is enough to answer all questions about eating and drinking. In this region all things are lawful for them. It is at this point that St. Paul interposes in the spirit of Mt 17²⁴⁻²⁷ (see above, 2 a). The knowledge of the Christian principle, he insists, is not enough. He accepts the principle, with a half-ironical depreciation of it: 'We know that we all have knowledge'—as if he would say, but that does not carry us far (1 Co 8¹). In dealing with conduct we must always consider its moral consequences, both to others and to ourselves; we must consider not only an abstract principle, which may in itself be sound enough, but the practical effect of acting upon it in given conditions. We must consider, in particular, whether it may not cause others or ourselves to stumble. These are distinct questions, yet involved in each other. If we cause another to stumble by what we do, our own ruin is inseparable from his. St. Paul accepts the principle of liberty, but qualifies it in both directions to avoid σκανδαλίζειν and σκανδαλίζεσθαι. Thus he writes, 'All things are lawful for me, but all things do not edify,' sc. the Church (1 Co 10²³); and the edifying or building up of the Church is the rule of all Christian action (1 Co 14²⁶, Ro 14¹⁹ 15²). To be Christian, in other words, conduct has to be guided not merely by knowledge, but by love. It has to include a reference to Christ's interest in others, especially in the weak; a Christian sins grievously when he asserts his liberty in disregard of that. The extraordinary vehemence of St. Paul's language in discussing this subject reminds us vividly of our Lord's words in the same connexion. 'For meat destroy not the work of God' (Ro 14²⁰). 'Through thy knowledge he that is weak perisheth, the brother for whose sake Christ died' (1 Co 8¹¹). 'If meat maketh my brother to stumble, I will eat no flesh for evermore' (1 Co 8¹³). 'Who is made to stumble, and I am not on fire with pain?' (2 Co 11²⁹). These are flashes of the same fire which glows in Mt 18⁹⁻⁹. The use of Christian liberty in an environment of paganism no doubt presented many moral problems, all with possibilities of σκανδαλον in them. A false solution, legitimating a free relation to pagan worship and its ordinary festive and sensual accompaniments, which no doubt caused many to stumble, is denounced in Rev 2¹⁴; possibly in the 'Apostolic decree' of Ac 15^{28f.} we have a more considerate and Christian solution for a special set of circumstances. (For the interpretation of the decree, practically in this sense, see Lightfoot, Galatians, 306 ff.; Chase, Credibility of the Acts, 96 f.). In the whole region in which liberty can be asserted, it is to be exercised only in subordination to love; to violate this rule and so injure others in their conscience and in their relation to Christ is the most un-Christian sin of which a Christian can be guilty. But Paul is aware of the other side of σκανδαλίζειν also—that in which a man so acts as to lead to his own stumbling, and the perdition of his own soul. 'All things are lawful for me,' but not only do all things not build up the Church, but 'I will not be tyrannized over by any' (1 Co 6¹²). A man may be befooled by his wisdom: if he is puffed up in the consciousness that he comprehends the principles of Christianity, he is quite capable of yielding to his natural appetites under the delusion that he is exercising a Christian liberty. St. Paul dreaded this for himself. 1 Co 9²⁴⁻²⁷—especially after v. 1 'Am I not free?'—is written in the very spirit of Mk 9³³⁻⁴⁷, and in 1 Co 10 the Apostle warns his converts of the peril which awaits them, if secure in their Christianity they slip into easy relations with paganism. In the end of this chapter the idea of offence is generalized. 'Show yourselves ἀπρόσκοποι—persons in whom there is no occasion of stumbling—both to Jews and Gentiles and to the Church of God' (1 Co 10³²). This is a final if not the supreme maxim of Christian ethics; there must be nothing in the Christian's conduct which could mislead, disconcert, or repel any person seeking or enjoying relations with Christ. Put positively, it is the rule of the Apostle's own action: 'I have become all things to all men if by all means I might save some' (1 Co 9²²); which again is but one form of the Golden Rule. Hence the teaching of the NT on 'offences' can be summed up in Mt 7¹². The only passage in which σκανδαλον occurs in Jn. (1 Jn 2¹⁰) perhaps combines the two references which it has elsewhere. When a Christian loves his brother, there is no σκανδαλον in him; he does not cause others to stumble, and he does not create difficulties in his own path. 'The triumph of love is that it creates no prejudice against the Truth' ('Wescott, ad loc.).

OFFERINGS.—

In the technical sense, implying a formal ceremonial act, three Gr. words are represented by 'offer,' 'offering,' in the RV: (1) προσφέρειν, to bring to or near, the general term for the act of worshipper or priest, Mt 5²³, 24 8⁴ (= Mk 14⁴, Lk 5¹⁴), Jn 16²; (2) ἀνάθημα, a votive offering set up in a temple (Lk 21⁹); (3) δίδωμι, to give (Lk 22⁴, cf. Lk 21⁴).

The attitude of Jesus to the ceremonial law is, in part, indicated in these references. Speaking to Jews He uses language appropriate to their condition, and illustrates the truth He would teach from their everyday life. He assumes that they will bring their gifts to the altar, and so far 'He respects the practice,' but He adds the all-important truth that the reconciliation of man to man must come before the altar-offering. Forgiveness of injuries (Mt 5^{23f.}), filial piety (15^{5f.}), and mercy (9¹³ 12⁷) condition all acceptable service of God. In this Jesus takes His stand with the Hebrew prophets, and fulfils their moral law. The command to the leper, now cleansed, 'show thyself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded,' Mt 8⁴ (= Mk 14⁴, Lk 5¹⁴), ought not to be pressed beyond this. The leper was ostracized, and the priest alone could remove the ban, and grant a certificate of health (Lv 14). Freewill offerings, over and above the requirements of the Law, were provided for in the Temple treasury (Mk 12⁴¹, Lk 21⁴). Of the 13 trumpet-shaped boxes of the treasury 4 were for voluntary gifts. (See Edersheim, The Temple, p. 26; and for the general subject, see GIVING; cf., further, artt. LAW and SACRIFICE).

OFFICER.—The term 'officer' is used in the Gospels (and Acts) as a tr. of ὀνηρέτης in the ordinary secular applications of that term (Mt 5²⁶, Jn 7³², 45 13³, 12 18 22 19⁶, Ac 5²², 26). In other two cases (Mk 14⁵⁴, 65 || Mt 26⁵⁸, Jn 18⁵⁶) the AV tr. 'servants'; the RV in the former adhering to 'officers' and in the latter putting it in the margin. In most of these cases the officers are servants of the Jewish Council; in Mt 5²⁵ and Jn 18³⁶ they may be regarded more generally as servants of the State. In Lk 12⁵⁸ 'officer' is the tr. of a still humbler term, πράκτωρ, a prison official, described in RVm as 'exactor' from his duty of collecting fines. In Jn 4⁴⁶ RVm 'king's officer' appears as an alternative to 'nobleman' for a term meaning 'courtier.'

It is evident that in the 16th or 17th century 'officer' had a lower meaning than now.* These ὑπηρέται belong to the rank and file. They are subordinate officials, with duties purely instrumental, virtually on a level with our policemen. As emphasized in Jn., they are the creatures of the Jews, accompanying the chief priests for the doing of their will; or they may take orders from a captain of the Temple (Ac 5²⁶), or they carry into execution the sentence of a judge (Mt 5²⁵). St. Luke in his narrative of the Arrest and Trial and in 12⁵⁸ avoids the term, but he uses it in Ac 5²²⁻²⁶ as above (where, possibly, he is following a source), and four times of religious service—in Lk 4²⁰ of a minister of the synagogue, in 1² and Ac 26¹⁶ (Paul) of Christian preachers, and in Ac 13⁵ of John Mark, who was, in some sense, assistant to Barnabas and Paul. So also St. Paul uses it in 1 Co 4¹. In all these cases the AV renders 'minister'; in two (Lk 4²⁰, Ac 13⁵) the RV, without much lucidity, substitutes 'attendant.'

ὑπηρέτης, originally 'rower,' was used in Greece of an assistant or inferior agent in any sort of work. In particular, it was used in a military sense of attendants on heavy-armed soldiers, and also of adjutants to officers of rank. A similar indefiniteness, but always involving subordination, belongs to the NT usage. The term 'officer,' owing to the secular and especially the military associations of the name, was manifestly unsuitable for the description of a Christian minister of any rank. Such terms of ancient administration as ἀπόστολος (commissioner) and ἐπίσκοπος (inspector) were received into modern languages, not by translation into an equivalent, but by a process of adoption and adaptation. But the ὑπηρέτης, whose title, like these, was extended from the secular to the sacred sphere, was too inferior in dignity and too indefinite in character for such distinction. We have indeed in ordinary usage a somewhat similar rank expressed by the term 'office-bearer,' and there is a special episcopal use of 'official'; while a still humbler dignity, parallel with the secular use in Scripture, is denoted by the designation 'church officer.' Of such terms, and of the term 'officer' as representing the servants of the Sanhedrin, the interest pertains merely to the study of language. No theological or ecclesiastical idea is involved; and for practical utility or correctness the only duty of new Revisers towards this term is to eliminate it entirely from the sacred page. R. SCOTT.

OFFICES OF CHRIST.—As the specific offices of Christ are handled in this work under their several heads, the treatment in the present article will be general.

Etymologically the word 'office' is from officium, the shorter form of opificium, the root meaning of which is 'a doing of a work' (Gr. πράξις). The meaning of officium being wide enough to include any service or kindness, a more precise connotation is supplied by munus, the technical term employed by writers like Calvin to describe the capital functions discharged by Christ. In the Bible the word is nowhere used of Christ's work, though it occurs in other connexions in OT (תְּשׁוּבָה) and in NT (διακονία, Ro 11¹³ [RV 'ministry'] πράξις, Ro 12⁴). The idea, however, abounds in connexion with the Jewish Messiah and the Christ of the Gospel. Under the OT dispensation the three principal offices were those of prophet, priest, and king; and 'the innermost pulse, so to speak, of the history of prophecy is to be found in the effort to interweave these three offices together, and to contemplate them in the Messianic image instead of in their distribution among several persons' (Dorner, System of Christ. Doct. iii. 388). Jesus, being the Messiah, fulfilled these three offices, as the supreme prophet, arch-priest, and Divine king. So repeatedly does He appear in these capacities in the NT, that it would be superfluous to enumerate loci.

* The most frequent application of the term was not to commissioners in the army or navy, but to petty officers of justice, as in 'sheriff's officer,' 'peace officer.' It is this usage that is reflected in the NT.

Passing to theology, we may find beginnings of the official conception of Christ in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Eusebius, Gregory of Nyssa, etc. Thomas Aquinas departs from the triple division of the offices, and makes them coincide with the two states of humiliation and exaltation; the high-priestly office, to which the prophetic is merely introductory, coinciding with the state of humiliation, while the kingly is to be reserved for the state of exaltation (Dorner, op. cit. iii. 391). Discussions as to the relations of Christ's two natures (Eutychians and Nestorians) involved different views as to the way in which He performed official functions. But it was the Reformation, magnifying the sufficiency of Christ in every capacity, that was most fruitful in the exposition of His offices.

'The theologians of the Lutheran Church,' writes Hagenbach, 'further developed the locus de persona Christi by distinguishing between three different genera of the communicatio idiomatum, which were brought into connexion with the two states of Christ's exaltation and humiliation (status exaltationis et exinanitionis). To this they added the theory of the three offices of Christ, viz. the prophetic, priestly, and kingly offices. These definitions owed their origin in part to temporary controversies within the Lutheran Church, such as the controversy between the theologians of Giessen and those of Tübingen, at the commencement of the 17th cent., concerning the κτιστος and αβύστος of the Divine attributes, and the controversy carried on by Epinus in a previous century respecting the descensus Christi ad inferos' (Compend. of Hist. of Doctrines, Buch's tr. p. 317). Those of Tübingen said that Christ in His humiliation possessed omnipotence, omnipresence, etc., but that these attributes were concealed; whereas those of Giessen said that Christ laid these prerogatives aside. Epinus said that Christ's soul suffered the punishments of hell while His body lay in the grave, whereas Calvin said that the only hell suffered by Christ was anguish of soul. The Lutherans, again, held that Christ's visit to hell was a part of His exaltation. Such controversies had a reflex influence upon ways of stating how Christ exercised His offices. Our subject is admirably treated by Calvin in the second book of his Institutes, Christ's priesthood being magnified as against Romish usurpations (ch. xv.). Arminius is especially full and interesting in the present connexion. 'Two things,' he writes, 'were necessary on Christ's part: that He should undertake some offices for the sake of men to obtain eternal salvation for them, and that God should bestow upon Him dominion or lordship over all things' (Private Disputations, Nichols's tr. ii. p. 380). Both these things were comprehended under the title of Saviour and Mediator. In respect of Christ's priesthood, the preparation consisted in imposition of office, sanctification by the Spirit, obedience, sufferings and death, and resurrection; and the discharge of the office consisted in His offering His body and blood. Re Christ's prophetic office, Arminius raised the question as to whether He received knowledge from the Logos as well as from the Holy Spirit. The functions of Christ's kingly office were legislation, giving of remission of sins and of grace, and judgment. The results of Christ's official work are the gathering of the Church, the obedience of His people, the actual remission of sins, resurrection from the dead, and life eternal. The means of Christ's rule are His Church, Word, and Holy Spirit. To all this the corollary is that no one is admitted even subordinately to participation in Christ's proper offices; therefore no pope can be tolerated.

The Westminster Confession of Faith contains a chapter (viii.) 'Of Christ the Mediator,' from which we give the third section. 'The Lord Jesus, in His human nature thus united to the Divine, was sanctified and anointed with the Holy Spirit above measure; having in Him all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; in whom it pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell: to the end that being holy, harmless, undefiled, and full of grace and truth, He might be thoroughly furnished to execute the office of a Mediator and Surety. Which office He took not unto Himself, but was thereunto called by His Father; who put all power and judgment into His hand, and gave Him commandment to execute the same.' Along with this may be taken the answers to questions 43-45 in the Larger Catechism. 'Christ executeth the office of a prophet in His revealing to the Church in all ages, by His Spirit and word, in divers ways of administration, the whole will of God, in all things concerning their edification and salvation.' 'Christ executeth the office of a priest in His once offering Himself a sacrifice without spot to God, to be a reconciliation for the sins of His people; and in making continual intercession for them.' 'Christ executeth the office of a king in calling out of the world a people to Himself, and giving them officers, laws, and censures, by which He visibly governs them; in bestowing saving grace upon His elect, rewarding their obedience, and correcting them for their sins, preserving and supporting them under all their temptations and sufferings, restraining and overcoming all their enemies, and powerfully ordering all things for His own glory and their good; and also in taking vengeance on the rest, who know not God, and obey not the gospel.'

In our day it is less common than formerly to speak of the official character of Christ; and this for several reasons. Definite doctrine as to the Person and work of our Lord is unacceptable in many quarters, and a reaction from the terminology of the schools is common. Questions as to the metaphysical nature of Christ are thought to be too abstract. That Jesus should embody a fulfilment of OT prophecy as to the Messiah is of remote interest to many. The richness of Christ's humanity has been so energetically unfolded, that there is an aversion to contemplate Him in any aspect which might be suspected of dehumanizing Him by representing Him more in the light of a formal functionary than of a loving Son of Man and Elder Brother. Ritschl, e.g., attacks the word 'office' as unsuitable, because office is a special calling with a view to realizing a legal or moral community upon conditions of law (see Dorner, op. cit. p. 383).

As against such objections we would submit that the theological category in question possesses too much historic and intrinsic worth to be discarded. Historically it has its roots in Scripture, and controversially it has served to clarify doctrine and to safeguard certain aspects of Christ's Person and work. But, above all, Christ in His official character meets the entire needs of sinful man. On account of that moral evil which blinds the soul to the knowledge and perception of God, we need a Mediator to reveal God and to enlighten the conscience; and here Christ, as the Light of the world, appears in His prophetic office. Next, the effect of light is to disclose the fact of sin and awaken the sense of guilt and the fear of judgment; and here Christ, by putting away sin, by affording access to God, and by blessing us from God, discharges the priestly office. Lastly, by creating an eternal society in which we may live as His loving subjects, serving Him willingly according to His laws, He acts as a Divine king. Nor is there any subordinate office performed by Christ which may not be classified under one or other of these constitutive three.

OIL (יָבֵשׁ, Elaios), by which we are to understand olive oil, was from the very earliest times one of the main products of Palestine, for already in days prior to the Hebrew settlement, Canaan was 'a land of oil olives' (Dt 8⁸). The importance of this valuable commodity cannot easily be over-estimated. It afforded light (Mt 25³) and nourishment (1 K 17¹²) to the household; it was valued for its healing and medicinal virtues (Is 1⁶ RV, Lk 10³⁴); it had its place in the Hebrew ritual (Ex 29⁴⁰, Lv 2¹); and it was an important article of commerce (2 K 4⁷, Lk 16⁶).

The oil was obtained by subjecting the berries of the olive-tree to pressure. The earliest method of expression seems to have been that of treading the olives with the feet, to which allusion is made in Mic 6¹⁵, and perhaps also in Dt 33²⁴. This process is unknown in modern times (Thomson, LB pp. 207, 339). Van-Lennep, however, states that the pulp from the olive-press is still 'trodden with the bare feet of women and girls' (Bible Lands, p. 130). At what period this primitive method was abandoned, and made way for more thorough processes, we do not know. The OT has no references that are clear enough to guide us: those that occur (e.g. Job 24¹¹ 29⁶) are vague and general, and in none of them is the oil-press specifically mentioned. But from the Mishna (Menahōth viii. 14) we learn that the processes commonly employed were bruising in a mortar, and crushing in the oil-press and the oil-mill, these processes being consecutive, not alternative.

The quality of the oil depended partly on the time at which the olives were gathered, and partly on the mode of crushing. The best quality was that yielded by berries gathered before they became black (as they do when fully ripe), and pounded in a mortar. Of this kind was 'beaten oil' (Ex 27²⁰ 29⁴⁰, Lv 24², Nu 28⁵). This first quality of oil was got by putting the pulp from the mortar into wicker baskets, through which the strained liquid ran into receptacles placed beneath. A second and a third quality were obtained by further crushing of the pulp in the oil-press, and then in the oil-mill.

In the NT allusions to oil are not very frequent; those occurring in the Gospels have reference to its use:—(1) As an illuminant (Mt 25^{3, 4, 8}). The lamps in common use were of earthenware, and small in size (see LAMP). When they had to be kept burning for any considerable period, it was necessary to replenish them with oil from time to time. (2) Medicinally (Lk 10³⁴, Mk 6³, cf. Ja 5³⁴). The healing virtues of oil were highly esteemed by the Jews, and it was much employed by them and by other ancient nations. It was applied, e.g., to wounds (Is 1⁶ RV) to soothe their pain and to hasten the process of healing. A similar usage is found in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁴). In this instance, wine as well as oil was employed, the added wine imparting to the mixture an antiseptic quality (cf. Pliny, HN xxxi. 47; Talm. Shabbāth xiv. 4). Oil-baths were sometimes used, as in the case of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xvii. vi. 5). The anointing of the sick with oil (Mk 6¹³, Ja 5¹⁴) was doubtless based on the current belief in its remedial powers, but may also have been a symbolic act, as was the anointing of lepers (Lv 14^{15ff.}). Plumptre suggests that 'it served as a help to the faith of the person healed; perhaps also, in the case of the Apostles, to that of the healer' ('St. James' in Camb. Bible for Schools, p. 103). (3) For anointing (Mt 6¹⁷, Lk 7⁴⁶). The custom of anointing the head or the body with oil was a very common one in ancient times, and was practised by the Egyptians (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 213), the Greeks (Homer, Il. x. 577), and others (Pliny, HN xiii. 1 ff.). Among the Jews the anointing of the head with oil seems to have accompanied the daily ablutions (Mt 6¹⁷, cf. Ru 3³, 2 S 12³⁰), except in time of mourning (2 S 14², Dn 10⁶). It was also a mark of honour paid to guests by their host (Lk 7⁴⁶, cf. Ps 23⁵). Anointing the feet (Lk 7^{38, 46}, Jn 11²) was very unusual. The dead were anointed as a tribute of respect (Mk 16¹, Lk 23⁵⁶ 24¹, cf. Jn 12^{3, 7}), aromatic spices being added. (4) As an article of merchandise (Mt 25³, Lk 16⁶). In common and daily use, and to the Eastern one of the necessaries of life, oil played a large part in the home trade of Palestine (2 K 4⁷), and was, further, a most valuable export. We find special mention made of trading in oil with the Tyrians (Ezk 27¹⁷), who probably re-exported it, and with Egypt (Hos 12¹). It formed an important part of the supplies sent by Solomon to Hiram in return for the timber and other materials furnished for the building of the Temple (1 K 5¹¹).

OINTMENT (μύρον). — Nard oil, from a plant found especially in Arabia (nardus), and highly prized at Rome. St. Luke mentions it in connexion with the anointing of Christ by the unnamed woman in the house of Simon the Pharisee (7^{38, 46}), and again (23⁵⁶) as one of the things prepared by the women for the intended completion of the burial of the Master. See art. ANOINTING.

In the account of the anointing of Jesus at Bethany, St. Matthew describes the unguent as μύρου βαρυντίμου, 'exceeding precious ointment' (26⁷ RV); St. Mark as μύρου νάρδου πιστικῆς πολυτελοῦς, 'ointment of spikenard [marg. pistic nard] very costly' (14³ RV); St. John as μύρου νάρδου πιστικῆς πολυτίμου, 'ointment of spikenard very precious' (12³ RV, with ref. to Mk 14³ [marg.]). As this word πιστικῆ is found only in these two places, it is rather difficult to give its true equivalent. It is used by Plato (Gorg. 455) and by Aristotle (Rhet. 1, 2), where it is synonymous with πειστικός, 'persuasive'; but that meaning would be irrelevant in this connexion.* Scaliger would translate 'pounded nard,' from πίσσω, 'to pound,' which is a possible rendering, but lacks analogy. The RV has translated it 'spikenard,' following, apparently, the Vulgate rendering of Mk 14³, spicati. Some would translate 'liquid nard,' deriving πιστικός from πίνω, 'to drink'; others regard it as a local technical term (see Mk 14³ RVm; cf. Westcott, St. John, 12³). The most natural rendering would appear to be 'pistic nard,' an ointment prepared from the oil of the pistachio nut, which is used to this day in Syria for similar purposes. See especially a long note by Morison, Com. on Mark, 14³, and cf. artt. NARD and SPIKENARD.

OLD TESTAMENT (I. Christ as fulfilment of). †—

1. The ideals of life found in the OT by Jesus.— Jesus' conception of the life of the OT is that of the life which is proper to the children of God (Mt 5-7). It is the normal relation of fellowship between God and His children, obedience to God and to His messengers (7²⁴). The life for which the prophets laboured, that which they represented as the ideal, was adopted by Him as the ideal, and their labours were continued by Him. He claimed no less an authority to carry on the development of the ideal than the greatest of the prophets had exercised. As the prophet taught (Is 50¹⁰) that those loyal to Jehovah should obey His representative, so did Jesus when He combined such sayings as 'He that doeth the will of my Father' (Mt 7²¹), and 'He that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them' (v. 24, Lk 6⁴⁶⁻⁴⁹).

The OT ideal of religious life was the earlier stage of a religious development which He came to continue. It needed no essential change to become that which He wished to establish. It was characterized by an imperative demand for a righteousness which consisted in a thoroughgoing obedience to God, and this was just what Jesus demanded and exemplified. Moreover, while Jesus taught that the ideal of life was to be found in the OT, He was far from teaching that all that was in the OT contributed to this ideal. When He had occasion, He expressly taught that even the law-giver, Moses, permitted practices which belonged to a lower plane of living than that of the principles contained in the OT. There was so much in the human heart that was hostile to these principles, that for a time a standard of life lower than these ideals was permitted (Mt 19⁸).

Jesus, like the prophets, was certain that the religious life for which He laboured was to become a universal religion. His claim of permanence for His utterances (Mt 24³⁵, Mk 13³¹, Lk 21³³) was also a claim that His teachings had the changeless quality of the word of God under the Old Covenant (Is 40⁸ 55^{10, 11}, cf. 51⁸), and of God's law under the New (Mt 5¹⁸, Lk 16¹⁷). Words uttered by Him when the Greeks sought to see Him (Jn 12³²), were an assumption to Himself personally of the universal significance for human history which the prophets (Is 11⁹, Hab 2⁴) had claimed for the religion of Jehovah. This claim to a unique place in human history and identification of Himself with those lofty utterances of the OT, show that in the mind of Jesus the religious life of the OT had a unique place among the religions of the world. This is equally seen in His declaration to the Samaritan woman (Jn 4²²), 'Ye worship that which ye know not: we worship that which we know: for salvation is of the Jews.'

Jesus addressed His hearers constantly as having the true religion, as nominally recognizing the true and living God, and as needing to do no more than live up to their own religion. He saw in the OT a universal ideal of society, and the principles for a programme of its establishment. The ideal society was one in which the lost should have been saved; into which the called and chosen should have been gathered; in which the repentant should have found pardon, the distressed and scattered should have found comfort; the members of which should love God supremely, and each other as themselves, and should be humble, meek, and pure in heart. During the progress of the establishment of this society, those who belonged to it would be called upon to be merciful, to hunger and thirst after righteousness, to be peacemakers, to endure persecution for righteousness' sake patiently, to love enemies, to devote themselves to God without pretence and with singleness of mind; and yet to live lives of radiant goodness, to bring forth an abundant fruitage of beneficence for the sake of Jesus and in His name, to observe the duties which grow out of the natural relations of life, to lose their lives for His sake and the gospel's, to seek first this ideal society and God's righteousness, to go to Jesus and take His yoke upon themselves, and look upon a life of lowliest ministry as the life of highest honour.

In these conceptions Jesus was developing the OT ideal, as will be seen later. An important element in developing the ideal was a maturing of the conception of God. Since Jesus was an 'OT saint' (A. B. Davidson, Theology of the Old Testament, 520), the OT God was His God. Moses had been able to add new elements of meaning to Israel's conception of God in connexion with the name 'Jehovah.' Jesus made a further advance by using the OT word 'Father' as applied to God, making it the dominant name in His own thought, and reading into this dominant conception of Fatherhood all the OT elements of the thought of God. Jesus so enlarged the conception of God that He practically gave a new revelation as the basis of the new development of religious life which He was promoting. This enlargement came in part from replacing the name 'Jehovah' by the name 'Father,' partly by the assumption on His part of a unique Sonship into which none of His disciples might enter (Mt 11²⁷), partly by the new place given to the Spirit which was no more than adumbrated in the OT.

* In later Greek, however, πιστικός = trustworthy, and the meaning may thus be 'genuine,' 'unadulterated,' 'pure.'

† On the OT of Jesus see following article.

In these views Jesus was at variance with many of the people among whom He lived. The Jews at large were incapable of understanding them. For Pharisees and Sadducees the OT was a finality. It was a full and complete law incapable of further development. It was to be accomplished, fulfilled, simply by obedience to its letter. Prophecy was formal and literal, and their interpretations were often puerile. The Apocryphal literature shows how far short they fell of the ideals of the ancient prophets in spite of their ethical zeal. There was attachment to noble ethical ideals, and desire to attain them, and yet blindness to the real nature of these ideals. There was a lack of insight into the nature of their own religion, and an incapacity to live anywhere except on the surface of things.

2. Jesus and the Law.—Jesus found in the OT not only the ideal of a life, but also commandments, moral and ritual, by which this ideal was to be realized. It is certain that He regarded the OT as supremely authoritative for the conduct of life. He so accepted it and used it. He emphasized it as giving an authoritative revelation of the mind and will of God. He met temptation (Mt 4^{1-7, 10}, Lk 4^{1-12, 8}) with precepts for life (Dt 8^{3, 6, 13}), which exactly fitted the emergency. He also referred to the Ten Commandments as specific directions for conduct (Mt 15³, Mk 7^{10a}; Mt 19^{18, 19a}, Mk 10¹⁹, Lk 18²⁰). He treated the OT as giving authoritative legislation when (Mt 22^{37, 39}, Mk 12²⁹⁻³¹, Lk 10²⁸) He quoted or approved other commands found in the Law (Dt 6^{4, 5}, Lv 19^{18, 34}) as chief rules for life. His practice is not the only indication of His mind. He made a definite declaration of principles, and gave abundant illustration of what He meant by it. The Sermon on the Mount is luminous on this point: Mt 5¹⁷. 'Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets: I came not to destroy, but to fulfil'; cf. Lk 16¹⁷.

His words to John the Baptist (Mt 3¹⁵ 'Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness') show that His conception of fulfilment included His own personal performance of any and every duty which was incumbent upon Him according to the Law, so that nothing should be wanting to His full performance of every human duty. In other utterances, as Jn 4^{34, 5, 17}, His use of τελέω shows that His idea of fulfilment meant the completion of the tasks laid upon Him to accomplish. It should be borne in mind that He considered, and even claimed, that His conduct and will were in perfect harmony with the will of God (Mt 7^{21, 12, 50}, Mk 3³⁵, Mt 26³⁹, Mk 14³⁶, Lk 22⁴², Jn 5^{30, 6, 8, 46}). This is a real and important mode of His fulfilment of the Law. If He did no more, it would be small help to those who were to preach the gospel. He did it because He was able to do far more. He was able to complete the Law as a law, i.e. to bring it to its perfection as a law. See, further, artt. LAW and LAW OF GOD.

One wishes to find a clear utterance of the mind of Jesus respecting the imprecatory Psalms. Perhaps it is to be found in Mt 5⁴⁴. If the basis of the current Jewish morality respecting revenge found support, as some think, in Ps 41^{11, 10} ('But thou, O Lord, have mercy upon me, and raise me up, that I may requite them') and the imprecatory Psalms, then we find the mind of Jesus in respect of those Psalms an expression of feelings which belong to the individual relations in life. Hate, divorce, and revenge are contrary to the principles of the society which Jesus came to establish, and they have no place in His ideal Kingdom.

The OT often had an ideal in solution, as it were, which in the mind of Jesus was precipitated into crystals of perfect and imperishable form. An illustration is the inchoate ideal of Job 31²⁹ 'If I rejoiced at the destruction of him that hated me, or lifted up myself when evil found him'; cf. Pr 24¹⁷ 'Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth, and let not thy heart be glad when he is overthrown'; 24²⁹ 'Say not, I will do so to him as he has done to me, I will render to the man according to his work'; 20²² 'Say not thou, I will recompense evil; wait on the Lord, and he will save thee'; 25²¹ 'If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink'; Ex 23^{4, 5} 'If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again. If thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden, and wouldest forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help with him'; 1 S 24⁴⁻⁸ the example of David in sparing the life of Saul when he had him in his power; also the similar instance of Elisha in sparing the Syrians (2 K 6²²); Ps 7^{5b (4b)} 'Yea, I have delivered him that without cause was mine adversary.' These were expressions of an ideal as yet unformed; passing through the mind of Jesus they appear in the form, 'Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you' (Mt 5⁴⁴), or more completely in Lk 6^{27b, 28} 'Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, bless them that curse you, pray for them that despitefully use you.' And they are exemplified in His prayer on the cross, Lk 23³⁴ 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do' (on this verse see Westcott-Hort, Gr. Test. ii. pp. 67, 68).

The ideal of true life found in the OT was fellowship with God. The necessary condition of such a life was perfect obedience to the law of love. Jesus found these principles in the literature of the OT, and their authority came from the Spirit, who moulded the life of which the OT was a growth.

3. Jesus and prophecy.—The recorded utterances of Jesus seem to indicate that He laid as real stress on the fulfilment of the prophecies of the OT as He did upon the fulfilment of the Law. This was a necessary consequence of the conviction that the ideal was to be realized. In Law and Prophets alike Jesus found declarations of the Divine purposes in human history, and intimations of the programme of the accomplishment of this purpose. In respect to the latter He expressed a firm confidence that the will of God as declared in the Law should be accomplished. In the Law and the Prophets He found intimations of Himself, of His experiences, and of the relation of these experiences to the establishment of the Kingdom. 'Ye search the scriptures, because ye think that in them ye have eternal life' (Jn 5³⁹). Were the intimations which Jesus found in the Prophets detailed and exact predictions which He was to fulfil? How did He look at the OT in relation to His own life? Did the Messianic conceptions of Jesus come chiefly from predictions which He found in the OT? Early in His ministry (Lk 4²¹), after reading from Is 61^{1, 2} He said, 'To-day hath this scripture been fulfilled in your ears.' He continued, and the contents of His speech are described (v. 22a), 'And all bare him witness, and wondered at the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth.' What these words of grace may have been is left to our conjecture. They may have been like the answer sent to John the Baptist at another time, which seems to show that Jesus regarded the work He was doing in preaching good news to the poor, healing the sick, restoring sight to the blind, as the fulfilment of the utterance of the prophet in this passage. But also the fact that He Himself was doing this work was seen by Jesus as a fulfilment of that prophecy. It is only reasonable to interpret the words of Jesus as affirming that He regarded Himself personally as included within the scope of the passage. Again, 'For I say unto you, that this which is written must be fulfilled in me, and he was reckoned with transgressors: for that which concerneth me hath fulfilment' (Lk 22³⁷). 'That which concerneth me' probably means that which in the Divine counsel concerned Him, whether written or unwritten. The words quoted by Him from Is 53¹² were a part of the Divine counsel, according to the thought of Jesus. He says in effect: This utterance includes me within its scope and finds its culmination and perfect realization in my experience. The same may be said of the following, 'But that the scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth my bread lifted up his heel against me' (Jn 13¹⁸); 'But this cometh to pass that the word may be fulfilled that is written in their law, They hated me without a cause' (15²⁵), i.e. 'the words of the OT find their completion in my experience.'

All the most important utterances of Jesus concerning fulfilment of OT prophecy found in His work or experience were attached to no specific Scripture passage, and furthermore we are unable to find a specific OT utterance as the basis. This is a very significant fact, and deserves more careful attention than was needed in the case of the passages just mentioned; cf. Mt 26³⁴ 'How then should the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?'; v.⁵⁶ 'But all this is come to pass, that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled'; less fully in Mk 14⁴⁹ 'But this is done that the scriptures might be fulfilled'; Lk 18³¹ 'And he took unto him twelve, and said unto them, Behold, we go up to Jerusalem, and all the things that are written by the prophets shall be accomplished unto the Son of Man.' Most important of all are Lk 24^{26, 27, 44-47} 'Behoved it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory? And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself. . . . And he said unto them, These are my words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, how that all things must needs be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms, concerning me. Then opened he their mind, that they might understand the scriptures, and he said unto them, Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer, and rise again from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all the nations, beginning from Jerusalem.' In these passages Jesus taught plainly that the OT testified that His death and resurrection were necessary antecedents to the preaching of repentance and the forgiveness of sins. In other words, according to Jesus, the OT clearly showed that His death and resurrection were a necessity in the Divine economy. The exact nature of this necessity has not been preserved in the record of the teachings of Jesus. We may say that in harmony with Scripture we should regard this necessity as not due to any arbitrariness on God's part, or to any necessity of a mechanical conformity to the utterances in the OT. Rather, in the nature of things, it was due to the hardness of the human heart, which necessitated such experiences on the part of a Saviour in order to overcome its hardness.

It is quite significant that no one passage is quoted or mentioned in the reports of the teaching of Jesus given by Him after His resurrection. Yet He taught His disciples explicitly that His sufferings, death, and resurrection were necessary in order to fulfil the OT. Further, the disciples, after they understood the Scriptures, also saw the necessity of the death and resurrection. For the most part, the early utterances of the Apostles, as recorded in the Book of Acts, show the same reticence respecting specific OT passages which Jesus had shown.

We must believe that in its general tenor the Apostles taught what they had learned of Jesus. Is it not possible that the speech of Stephen before the Sanhedrin gives us very nearly the character of the teaching of Jesus? This is an argument from broad historical analogies and principles rather than a use of particular passages. In support of this suggestion we may turn to the utterances of Jesus, before His crucifixion, respecting His sufferings. See art. ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH.

The only passages of the OT which Jesus is recorded as having quoted in any relation to His sufferings are Ps 35¹⁹ 41⁹ (Heb.¹⁰) 69⁴ (Heb.⁵), Is 53¹², and Zec 13⁷. Did Jesus see specific predictions in these passages?

Before attempting to answer this question, it will be well to note what He said respecting the suffering of others than Himself which was due to their religious activities. He affirmed that in the past the world had been bitterly hostile towards those who worked for the doing of God's will on earth. In Mt 51^{1f}, Lk 1147-49, and similar passages, Jesus called to mind the fact that God's messengers to His people had encountered bitter hostility throughout the past. In passages like Mt 1017-22, 34-36, 23²⁹⁻³¹, 34, 37, Mk 1030, Lk 1249-53, 1394, Jn 1518-25, 1714, 15 He showed that such hostility is inevitable in the progress of His Kingdom. The spirit and methods of the world in the midst of which His Kingdom must develop are wholly alien to those of the Kingdom, therefore Jesus must meet hostility, and so must His disciples. The work of Jesus in the establishment of the Kingdom was conditioned by a long historical development which had already been centuries in progress when He came.

A long-continued historical movement, however complex, tending toward one goal has a substantial unity of character in all stages of its development. The various attitudes assumed by men towards the great features of such a movement are substantially the same from generation to generation, from age to age. Human beings persistently manifest their attitude in modes that are practically identical. Hence arise the oft-noted historical parallels. The fact that at one stage of a movement persons may act as persons do at another stage is the essential element of a historical parallel. In a long-continued development of a specific character nearly identical situations will often be repeated, and nearly identical experiences will often occur.

More noteworthy than mere historical parallels is the substantial identity of moral attitude and conduct seen in the persons whose experiences constitute the historical parallels. These facts can be verified from the political life of all peoples which has been recorded and transmitted to us. Nay, even movements separated widely in time and place, and not in the direct lines of historical development, give striking instances of historical parallels, and substantial identity of human character and conduct. This is notably exemplified in the entire history of the attempt to establish an ideal society, from Moses until the present day. Every attempt of men to establish the coming perfect society had some likeness to the labours which were to follow it. Every person, therefore, who shared in the earlier parts of the work in some respect foreshadowed those who should come later, including Him who should complete it. The earlier is the type of the later. So the persons in the earlier stages were typical of those in the later stages. So also were the institutions which were auxiliary to the labours of these persons, or instrumental in their hands, typical of elements involved in the final accomplishment of the work to which they contributed. The later experiences are more complex than the earlier ones. For this reason we may say that the earlier ones foreshadowed the later, but we do not say that the earlier ones show with anything like exactness what the later ones were to be. Nevertheless, there is so much of likeness that similar language may often be used respecting them both. The names or descriptions of the earlier may, in a measure, fit the later. It was thus that Jesus properly gave the name Elijah to John the Baptist (Mt 1710-13), and appropriated for him the utterance in Mal 4⁵ (Heb. 3²³), as He had done more explicitly (Mt 1110-14) in the use of Mal 31.

It is a most noteworthy fact that men who would gain power over others to secure their transformation of character, must gain that power by self-denial and suffering. This was the philosophy of history given by Deutero-Isaiah. It was recognized by Stephen in his address before the Sanhedrin. Is it likely that Jesus had any less insight into the meaning of the history of His race, and the nature of the work which He had to do, than the prophet of the Exile? The teachings of Jesus show that He saw that the ideal state of society could come only by means of a contest with human selfishness and victory over it. The conflict presents essentially the same aspects in all stages of its progress. A successful issue of any long struggle is the consummation of all the previous stages of that struggle. Any complete realization of an ideal sought in the past is the consummation of that ideal. Also any conflict or experience securing the consummation of the ideal is equally the consummation of those seemingly fruitless conflicts and sufferings in the previous stages of the striving after the ideal. The history of redemption is organic. All the earlier stages typify the later ones.

Among other things, two facts have come to clear recognition at some stage in this discussion. One is that Jesus knew that the society which He was labouring to establish, the Kingdom of God, was certain to be established, and that both the chief place in the establishment of it and the supreme place in it after its establishment belonged to Him. The other fact is that Jesus recognized the inevitable and deeply rooted antagonism which He and His society must encounter and overcome, and that the way of suffering was the only path by which He could reach the goal of success. The conviction of the certainty of the establishment of the Kingdom of God must accordingly carry with it the conviction that all the conflicts and sufferings necessary to the establishment of this Kingdom were equally certain. Without doubt, Jesus saw in the OT Scriptures those experiences narrated and depicted which were necessary as the conditions of accomplishing the work which belonged to the establishment of the Kingdom of God. He claimed that He was establishing the Kingdom, that the foremost place in it belonged to Him, and that the position of men in the Kingdom was determined by relation to Himself. Accordingly He, the pre-eminent agent in the establishment of the Kingdom, in order to accomplish the purpose for which He was labouring, must accept into His experience all the trial and conflict which could befall any person engaged in the same work. OT prophecy, therefore, as a programme of the establishment of the Kingdom, depicted the experiences and labours of God's servants, which were an unavoidable part of their work in achieving the results which they sought. The Synoptics record the sense of Jesus that sufferings prophesied in connexion with the establishment of the Kingdom were necessary (see, Mt 16²¹ et al.). He saw that the goal was certain to be reached, and that the OT representation of the toils, sufferings, and experiences necessary for the accomplishment of the labour which He was to perform concerned Him more fully than they concerned any one else, because the chief place in the Kingdom was His. So all the partial successes and the unsuccessful attempts in past generations to establish the ideal society were prophetic of what must come before the goal should be reached.

We must believe that this typical nature of the OT records and prophecy was that which Jesus had in His mind when He applied the OT prophecies to Himself. This is a principle, and the use which Jesus made of the OT in ethical and spiritual matters was so prevalently that of principle, that it is most natural to regard the use of prophecy as that of principle. Like the Semitic mode of presenting principles by concrete examples, so was His use of the OT Scriptures by definite illustrations and allusions to individuals. The instances noted above of the use of Is 53¹², Zec 13⁷, Ps 41⁹ (Heb. 10) 35¹⁹ 69¹ (Heb. 5), may all without violence be interpreted as concrete illustrations of principles, instead of being regarded as citations of specific predictions of His individual experience. Jesus saw in Himself the fulfilment of all that belonged to the life of conflict which must be met by any of the members of the Kingdom of blessing, and of all that belonged to the work of deliverance of the people from those habits of life which enslaved them, and which might render them liable to re-enslavement after having once experienced some release.

The view thus derived from the broad consideration of the teaching of Jesus is supported by the various words conveying the idea of fulfilment in respect to the OT utterances and their relation to the experiences of Jesus (ἀληθῶς, Mt 26⁵⁴ 56, Mk 14⁴⁹, Lk 4²¹ 24⁴, Jn 13¹⁸ 15²⁵ 17¹²; ἀναπαύσασθαι, Mt 13¹⁴; σιωπᾶσαι, Lk 21²²; τίλει, Lk 22³⁷; τίλει, Lk 13³¹ 22³⁷, Jn 19³⁰). The study of these passages gives the idea of the completion of the incomplete, the culmination of a process, as was the case in the use of the first of the above words when applied to the use of the first of the above words when applied to the Law. E.g. Mt 13¹⁴; the generation of Jesus exemplified in their conduct, more fully than any previous generation could have done, that wilful blindness, that spiritual insensibility described in Is 69¹⁰. Thus in the experience of Jesus He thought that nothing was to be lacking of the element of suffering which was the indispensable condition of His entering into the fulness of power needed by the Messiah. Since He was the One who should perfect the work for which so many before Him had toiled and suffered, He must gain His power by the same method as they, for the very nature of things made this a necessity, and His experience must fulfil theirs by taking up into it every variety known by them, and fill out to complete realization every type of suffering by which one must enter into power. He needed greater power than others, hence He must suffer much more than they.

It is to be noted that the large and broad conception of prophecy which is evident in the words of Jesus is not equally evident in the writings of the Evangelists. Mark and Luke make little use of prophecy, and present no variation from the method of Jesus. Matthew and John had much more use for OT prophecy. As Orientals, they also would naturally follow the example of Jesus in the use of the common method of teaching by illustration. Those passages which in the mouth of Jesus would be of illustrative value were often stated by the Evangelists so as to seem the fulfillments of strict predictions.

The following are passages of this sort: Mt 122. 23 215. 17. 18. 23 517. 21 214. 5 279. 19, Jn 217 1214-16 1924. 36. 37. See, further, art. PROPHETCY.

OLD TESTAMENT (II. Christ as student and interpreter of).—1. Importance of the subject.—In studying the Gospels, it is hardly possible to exaggerate the importance of the subject of Christ's knowledge of and use of the Scriptures of the OT. These constituted the main part of the literature of His fellow-countrymen, and by all of them were regarded with a reverence second to nothing else.

In our own day it has become possible to study this subject as no previous generation has ever had the opportunity of doing. Careful textual investigation of the NT has enabled us to be much more sure of the actual form of the text than ever before, and the patient comparative study of the Gospels has set forth their inter-relation and dependence upon one another in a clearer fashion for the ordinary reader than at any other time. Much more care has also been expended on the study of the OT, both in Hebrew and in Greek, and, consequently, the influence of the latter version upon the language of the NT has been rendered clearer. Much study has also been given to the language of the NT, so that we are better able to tell when the LXX influences it, and when the vocabulary is less that of the OT than it is of the common contemporary speech. The discoveries of recent years among the papyri of Egypt have given us much insight into the ordinary Greek of the period, so that many words formerly supposed to belong exclusively to the LXX are now known to belong to the everyday language of the market-place. Investigations of another order have made us better acquainted than before with the vast amount of literature current in the circles of Judaism, only a small portion of which is contained in the Apocrypha of our English Bible. The various Apocalypses in particular exerted an immense influence upon the generation to which our Lord belonged, and much of their language and ideas can be traced in the pages of the Gospels. Again, the mere improvement in the methods of printing has made the study of this subject easier for present-day students. Take such a copy of the Greek text as that of Westcott and Hort. A cursory examination of it shows that not only actual quotations, but even reminiscences, when these consist of not more than a word or two, are printed in uncial type, and so reveal at a glance the fact that there are traces of the OT in the passage. It is very striking to run through the Gospels in such a form, and to find how large a portion of them, comparatively speaking, is made up of OT phraseology. A similar expedient is carried out in the Twentieth Century NT, save that there quotations and reminiscences from the Apocryphal literature are also indicated. In Weymouth's translation, The NT in Modern Speech, the actual quotations from the OT are also indicated in special type, and more clearly still these various sources are indicated in Weizsäcker's German translation of the NT. All these are indications of how thoroughly modern scholars realize the importance of setting forth the presence of OT language in the text of the NT. This, however, is not mainly of antiquarian or historical interest, but derives its greatest significance from the bearing that it has upon the personal thought and action of our Lord. It is always of the greatest interest and significance to discover the intellectual forces that have moulded any great personality. Books that have influenced me' always constitute an illuminative section of the autobiography of any great thinker or writer; and to discover that the recorded conversations and addresses of our Lord reveal to us as clearly as they do the literature upon which He has nurtured His own soul, is a great help both in the interpretation of His teaching and in the understanding of His message and mission.

2. Difficulties of the subject.—Fascinating as this study is, it is beset with many peculiar difficulties. (a) First among these is the question of language. It is now generally recognized that the language our Lord spoke was Aramaic, the then current colloquial speech of Palestine. This is, as is well known, revealed in certain expressions in that language quoted in the Gospels, as, for example, the words upon the Cross and those spoken at the raising of Jairus' daughter. The fact that our Lord commonly spoke Aramaic implies, of course, that all the reports of His speeches and conversations are translations, and this at the outset necessarily complicates the question we wish to investigate, for the references that are clearly obvious to the OT or other writings may be the work of the translator; and, on the other hand, many traces of OT language present in the original address may now be lost sight of. It is a further question whether and how far the existing Gospels depend upon an Aramaic original or originals. The well-known tradition, derived from Papias, that Matthew's Gospel was originally composed in Aramaic, has been taken as a basis for various theories, that seek to account for existing divergences among the Synoptics by the supposition that these consist of different translations of the same original.

(b) The second difficulty that attaches to the preliminary investigation of the subject is as to whether our Lord Himself quoted from the original Hebrew text of the OT, or from the Septuagint. A knowledge of Hebrew was not usual among the common people, and in the synagogue services the reading of the Hebrew text was always accompanied by that of an Aramaic paraphrase;* but, of course, it is impossible to tell whether in any one individual case a knowledge of the sacred language might not in some way have been acquired. But the evidence goes to show that the Greek version of the OT was that most commonly in use, and the majority of the quotations in the Gospels are made from it. Swete has pointed out that the large number of citations common to the three Synoptics, or to two of them, are directly taken from the LXX, while in the case of citations that are peculiar to one Gospel a larger proportion show independence of the LXX text. Some of these peculiar instances will be examined in detail later in this article; but a curious discovery has been made, namely, that certain quotations contained in the Gospels reveal a closer agreement with Cod. A than with any other existing text of the Greek OT—a tendency that has also been discovered in the writings of Josephus and of Philo, while Swete also points out that there is an 'occasional tendency in NT quotations to support Theodotion against the LXX' (Introd. to the OT in Greek, p. 395). It would thus appear that the NT writers may have employed a form of text different from that of the LXX as now known to us in what we reckon its best textual form; but whether, of course, this is only a peculiarity of the writer or was also the form of text familiar to and used by our Lord Himself, is impossible to decide.

An interesting illustration of our Lord's apparent intimate acquaintance with the LXX, where that differs from the Hebrew, is given by Dr. Horton in the case of the Book of Proverbs. In Pr 9¹² there is a long addition in the LXX text to that of the ordinary Hebrew, the latter part of which runs as follows: 'For he hath forsaken the ways of his vineyard, and gone astray in the paths of his field; for he walketh through a desert without water (χωροποιήσας δι' ἀνίδρον ὄρουσιν), and over a land that is set in thirsty places; and with his hands he gathereth that which is without fruit.' The phrase used above for 'through a desert without water' is that employed in the description of the conduct of the unclean spirit in our Lord's parable in Mt 12⁴³. Again, in Pr 4²¹ the LXX, instead of 'Let them not depart from thine eyes,' reads 'in order that thy fountains may not fail thee,' using a metaphor which recurs frequently in the pages of the book (see 18⁴ 14² 16²²), and is frequently employed by our Lord Himself in His language with reference to the 'water of life' (cf. Jn 7³⁸, and what is said of that passage below).

(c) The third difficulty is that which attaches to the method of the Evangelists in reporting our Lord's sayings. For instance, in Lk 11^{29, 30} our Lord says that no sign shall be given to the men of His own generation save the sign of Jonah; 'for even,' He adds, 'as Jonah became a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of Man be to this generation . . . the men of Nineveh shall stand up in the judgment with this generation and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and behold a greater than Jonah is here.' It is obvious that in Lk.'s understanding of the saying the parallel between Jonah and Christ is that of the preacher of righteousness, and the result that his preaching had upon his hearers; but when we turn to the parallel in Mt 12⁴⁰, we find the sign distinctly given as the fact of Jonah's being three days and nights in the maw of the sea-monster, and as a parallel with the Son of Man's being three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. But the close of the passage is the same as that given by Lk., so that it seems pretty certain that this fantastic and allegorical interpretation was not due to our Lord Himself, but to the Evangelist, a fact that is made the more probable by the consideration that He seems never to have hinted at His resurrection except to the immediate circle of His disciples. Another instance is to be found in Mk 7^{11, 12} and its parallel in Mt 15^{5, 6}, where Mk. in the explanation of the custom of Corban makes our Lord say, 'Ye no longer suffer him to do ought for his father or his mother,' while Mt. says, 'He shall not honour his father (or his mother).' A further study of these two parallel passages will also reveal the fact that a passage from Isaiah quoted in each of them has a different connexion in each Evangelist, and that either considerable freedom must have been used in reporting our Lord's words, or the Evangelists have themselves introduced the passage as appropriate to the occasion. The well-known method of Mt., in particular, of introducing OT passages as illustrative of incidents in our Lord's history or as explicative of His teaching, makes it the more difficult in the case of the First Gospel to feel certain when we have our Lord's own words and when the sayings are attributable to the writer.

3. How Jesus learned to know the OT.—Jewish boys were from their earliest years made familiar with the contents of the OT, particularly with the books of the Law (see BOYHOOD, and EDUCATION). They were not only taught to commit many passages to memory, but there seems to have been a pretty widespread knowledge of reading. While the primary steps in such education were no doubt carried out in the home, there is pretty clear testimony that everywhere schools for at least elementary education were established. Within the home circle also children were accustomed from a very early age to observe certain practices enjoined by the Law, e.g. the keeping of the Sabbath, fasting on the Day of Atonement, the simpler forms of prayer, and grace at meals. Boys at least, as soon as they could walk the requisite distance, were required to be present at the chief festivals in the Temple, and in particular were bound to observe the Feast of Tabernacles. At the earliest manifestation of manhood's estate being reached, the full observance of the Law was enjoined upon the youth, and, consequently, our Lord's appearance in the Temple at the age of twelve is quite in accordance with the regular practice of the time. On this occasion the boy Jesus gained His first insight into the Temple worship. Whether He returned at all, or frequently, during His youth and early manhood, to the Holy City, we have no means of ascertaining; but in Nazareth He would seem to have been a constant attender at the synagogue services, for such is noted in the Gospels as being

His practice; and when He returned to the town, after His public ministry had begun, it was not His presence in the synagogue that surprised His fellow-townsmen, but the learning of one whom they had previously regarded as an ordinary comrade. In the services of the synagogue He would be familiar not only with the recognized reading of the Law in accordance with the prescribed practice and order, and may even have been frequently called upon in His youth to read, but in the chief Sabbath service He would also become familiar with passages read from the Prophets. These might be chosen at will by the appointed reader, a practice of which Jesus probably availed Himself (Lk 4¹⁷). The Scriptures were not only read in these services, but were paraphrased into the popular language of the people. It is uncertain whether the interpreter was a fixed official, or whether his function was left open to be undertaken by any competent member of the congregation. It is at least permissible to think that Jesus may Himself have played this part many times in the quiet of the Nazareth synagogue, and by the exquisite appropriateness of His language have already shown Himself capable of making the word of God an attractive message to the common people. This is at least a possible fancy, and if it is true, it would form an excellent training for His subsequent service as a deeper interpreter of the inner meaning of both Law and Prophets.

It is almost certain that our Lord would have another advantage in gaining a familiar knowledge of the OT, and in enabling Him to use that knowledge for the benefit of His countrymen, the advantage, namely, of being familiar with another language that was then the common speech of the civilized world, namely, Greek. The LXX was, as we have already seen, the Bible most generally used by the Jewish community, and it is quite possible that Jesus Himself read it. In any case, if He could speak Greek (see art. LANGUAGE OF CHRIST), He would have the immense advantage that belongs to any one who grows up able to speak and think in two languages almost indifferently. It seems as if the condition of affairs then prevalent in Palestine was similar to that which exists in many parts of the Highlands of Scotland, or in Wales, at the present moment. The people will always read a book like the Bible by preference in their own tongue, and its language will naturally be most familiar to them in that form, but they can at will translate it into English, though that English may not, and very likely will not, agree verbally with the version in use. Some such process as this may account for many variants that are found in the Greek quotations from the OT in the pages of the NT. But the alacrity thus attained in mental processes and in the rapid change, not only from the idiom of one speech to that of another, but also from the mental atmosphere of one to that of another, is a great education, and helps the man with a natural gift as a teacher to develop his inborn genius in directions very valuable for those he has to teach.

4. Jesus as interpreter of the OT.—Having now seen how Jesus acquired His knowledge of the OT Scriptures, the next matter of importance is to discover how He attained to His position as an interpreter of them. There was a class of official interpreters, and neither by training nor by personal claim did He belong to this section. Yet His methods of interpretation created far more surprise among His hearers than did the teaching of the orthodox and recognized men of learning. It was not only that His methods possessed the charm of novelty, but that they enabled the people to feel that for the first time their Scriptures had become a new and living book, which no longer pressed upon their souls like a heavy burden, but itself enabled them to bear life's greatest loads. He became, therefore, a popular interpreter of the Book to the weary heart of humanity; while He became, on the other hand, a hated teacher to the privileged class, who felt their profession endangered both by His methods and by the reception they met with at the hands of the crowd. He regarded the OT with much more real reverence than did the scribes, and, indeed, He spoke of it in a way that might almost sound extravagant in its praise, but He also treated its message with a freedom that was surprising, and broke through the husk of the letter till He found for men the strength and the sweetness of the kernel they had not before tasted.

(a) The great ideas that were regulative of the OT revelation were also those which guided the conduct and practice of our Lord, ideas that were central to His thinking, and loyalty to which He demanded not only from all His followers, but from the people who themselves professed to reverence them. The OT idea of righteousness of conduct as consisting in both outward obedience to the ceremonial observance of the Law and inward obedience to its spiritual precepts, were the two points round which His own teaching and practice appear to have centred. It was this, we are told (Mt 3¹⁵), that led Him to undergo the ceremony of baptism at the hands of John, as it was this also that on more than one occasion made Him quote the great spiritual commandments of the Law as containing within themselves the secret of eternal life.

(b) It is not, of course, possible to judge fully from the scanty references preserved in the Gospels as to how far our Lord employed the histories of the OT to illustrate His teaching; but inasmuch as we have no material other than these upon which to form a judgment, we must examine the records that we possess. The difficulty is increased, moreover, by our uncertainty as to when the statements are clearly those of the Master Himself, and when they are due to the editing hand of the Evangelist.

In the passage, for example, in which He refers to Noah's flood (Mt 24^{37ff.}, Lk 17^{26ff.}), He has been dealing with the question of the future history of the world. In Mt. the words occur in the middle of the great apocalyptic passage, which is more than likely to have been much influenced by later ideas, and more altered than many sections of the Gospel. As Lk. reports the reference, it is contained in a short section of teaching to the disciples that follows upon a question asked by the Pharisees; but it is a section which also bears upon it the impress of apocalypse, and may be a passage extracted by the Evangelist from what the present writer regards as most probably the first collection of the sayings of Jesus, i.e. His apocalyptic utterances about the future. Apocalypse was so favourite a form of literature in our Lord's day, and exercised so strong an influence upon His contemporaries, that it seems more than likely that the first series of His words to be reduced to writing would be that which in form and substance most readily fell in with current conceptions. Such a collection of sayings also best accounts for the variety of form in which this particular section appears in the first three Gospels, and may also lie behind St. Paul's well-known passages in the Epp. to the Thessalonians. If the theory here suggested is a sound one, that collection of our Lord's sayings would be in the hands not only of St. Paul, but probably also of his correspondents; and consequently his language and imagery would not only be familiar and intelligible, but would have the authority of Christ behind it. In the parallel passage in Lk., above referred to, there is added to the reference to Noah a reference to the history of Lot, and the fate of Sodom and the Cities of the Plain is again referred to by our Lord when He utters His judgment upon the generation that rejected Him, and declares that in the Final Judgment it shall be more tolerable for Sodom than for them (Mt 10¹⁵ 11²⁴, Lk 10¹²). In the same connexion He makes reference to the fate of Tyre and Sidon. According to Mt 12⁴⁰, our Lord speaks of Jonah's being swallowed by the sea-monster, but from the parallel in Lk. we should judge that the reference was made only to Jonah's preaching and the subsequent repentance of the Ninevites (Lk 11²⁹, 32).

All the Synoptics (Mt 12³⁶, Mk 22⁵, Lk 6³⁶) contain a reference to an incident in the life of David, viz. his eating the shewbread, and, according to Mk. and Lk., his sharing it with his companions. The account of Mk. has a peculiar difficulty, inasmuch as 'Abiathar' is given as the name of the priest, where the OT narrative (1 S 21^{10f.}) states that it was 'Ahimelech' (see ABIATHAR). To Elijah the prophet there is more than one reference. In answer to the question asked by the disciples as to what is meant by the statement of the religious authorities that Elijah must be the precursor of the Messiah (a doctrine founded on Mal 4⁵), our Lord replies that the advent of Elijah has already taken place—a statement which in one connexion (Mt 11¹⁴) is directly referred by Jesus in its fulfilment to John the Baptist, whereas in another place (Mt 17¹³) this interpretation is given by the Evangelist himself. Another reference to the history of the same prophet is that to his visit to the widow of Sidon in the time of the great famine (Lk 4^{25f.}), where also an illustration is taken from Elisha's cleansing of Naaman the Syrian. In the former passage there is again a divergence from the OT as to the length of the period of famine. The latter two passages occur in the address in the synagogue of Nazareth, for which, of course, we have only the authority of Lk.; but inherent probability is in favour of our Lord's using such illustrations to show the wider reach of His mission, though it is not perhaps quite probable that He would have done so, as Lk. represents, at the very outset of His ministry. We may therefore, perhaps, regard the fact of the reference as a correct tradition, but the place and manner of it as due to the Evangelist himself.

The glory of the court of Solomon is twice referred to in the Gospels, and that in words of Christ. The first instance is the unfavourable comparison between the splendour of the great monarch and the beauty of the field flowers (Mt 6²⁹, Lk 12²⁷). The second occasion is the reference to the story of the visit of the 'queen of the South' to the court of Solomon, and the argument that inasmuch as 'a greater than Solomon is here,' she will bring into condemnation Christ's contemporaries. A general reference to the ill-treatment of the prophets at the hands of their countrymen is made in the pathetic lament over Jerusalem, attributed to our Lord in Mt 23³⁷, Lk 13³⁴, while a more specific reference is contained in the immediately preceding verses in Mt.—a passage, however, that is fraught with peculiar difficulties. The whole section is that which contains the woes uttered against the scribes and Pharisees, and bears considerable trace of later editing, even if it is to be attributed, in very much of its present form, to the writer of the Gospel. The passage referred to is contained in Mt 23²⁹⁻³⁶, where the religious teachers are spoken of as those who 'build the sepulchres of the prophets and garnish the tombs of the righteous, and who say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we should not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets.' The passage then proceeds to a prophecy of what is to happen later to further witnesses that will be sent, and of their ill-treatment; they are to be scourged and persecuted from city to city—an obvious reference to the treatment of the early Christian missionaries, and, in all likelihood, with the knowledge of their fate before the writer's mind. The conclusion of the passage speaks of the judgment that is to come upon the men of that generation for all the blood shed on the earth, from that of 'Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah, son of Barachiah, whom ye slew between the sanctuary and the altar.' It is very difficult to decide what is meant by this last reference, the supposed original passage (2 Ch 24²¹) having a different name for the father of Zachariah (see BARACHIAH). In John's Gospel there is a reference (3¹⁴) to the brazen serpent raised by Moses in the wilderness, and in His controversy with the Sadducees our Lord shows His acquaintance with the passage in the life of Moses that relates the revelation at the burning bush (Mk 12²⁶).

These historical references may seem very slight, but they are sufficient to show Jesus' intimate acquaintance with the history of His people, seeing that He was able to employ at will illustrations from what one might consider remote and unlikely incidents in the national story. We must remember also that He was not dealing with historical questions in His teaching, and that all references to these are purely casual. He seems to have accepted the history as it stood recorded, and not to have dealt with it in any critical spirit; for what concerned Him most was its spiritual significance, and this He could best show by accepting the narratives as they stood in the recognized Scripture.

(c) It is of extreme interest to discover, if we can, what books of the OT Jesus turned to with the greatest interest and affection. So far as the available evidence is concerned, it would seem, as we might expect, that the writings which were most familiar to Him were those in which the spirit of the prophets reached its highest level, and on which His countrymen and fellow-religionists had most perfectly matured their own spiritual life—such books as Isaiah, the Psalms, and that most spiritual setting forth of the Law, the Book of Deuteronomy. There is another of the prophets—in all likelihood a native of Galilee, where our Lord Himself was brought up—who seems to have influenced His thought and teaching not a little, viz. Hosea. Out of the 39 books which compose the OT, 14 are directly quoted by Jesus in the records we possess. These are Gen., Ex., Lev., Num., Deut., Sam.—Kings, Ps., Is., Jer., Dan., Hos., Zech., Malachi. His particular interest in Deut. is shown in the fact that in the narrative of the Temptation all the quotations with which He meets the assaults of Satan are taken from that book; and when He declares the essence of the Law to inquirers who ask for it, He invariably states it in the Deuteronomic form. Passages from the Psalms were apparently not only frequently upon His lips, but He used their language on various occasions to describe the real significance of His mission, as when He refers (Mt 21⁴²) to the 'stone which the builders rejected' as being significant of Himself, and so consecrated the passage to the later usage of the Church. That He used the Psalms to strengthen His own spiritual life, is pretty clear from various instances in His recorded language of their phraseology underlying His own forms of expression; but most clearly from His words upon the cross, where it seems that one of the Psalms, the 22nd, was the subject of His reflexion in that supreme hour. Of the prophet Isaiah He evidently made frequent use. According to the narrative in Lk. (4^{17f.}), His ministry opened with an appropriation and interpretation of the great passage in Is 61, which is elsewhere (Mt 11⁵) employed as part of the proof that He Himself is carrying out the Messianic programme. If the reference to the 'keys of the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 16¹⁹) be authentic, the phrase probably comes from another passage in Isaiah (22²²), which reads, 'The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder, and he shall open and none shall shut, and he shall shut and none shall open.' In the case of Hosea it is not only that the suggestive words from 6⁹ are twice quoted (Mt 9¹³ 12⁷), but that the words in which He is accustomed to speak of His resurrection are also found in Hos 6². Hosea is a prophet who is fond of parables, and some of his illustrations from nature are those also employed by Jesus; e.g. husbandry (Hos 10¹²), grape culture (14⁷), the flowers of the field (10⁴), the chaff on the threshing-floor (13³; see, further, Expt x. [1899] p. 281). It is very remarkable that the Wisdom literature of the OT should not be directly quoted by Jesus, and that, in particular, there should be no specific quotation from the Book of Proverbs, though it will be shown in a later section of this article that much of its language finds an echo in His teaching. We shall find, too, traces of the later Wisdom literature in the words of Jesus, who came Himself to be regarded as the incarnate Wisdom.

(d) Jesus' attitude to current modes of interpretation.—The teaching of Jesus was recognized by His contemporaries as being different in character from that of the scribes; yet He employed, to some extent, the same methods. He based His teaching upon that of the OT, which He interpreted not in their manner, but on authoritative lines of His own. The objections that He urged against the current modes of interpretation were that they hid under an accumulation of worthless tradition the real truths which the Divine word was designed to teach; while His own method, in the first place, made clear the meaning of the original utterance; and, secondly, interpreted it in a clearer and fuller manner to those whom He addressed. His method of dealing with current interpretation can best be studied in the records of His controversies with His opponents. For example, they based their teachings on divorce on the permission given in the Law of Moses; Jesus goes behind it to the narrative of the Creation, and shows how husband and wife were destined to be one higher and distinct unity from the very beginning. This note of idealism and spirituality is manifest in all our Lord's teaching, and marks it out as distinct from the verbal trilling of His contemporaries. He was not afraid to tell some of those who prided themselves on the subtlety of their arguments that they were in error, and unable to understand those very Scriptures which they professed to interpret (Mt 22²⁹, Mk 12^{24, 27}). In His judgment many of those who were the professional interpreters of Scripture were doing more harm than good by their methods. 'Ye have made void the word (or law) of God because of your tradition' (Mt 15⁶, Mk 7¹³). He said, meaning that what they considered to be an improvement upon the original commandment was so contrary to its spirit as absolutely to make of none effect its purpose. But in the case of His own teaching, however revolutionary it might at first sight appear, He claimed that it constituted a fulfilment of the Law; and not only so, but He asserted that loyal obedience to the commandments, both in act and precept, would be the ground of advancement in the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 5^{17, 20}). There is even a stronger passage in the same Gospel, where our Lord is represented as enjoining upon His disciples observance of all the precepts taught by the scribes and Pharisees, since they are the legitimate successors of Moses (Mt 23²); but the whole passage in which the words occur shows considerable traces of the influence of later ideas, and can scarcely be pressed into the service of a definite statement of Christ's own personal teaching. There may be in it a trace of Jewish prejudice in favour of the letter of the Law; but the immediate context, in which the Pharisees are most severely criticised, proves that the prejudice, if it existed at all in the mind of the writer, cannot have gone very deep, and we may be justified in seeing in the words at least an accurate reflexion of the teaching of Jesus in this matter. If we may so regard it, it is then clear that He had the very highest estimate of the spiritual and ethical teaching of the OT, and objected only to such interpretation of it as obscured its meaning or altered its emphasis.

(e) We now turn to the very important and somewhat difficult section of our subject which deals with Christ's discussion or use of special passages in the OT. The first passage in which we meet this is in the narrative of the Temptation. This is, of course, a pictorial representation of an inward struggle, which must have been related to His disciples in the parabolic form in which we now possess the story. But it is nevertheless extremely important to find Him reverting time and again to that one book in the OT (Deut.) which we have already discovered was one of His favourites. In its highest spiritual teaching He seems to have found the best antidote against the poison of the evil suggestions that reached Him from the current conception as to the Messianic Kingdom prevalent among His contemporaries, and which also affected even the inner circle of His disciples. In following the course of the First Gospel, we next come upon the long series of teachings contained in the so-called 'Sermon on the Mount,' and there (5²) the first passage to be considered is that which consists of a condemnation of quotations from Ex. and Deut. where the old Law had spoken of killing. Jesus interprets its meaning as signifying an attitude of the inward temper rather than an outward act, and, according to the form in which the saying has reached us, increases the severity of the judgment in proportion to the contempt shown in the expression of inward hatred used against a brother. Here again, however, the whole nature of the expressions employed seems to point toward a colouring of this original saying under the influence of a later Christian tradition; and it is probably a narrowed and intensified form of some simpler word of Jesus which the early Christian community edited in such a way as to contain a severe and solemn warning against careless speech—a fault which, as is evident both from the Gospels and the Epistle of James (3⁵⁻¹² 4^{11, 12}), was sadly prevalent. In the same passage of Mt. (5²²) we have the first reference to Gehenna, a word which occurs frequently in the records of our Lord's teaching. This name for the place of punishment of the dead had become familiar in the literature of later Judaism, meeting us frequently, for instance, in the Book of Enoch (see 27² 84² 90²⁶). A similar elevation and intensification of the law of purity is found in vv. 27-32. In Mt 5³³ we have quotations from Num. and Deut. with reference to false swearing. Here, in interpreting the passage, Jesus goes much further than the precept of the older Law, and inculcates such perfect truthfulness as not to necessitate any form of oath. Again we are reminded of the Epistle of James (5¹²), so that we feel ourselves in the atmosphere of the early Christian assemblies. But there is nothing to prevent the statement, substantially as we find it, being attributed to Jesus. Such teaching had already been given in Judaism, and a close parallel is found in Sir 23⁷⁻¹¹, in the course of which we read: 'Accustom not thy mouth to an oath, and be not accustomed to the naming of the Holy One. A man of many oaths shall be filled with iniquity, and the scourge shall not depart from his house.' In the book of the Slavonic Enoch also (48) the sons of Enoch are taught not to swear by heaven, by earth, or by any other creature. The next citation deals with the law of retaliation (v. 38), and here again the interpreter goes even further, and practically reverses the theory of the OT. In place of exacting an equivalent for any injury, He definitely inculcates the principle of rendering voluntary service where unreasonable exaction has already been practised. To the next quotation (v. 43) no direct parallel can be discovered, the nearest equivalent to the sentiment, 'Hate thine enemy,' being Dt 23⁶ 'Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever'; so that we are compelled to assume that the form of the word here quoted by Jesus either represents some traditional form of the Law which has not been otherwise preserved, or that it embodies in a succinct form an idea that had hardened itself into ordinary practice.

In the eulogy of John the Baptist, reported in Mt 11, Jesus is represented as quoting the passage in Mal 3¹ with reference to His great predecessor. Inasmuch as this verse is elsewhere used by the Evangelists as descriptive of John, and as we have other traces of the fact that they did not, till a later time, understand our Lord's reference to him as fulfilling the function of Elijah, and as we remember also Mt.'s fondness for introducing OT quotations on every possible occasion, we cannot feel certain about the attribution of these words to Jesus, but they seem quite probable. Later in the same chapter (v. 23) the form in which the judgment is pronounced on Capernaum is taken from the Greek of Is 14¹³⁻¹⁷, and serves to show not only how, on solemn occasions, Jesus would readily fall into the familiar language of OT prophecy, but how He was always prepared to apply its teaching to the needs and moral issues of His own time.

We pass next to the passage in Mt 15⁴, where again our Lord is discussing a definite commandment of the Law, which He cites in a double form contained in Ex 20¹² and 21¹⁷, combining the passages without strict verbal accuracy. Starting from this precept, He proceeds to discuss and to condemn the casuistical tradition that had been reared upon it, and reveals perhaps an acquaintance with Pr 28²⁴, where the writer is in sympathy with Jesus in condemning the man who regards the robbery of father and mother as being no transgression. In the same context our Lord is made to quote Is 29¹³ in a form that diverges even from the LXX. The usual difficulty has here, of course, to be faced,—Did Jesus actually use the words, or are they inserted by the Evangelist in order to give a definite completion to his paragraph, and to carry out his theory of finding appropriate illustrative passages from the OT for as many as possible of his events? The rebuke which our Lord gave to the defilers of the Temple (Mt 21¹³) consists of a combination of Is 56⁷ and Jer 7¹¹, but does not call for more than a simple note of the fact that here also we see that intimate knowledge which could seize at once on the phrases most appropriate for His purpose. In Mt 22 we find three special discussions of passages recorded. The first (v. 31⁴) is that of Ex 3⁶, which Jesus uses as an argument for the reality of the life after death. We cannot tell whether this was His own original interpretation of the passage, or whether He was here giving His assent to some ideas about it that were then current; but in any case it is a striking instance of the high level to which He was able to raise the frequently trivial discussions of the literalists. In vv. 37-39 He shows Himself in sympathy with the most spiritual teachers of His own day, insisting on the primary importance of the inward precepts of the Law, and upon Love as its most perfect and adequate fulfilment. According to another version of the same incident (Mk 12³²), His answer won from His interlocutor the response, 'Of a truth, Master, thou hast well said that he is one, and there is none other but he: and to love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbour as himself, is much more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices.' If this, as it appears to do, represents the actual circumstances of the case, it shows how Jesus won the sympathy of the finest spirits of His day, and by His interpretation of the Law was enabled to appeal to their better nature.

The final example in this chapter (v. 42^{f.}) is the difficult one of Christ's question about Ps 110¹. An altogether exaggerated importance has been attached to this passage, because of its supposed bearing on questions of criticism. It is, of course, obvious that Jesus speaks under the limitations of the literary knowledge of His time, and that He and His hearers regarded the Psalm as representing David's own personal sentiments. But a matter that is often overlooked is that the point of the argument lies in David's being regarded as under the influence of the Divine Spirit in what he said. He designates the expected Messiah as his Lord, and yet the Messiah is regarded as being, according to the flesh, David's son. This seems to involve a contradiction in terms. All that Jesus does is here to state the dilemma, and enjoy the discredit of His adversaries when they were unable to solve it. He Himself offers no solution. In this case it appears that, as on one or two occasions, He was suggesting to the thoughtful among His auditors that the ordinary literal interpretations of Scripture were perfectly inadequate to meet the needs of the religious soul, and that His main endeavour was to lead them to revise their methods, and to understand that only the spiritually minded could understand the Divine revelation. Cf., for the same purpose, His statement that John the Baptist was the Elijah spoken of by Malachi.

The difficulties that we have encountered in Mt. are even more pronounced when we pass to the dis-ussion of several passages in John's Gospel. There the idealizing process has been carried so far that we cannot be definitely certain, especially when we are dealing with quotations, that we have the words of Jesus at all. In 6⁴⁵, where Jesus is speaking of the impossibility of any man's attaining a knowledge of Him without the previous influence of His Father, this statement is supported by a quotation from Is 54¹³, wherein the prophet speaks of the people being directly enlightened by God. This is one of the references that would suggest themselves to a writer familiar with the OT, but it has no special bearing on the argument of the passage, and has all the appearance of a gloss. The next passage is a very difficult one, though its very difficulty makes it more probable that it is to be referred in its present form to Jesus Himself, since it is not at all likely that a later writer would have added to his own problems by quoting as Scripture something of which the origin is so obscure. The words referred to are those in 7³⁸ 'He that believeth in me, as the scripture has said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.' Now the passages suggested as the origin of this saying—e.g. Is 12³ 43²⁰ 44³ 55¹ 58¹¹, Ezk 47¹⁻¹², Zec 13¹ 14⁸, and Jn 4¹⁴—have, it must be confessed, very little resemblance to it. The passage last cited, with its phrase, 'a well of water . . . unto eternal life,' has the closest resemblance to the form of the words, but we can scarcely suppose it to be the actual source. One seems driven to conclude, with Hühn, that the reference must be to some passage in a writing not now known to us (see, for some interesting suggestions as to the possible origin of the phrase, H. J. Holtzmann, Hdcom. ad loc.)*

(f) It is not only, or perhaps mainly, in such definite quotations as we have already considered that our impression of Jesus as a student of the OT is most clear, but when we read through the body of His teaching, and see how it is everywhere permeated by OT ideas and coloured by OT language. When, for example, we read the Beatitudes in Mt 5, we can almost parallel them from passages in the OT. For example, Ps 37¹¹ 'The meek shall inherit the land'; Pr 2¹¹ 'The upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it.' Again, as illustration of vv. 9-13, we have the words in Ps 24³ 'Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? He that hath . . . a pure heart'; while the very form in which these great utterances are couched is reminiscent of OT language, where the Beatitude is a favourite form of stating great and precious truths. When, again, we regard the continual teaching of Jesus as to God's Fatherhood, which many have considered to be the central point of His revelation, we are reminded how widespread a basis He found for this in the OT, in such passages as Dt 32⁶, Mal 2^{10, 16}, Is 63¹⁶, and elsewhere. The idea of the catholicity of the Kingdom of God, which is so often upon His lips—e.g. in Mt 8¹¹ 'I say unto you, That many shall come from the east and the west,' etc.—finds its prototype in such passages as Is 43^{6f.}, and more closely still in Ps 107³. For the darker as well as for the lighter colours of His picture He seems also to be dependent on the words of His predecessors, since we find that the foreshadowing of trouble within the family circle, owing to obedience to His message as set forth in Mt 10²¹, has the closest parallel in Mic 7⁶. One is sometimes tempted to think that the actions of Jesus, as well as His words, were prompted by reminiscences of the OT. For instance, the story of Elisha, recorded in 2 K 4⁴²⁻⁴⁴, may have suggested the providing of a meal for the multitude in the desert place, the words of Ps 69⁹ the cleansing of the Temple (see Jn 2¹⁷), and the memory of the prophecy in Zec 9⁹ may have been the thought that prompted the triumphal entry into Jerusalem. Sometimes also the OT seems to have afforded a theme for a parable, as in the case of the Vineyard (cf. Is 5¹ with Mt 21³³), or the Lost Sheep (Lk 15³); and the allegory of the Shepherd in Jn 10 may have as its literary origin Ezk 34¹. Jesus' great utterance about the future of His Church, as well as about the perils that were about to come upon His fellow-countrymen, has many points of contact with the OT (cf. e.g. Mt 24²¹ with Dn 12¹ 24²⁴, Dt 13²⁻⁴; 24²⁹ with Is 13¹⁰, Am 8⁹; 24³¹ with Is 27¹³, Zec 12¹⁰). A careful examination of the passage will reveal many more. Very pathetic is the interest of the sayings recorded from the Cross, where Jesus is reported to have quoted, in the language of His childhood, the first verse of the 22nd Psalm. The appropriateness of the whole of this to the circumstances has been frequently pointed out; and, according to Lk 23⁴⁶, His last words were an adaptation of Ps 31⁵.^{*} These are to be taken only as instances of what a careful examination of the Gospels, by the help of such a guide as Hühn, will reveal to any student in frequently unsuspected places; and the great significance of the study does not, of course, arise from the interest or ingenuity of the parallel that can be drawn, but from the fact that such a study reveals how thoroughly imbued Jesus was with the thought and spirit of the OT.

* Albert J. Edmunds (Buddhist and Christian Gospels) contends that the words are quoted from a Buddhist writing, the Patisambhida-naggo ('Way to Supreme Knowledge'). See Expt xviii. [1906] p. 100. Cf. also Clemens, Der Gebrauch des AT in den NT Schriften, pp. 36, 37, who regards the words as referring not to one passage, but to the general teaching of the OT on the gift of the Holy Spirit. A third passage in John's Gospel should also be noted where (16⁷) Jesus quotes Ps 82⁶, where the words are applied a fortiori to Himself. In Jn 8⁴⁴ we have a reference to the story recorded in Gn 4^{3, 9}. Cf. Wellhausen, Erweiterungen und Aenderungen im Vierten Evangelium [1907], pp. 19-24. Cf. also Jn 15²² and 13¹⁸.

(g) A subject of wider reach, though also of greater difficulty, is the endeavour to discover to what extent Jesus was familiar with, and employed, the Jewish literature that lies outside the OT. It is only in comparatively recent times that much attention has been given to this subject; but the more carefully it is investigated, the more clear does it become that if He does not actually quote from any of that literature, He was either Himself familiar with it at first hand, or its ideas and language had so influenced Himself and His contemporaries that many of His ideas, and even forms of speech, are practically identical with what we find in that literature.

In the extra-canonical Wisdom literature we are familiar with many personifications of Wisdom, and traces of this are found in two passages given in Mt 11¹⁹ and Lk 7³⁵. The ordinary text of the former passage reads, 'Wisdom is justified by her works'; but some MSS read 'children' in place of 'works', thus conforming it to the passage in Lk. where the verse stands, 'Wisdom is justified of all her children,' and a comparison may be made with Wis 7²²⁻³¹ and Sir 11²⁰. Again, the passage at the close of Mt 11 has several reminiscences of the same literature, e.g. Sir 24¹⁹ reads, 'Come unto me, ye that are desirous of me, and be ye filled with my produce'; 51²³ 'Draw near unto me, ye unlearned, and lodge in the house of instruction'; cf. also 17²⁴. The whole tenor of the passage suggests the manner in which Wisdom speaks in the books referred to. Again, the longer and more elaborate addresses in Jn. have a suggestion of the speeches of Wisdom, and may well be modelled upon them. In some such way the marked difference between the addresses in the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics may be accounted for. Wisdom is always represented as addressing her disciples, and so these words delivered in the hearing of the innermost circle of His chosen friends may have been modelled by the Incarnate Wisdom on the lines of His great forerunners. In this connexion there is one very interesting reference also contained in ^{*} Traces of the Book of Proverbs are to be discovered in several places in the teaching of Jesus, e.g. the metaphors of the way and the light (cf. Pr 6²³ 14¹² 41⁸, 19 with Mt 7¹³, Jn 11¹⁰ 12³⁵), those of hid treasure and merchandise (cf. Pr 24³¹ 34. 15 with Mt 13⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶). The germs of certain parables are also to be found there: e.g. Pr 3²⁸ as that of the parable recorded in Lk 11⁵⁻⁸; Pr 9¹⁻⁶, cf. Lk 14¹⁶, Mt 22¹⁰; and even more clearly Pr 25⁶, 7, cf. Lk 14¹⁰; and Pr 24²⁷, cf. Lk 14²⁸.

Lk. (11⁴⁹), 'Therefore also said the wisdom of God, I will send unto them prophets, etc. No OT parallel can be discovered for these words, and we are driven to the conclusion either that they are quoted from some work now lost, or that our Lord here uses the term 'wisdom of God' in the most general sense as indicative of the Spirit which moved in all the prophets. In Jn 4³⁷ there is a saying quoted, 'One soweth and another reapeth,' which may, of course, be a popular proverb, though words of somewhat similar character are found in Job 31³, and they may have occurred in the exact form quoted in Jn. in some writing now lost.

The well-known name whereby our Lord most commonly speaks of Himself, namely, 'Son of Man,' though derivable from Daniel (7¹³), is so common a title in the Apocalyptic literature that there can be little doubt that His use of it is influenced thereby. This is the more certain when we remember how in these writings the glorious manifestations of the Son of Man are paralleled by certain sayings in the Gospels, e.g. His coming in the clouds of heaven, and in the glory of the angels. Such ideas also as those of the imminence of the Redemption, the sitting on the twelve thrones, the authority given to the Son of Man, and the definite doctrine of Gehenna, are all familiar in the Book of Enoch, 'the influence of which on the NT,' according to Professor Charles, 'has been greater than that of all the other Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphal books taken together.' To the same book are attributable developments in the doctrine of Hades and of the resurrection,—ideas which appear in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, and in such sayings as 'sons of the resurrection,' and the answer to the Sadducees' question about marriage. In the same book also are found doctrines about demons, which throw light upon the conceptions of the NT; e.g. that they are disembodied spirits (cf. Mt 12⁴³⁻⁴⁵); that their punishment is to be deferred till the Final Judgment, hence the surprise expressed by the Gadarene demoniac (Mt 8²⁹), who asks, 'Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?' The subjection of all the evil spirits to Satan or Beelzebub (cf. Mt 12²⁴⁻²⁷) is also a doctrine found in the Book of Enoch.

Another interesting group of writings is the 'Psalms of Solomon,' which at the latest were probably put into circulation about half a century before the birth of Jesus, and seem to have exerted a very powerful influence on His contemporaries. It may not be possible to point to any actual quotations from these writings in the NT, but they show the growth of certain important ideas which have sometimes been regarded as unique in our Lord's teaching; e.g. the use of the word 'Christ' as a title of the expected Deliverer; the definite statement that He is to be a son of David (cf. Ps-Sol 17²³ with Mt 22⁴²⁻⁴⁵). In the third of these Psalms we find a careful description of 'the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees,' and the germ of the parable of the 'strong man' (Mt 12²⁹) is found in Ps-Sol 54.

More important, however, than any reference to special passages is the effect upon the general intellectual atmosphere of the generation in which Christ lived and worked, created and moulded to a certain extent by the literature intermediate between the OT and the NT. We have to read that literature to understand many of the ideas that were then current, and to find the conceptions that underlay much of the phraseology which to us seems new and specifically Christian, but which had been gradually evolved in the preceding centuries. Jesus and His disciples were, of course, children of their time in this matter, and He was bound to speak in terms intelligible to His contemporaries. What is wonderful is the manner in which He cleared these ideas of many foolish interpretations, and delivered them from a merely fanciful exegesis.

5. Traditional sayings of Jesus that reveal dependence upon the OT.—When we turn to a consideration of the sayings that are attributed to Jesus in sources outside the NT, our difficulties are, of course, increased; for here we are on less certain ground of information, and there is a greater likelihood of the writers being influenced by the literature with which they were familiar. Still, it will not serve to allow any theory of imitation to account for all these recorded utterances, and some of the best authenticated of them must now be examined in the light of our present purpose.

There is, to begin with, the famous saying from the Gospel according to the Hebrews. In this work Jesus Himself is the speaker, and the saying referred to runs as follows: 'The Saviour himself says, Just now the Holy Spirit my mother took me by one of my hairs, and bore me away to the great mountain Tabor.' This seemingly extravagant figure is not so unquely grotesque as might be supposed, for in Ezk 8³ we read of the Lord taking the prophet by a lock of his head, and the spirit lifting him between heaven and earth; and in the Apocryphal book of Bel and the Dragon the prophet Habakkuk is described as being lifted by the hair of his head, while the notion of transportation without specification of the method is by no means uncommon in prophetic narratives. There is the ascetic character of the passage quoted from the Gospel according to the Egyptians, where, in answer to the question of Salome, as to when the power of death shall end, the Lord says, 'So long as ye women bear children; for I came to destroy the works of womankind.' These words do not seem at all in agreement with the general tenor of our Lord's teaching, though it must be confessed that the paradox is modified in the later part of the section; but the words as they stand have a reference to such sayings as that found in Sir 25²⁴ and other passages where women are spoken of with great severity. In the saying contained in the first Oxyrhynchus papyrus, 'Except ye make the Sabbath a real Sabbath, ye shall not see the Father,' there may be a reference to Is 58^{13, 14}. There is a class of sayings found in one form or another in several of the early Christian writers, and attributed to our Lord; e.g. 'He that is near me is near the fire' (Or. Hom. in Jer. xx. 3), 'He that is near the Lord is full of stripes' (Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 7. 35). Both of these have a close parallel to a passage in Jth 82¹ 'For he hath not tried us in the fire as he did them to search out their hearts, neither hath he taken vengeance on us; but the Lord doth scourge them that come near unto him to admonish them.' In the Clem. Hom. 19, 20, we find our Lord saying, 'Keep my mystery for me and the sons of my house'; and Westcott has pointed out that Theodotus's version of Is 24¹⁶ reads, 'My mystery for me, my mystery for me and mine.' The words now found in 1 P 4⁸ and there frequently taken as a quotation of Pr 10¹², viz. 'Love covers a multitude of sins,' is by Clem. Alex. (Pæd. iii. 12. 91) and others attributed to Jesus. It seems probable enough that He might have used the expression, and not less so even if it is a quotation from the OT. Another saying found in Justin (Dial. Tryph. xvii.), and other authorities, is, 'In whatsoever I may find you, in this also will I judge you,' which is, of course, reminiscent of Jn 5³⁰; and both of these may go back upon Ezk 18³⁰ and 24¹⁴. A very remarkable passage is given in Iren. v. 33, on the authority of Papias, descriptive of the days of the final glory, and the extreme fruitfulness of the vines and grain, and also of the universal peace throughout the animal creation. The passage, which is extraordinary in character, has much resemblance to those found in Is 11^{6, 9}, Am 9¹³, and a very close one to Apoc. Bar 20⁹.

6. Christ's methods as suggestive of our attitude towards OT problems.—From the foregoing discussion of our Lord's study and employment of the OT we may be able to discover several principles which seem to have guided Him in His use of that literature.—(a) He subjected Himself to a virtual authority, but in no respect did He forego His intellectual right to judge for Himself about details of its teaching. The mere fact that words were written in the Scriptures did not suffice to render them authoritative for Him; in fact, He selected teaching which seemed in consonance with the spirit of the Kingdom He had come to declare, and in His interpretation of sayings that He did accept He was not afraid to pass by altogether received opinion or current explanation, if He felt these to be at variance with the true spirit of the original declaration of the Divine will. Sometimes, as in the case of the words, 'I am the God of Abraham,' etc., Jesus seems to support fanciful interpretations of the words, and even to give His authority to the allegorists. But on more careful examination we find that His exegesis is really a spiritual one, and that if the actual words can scarcely be taken, in their original use, to bear the meaning He puts upon them, at all events His reading of them is not forced, but penetrates beneath the surface to the spiritual realities underlying them.—(b) As has been already pointed out, the critical questions connected with Jonah or the 110th Psalm did not emerge in His time, neither does His treatment of either passage depend upon the judgment formed as to the authorship of the original. Whatever the character of the Book of Jonah, and whoever wrote it, the hero of the book remains as significant as a sign to Christ's contemporaries; and in the case of the Psalmist it is the significance of his words as the utterance of the Divine Spirit upon which Jesus lays stress; and this is equally the case whenever the Psalm was written, and whoever was the author of it. The same things apply to our Lord's treatment of narratives in Genesis and other parts of the OT. His treatment of these passages is of immense significance for us, therefore, as showing that it is the truths embodied in the writing which we have to discover and apply, and that the mere outward form of the revelation is of little significance.—(c) Again, it is helpful to find that Jesus recognizes the process of evolution that took place in OT revelation. It is not only that He sets aside certain precepts of the Law, but that He sees clearly that those who in the past were deprived of the privileges that a later age possessed would also be judged in accordance with their opportunities. Thus Tyre and Sidon and the queen of Sheba would find more lenient treatment in the Day of Judgment than the cities that had the opportunity of receiving Christ, but rejected Him. This great spiritual principle carries us very far in the treatment not only of OT problems, but in that of the relation of God to heathen peoples, and in the manner in which we regard the revelation contained in other religious systems. When He speaks of Abraham 'seeing his day,' it is also an indication of the same mental attitude, and recognizes the reality of the apprehension of great spiritual truths, even when these are veiled under forms of expression that render them difficult of apprehension.—(d) Of great significance also is the manner in which Jesus used the OT as the source of His own spiritual life. It is not only, as we have seen, that He was so imbued with its letter and spirit that He could employ it at all moments of temptation and trial, but also that He based upon it His greatest doctrines, developing and purifying the idea of the Divine Fatherhood, the Kingdom of righteousness, the Messiah, the Final Judgment, the Holy Spirit, and the mission of Israel (see Charles in Expos. vi. v. [1902] p. 258). He found also, it would appear, the very forms of His teaching in OT examples. The parable, which has been so often regarded as His most significant invention, is not infrequent in the pages of the prophets. The aphoristic forms in which so many of His utterances are cast seem based upon the language of the Book of Proverbs; while, as we have seen, the longer addresses have a resemblance to sections of the Wisdom literature. He was Himself reckoned by His contemporaries to be a great prophet, so that they saw the resemblance between His words and those of His great predecessors. As a preacher, therefore, He found His models in the religious literature of His own people, and a careful study of the use He made of these, the modifications that He found requisite, and the development that His own religious genius effected, may all be of the greatest value to those who have in the present day to apply not only Christ's teaching, but that which He Himself received and accepted, and which is implied in all that He taught. (See for interesting and valuable discussions of this latter point, Bugge, Die Haupt-Parabeln Jesu; and Fiebig, Alltjud. Gleichnisse und die Gleichnisse Jesu).

LITERATURE.—The two best books for a careful study of the subject treated in the above article are Hühn, Die Alttest. Citate und Reminiscenzen im NT, and Dittmar, Vetus Test. in Novo. Both of these works contain most careful references to the OT parallels, and also to the passages in the extra-canonical literature; and, where questions of various readings or other difficulties occur, these also are noted and discussed. Probably the best work in English of a similar nature is C. H. Toy, Quotations in the NT. This has the advantage of printing in important passages the Hebrew, LXX, and NT texts side by side, and contains fuller discussions of many passages than the German volumes. But, on the other hand, its references are not so full. An older, but useful book, is Turpie's The Old Test. and the New, which has much information, not given, however, in very careful fashion; and another work by the same author bears on the question, The New Test. view of the Old. A valuable chapter by S. Davidson on Quotations from the OT and the NT is contained in Horne's *Introduction*¹⁰, vol. ii. pt. 1, chs. 28 to 32. Of great value is the discussion of the subject by Clemen in his Der Gebrauch des AT in den NT Schriften, pp. 20–26. For a more popular treatment, see Rose OMNIPOTENCE.—The infinite power that works in and through, or above, all things towards the realizing of Divine ends. It may be viewed either intensively, as the power which makes its way through all finite powers, finding in these no real obstacle to its purpose; or extensively, as the power which gathers within it all finite powers, and so achieves its ends throughout the universe.

1. As attribute of God.—Power is a fundamental attribute of Deity: it has even been called the Divine attribute par excellence, because it is found in all religious conceptions from the lowest to the highest, and forms the basal thought, so to speak, upon which all other conceptions are built. In primitive religion, however, the superhuman power is not yet conceived as infinite: it is not even centred in one being, but distributed among many. It is enough for the worshipper to be able to regard the deity he worships as higher than himself and able to give him what he needs. Even the polytheist, however, often sets logic at defiance by ascribing to the god he is worshipping at the moment an unrestrained power within his own domain, and even a universal sovereignty. A true omnipotence is logically attributable only under a monotheistic scheme, where the one Divine being is invested with all the powers formerly distributed among many deities. Here the conception naturally develops of a Being whose power is universal in space and time, and moulds all things and events irresistibly to its own purposes. So, in the great days of the prophetic period of Israel's history, all limiting conceptions are withdrawn from the notion of God, and Jehovah stands revealed as the One Being who has all creation in the hollow of His hand, maker and controller of all things in heaven and earth, the supreme power working irresistibly to the accomplishment of His great moral ends (Am 4:13-58, Is 40:12-26, Ps 33:9-11, 115:3). God is not merely conceived as transcendent, the wonder-working God, intervening when and where He will: the higher conception also prevails that the ordinary as well as the extraordinary events of history are ordered by the Divine hand, and made to effect His purposes. Not only the universal movement of human life, but nature in all its forms, pulsates with the energy derived from God, is a channel of His revelation, and conforms absolutely to His will (Ps 148). In the NT the teaching of the prophets is accepted in its entirety: the advance made concerns only the higher attributes of God, and His spiritual ends. God is the infinite power working above and within all things: with Him is the power (Mt 6:13), to Him all things are possible (Mk 10:27, 14:36). He is the Lord God Almighty (Rev 4:8, 11:17), with no other limits than are set by His own nature ('He cannot deny himself,' 2 Ti 2:13) or by the moral ends He has in view (Mk 14:35, 36).

2. As ascribable to Christ.—It is generally admitted that the ascription to Christ of the Divine power has passed through a certain development, which is partly traceable in the Gospels themselves.

(a) In the Synoptic Gospels we have to distinguish between the Divine power attributed to Him in His earthly life, and the fuller power belonging to Him as the risen Lord, and the future Judge of the world. In His earthly life, while He passes through a truly human development, and is subject to natural human weakness, He is clothed with unique power for the fulfilment of His mission. The powers of heaven are at His command (Mt 26:53); He has power to heal, exerted at will (Mt 8:3), and apparently resident in Himself, though ultimately derived from God by faith and prayer (Mt 17:20, Mk 9:29). Sometimes this power is brought into play unwittingly on Christ's part (Mk 5:27-30, Lk 6:19). His wonder-working power extends over nature: and even the winds and the seas obey Him. The only limits to His power seem to lie in the faith of those who receive blessing (Mt 13:58) and in the conditions set to His Messianic mission (Mt 15:24). It is a further extension of this power of doing miracles that He can bestow it also upon His disciples (Mk 3:15, Lk 9:1, Mt 10:1), to be used within the same limits and under the same inward conditions of faith and prayer—the channels of the Divine omnipotence. As the risen and exalted Christ, He enters into a still wider range of Divine power. He is now clothed with a limitless authority in heaven and earth for the triumphant fulfilment of the Messianic work (Mt 28:18), and shares in the omnipresent government of God the Father (28:20). When He comes again as Messianic King to judge the world, He will come clothed with the full power and glory of God (Mk 13:26, 14:62, Mt 25:31ff.).

(b) In the Fourth Gospel the sphere of Christ's Divine power is still further enlarged. He is the incarnation of the Logos, by whom the world was made; the source, under God the Father, of all light and life. While the marks of human weakness are still found, the Christ of this Gospel is invested more thoroughly with the basal attributes of Divinity—eternity (8:58), omniscience (1:48, 6:44, 11:4), and omnipotence. Thus His miracles are manifestations of Divine glory, and are painted in the most striking colours, as the miracle at Cana and the story of Lazarus. He speaks as if He were already at the right hand of power; for all judgment is already committed to Him, and life, even life eternal, is in His hands (5:21, 22, 10:27ff.). His death on the cross is no longer a matter of untoward circumstance, and human violence prevailing over right; Christ permits His seizure only after proving His power to resist (18:6); and as He has freely laid down His life, so He freely takes it again (2:19, 10:18). It seems clear, then, that in the Fourth Gospel the conception of Jesus as a man subject to ordinary human limitations of weakness, ignorance, and moral growth is giving place to the thought of a Christ-Logos, who, even while on earth, is invested with all the metaphysical attributes of Divinity. At the same time it must be recognized that the earthly Christ exercises His Divine powers under certain limitations. His power (ἐξουσία is the word preferred) is a delegated power, given Him of the Father; and it is exercised within the definite limits of His saving mission.

(c) Without following in detail the progress of thought in the Apostolic teaching, and the development in later ages, we may notice one or two points in Christology where the question of Christ's omnipotence comes more prominently into view. The Logos theory developed into the Two-nature conception of Christ's Person, which last remained as the authoritative doctrine of the Church. The problem of Christ's Person was not thereby solved; and ever-recurring attempts were made to harmonize the facts of weakness, ignorance, and growth with a Divine φύσις possessed of all Divine powers. Either the human nature was conceived as exalted to the Divine, or the Divine was conceived as limiting itself, and so placing itself on a level with the finite human nature. The boldest attempt in the first direction was that made by the Lutheran theologians of the 16th and 17th cents., who taught that all Divine powers were personally communicated to the human nature of Christ, but that in His earthly state the use of these powers was ordinarily veiled, if not surrendered. The other direction of thought is seen, e.g., in Thomas Aquinas, who strives to bring the Divine omnipotence of Christ into harmony with His human life, by affirming that He shared in the Divine omnipotence only so far as He needed it in His mission, and, further, that He ordinarily limited His own power voluntarily so as to be able to partake of human weakness. A more strenuous attempt in the same direction is to be found in the Kenotic doctrine of last century, which affirms that Christ in becoming man emptied Himself of the attributes of omnipotence, etc., and so became subject to the ordinary conditions of a real human life (see KENOSIS). All such attempts to unify inconsistent characters end in depleting the Person of Christ either of His Divinity or of some part of His humanity, and so serve only to show the inadequacy of the Two-nature theory from which they start. The problem is to be solved only by (1) a new conception of what constitutes Divinity, and (2) by pressing back to the historical Christ as presented in the Synoptic Gospels. So long as God is characterized mainly by His basal attributes, the doctrine of the God-man is a simple unintelligibility: it is here that the proposition finitum non capax infiniti verifies itself to our minds. But as religious faith presses on to a recognition of the inner being of God, it comes upon attributes that are at once more central and at the same time essentially communicable to humanity. Holiness, justice, faithfulness, love, are the innermost attributes of God, and they also represent the goal of human life; and in the measure man attains to these, does he attain to union with God. It is through the possession of these qualities that Christ is one with the Father, and approves Himself as the Son of God. This must be the starting-point for a revision of the thought of Christ's omnipotence. Christ's power is not coextensive with God's; it is the power of omnipotent goodness and faith, the omnipotence of One who makes Himself the channel of the Divine will. Even His miraculous power must be subsumed under the same category; it is a power granted to faith (Mk 11²³, Mt 17²⁰). If it be said that this spiritual power and sovereignty are not yet omnipotence, we shall not quarrel about words. Christ does not possess absolute omnipotence, any more than He is God simpliciter. But He who lives in fullest fellowship with the Father, who is one with God in heart and purpose, and who consciously makes Himself the instrument of the Divine will in carrying out His work of grace among men, may surely claim to share in the Divine omnipotence.

OMNIPRESENCE.—The distinctive conception of omnipresence which meets us in the Gospels may briefly be expressed thus: God is able to exert His activity anywhere. God's children cannot be where He is not. He is spiritually present with all earnest, seeking souls everywhere.

1. If this be so, it is evident that Christ's distinctive teaching on this subject was not metaphysical. He does not speak of God in terms of philosophy. Such terms as 'the Absolute,' or 'the Infinite,' or 'the Unconditioned' are never found on Christ's lips, and, what is more, the ideas implied by these terms are absent from His horizon. We do not find in Christ's discourses any disquisition on the nature and attributes of God. With the exception of the solitary phrase 'God is Spirit' (Jn 4²⁴), which is certainly rich in implications, but, when originally uttered, was meant merely to check material and local conceptions of the Deity, we have no instance in which Jesus expounded the nature or even the attributes of God as such. His method was rather to reveal the character of God by portraying His activities in relation to the lives of men, and especially of Christian men. Not only so, but Christ's starting-point was different from that of the metaphysician. To the latter, God is a postulate of the Reason. God is a necessary assumption to explain the origination and continuance of the world. Reason claims satisfaction; and therefore insists that God must essentially be that which will subsume mind and nature under the unity of an intelligible notion. The metaphysician seeks for proofs of the existence of God—for indications of the real behind the phenomenal, the great First Cause behind the congeries of events which seem to be effects. In the teaching of the Lord Jesus, God is the postulate of the religious consciousness. When religious experiences are reduced to terms of thought, and the religious consciousness of the individual and the community is expressed in terms which are intelligible to the intellect, it is at once recognized that the God who is so real to His people, wherever they may be,—who is the source of strength and joy and light to His people everywhere,—must have the attribute of omnipresence predicated concerning Him. Christ's conception of the presence of God is thoroughly religious. It is always a presence to the religious consciousness, trust, prayer, and fellowship.

2. The Lord Jesus never associated omnipresence with infinitude. Hebrew philosophy, in the person of its supposed founder, might exclaim: 'Behold, heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain thee' (1 K 8²⁷); but no such thought ever came from the lips of Jesus. To Him the distinctive conception of omnipresence was: The child of God cannot go where his Father is not. He did not associate omnipresence with the infinitely great, but rather with the infinitely little. He was chiefly concerned to show that in the minute events of life God is present and observant; and that there is nothing so trivial as to elude the vigilance of our Father in heaven. The Lord Jesus left it for philosophers to lash their weary imaginations so as to trace the ubiquity of God in the infinite recesses of space, and to prove that everywhere there are indications of the same law and order as in the world around us, and that the indications of the presence of a supreme Mind are as apparent in the sidereal heavens as here. If we may so say, Christ's conception was microscopic rather than telescopic. To trace the tokens of the presence of God's workmanship in the colours of the lily, or in the provision God has made for feeding the ravens, yielded great joy to the Saviour's heart because it suggested so strikingly that God is 'round about us,' and enabled Him the better to impress on the hearts of His disciples, when their faith was so feeble, that God was very near to them, to sympathize, to succour, and to bless, as well as to further the interests of His Kingdom.

3. It is probable that Christ's teaching on this subject was intended to be a corrective to much of the current Jewish theology of that period. An outstanding peculiarity of the religious thought of Christ's time was the emphasis placed on the doctrine of God's aloofness. The Jews had imported, probably from Persia, the belief that matter is essentially evil. Hence it was considered to be beneath the dignity of the Divine nature that God should be supposed to have direct contact with inert matter, or immediate intercourse with sinful men; and under the influence of this belief God was gradually pushed further away from His world. This conception was operative in two ways: (a) To the Palestinian Jews God was conceived of as enjoying the otiose majesty of an Oriental monarch, who is kept informed of the deeds of men and the events of the world by the 'angels of the Presence,' who 'at His bidding speed o'er land and sea,' and report what they have seen and heard. (b) The Alexandrian Jews, of whose beliefs Philo was the chief exponent, treated the matter more philosophically, and they pushed the doctrine of God's 'separateness' from all that is material, earthly, and human, to such an extent as to deny that God has any qualities at all. Philo maintained, as some moderns have done, that to assign any quality or attribute to God is to limit Him: which is inadmissible, since God is the absolutely unlimited, eternal, unchangeable, simple substance. 'Of God,' said Philo, 'we can only know that He is, not what He is' (Drummond, Philo Judæus, ii. 23-30). Knowing as we do that this was the trend of Jewish thought in Christ's day, it is difficult to believe that Christ's teaching as to the Divine omnipresence and fatherly care, in the Sermon on the Mount and elsewhere, was not meant to be a corrective of the current theology, which in its endeavour to de-humanize God was in danger of un-deifying Him.

And now we are prepared to consider in detail the intimations of omnipresence which meet us in the Gospels; and we may conveniently arrange them in three groups, according as they refer to the Father, Son, or Holy Spirit.

4. Passages which teach or imply the omnipresence of God the Father. We know what kind of intimations to expect. We shall not meet with much that will satisfy our intellectual, philosophical nature, but with much that will appeal deeply to our religious nature.

As Dr. Stevens says: 'He (Jesus) aims to rescue the idea of God from the realm of cold and powerless abstraction, and to make it a practical, living power in the heart. He sought to inspire in men an intense and constant sense of God's presence and care' (Theol. of NT, 66). Similarly, Dr. Orr teaches that 'Christ's doctrine of the Father is entirely unmetaphysical. . . . He takes up into His teaching all the natural truth about God. He also takes up all the truth about God's being, character, perfections, and relation to the world and man, already given in the OT.' But 'the attributes of God . . . are never made by Christ the subject of formal discourse, are never treated of for their own sake, or in their metaphysical relations. They come into view solely in their religious relations' (Christian View, 77f.).

The distinctive feature as to the omnipresence of God in the Sermon on the Mount is to be found in the words, 'Thy Father who is in secret' (Mt 6¹⁸). Others may expatiate on the fact that God transcends the heaven of heavens, our Lord was concerned to bring home to the religious consciousness of His disciples, that God is in the secret place of their lowly dwelling, where no other eye can see them. To use the words of Beyschlag—Christ taught that—'God is as present and operative in the world as He can be, without denying His absolute goodness, and without interfering with the freedom of the creature, which is the fundamental condition of all development of good in the world. The world is . . . His work and workshop. If the Judaism of the time separated God and the world from each other almost deistically, . . . Jesus, on the other hand, conceives the relation of His Father to the world as one instinct with life. God has by no means withdrawn Himself from the world He once created' (NT Theol. i. 95f.).

'Presence' and 'activity' are equivalent with God, and therefore He 'who is in secret' must also 'see in secret' (Mt 6¹⁸). He is actively present with those who 'give alms' in secret (6⁴), who 'pray' in secret (6⁶), and who 'fast' in secret (6¹⁸). The omnipresent activity of God is evidenced also in His unceasing care and fatherly solicitude over His creatures. His children are encouraged to rely on His care from the fact that the Heavenly Father feeds the fowls of heaven (6²⁶), and clothes the grass of the field and the beautiful lilies (6³⁰); notices the fall of every sparrow, and numbers the very hairs of our heads (10^{29d}). Wherever God's children may be, He knows what things they have need of (6^{28, 32}), gives good things to them that ask Him (7¹¹), and reveals the truth to earnest souls (16¹⁷). We learn from these passages that wherever God's children are, there God is, without any need of moving from place to place. All the activities of God are available everywhere at the same time. 'Whatever God can do, whether by way of knowing, loving, creating, or controlling, He can do anywhere, and everywhere at once' (W. N. Clarke, Outline of Chr. Theol. 79).

5. We turn now to the profound and really inexhaustible words which Jesus let fall in His conversation with the woman of Samaria: 'God is Spirit' (Jn 4²⁴), not 'a spirit,' which might mean that God belongs to the class of spiritual beings. Jesus wished simply to describe what the essential nature of God is; it is spiritual. This declaration of Christ, which, as Westcott says, is 'unique in its majestic simplicity,' has many implications. It certainly implies omnipresence. This is the very fact which the words were employed by our Lord to teach—that God's presence is not confined to any temple, Judean or Samaritan; and that therefore in the new dispensation His presence is everywhere operative, and equally real and near to men wheresoever they may be.

Taking in our hand this clue that 'God is Spirit,' we shall find it useful to guide us in regions which lie beyond the immediate purview of our Lord in His conversation with the woman of Samaria. For instance, it is a disputed point whether we ought to say that 'God fills all space.' Martensen expresses himself thus: 'All is filled with God. The omnipresent God is the inmost fundamental being of everything that exists,—the life of all that lives—the Spirit of all spirits' (Chr. Dogmatics, 93). Dr. Strong says: 'By omnipresence we mean that God in the totality of His essence, without diffusion or expansion, penetrates and fills the universe in all its parts. Like birds in the air, like fish in the sea, we are surrounded still with God' (Man. Theol. 132). Whereas, on the other hand, W. N. Clarke teaches: 'By omnipresence we do not mean a presence of God that fills all space in the manner in which we think of matter as filling certain parts of space. It is not a universal diffusion of the essence of God, like diffusion of the atmosphere' (Outline, 79). Following the analogy of 'spirit,' we learn that we must be very careful lest we fall into any statements that are strictly applicable to matter only. Spirit is in every respect the antithesis of matter. Every quality which belongs to matter is, ipso facto, to be excluded from spirit. Matter fills space, and on that very account we may not say that 'spirit fills space,' or that 'God fills all things.' To introduce the idea of God's filling space is at once inevitably to suggest materialist analogies, as air fills the atmosphere, or the luminiferous ether fills all space; and all such analogies are misleading. The saving clause introduced by Dr. Strong and others, that God fills the universe 'without diffusion or expansion,' does not help us; it merely makes the definition self-contradictory. It is well that we should avoid all metaphors which suggest that which is extended and materialistic, and adhere closely to dynamical analogies. It is not a substantial, but an operative presence of God in creation which is suggested to us by the word 'spirit.' It is God's almighty energy that is present everywhere. If we could penetrate into the realm of ontology, doubtless God is somewhat which infinitely transcends our thought, but what that is we lack the capacity even to imagine.

While thus maintaining the Divine omnipresence, we must try to find room for those numerous passages which speak of God as dwelling in heaven. In the First Gospel we have the frequently recurring phrase 'Your Father which is in heaven' (5^{16, 45} 6^{1, 9} 7^{11, 21} 10³² 12⁵⁰ 13^{14, 19}). In the prohibition of oaths in the Sermon on the Mount, Christ speaks of heaven as 'God's throne' and the earth as His 'footstool' (Mt 5³⁴). In the Fourth Gospel Jesus says that He 'came down from heaven' (Jn 3¹³ 6³²), and also that He 'came forth from God' (16^{27, 32}). And in looking forward to His death, He says: 'I came forth from the Father, and am in the world: again I leave the world and go unto the Father' (16²⁸). So also in 16¹⁰ 'I go to the Father, and ye behold me no more'; and in 20¹⁷ 'I ascend unto my Father and your Father.' How in the light of the present article are we to conceive of God's being thus connected with heaven so much more than with earth? and of other passages which assure us that 'in heaven the angels do always behold the face of our Father who is in heaven'? How are we to reconcile the statement that God's throne, or God's face, is in heaven, with the doctrine of Divine omnipresence? The following seems to be the line along which we must seek for light:—While it is true that God's presence is everywhere, it does not follow that His presence is manifested everywhere alike. He is most fully manifested to those who are most like Him; and if we may believe in a home where there are assembled the spirits of just men made perfect, and also the varying gradations of angels—the holiest intelligences whom God has created, vastly superior to man in purity and capacity for knowledge—that will be the home where God is most fully manifested, because those who can best understand Him are there. There are 'the pure in heart' who 'see God.' But it will be said: 'Is heaven, then, a place?' Perhaps not; but so long as we are here, and endowed with our present faculties, we are compelled to think of it as a place; and it must ever seem to us probable that created spirits are possessed of some enswathement which enables us, more or less accurately, to assign locality to them. This is our justification for believing that heaven is a region in which, in a manner more glorious than we can conceive, God manifests His natural and moral attributes, and reveals tokens of His loving favour to pure and holy intelligences. 'In thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore' (Ps 16¹¹).

Considerable controversy has been waged around the passage we have quoted from Mt 5³⁴, which affirms that heaven is 'God's throne' and the earth is 'his footstool.' The early Socinians interpreted it to mean that God's essential or substantial presence is in heaven, and that elsewhere He is present by His efficacy only. To this it has been objected that 'it includes God in the heavenly space and excludes Him from the earthly space, and thus tends to Deism' (Macpherson, Chr. Dogmatics, 131); and that 'such limitation in the Divine essence manifestly abrogates the Divine absoluteness' (Dorner, System, i. 241). The Socinian interpretation is a fair illustration of the way in which we become entangled when we introduce terms of space into our descriptions of God's attributes. God's spiritual nature refuses to be compared with terms of space, and hence it is incongruous to say that God is existent in one part of space and not in another. He does not, being purely spiritual, occupy space at all; but for fuller knowledge of Him we must be content to wait till we have emerged from this state of existence, where all our perceptions are conditioned by space and time, and have entered into that state where we shall see our Lord 'as he is,' and 'shall know' in the same manner as now 'we are known' (1 Co 13¹²).

6. We have now to speak of those passages in which the Lord Jesus speaks of Himself as ubiquitous.—In Jn 3¹³ our Lord says: 'No man hath ascended into heaven but he that descended out of heaven, even the Son of Man who is in heaven.' It must be noted that the words ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ οὐρανοῦ are omitted in A B L T_b 33, Cyril, Origen, and several Fathers. WH consider them 'a Western gloss, suggested perhaps by 1¹⁸'; but our Revisers retain the words in the text, remarking in the margin that 'many ancient authorities omit them.' If genuine, as is very probable, they are important, but not unique. They do but cause Jesus to say of Himself what the Evangelist says of Him in 1¹⁸ 'The only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.' They teach us that Jesus was conscious of a state of glory which from eternity He had with the Father—was conscious of it not as a past memory, but as a continued reality. His earthly life had not severed the intimacy of His fellowship with His Father; and ontologically His presence as Son of Man on earth did not remove the presence of the Son of Man from heaven.

Beyschlag interprets the passage differently: 'Jesus thinks of Himself as pre-existent, not because He knows Himself to be a second God, and remembered a former life in heaven, but because He recognized Himself in Daniel's image as the bearer of the kingdom of heaven, and because this Son of Man, as well as the kingdom which He brings to earth, must spring from heaven. That the ideal man existed from eternity in God is the truth which He grasped, and to which He gave concrete intellectual form' (NT Theol. i. 253).

Another important passage is Mt 18²⁰ 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' The genuineness of this passage has been denied, not because it is lacking in any Greek MSS, but for a priori reasons. Starting from a humanitarian conception of Christ, some hold it to be improbable, if not impossible, that He should, as is here affirmed, foresee the development of His Church, legislate for its management, and promise His spiritual presence, wherever the members of the Church were assembled, however few in number they might be. Our purpose is not critical, but exegetical. If we assume the genuineness of the words above cited, they seem to show that Christ's Messianic consciousness included the ability to fulfil such OT predictions as Jl 2²⁷ 'Ye shall know that I am in the midst of Israel'; Zeph 3¹⁷ 'The Lord thy God in the midst of thee is mighty.' As He was conscious of His identity as Son of Man before His advent, so He is confident that such powers as He has heretofore possessed will be continued to Him in the days which He foresees shall intervene, before the Son of Man shall come in His glory. Whatever the community of disciples shall bind or loose, make binding or leave optional, shall receive Divine ratification, because the presence of the Christ will be with them guiding and controlling them.

If we have followed this interpretation—and surely, unless St. John and St. Paul have misunderstood and misinterpreted Jesus Christ, there is nothing improbable in the interpretation—we are quite prepared to expect that the Lord Jesus after His resurrection should say to His disciples, 'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world' (Mt 28²⁰). This passage is also regarded by Wendt and others as a product of the developing Catholicism and Christology of the Church; but it is surely a blunder to ascribe so much to developing Christology, unless there were some germinal utterances of Jesus which the Church proceeded to develop. The eagerness of the primitive Christians to disseminate the gospel most probably rests on a command of the Master, and the readiness with which they assume the presence of Christ with them wherever they are, implies as its background some such promise and declaration as that before us. Christ's Messianic consciousness could hardly fail to include the conceptions involved in Is 42¹ 49⁶ as well as Jl 2²⁷. If Jesus could appropriate to Himself the statements of Is 61¹⁻² (cf. Lk 4^{18, 19}), it follows most naturally—and this is precisely what the Gospels presuppose—that He applied to Himself all the OT predictions of the Messiah, and was conscious that He possessed the properties and attributes which the OT assigns to Him who was to come—King, Servant, Prophet, and Messiah in one. It is perfectly in accordance with this conception that Jesus, in contemplating the spread of His Kingdom in 'all nations,' 'to the ends of the earth,' should say, 'Lo, I am with you always.'

In the Reformation period there was bitter controversy as to the ubiquity of Christ's body. It arose chiefly from Luther's interpretation of the words of Jesus at the Supper, 'This is my body' (Mt 26²⁶). Luther was persuaded that the word 'is' denotes real and essential existence. In vain did Zwingli point out to him that Jesus also said, 'I am the door'; 'I am the true vine.' Luther was immovable in his belief that the consecrated bread is in some sense the body of Christ. He had repudiated the Romanist dogma that the particles of the bread are transmuted into substantial particles of the veritable flesh and blood of Christ, and therefore it remained to him to contend that the body and blood of Christ are 'in, with, and under' the bread and the wine. In order to show that this is compatible with Christ's ascension, Luther fell back on the Scholastic distinction as to the three ways in which a body can be in a place, localiter, definitivè, and repletivè. Locally, when the contents exactly fill the vessel. Definitively, when that which fills has the power of occupying a larger or a smaller space. Repletively (or, to use Luther's word, illocally), when a thing is everywhere, and yet measured or contained by no place.

Luther maintained the ubiquity of the body of Christ illocally. Then, in order to explain how we may without self-contradiction ascribe omnipresence to body, he adopted the theory known to theologians as communicatio idiomatum. In other words, he maintained that the Deity of Christ imparted all its essential attributes to Christ's humanity. And in this way Christ's body received the attributes of omnipresence, omnipotence, and omniscience. The body of Christ is present everywhere, especially in the consecrated bread, and thus can be literally manducated by those who partake of the Lord's Supper. (For further extreme and unreasonable positions of Luther's followers, one should consult Bruce, Humiliation of Christ, Lecture III.)

7. We have now merely to adduce the few expressions in the Gospels which imply the ubiquity of the Holy Spirit. We do not find any explicit statement in the Gospels of the absolute omnipresence of the Spirit. His attributes are disclosed in connexion with His activities in the spread of the Kingdom. Wherever believers are found, there 'the Comforter, who is the Holy Ghost,' is present with His benign power over human hearts. He will 'teach' the disciples 'all things, and call all things to their remembrance' (Jn 14²⁶); and will guide them into all truth, and show them things to come (16¹³). But the activity of the Spirit is not limited to those who have believed and have become disciples: it is exerted also on those who are still in 'the world.' Our Lord declares, 'He shall convict the world in respect of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment' (16⁸). To those who believe and are thus 'chosen out of the world' the Spirit 'testifies of' Christ (15²⁶); He 'dwells with' them and is 'in them' (14¹⁷); and they know Him, 'though the world seeth him not, neither knoweth him' (14¹⁷).

Ritschl maintains that our Lord limited the doctrine of God to its relation to the Kingdom of God. This is not quite true with regard to the Divine omnipresence any more than to the other natural attributes of God; for did not Jesus say that God 'causeth his sun to rise,' and 'sendeth rain' (Mt 5⁴⁵), and 'clothes the grass of the field and the lilies' (6³⁰)? Still it is only a slight exaggeration of an important truth. The distinctive teaching of Jesus on the subject before us is that God is with His people everywhere. They cannot go where He is not present, to succour and to bless.

OMNISCIENCE (OF CHRIST).—There are such great differences in the mental grasp of different persons, that no one can prove that all knowledge may not have been open to the human mind of Christ. On the other hand, no one can assert that because of His Divine nature in union with His human nature He must have possessed and exercised such powers. It seems to be left quite open to us, unbiassed in the one direction or in the other, to deal with each department of His knowledge,—as of history before His coming, of nature, and of the future,—and to come to the conclusion that His knowledge included any matter or did not include it, without introducing the dogmatic fallacy that He must, because of His omniscience, have known this or that. Apart from assurance of what God has done, we cannot say what He must do. And this applies to the conditions of the earthly life which it seemed good to the Father that Christ should live.

When we come to the testimony of Scripture, we find Christ growing in knowledge (Lk 2⁵²), and afterwards limiting Himself to be a teacher not even in matters of civil justice (Lk 12¹⁴), but only in the highest region of religion. In a sense, every prophet who says what God will do, claims a knowledge which dominates all the details of God's providence in every department (1 Jn 2²⁰ 'Ye know all things'). And in this sense, and in higher measure, Christ was omniscient. In the words of Luther, 'He was full of grace and wisdom, and able to judge upon and teach all that came before Him' (Dorner, Person of Christ, ii. 92). Thus His disciples said of Him, 'Thou knowest all things' (Jn 16³⁰ 21¹⁷). 'He knew what was in man' (Jn 2²⁵).

It is usual to refer to Mk 13³², where Christ disclaims knowledge of the day of His coming, as evidence that there were limitations to our Lord's knowledge. On the other hand, in His discourse with Nathanael and with the woman of Samaria, He showed supernatural knowledge. See, further, artt. ACCOMMODATION, KENOSIS.

ONENESS.—The term 'oneness' (ἐνότης, tr. 'unity') occurs only in the Epistle to the Ephesians, where it is twice used (4³ 13) in what may be called a moral sense, i.e. to express not a physical but a mental or spiritual idea. In that Epistle, where the writer has in view the Gentile world, fundamental ideas of unity are set forth more distinctly and emphatically than anywhere else in the Bible. There is one God, one Lord, one Spirit (4⁴⁻⁶). Christ's work is to 'gather together in one' (1¹⁰), or, as it may be rendered, unite under one head, all created beings in earth or heaven. God had made 'of one' (Ac 17²⁶) all nations of men, but in the course of history divisions had prevailed and walls of partition (Eph 2¹⁴) had been built. These separations were to cease. In the Kingdom of God, Jew and Gentile were reconciled, these two types being made 'both one' (2¹⁴) in a union based on the deeper reconciliation of both to God (2¹⁶). Hence the formation of one Body in which the individuals resemble the Head, and the whole is animated by unity of faith and character and life (4¹³ 16). These conceptions, so eloquently unfolded, are presuppositions of Christianity, and are implied, if not explicitly taught, in the Gospels. In Luke, in particular, emphasis is laid on the work of the Redeemer in the saving of the outcast, the sinful, and the lost. This is the subject of the three parables in ch. 15 and of the parable of the Banquet in ch. 14. To these may be added the parable of the Good Samaritan (ch. 10), the story of Zacchæus (ch. 19), and the description of the Kingdom of God as containing men from all parts of the world (13²⁹, cf. Mt 8¹¹). These correspond with the saying of St. Paul (Gal 3²⁸), that 'all are one in Christ Jesus.' In Mt., again, we have the doctrine of the Church (16¹⁸), of the mystic presence of Christ with His people (18²⁰ 28²⁰), and of the power of union in commanding answer to prayer (18¹⁹). And in the closing verses (28¹⁸) the universal Headship of Christ is fully announced.

It is in St. John's Gospel, however, that conceptions of oneness are most pointedly set forth. We note the following:

1. The oneness of Christ and God (10³⁰ 14⁹ 17¹¹ 22). The declarations, 'I and the Father are one,' 'he that hath seen me hath seen the Father,' may or may not be designed to teach identity of essence; they at least express a practical identity as far as human relations are concerned. They imply the moral perfection of Jesus so that His life and example become the manifestation of the Divine; and not moral perfection only, for His character and teaching constitute the revelation of the Father. Other passages indicate the mutual knowledge and love of the Father and the Son, and their mutual indwelling (17²¹⁻²⁵); but the main lesson is that Christ is for us the revealer and representative of God.

2. The oneness of Christ and His people.—This thought is embodied in the allegory of the Vine (15¹⁻⁹). The branches are a part of the vine, and when separated are dead. The unity is therefore that of a common life, and it is indicated in the phrases that express mutual indwelling. The idea is substantially the same as in the figure of the Body which is the fulness of Him that filleth all in all (Eph 1²³), and even in the figure of the Temple or spiritual house of which Christ is the foundation and His people are as living stones (1 P 2⁵, Eph 2²¹). This oneness is not of equality; for the vine is greater than the branches; the head is the source of the life, and occupies a position of authority. Jesus possessed the Spirit without measure, and His life marks the ideal towards which His followers are to strive (Eph 4¹³). But it is a oneness of life, though in the conditions of normal human existence the Divine is often obscured, and at best is only partially exhibited. This oneness of Christ and His people is represented as parallel to the oneness of the Father and the Son; in respect of mutual knowledge (10¹⁴⁻¹⁵), community of life (17²¹), and the love which issues from the Father and the Son (15⁹). Hence the loving obedience of the disciple to his Lord should correspond to the consecration of the Son to the Father (15¹⁰).

3. The oneness of Christ's people as constituting a Body or Church, is expressed in the metaphor of the one flock (10¹⁶ RV), divided amongst Jewish and Gentile folds. And to the same effect is the assertion that Christ is to 'gather together into one' the children scattered abroad (11³²). The first of these texts contradicts the claim of a particular organization to be the sole Church of Christ. Both of them belong to a far loftier sphere of thought, which conceives the Church as a great spiritual organism, embracing those of every land and age who are redeemed and sanctified, and who by the power of God live for His Kingdom and glory.

4. But the conception of a catholic Church one and holy carries us away from any visible condition of things; and the moral oneness of faith and love which every company of Christians should exhibit presents itself as an unrealized ideal. The first years of Christianity were indeed a period of singular oneness (Ac 4³²). But harmony gave place to discord as new questions of thought and practice had to be faced. Consequently we find St. Paul pouring out his heart in pleas and prayers for oneness of mind and heart and soul (Ph 2²). In anticipation of such troublous times, Christ makes oneness a main burden of His last prayer with His disciples (Jn 17¹¹⁻²¹⁻²⁶), as He makes mutual love the sum of His closing commandments (15⁹⁻¹³). Such oneness, resting on the basis of Divine fellowship and the possession of Christlike excellence, becomes a means of the attainment of perfection (17²³). For, without social relationship and the mutual support of interdependent men, human nature cannot truly realize itself or completely fulfil the end of its creation.

ONLY BEGOTTEN.—1. Meaning.—There is no doubt that the term 'only begotten' indicates a nuance of the Greek μονογενής which is very seldom emphasized. As H. Schmidt proves, the word γίγνεσθαι has in general usage entirely lost the early sexual sense of the root γεν. It means simply 'to arise,' 'to become.' It signifies 'that which previously was not there and had no existence comes into being'; μονογενής is 'what alone acquires or has existence,' it is merely a fuller form for μόνος (as πρωτογενής = πρώτος, ὁμογενής = ὁμοιος, ἀετιγενής = αἰώνιος). When we have to do with living beings—men or animals—the meaning 'born,' 'begotten' is, of course, congruous, but there is no emphasis whatever attached to this side. When Christ is designated μονογενής υἱός, the emphasis is laid not on the fact that He as Son was 'born' or 'begotten' (in contrast to being 'created' or 'made'), but that He is the 'only' Son, that as Son of God He has no equal. The Latin translators were quite right when originally they rendered the expression υἱός μονογενής simply by filius unicus, not by filius unigenitus. It was the dogmatic disputes as to the inner essential relations between Christ and God, especially those raised by Arius, which first gave occasion for emphasizing the point that Christ as the Son of God was a 'begotten' Son, i.e. that He did not form part of the creation. After that it became a general custom to render μονογενής by unigenitus, 'only begotten.' In the original form of the so-called 'Apostolic Symbol'—the 'Old Roman Symbol'—we read: καὶ εἰς Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ τὸν μονογενῆ τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν; and in the Latin text, which in all probability belongs to the same date (i.e. in any case some time in the 2nd cent.): 'et in Christum Jesum filium eius unicum dominum nostrum.' In the Latin, there is nothing to distinguish whether 'unicum' is to be connected with 'filium eius' or 'dominum nostrum.' The present writer, in an exhaustive inquiry into the historical meaning of the original form of the Apostolic Symbol (see Literature cited at end), has defended the hypothesis that the latter combination is the correct one. Then, of course, the τὸν before μονογενῆ in the traditional Greek form must be an interpolation. Such an interpolation could easily arise in later times, because the title υἱός μονογενής was well known from the Johannine writings as an honorific designation of Jesus, whereas in the NT the title κύριος μονογενής does not occur (only εἰς κύριος occurs, 1 Co 8⁶). As far as the language is concerned, there is absolutely no reason why Christ should not be designated μονογενής κύριος; and the thought, which then finds a place in the Symbol, is a particularly pregnant one. The combination of μονογενής with κύριος, not with υἱός, is favoured by two considerations: first, that in the Symbol there is nothing that recalls Johannine ideas (much, on the other hand, suggesting Pauline thought); and, secondly, that there are a number of Latin texts where, undoubtedly, 'unicum' is connected with 'dominum nostrum.'

2. NT usage.—In the NT the expression υἱός μονογενής is used only of Christ by John (3¹⁶⁻¹⁸, 1 Jn 4⁹). The passage Jn 1¹⁴ is a contested reading, and in any case comes only indirectly into comparison. Elsewhere in the New Test. the expression occurs in Lk 7¹² (the young man of Nain), 8⁴² (the daughter of Jairus), 9³⁶ (the demoniac boy), He 11¹⁷ (Isaac). In the LXX μονογενής is frequently the tr. of רִבִּי, especially wherever the idea of uniqueness or aloneness seems to be emphasized: Jg 11³⁴, Ps 22²⁰ 25¹⁶ 35¹⁷ (cf. also To 3¹⁵ 6¹⁰⁻¹⁴ 8¹⁷). The expression μονογενής acquires a qualitative secondary meaning from the fact that what is 'unique' is naturally of special value. An 'only son' is a specially beloved son. This secondary meaning belongs in all likelihood to the expression υἱός μονογενής in Jn. also. Cremer compares with it the term used by St. Paul in Ro 8³²—υἱός ἴδιος. In the LXX, where this secondary meaning is emphasized, the rendering ἀγαπητός is chosen for רִבִּי: Gn 22²⁻¹²⁻¹⁶, Jer 6²⁶, Am 8¹⁰, Zec 12¹⁰. In the Synoptics (in the narratives of the Baptism and the Transfiguration), where Christ is called υἱός ἀγαπητός, μονογενής could hardly be substituted. The expression here corresponds to the ὄντως of Is 42¹ [LXX ἐκλεκτός] (for ἀγαπητός in Lk 9³⁵ Cod. NB and other MSS give ἐκλεκτός). In all the passages in Jn., with the exception of 1¹⁴, it seems we might substitute the expression ἀγαπητός for μονογενής.

Jn 1¹⁴.—This passage is of interest because the question arises whether instead of υἱός μονογενής we ought not to read θεός μονογενής. Hort strongly supports this view with a brilliant display of learning, and has proved that the latter reading was very widespread in the Ancient Church. It is to be found in a number of good MSS of the Gospel: κ BCL 33 and in the Pesh. and Coptic versions. He also argues, in support of it, that 'the whole Prologue leads up to it, and, to say the least, suffers in unity if it is taken away.' Supposing that we have to accept this reading, it appears to the present writer probable that St. John, in applying this predicate to Christ, was influenced by regard to a non-Christian religious employment of the notions of μονογενής and θεός μονογενής, and that the expression υἱός μονογενής has thus in his writings a special secondary meaning in addition. For the term Μονογενής occurs in the Valentinian (Ptolemaic) system as the name of one of the aëons (Irenæus, i. 1 ff., ed. Harvey). Wobbermin, however, has shown that the term was of special significance in the Orphic mysteries, seeing that it occurs there as the personal name of a powerful incomparable divinity. Just as St. John took over from the Hellenistic philosophy the title 'Logos' for Christ, in order to remove from the minds of Christians the fear that there was beyond Christ a higher mediator between God and man, so he might have taken over from the highly important Orphic cult the title 'Monogenes,' in order to show Christians that they knew Him who is in reality the θεός μονογενής. We should then have to suppose that St. John has invested the expression with a meaning which was foreign to general and popular usage, but which probably corresponded with the use of the word in Orphic circles. That is to say, it is possible to interpret the term μονογενής as designating Christ as ἐκ μόνου γενόμενος (cf. αὐτογενής—a name of an aëon in the Barbelognosis [Iren. i. xxix. 1], γεννητός—a description of mankind in Clem. Rom. [First Ep. to Cor. xxxix. 2] etc.). Christ would then be the 'God' who proceeded from the 'only,' i.e. from the 'true God,' the Son who sprang from the 'unique One.' In that case the idea of ἀγαπητός, noted above as the secondary meaning which per se everywhere best suits the context, would recede into the background. But the present writer does not regard it as likely that St. John knew anything of Orphism. In the whole Gospel there is nothing else to suggest this. It might, indeed, be said that the conception of the Logos in the Prologue is the only trace of Hellenism in the Fourth Gospel. But in the first place this is not quite correct, and again in itself it is much more likely that John [the author of the Gospel is unmistakably a Jew] knew the philosophy of Philo than that he was acquainted with the Orphic system. Thus the present writer believes that it was persons like Clement of Alexandria who were first reminded of the Orphic titles of the aëons by the predicate μονογενής applied to Christ as Son of God. He further holds that the Church so far thought she was acting wisely in making out of the υἱός μονογενής of Jn 1¹⁴ a θεός μονογενής, in order to be able with more assurance to meet both Orphism and Gnosticism.

OPPOSITION.—The reason for the opposition offered to Christ in proclaiming His Kingdom on earth was the hostility of the scribes, Pharisees, and others, who represented the religious element in the Jewish nation. The profession of religion was at that time fashionable among the Jews. To make a parade of religious observance was a sure passport to popularity, as the ostentatious display of wealth is in modern times. Christ decried this parade of religion as hypocritical. He inveighed against the Pharisees and scribes in no measured terms (see esp. Mt 23). He told them that their profession was a sham and their religion worthless. He assured them that their lineal descent from Abraham, on which they prided themselves so much, gave them no special plea for acceptance with God. It was the spiritual descendants of the patriarch, who imitated his faith and listened to the teaching of God, who were the true Israelites, the inheritors of the promise. He insisted upon a religion of the heart, and not the outward and formal rites and observances, on which they laid such stress because they brought them into favour with men.

The Sadducees, with the leading priestly families at their head, had a special grudge against Jesus, on account of His cleansing of the Temple and condemnation of the traffic carried on in its courts,—a traffic in which they had a direct interest.

The opposition to Christ was so bitter as to be satisfied with nothing short of His death. It culminated in the illegal trial before the high priest and the Sanhedrin, and the arraignment before Pontius Pilate. Its strength is shown in the preference for the release of Barabbas to that of Jesus. Though the Roman governor fully realized that this opposition was dictated by envy, and that Christ was innocent of any thought of treason against the Roman government, yet he was afraid, from motives of personal interest, to give a decision in accordance with his convictions.

As far as the people, as distinguished from the ruling classes, were concerned, their final opposition, or at least indifference, to Jesus arose chiefly from the way in which He had disappointed their carnal Messianic expectations. See artt. POPULARITY, POPULARITY OF JESUS.

Christ in the Gospels warned His disciples constantly of the opposition with which they would inevitably meet (see esp. Mt 24⁹, Mk 10³⁰, Lk 21¹²⁻¹⁶, Jn 15²⁰). C. H. PRICHARD.

OPPRESSION.—The word does not occur in the Gospels or in connexion with the activity of Jesus except in the verbal form in Ac 10³⁸ ('Jesus of Nazareth . . . went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed [καταδυναστευόμενοι] of the devil'). In 'breaking the rod of the oppressor,' Jesus delivered men not only from sin, but from sorrow and sickness (Lk 4²⁸, Mt 11⁴¹), from the yoke of legalism (Lk 11⁴⁶), the tyranny of worldly circumstance (Lk 12⁴⁻⁷), the fear of death (Ac 2¹⁵), etc. Oppression of guilt weighing upon the sinner's soul was a condition which never failed specially to elicit Christ's sympathy and pity (Mt 11²⁸⁻³⁰), according to the interpretation that commends itself to the present writer. The sense of this oppression could not exist without an earnest desire to be rid of the burden, and it was this desire that was a sign of a tendency towards a higher life.

It was the oppression of sin that Christ came to take away, and not the yoke of the Roman government which proved so galling to the Jewish nation after their glorious past. It was partly the mistake about the object of His mission that stirred up against Christ the opposition which is so marked a feature in the Gospels. See OPPOSITION.

ORDINANCES.—In the English versions of the Gospels this word occurs only once, Lk 1⁵, where the parents of John the Baptist are described as 'walking in all the commandments (ἐντολαίς) and ordinances (δικαιώμασι) of the Lord blameless.' From its etymology the word δικαίωμα means (1) a righteous enactment of rightful authority, and (2) a righteous act or deed. Here, of course, the first signification is the one intended, but the strict etymological force is not to be pressed, as the word is simply one of the oft-recurring practical synonyms for the injunctions of the Divine Law, both moral and ceremonial.

E. C. DARGAN.

ORGANIZATION.—In the NT organization is visible, but in a rudimentary and experimental state. It lacks the rigidity of a fully systematized religion, but it is thereby the better evidence of the glorious vigour of primitive Christianity and its impatience of all that might restrain and hinder its mission. Christ imbued His disciples with an ideal; they accepted His declaration of a Kingdom of God unfettered in plan and method and time; they knew it was to come imperceptibly ('the wind bloweth where it listeth,' Jn 3⁸), and to one the Kingdom will appear with the surprise of a treasure found in a field (Mt 13⁴⁴), while to another it will be the pearl gained at the willing cost of all else (v. 45). In its earthly realization it was to be all-inclusive, a net that should gather of every kind (v. 47), a field for tares as well as wheat (v. 30), and this wide vision gave the Apostles zeal to seek sinners as well as saints, Romans as well as Jews, calling none unworthy or unclean (Peter's dream, Ac 10²⁸). Yet Jesus knew that organization was the inevitable accompaniment, if not the necessity, of this heavenly Kingdom's appearance on earth. The sea might be full of fish, but fishers were needful (Lk 5¹⁰); the fields were ripe unto harvest, but labourers must be found for the reaping (Mt 9³⁷, Lk 10²); the broadest community will need the power of exercising discipline, even to the extent of excommunicating if that will make the wrong-doer feel the distance between his present and his best self (Mt 18¹⁷); the tree must have visible form if it is to shelter men in its branches (Mt 13³², Lk 13¹⁹), though its vital force may be a hidden mystery, permeating, as it does, the whole body, as the leaven does the bread (Mt 13³³, Lk 13²¹). Jesus accepted the organization of the past, and made use of it. He referred to the rights of the Sanhedrin (Mt 5²²), He honoured the Temple-sanctuary and the altar (23¹⁶⁻²²), He sent the lepers to the priests to fulfil the Law (8⁴), He attended the synagogue on the Sabbath 'as his custom was' (Lk 4¹⁶). His race had learned in the Captivity and the Dispersion the value of some outward conformity, especially of holy seasons, holy books, and meetings for worship and edification, all aiming at that unity expressed in Ac 4³² 'they had one heart and soul.'

His first step was to form a circle of disciples, learners (μαθηταί), those who would differ from the crowd of listeners by their whole-hearted obedience, becoming imitators (μιμηταί), actually doing the things taught after the Teacher's example ('if ye abide in my word, then are ye truly my disciples, Jn 8³¹). Much of His teaching is given directly to them: they are distinguished as 'the' disciples, or

'my' disciples (Mt 5¹ 10¹ 12¹, Mk 8²⁷, Lk 8⁹, Jn 3²² etc.); and, though they may ultimately almost form a school of tradition, inheriting certain teachings (Ac 2⁴²), still they remain learners in the school of Christ, rejecting the title of 'Rabbi' ('teacher,' 'master'), and keep their name of 'disciples' well into the next generation (Ac 6² 9³⁶ 11²⁶ 21⁴ 16). Jesus may call them 'servants' (Mt 10²⁴), 'labourers' (Mt 9³⁷, Lk 9⁶²), 'the salt of the earth,' 'the light of the world' (Mt 5¹³ 14), but the two most distinctive titles He bestows are 'disciple' and 'apostle.' They are first to learn of Him (Mt 11²⁹) the secret of calm inward strength of peace, and then they shall become heralds, messengers, apostles of that peace to the world. The Apostolate has no status except for its missionary purpose, and though the Apostles may have the power to forgive sins (Jn 20²³), or to exorcize evil spirits (Mk 6⁷), or to heal the sick (Mt 10⁸), these are secondary to the work of preaching (Mk 6¹² 13).

In founding this first great order in His Church, a whole night of prayer significantly precedes the all-important choice. Next day the Twelve are chosen, and after them Seventy for special and local service, and sent to preach repentance and the Kingdom of God, and to heal (Mk 3¹⁴ 15, Mt 10¹, Lk 9¹, Mt 11¹ ['teach and preach,' as though to indicate the true fervour which will give wings to the doctrine]). They are to lead men to repentance (Mk 6¹²), over which the joy of the angels is increased (Lk 15⁷ 10, ending in the parable of the Prodigal Son). They are to sow the seed of the word of life broadcast, on all soils (Lk 8⁴ 15); and the thought which will sustain them, even when the seed seems utterly fruitless, is that they are His representatives, and speak with His authority behind them ('He that heareth you heareth me,' Mt 10⁴⁰, Lk 10¹⁶ 19, Jn 13²⁰), for are they not His 'servants,' and 'of his household'? (Mt 10²²). He points to one, possibly as indicating all, and says that upon him, upon the living rock of human faith and enthusiasm, and not upon the dead heights of Sinai or rock of Zion, will He build His Church (Mt 16¹⁸). That Church was to be distinguished by its component members. It should reveal to the world a type of character new in the combination of its qualities and representative of the Society's ideal. This perfect membership was of the future, and not immediate. Even in the inner circle of His associates Christ had to admit the lapses of the Boanerges or of Peter; they had to learn slowly what it meant to be members of the Church as Christ conceived it. The disciple must bear himself with an unswerving attitude towards the world, being filled with one overmastering idea and service (Mt 6²⁴, Lk 16¹³), from which he must never look back (Lk 9⁶²). So complete is to be his obedience and devotion, that the nearest human ties must be broken if they conflict with this vocation (Lk 15²⁸, Mt 10³⁷), and entire renunciation of 'all that he hath' become his rule (Lk 14³³), though not with the impulse of a blind fanaticism, but with the calm and measured reasoning of the king going to war, or the builder of a tower (Lk 14²⁸⁻³³); for calmness, trust in God, absence of fretful anxiety, is the note of the single-minded disciple (Mt 6²²⁻³⁴). Hence he will need to make no elaborate apologies for his faith, for God will inspire him when the time for utterance arrives, prophecy being one of the marks of primitive discipleship (Mt 10¹⁹, Mk 13¹¹, Lk 12¹¹). As a soldier, he must look for hardship as his lot, expect no ready welcome everywhere, not bid the fire of heaven fall on those who heed him not (Lk 9⁵³), but anticipate the burden of the cross (Lk 14²⁷), submit to be 'hated of all men for my sake' (Mt 10²²), fearlessly enduring persecution even unto death (v. 28). As being on active service, each member must guard against encumbrances, possessions that, accumulating, hinder. If the rich young man would be a 'perfect' disciple, he must part with that which now shares his care and attention (Mt 19²¹, Lk 18²²): the disciple must go forth wasting no thought upon purse, wallet, or clothes, losing no time in mere gossip, 'salutations by the way' (Lk 10⁴, Mk 6⁷, Mt 10¹⁰). He renounces for the sake of his high mission, not for the boastful and purposeless contempt of an Essene. His aloofness from possessions is consecrated by the lowly simplicity of his spirit, which, already dwelling in the Kingdom of heaven, proclaims it with the artlessness of a little child (Mt 18¹, Mk 9³⁴, Lk 9⁴⁸), and with the same generous desire to share all his possessions, spiritual as well as temporal, with others (Ac 2⁴⁴ 45 and the Pauline comment Gal 2⁹). He may find himself a lamb among wolves (Lk 10³), but he will still show his discipleship by that love of men which first commissioned him (Jn 13³⁵). He will learn to see brothers in all workers for good, whatever name they bear, for 'he that is not against us is for us' (Mk 9³⁸, Lk 9⁵⁰), and the 'false prophets' he will easily discern by their spiritual unfruitfulness, though they call on the Name and work miracles (Mt 7²²). These signs of the perfect member of the body of Christ will be the gradual outcome of the hidden inward life: no school can make it; it will spring from the inner sincerity of devotion and character, the 'prayer, alms, fasting' 'in secret' of Mt 6¹⁻¹⁸.

In founding the Church, whose main purpose should be the reconciliation of man to God, Christ's chief act of organization was connected with the material that should form the Church,—the primary Apostles, and the larger group of disciples who should foreshadow the ultimate attainment. To perfect them was the chief necessity: to make them the shining, guiding lights of the world, who in the after-days should do even greater things on earth than He Himself (Jn 14¹²). Hence, perhaps, the little He says about the elements of external religion. He certainly accepted from the past the act of baptism as employed by John (Mt 21²⁵ || Mk 11³⁰, Lk 20⁴), and commanded its practice (Mt 28¹⁹), though not Himself actually baptizing (Jn 4²), and clearly impressing one Apostle with the minor importance of baptism (1 Co 1¹⁷) as compared with preaching—the baptism of the Spirit (Mt 3¹¹ || Mk 1⁸, Lk 3¹⁶, Jn 1²⁶). He accepted the Sabbath of His people, but only subject to the good and needs of man (Mt 12⁸, Mk 2²⁷, Lk 6⁵), so that His followers afterwards felt free to change the day. While He organized prayer to the extent that it should be always in His name (Mt 18²⁰, Jn 14¹³ 15¹⁶ 16²⁶), and showed the spirit of that command in the prayer taught to His disciples, He would have it liberated from the formalism and ‘vain repetitions’ of the past and of the heathen (Mt 6⁷). He adopted no systematized body of teaching, or of technical Rabbinic discipline, and no casuistic expounding of Scripture. The one new institution He delivered into the keeping of His followers was in the consecration of that Last Supper destined to be the first of an ageless series, and to be the perpetual symbol of the vital union of the Church and its Lord in things visible and invisible (Mt 26^{26, 27}, Mk 14²², Lk 22¹⁹).

If, then, we ask what organization appears to exist on the night of the Crucifixion, we seem to find little that could satisfy the representative ecclesiastical mind. There is throughout Galilee and in Jerusalem a vaguely connected number of believers in Jesus. These know, in more or less detail, the kind of witness that is expected of them before the world, a manifestation that, once realized, would mark them out from the world more plainly than Jew from Roman. They are bound together by this unity of character, which, once attained, will be the presence of the Kingdom of God to each one. Their leaders are eleven of their Lord's intimates, chosen by Him as teachers and preachers of His word. For outward helps they have the institutions of Judaism, with the baptism of John; the continual remembrance of Christ through praying in His name, and in the prayer He had given; and in the communion of the Lord's Supper.

But in the Acts and the Epistles we meet with a development of organization arising chiefly out of local necessities. Whilst remaining Jews and attending worship at the Temple (Ac 3¹), the disciples gradually became more conscious of the necessity of something in the nature of a separate community. Meetings of sympathizers, which were also open to any who would come (1 Co 14²³), were planned, and since they could not be held in the synagogues (Ac 6⁹), private houses were used (Ac 2⁴⁶ 5⁴² 18⁷, Ro 16⁵, 1 Co 16¹⁵, Col 4¹⁵). Here were held gatherings for common prayer, for the breaking of bread, for Apostolic teaching and fellowship (Ac 2⁴²), and for the moral edification of those present. As the first community at Jerusalem increased in numbers, it was found to be necessary to organize a group of helpers for the distribution of charity and the general ministrations (διακονίαι, Ro 12⁷, 1 Co 12⁶) of almonry (Ac 6¹⁻⁶), though for the full ‘work of the ministry’ other gifts and opportunities would enter in (Eph 4¹²). The Apostles continued to spend themselves in preaching and in prayer; and as they needed assistance in these, they would naturally turn to their ‘helps’ (1 Co 12²⁸), those ‘men of good report, full of the Spirit and of wisdom’ (Ac 6³), who would thus, by giving occasional instruction and spiritual guidance, become practising ministers of the word, though their almonry would remain the distinctive duty of these ‘deacons,’ and the key to their expected morality (1 Ti 3^{8ff.}), especially during the brief period of Apostolic communion (Ac 2^{44, 45}).

The Church still consisted of those called disciples, but slowly it assumed a more visible membership. Baptism became the recognized entrance; baptism ‘into the name of Christ’ (Ac 2³⁸ 8¹⁶ 10⁴⁸ 19⁵, Ro 6³, Gal 3²⁷)—in St. Paul's thought a spiritual cleansing (1 Co 6¹¹), a mystical burial before the rising of the new life (Col 2¹²). Each member was to offer sacrifices of praise and thanks (He 13¹⁵), might teach (Ja 3¹), and pray with immediate access to God (Eph 3¹²), and would receive direct illumination (Jn 1⁹, 1 Jn 2²⁷). Each was a temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Co 6¹⁹), and was to be given up entirely (mentally, physically, and spiritually) to God (Ro 12^{1, 2}), unto a renewed life of righteousness and holiness (Eph 4²⁴). Their common name steadily underwent changes that marked a more organized body. From ‘disciples,’ the followers and learners of Jesus, they became more conscious of mutual bonds of faith and consecration, so that ἀδελφοί (‘brothers’) better described them (Ac 28¹⁴), since in the fellowship of Christ they had abolished the demarcations of nation, wealth, position, and sex (Gal 3²⁸, Col 3¹¹), and had attained to that kinship which is as close as that of mother and brethren (Lk 8²¹). Afterwards the religious sense of the brotherhood led them to a new name for the members, οἱ ἅγιοι (‘the saints’), those who are striving after holiness (1 Co 1², Ro 1⁷). They are already looked upon as a school, a sect, a party (αἰρεσίς) by outsiders (Ac 24^{5, 14} 28²²), so that these first communities of ‘the holy ones’ were being welded together openly. Their government was not sacerdotal, the name ‘priest’ occurring in the NT only when used of the whole society (1 P 2^{5, 9}, Rev 1⁶ 5¹⁰). At their head were still the Apostles, strong by their commission from Christ (Mt 10², Lk 6¹³, Mk 3¹⁴ marg. 6⁷⁻³⁰), and increased in numbers through the guidance of the Holy Spirit, Paul, Barnabas, Matthias, and others being added (1 Co 9⁶, Gal 1¹⁹, Ro 16⁷, 1 Th 2⁵). Their faith and zeal had been renewed by the vision of the risen Lord (Ac 1^{21, 22}, 1 Co 9¹⁵), and in that faith they had wrought wondrous signs of their Apostolate (2 Co 12¹²). But with the growth of the membership of the Church, and the formation of many isolated congregations, superintendents or presidents (πρεσβύτεροι) were needed and appointed, whose duties soon included that of teaching as well as governing the general affairs (1 Ti 3² 5¹⁷, Tit 1⁹). Their equivalent title in Greek cities would seem to have been ‘overseers,’ ‘bishops’ (ἐπίσκοποι, Ph 1¹, Tit 1⁷), and their duties the same, namely, attending to the poor and the sick, helping travelling brethren, exercising discipline towards wrong-doers, and the general administration of the community's business. So that, although St. Paul mentions many offices in the Church (1 Co 12²⁸, Eph 4¹¹), two orders only stand out clearly in the NT after the Apostles, that of the presbyters or elders, and that of the deacons. The prophetic office is too nearly allied to the Apostolic to be easily distinguished, though Jesus speaks of it as of something known universally (Mt 7²² 10⁴¹ 23³⁴); St. John speaks of the Church as ‘the saints, apostles, and prophets’ (Rev 18^{20, 24}); and Acts names some (Ac 11²⁷ 21¹⁰ 15³²).

In the organization of the Church, doctrine began to be more settled. While Jesus lived, and in His own life could show the blessedness of the Kingdom of God within, men could not go far astray. But afterwards it was necessary to tell of Him, His sayings and doings, His warnings, His ideals, and the purpose of His life. The Apostles would question whether the future would guard these truly, or add to, alter, or take away. So a body of things needful to be taught was collected, and, for the Gentile world, the OT added as an introduction to the comprehension of Christ. To some such collection St. Paul alludes in Ro 6¹⁷, 2Th 2¹⁵; but for the knowledge of this the whole NT is our only source to-day. Thence we gather, besides many conflicting modern readings of great doctrines, a general agreement as to the practices of the early Church. We find them still meeting for a while on the Sabbath, the Lord's day commemorating the Resurrection and only later becoming the rest-day. At their meetings would be celebrated the Love-Feast, sometimes hardly distinguishable from the Lord's Supper. Here would be the gathering for common prayer, of the form of which we know nothing, the Epistles quoting no regular prayer, referring to no liturgical order, and not even alluding to the Lord's Prayer. Afterwards the fund for the poorer brethren would be collected (Ac 4³⁵, Gal 2¹⁰, Ro 15²⁶).

So that which comes to be known by the Greek pagan title ἐκκλησία, 'the Church,' is gradually organized. She begins in the mind of Christ, free, unlimited, the universal Kingdom of God, with no sacred seasons, sanctuaries, or priesthood. But her Founder knows that her work is among men, and that she must be humanly as well as Divinely developed. So the limitations of organized life are lightly imposed upon her, not to hinder but to increase effectiveness. Still will she cherish the liberty to which the past has brought her (Gal 3²⁴), and receive both good and evil into her net (Lk 5⁶, 2Ti 2²⁰), for she strives to save all. The outward organization develops, but, while we keep to the pages of the NT, the spirit of the Church is still master of her organization, still looks to the Invisible Church, yet to be, of those made perfect, where the unrighteous have no place (1 Co 6⁹ 15⁵⁰, Gal 5²¹, Eph 5⁵), the assembly of those made perfect through love (Ja 2⁵), the everlasting Kingdom of our Lord (2 P 1¹¹), into which the few have already entered here upon earth—'Theirs is the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 5^{3, 10}, Lk 6²⁰). ORIGINALITY.—It is not surprising that attempts should have been made to dispute Christ's claim to originality. Under whichever aspect we regard His Person, whether we consider Him in His historical relations, or contemplate the eternal truth revealed in Him, on either side opportunity presents itself for disputing the originality of His doctrine. Under the former aspect this is manifestly the case. However fully we may be convinced of the novelty of the doctrine of the Saviour, nobody fancies that that doctrine was without historical connexion with what had gone before. As in the Saviour's Person the Divine revealed itself in human form, so in His doctrine the Divine truth which He had to communicate clothed itself in the language and thought of the time in which He lived. Though He was the Son of God, He was also the child of His own age and people. Though the truth that He revealed was eternal, it was addressed, in the first instance, to the people of the country and time in which He lived, and linked itself at countless points to the religious ideas and hopes of those who listened to His preaching. And under this aspect of the Saviour's doctrine the question presents itself, whether it may not be sufficiently accounted for on the lines of a natural development of the religious tendencies of the age in which He lived, and whether He has indeed contributed anything new and original to the religious history of the world.

But, on the other hand, the tendency to emphasize the eternal truth revealed in the Person of Christ, while it seems to rebut such attempts to reduce His doctrine to the product of the religious developments of the age in which He lived, may lead indirectly to the challenging of His originality from another side. The religion which Christ has founded is recognized as a universal religion—a religion destined not for any particular people, but for all mankind. As such it must appeal to the deepest cravings of the human heart, and satisfy those yearnings which had found expression in the thoughts and aspirations of the teachers who had gone before Him. Christ came in the fulness of time. The course of the world's history before Him had been one long preparation for the revelation given in His Person. The Spirit of God had been at work in the hearts of mankind from the beginning, guiding them gradually to the truth. The very fact that the truth which Christ proclaimed is eternal, may be regarded as a proof that He can lay no claim to originality in the declaration of it. There had been countless anticipations of it in the teachers who had gone before. He did but formulate the truth upon which the mind of man had been brooding from the beginning. 'Nam res ipsa,' says Augustine (Retract. i. c. 12), 'quæ nunc Christiana religio nuncupatur, erat et apud antiquos, nec defuit ab initio generis humani quousque Christus veniret in carne, unde vera religio, quæ jam erat, cœpit appellari Christiana.' It is easy to understand how, from this point of view, arguments might be urged against the originality of Christ, in a spirit very different from that which animates Augustine in his remark. Attempts have been made to prove that the truth revealed in Christ had been anticipated by the sages and religious teachers who had gone before Him. The literature of the ancient world has been ransacked to discover parallels to the doctrine of Christ. And on the strength of the occasional points of resemblance, which have been thus collected, between the teaching of the Saviour and that of those who have gone before Him, the originality of Christ has been disputed, and His claim to be the founder of a new religion denied.

We propose to consider some of the attempts which have thus been made from different sides to prove the indebtedness of Christ to those who preceded Him, and to discuss the worth of the charge of want of originality based upon the evidence thus adduced. In some of the cases we have to consider, it is the question of the originality not so much of Christ as of Christianity that is involved, as the Person of Christ is either left out of account as a pure piece of fiction, or reduced to such mean proportions as rob it of all historical significance. But inasmuch as in such cases the attempt is made to disprove the originality of that religious movement which we, at any rate, associate with the Person of Christ, we may fitly consider them here, so far, at least, as the criticism in question involves the doctrine of the Master as distinguished from the Apostles.

i. Christianity and Græco-Roman thought.—Occasional attempts have been made to trace the indebtedness of Christianity to Greek and Græco-Roman thought. We do not refer here to the endeavours of such men as Hatch and Harnack to prove the influence of Greek philosophy on the development of Christian doctrine, but to the much more revolutionary tendency of such writers as Bruno Bauer and Ernest Havet, who have sought to account not only for the development of Christian doctrine, but for the origin of Christianity itself, upon such lines.

In his work, Christus und die Cæsaren: Der Ursprung des Christenthums aus dem römischen Griechenthum (1877, 2nd ed. 1879), Bauer seriously undertakes to prove that Christianity is not Jewish in its origin, but is really the product of Græco-Roman thought. Its birthplace was not Palestine, but the two cities in which the blending of East and West took place,—Alexandria and Rome. Judaism in its monotheism did but give the skeleton; it was the West that gave the soul. Philo and Seneca were its real founders. At Alexandria, Judaism was enriched by a combination of the Platonic world of ideas with the Heraclitic Logos. Philo made of this Logos a priestly mediator who brings the extremes of the Divine and the human into relation to one another. Seneca gave to this mediator reality, brought him down to earth into touch with men, and made him approve himself by suffering. In the picture he has painted of the ideal man who would one day arise and fulfil the destiny of mankind, he is the real creator of the Christian Messiah. He introduced to the masses the wisdom of Greece, with its call to self-denial and renunciation of the world, whereby man may attain to God-likeness and eternal peace. It was Seneca who laid the foundation for Christian Rome. In the contrast which he presents between the old law with its formal requirements and the new with its higher, more spiritualistic demands, he has supplied the theme for the Sermon on the Mount. Many of his sayings have been reproduced in the NT, sometimes in a manner which conclusively proves the secondariness of the Scripture version. It is true that he is never mentioned by name in the NT. This Bauer would explain by the fact that the NT literature is so late in date that its compilers were ignorant of the fact that Seneca was the author of the maxims which were current among the society for whom they wrote. Still, in some cases the correspondence between the NT parallels and the original utterances of Seneca is so close, that Bauer is of opinion that the NT authors must have had the writings of the Roman sage before them.

Another factor to which Bauer attaches importance in accounting for the origin of Christianity, is the influence of the political conditions of the time. Despair over the downfall of the Republic, which seemed to portend the end of the world, awakened the yearning for a new spiritual world. The levelling of classes, which followed on the establishment of the Empire, begot a faith in human rights and inspired a feeling of mutual dependence such as the Republic had never awakened. Further, the emperors themselves contributed to the ideal which was gradually taking shape in the mind of the age. The Christian Saviour and the Roman emperors are both products of the same tendency, which sought to sum up the aspirations and immaterial goods of antiquity in one personal, all-powerful form. Augustus was the prince of peace who healed the wounds of the Civil War; Tiberius, the servant of the community; Caligula, the god-man and world-judge; Nero, the philanthropist who dedicated himself to the service of humanity; Vespasian caused the Jewish oracle, which had called him to be ruler of the world, to be carried before his legions; Nerva and his successors gave to the Roman world an example of mildness and tranquillity. The central figure of the new religion is a composite character constructed out of the aspirations and ideals of Greek philosophy and various traits borrowed from the occupants of the imperial throne, in whom the Roman world recognized the mediators between heaven and earth.

Such are the lines on which Bauer seeks to ascribe the origin of Christianity to Græco-Roman influence. It is evident that his theory involves not only the complete overturn of all but the most extreme theories as to the date of the NT literature, but also a very different reading of the course of profane history from that which has hitherto obtained. Bauer has no hesitation in setting aside the testimony of Tacitus, Suetonius, and the other Roman historians. A theory which represents Nero in the character of philanthropist, and finds in his reign an anticipation of the Messianic blessedness, makes the strongest demands on our credulity. Bauer's views as to the date of the NT writings are wild in the extreme. The Epistles to the Corinthians are a late composition of the 2nd cent.; the Urevangelium is ascribed to the first half of Hadrian's reign; the Apocalypse and Fourth Gospel to the time of Marcus Aurelius, the latter being an attempt to carry out systematically the Gnostic opposition to Judaism. The Jewish element in the NT is persistently denied. The author of the Urevangelium is 'an Italian by birth, who was at home in Rome and Alexandria'; the author of Matthew, no Jewish Christian, but 'a Roman nourished by Seneca's spirit.' Such theories justify H. Holtzmann's characterization of Bauer as 'a critical Herostratus' (Einkl. in d. NT, p. 183). If their very wildness calls for no serious refutation, it at any rate serves to demonstrate the impracticability of the attempt to assign a Hellenic origin to Christianity.

Havet's work, Le Christianisme et ses Origines, is on somewhat similar lines, but much more moderate in tone.

There are, Havet thinks, three elements to be taken into account in considering the origin of Christianity, the Hellenic, the Jewish, represented by the Prophets and the Psalms, and a third which he calls the Galilean, by which he means the sentiments and ideas which developed at first among the turbulent population of Galilee under the misery of the Roman dominion, and then raised up Jesus, and determined His action and destiny, and which gradually spread throughout the great cities of the Roman Empire. He admits that Christianity is not to be found 'tout entier' in Hellenism, but insists, on the other hand, that however large may be the share of Galilean Judaism in the Christian revolution, far more considerable is that of Hellenism in Christianity once it was established. We must distinguish, he contends, between the essence and the accident, between the Christian spirit and the Christian revelation. The Christian revolution came from Judæa and Galilee. But the Christian spirit is essentially that of Græco-Roman philosophy and religion. On the appearance of Christianity it was not the faith and wisdom of Hellenism that were absorbed into Judaism, but Judaism that was absorbed into the common beliefs of the human race. In order to establish this contention, Havet gives an exhaustive examination of Hellenic literature from the earliest times, making an anthology of all the passages which seem to breathe anything of the Christian spirit. In summarizing his conclusions, he paints a picture of the heathen world designed to show how nearly it approached to Christianity in its beliefs and hopes. The heathen believed in the immortality of the soul, in the resurrection of the dead, in a future life with punishments and rewards, in the existence of gods who were offended by the faults of men, in the approaching end of this world and the coming of a new one. They had their temples, their altars, their prayers, their sacred songs; while there were not wanting among them loftier spirits who held that the divinity desired no other temple than the heart of man, nor other worship than the practice of virtue. Their moral code breathed the same spirit of self-denial as Christianity inculcated; taught men to despise riches, honours, pleasures, yea, happiness itself; inspired an abhorrence of sin, a consciousness of our moral infirmity, and a passionate longing for salvation; inculcated chastity, alms, charity, a horror of war, submission to authority. How is it possible, asks Havet, with such a picture before us, to speak of Christianity as renewing the face of the earth, or to hail its advent as something entirely new and unexpected? He believes that the heathen world, if left to itself, would not have remained heathen, that its mythology and superstition would gradually have vanished, and that the feeling of human fraternity and the need of equality and justice would have developed more and more and passed into its manners and laws. This natural development it was not permitted to pursue. The Judaizers precipitated the crisis; the reform was carried through with too great haste, with the result that the world, in becoming Christian, remained more pagan than if Hellenism had retained its mastery.

While Havet recognizes that Judaism thus played a considerable part in the origin of Christianity, he assigns but little importance to the Person of Christ Himself in the movement which bore His name. He believes that John the Baptist was the principal personage in the religious revolution of which Jesus has the honour. Of the life of Jesus Himself we know almost nothing. Havet denies that He claimed to be the Christ, and that He was tried before the Sanhedrin and condemned for blasphemy or any religious crime. He did not break with Judaism, nor was He the opponent of the Pharisees in the way He is represented in the Gospels. He was a Jew, ardent to fanaticism, a Galilean zealot who had inflamed the people of His country, and, in the end, so agitated Jerusalem itself that the Jewish authorities, whom He had compromised, handed Him over to the Roman police, by whom He was put to death as a disturber of the peace. At the moment of His death, that which we call Christianity had no existence. He was Himself a Christian only in His manner of feeling; otherwise He was a pure Jew, and there is neither word nor act in His life that is not thoroughly Jewish. He introduced no new dogma or practice. He had no conception of the Trinity, or the Incarnation, or other mysteries,—no idea of Church or Sacraments. It was not till after His death that some began to ask, 'Was He not the Christ?', and the thought once started gained currency. In order to give the suggestion any plausibility, it was necessary to combine with it the belief that this Jesus who had perished miserably had been raised up from the dead to enter on a life of glory. If Jesus was the Christ, then all was not finished. He must reappear. He must come again as the Christ on the clouds of heaven to destroy this wicked world and restore Israel. The hope thus cherished was converted into actual fact. The step was taken from the thought, 'He must rise again,' to the belief, 'He has risen.' The news spread among the Jewish communities scattered throughout the Roman Empire, and from them to the Roman world in the midst of which they lived, that the Christ, who was to come to inaugurate the kingdom of the God of the Jews in place of that of the Romans, had actually appeared, that He had been crucified, and had risen from the dead, and was to reappear to destroy the sinners, and to raise up from the dead all the righteous, and reunite them in an eternal life with those who were still alive. With faith in Christ and His resurrection, the Gentile converts to the new faith accepted also the worship of the one God alone, and the denial of idolatry; while in their turn they set aside, in the name of Christ, the more repugnant elements of Judaism, particularly circumcision. This purified Judaism purified itself more and more as it spread among the Gentiles, and became permeated by the spirit of Greek philosophy. The two spirits came in time to be confounded.

Such is Havet's account of the origin of Christianity. Although his theories are not so extreme as those of Bauer, his attempt to assign Hellenic culture as the main source from which Christianity has sprung serves, equally with Bauer's, to illustrate to what desperate expedients such a theory is reduced in order to give itself even some measure of plausibility. Both essays result in the attempt to explain Christianity without the Person of Christ; for though Havet does not, like Bauer, deny the existence of Christ altogether, there are few Christians who will recognize, in the Jewish fanatic whom he presents to us, the Saviour whom they worship. We must allow to both authors—to Havet especially—a certain merit, in so far as they demonstrate how well Greek thought had prepared the soil for the seeds of Christian truth. As contributions to the study of the early history of the Christian Church and the development of Christian doctrine, their works may prove of value; but as accounts of the origin of Christianity itself, we cannot assign to them any worth (Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, Eng. tr. i. 52 f.). They virtually recognize the impracticability of any attempt to trace the indebtedness of the historical Jesus to Hellenic culture. Whatever parallels they may bring forward to any of the recorded utterances of Jesus, they make no attempt to show in what way He could have been brought into contact with the literature from which He is supposed to have derived inspiration. Only by critical theories regarding the Gospels which would deprive them of all historical worth, can they find room to introduce that Hellenic influence which they seek to trace.

ii. Christianity and Buddhism.—From the side of Buddhism, also, attacks have been made on the originality of Christianity. It is an undoubted fact, that long before the Christian era Buddhist doctrine had penetrated to distant regions, and the possibility of the indebtedness of the Christian Gospels to the Buddha legend is not so remote as to be dismissed without careful consideration. Various attempts have been made to prove that much of the material in the Gospel narratives may be traced to Buddhist sources—notably by Bunsen, Seydel, Lillie, and more recently by Stix, Pfeleiderer, and van den Bergh van Eysinga (for titles of works see below in list of literature). Among the earlier group of writers, Seydel is generally recognized to be the most scholarly; and we may devote our attention chiefly to him. In his book, Das Evangelium Jesu in seinen Verhältnissen zu Buddha-sage und Buddha-lehre, he endeavours to construct a 'Buddhist-Christian Gospel Harmony' by drawing up a list of the parallels that may be traced between the two religions.

In all, Seydel collects 51 such parallels, which he proceeds to arrange in 3 groups. In the first he places those resemblances which may be accidental; in the second, those cases in which we are forced to conclude that there has been borrowing on one side or the other. The third group contains parallels in which it is clear not only that there has been borrowing, but on which side the borrowing has taken place. This last group contains only five parallels, and in each case Seydel concludes that the verdict must be given in favour of Buddhism. They are as follows:—(1) the presentation of the infant Jesus in the Temple, compared with that of Buddha; (2) the fast of Jesus and of Buddha; (3) the pre-existence of Jesus and of Buddha; (4) the fig-tree as the place of Buddha's first conversion, compared with Jesus' interview with Nathanael (Jn 1^{46ff}); (5) the question of the disciples regarding the man who was born blind (Jn 9²), which seems to imply a former state of existence whose sinfulness might account for present affliction. The verdict in favour of Buddhism in this third group of parallels strengthens the probability that in the second group also it is Christianity that is the debtor. In this group the number of parallels runs to 23, 12 of which Seydel regards as of greater cogency than the rest. Among the Gospel facts which he introduces in this first division of his second group may be mentioned the annunciation to Mary, the gifts to the newborn child, the temptation, and the Beatitudes. Lastly, even in the first group of 23 parallels, which Seydel admits may be wholly accidental, he believes that in view of the conclusions reached by an examination of the two other groups, there is a possibility that in at least 15 cases the Gospels may have been subject to Buddhist influence.

To account for the presence of so much material in the Gospels borrowed from Buddhist sources, Seydel formulates the hypothesis that, in addition to the two sources generally recognized as underlying the Synoptic Gospels—the collection of Sayings, and the original Mark—there must also have existed a third source, a poetic-apocalyptic Gospel, in which the Christian material must have been worked up after the pattern of the Buddhist Gospels, with the incorporation of much that was derived from Buddhist sources. This poetic source was used by all the Synoptists and by the Fourth Evangelist as well. That it has been lost is to be explained by the fact that the available material which it afforded had been incorporated in the Gospels, whose more historical form and genuine Christian doctrine caused the early poetical work to be quite forgotten.

Seydel claims a certain apologetic value for his investigations. If he has shaken our faith in much in the Gospel narratives which he has shown to be derived from Buddhism, we may comfort ourselves, he thinks, with the reflexion that those features in the life of Jesus to which he has found no analogy in Buddhist tradition,—such, e.g., as the Passion and certain fundamental doctrines and personal characteristics of Jesus,—are thus indirectly confirmed. In what remains after we have taken away what may be traced to Buddhism, we have a kernel of historical fact which is unassailable.

When we turn to examine the various parallels upon which Seydel bases his contention, we find that the resemblance between the Christian and the Buddhist material is frequently exaggerated; that but little attention is paid to the underlying difference between the two sides, which in many cases is much more striking than the apparent resemblance; and that, even where the resemblance is strongest, Seydel has not made out his case, viz., that the fact which he instances from the Gospels is so unintelligible on Christian premises, that borrowing from an external source is the only feasible explanation. We shall endeavour to justify this contention in the case of the five parallels upon which Seydel lays the greatest stress.

(1) The Presentation in the Temple. Here Seydel's point is that such presentation of the infant Jesus was not required, and that Luke's appeal to the Law (2²²) is a mere device to introduce an incident borrowed from a foreign source. We admit that it was not necessary that the infant should be presented in person on the occasion of its being ransomed; but we have only to read the account of the presentation of the infant Buddha, which Seydel thinks may have suggested this incident, with its description of how 100,000 gods drew the waggon which bore him, of how the earth trembled as he entered the temple, of how the images of the gods left their places to throw themselves at his feet, to convince ourselves that among the various motives which might be assigned for the departure from the strict letter of the Law in the case of Jesus, a more unlikely one could hardly be conceived than a desire to institute a parallel with this fantastic story, to which the simple Gospel narrative offers the most striking contrast.

(2) Seydel finds the 40 days' fast of Jesus in the wilderness inexplicable in view of the contrast He Himself drew between His own conduct and the asceticism practised by John the Baptist, and suggests that this incident is borrowed from the example of Buddha. But if any parallel at all is required, we do not need to go so far afield. The 40 days' fast of Moses (Ex 34²⁸, Dt 9⁹) and that of Elijah (1 K 19⁸) at once suggest themselves as parallels which do not take us beyond the limits of Jewish history.

(3) Seydel finds a parallel to Christ's words to the Jews, 'Before Abraham was, I am' (Jn 8⁵⁸), in Buddha's assertion of his pre-existence. But the resemblance at once disappears when we realize what is the kind of pre-existence Buddha claims for himself,—not like that of the Johannine Logos who has been with God from the beginning (Jn 11^f), but that of a being who has undergone countless different forms of incarnation.

(4) It was while sitting under the Bodhi-tree, which was a kind of fig-tree, that Gautama attained Buddha-hood, and immediately thereafter converted two brothers, who became his first disciples. Seydel finds a parallel to this in the words of Jesus to Nathanael, 'When thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee' (Jn 1⁴⁸). But beyond the facts that a fig-tree and a disciple are mentioned in both cases, there is no resemblance between them. It was not Jesus, but Nathanael, who was sitting under the fig-tree; there is no suggestion of the 'enlightenment' of Jesus; and the disciple in connexion with whom the fig-tree is mentioned was not, as in Buddha's case, the first who was called.

(5) The question of the disciples with regard to the man who was born blind, 'Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?' (Jn 9²) is brought forward by Seydel as implying belief in the Buddhist doctrine of re-birth, according to which we are punished here for sins committed in a former state of existence. But the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul was not unknown to the Jews (cf. Wis 8²⁰), and it is questionable, further, whether even this doctrine is necessary to explain the question of the disciples. They may have been thinking of some sin committed in the womb (cf. Gen 25²²), or may have regarded the blindness of the man as punishment in anticipation of the sins he would commit (cf. B. Weiss in Meyer's Kommentar, ad loc.).

These are the parallels upon which, as has been said, Seydel lays the chief stress. He admits himself that the force of the other analogies depends, in great measure, upon the verdict we pass upon the evidence afforded by these five parallels, which constitute his third group. And if, as we have endeavoured to show, he has not made good his case in these instances, much of the force of his argument is gone. As to his hypothesis of the existence of a poetic-apocalyptic Gospel imbued with Buddhist doctrine, there is absolutely no proof for the existence of such a document. Seydel can bring forward no particle of evidence to support his hypothesis. He merely invents this fictitious Gospel to supply the lack of historical connexion between Buddhism and Christianity, the want of which is one of the strongest objections to his theory.

As remarked above, attempts have been made more recently by Pfeleiderer and van den Bergh van Eysinga to trace Buddhist influence on the Gospel narratives. Among the parallels which the latter finds specially important, may be mentioned Simeon in the Temple, the twelve-year-old Jesus, the baptism of Jesus, the temptation, the blessing of the mother of Jesus (Lk 11²⁷), the widow's mite, the walking on the sea, the Samaritan woman at the well, and the world conflagration. Pfeleiderer does not descend so much into detail, but groups his parallels together under general heads, such as Christ as Son of God, as miraculous Saviour, as victor over Satan, as King of kings, etc. With regard to these more recent works, the same criticism applies as in the case of Seydel. Many of the suggested parallels, when closely examined, prove much less striking than appeared at first sight; and even where the resemblance is closest, a much more natural explanation can usually be given of the feature in question on the Christian side than the adaptation of Buddhist material. And due consideration should here be given to the fact to which Oldenberg has called attention (ThLZ, 1903, No. 3), that the Buddhist literature which is drawn upon to supply these parallels to Christianity is so extensive, so infinitely rich in legendary lore, that the wonder would rather be if we did not find occasional points of resemblance between the Buddhist narratives and those parts of the NT which deal with a similar sphere of life. Finally, while we must admit in the abstract the possibility of Buddhist influence upon Western culture, the fact remains that we have no historical evidence of the spread of Buddhist ideas to the regions in which Christianity had its origin till a much later time. Clement of Alexandria is the first who mentions Buddha by name. In this connexion we may quote the words of Max Müller (India, what it can teach us? p. 279):

'That there are startling coincidences between Buddhism and Christianity cannot be denied, and it must likewise be admitted that Buddhism existed at least 400 years before Christianity. I go even further, and should feel extremely grateful if anybody would point out to me the historical channels through which Buddhism had influenced early Christianity. I have been looking for such channels all my life, but hitherto I have found none. What I have found is that for some of the most startling coincidences there are historical antecedents on both sides, and if we once know these antecedents, the coincidences become far less startling. If I do find, in certain Buddhist works, doctrines identically the same as in Christianity, so far from being frightened, I feel delighted, for surely truth is not the less true because it is believed by the majority of the human race.'

iii. Christianity and Judaism.—When we come to consider the relation of Christianity to Judaism, we feel that the case is very different from what it was in the above instances. There the possibility of contact between Christianity and those influences to which its indebtedness was alleged was remote. Here we are in the line of direct historical connexion. The roots of Christianity go deep down into Jewish soil. Christ was a Jew by birth and education. His whole thought and teaching were cast in Jewish moulds. The very title He bears—the Christ—is meaningless apart from the background of Jewish history in which it had its origin. If we claim originality for Him, we recognize that originality does not mean an entirely new start, the severance of all the links which bind the new Teacher to the religious development of the nation to which He belongs. Such originality is an idle figment of the imagination. It never has existed; it never can exist. If the original teacher is to be a teacher at all, if he is to exercise any influence upon the men he addresses, then he must live in close contact with them and link on his doctrine to the beliefs and hopes which they cherish. So it was with Christ. He may be the world's Teacher, but He spoke first of all to His fellow-countrymen in Galilee and Judaea, and He used the modes of thought and speech familiar to them. He preached in their synagogues and taught in their streets like the Rabbis of His own day. That there was a certain novelty in His manner of preaching is proved by the astonishment with which the people listened to it (Mk 1²² 6²). But was the content essentially different from that of the preachers of His own day, or that of the prophets of old? Had He any new doctrine to communicate? Or was He, as has been alleged by modern Jewish scholars, merely a teacher who gave expression to the best Jewish thought of His time?

We proceed to consider more closely some of the different elements in the Jewish religion to which Christ's indebtedness is alleged to be so great as to detract from His originality.

(1) The Old Testament.—There can be no question as to Christ's obligations to the OT. How much He was influenced by it in His personal life is shown by the frequency of His quotations from it. He seems to live in it. Parallels from it suggest themselves at every turn. In critical moments of His life His thoughts find natural expression in OT quotation. So it was at the temptation (Mt 4⁷ 10), at the cleansing of the Temple (Mk 11¹⁷), even when He hung upon the cross (15³⁴). He recognized its authority in religious matters. He appealed to it in defence of His own conduct (2²⁵). He quoted it in condemnation of the Pharisees (7⁶ 13), and in refutation of the Sadducees (12³⁴). He claimed that He came not to destroy, but to fulfil the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5¹⁷). And when He was asked by the rich young man what he must do to inherit eternal life, instead of imparting to him any new doctrine, He simply referred him to the commandments (Mk 10¹⁹).

In view of the attitude Christ thus takes up to the OT, and of His avowed intention of fulfilling the Law and the Prophets, we should expect to find great affinity between His doctrine and that of the OT. Is this affinity so great as to detract from our Lord's originality? It is alleged by some that it is. Nay, it has been questioned, indeed, not only whether Jesus has made any new contribution to the religious and moral teaching of the OT, but whether He even desired to do so (so B. Weiss, Leben Jesu, i. 274). There is hardly a feature in the teaching of Christ, it is maintained, to which there is not a parallel in the OT. The constant theme of His preaching, the Kingdom of God, is so manifestly not novel, that He assumes familiarity with it on the part of His hearers, and never even explains what He means by it. His work as a Prophet, sent to announce the coming of this Kingdom and to call men to repentance, was evidently nothing novel. The very words by which the preaching of Christ is introduced by Mk. (1¹⁵) are practically the same as Mt. uses to describe the appearance of John the Baptist (Mt 3²). The God whom Christ reveals is no new God, but the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob (Mk 12²⁶), the God of Israel (Mt 15²¹, Mk 12²⁹). The Fatherhood of God, upon which so much emphasis is laid as the most fundamental and distinctively characteristic doctrine of Christianity, is taught in the OT. The trust in this Father which Christ seeks to inspire already finds most beautiful expression in the Psalms. The new commandment of love which Christ inculcates is so far from being new, that He Himself formulates it on occasion in language borrowed from the OT (Mk 12³¹). Not even the widening of the circle of those whom we are required to love, so as to make it embrace our enemy as well as our neighbour, goes beyond the teaching of the OT (Ex 23¹⁶, Pr 20²² 24²⁹ 25^{21c}). How, it is asked, can originality be claimed for the teaching of Christ, when He Himself takes His stand upon the OT and recognizes its authority; when He claims to reveal no other God than the God of the OT, and to continue the work of the Law and the Prophets; when we find that even those which are regarded as the most characteristic doctrines of Christianity have been forestalled in the OT?

To this it may be replied, that while it is true that Christ generally recognizes the authority of the OT, and appeals to it at times quite in the manner of the scribes, still His attitude towards it is one of freedom and independence. He discriminates between the various parts of it, and leaves aside much that does not appeal to Him. In spite of what He says in the Sermon on the Mount about fulfilling the Law and the Prophets, He does not hesitate in that same sermon to set up His own authority in opposition to the teaching of the Law. He freely criticises the Mosaic law of divorce (Mk 10^{2ff}), and on the question of Sabbath observance not only exercises a freedom which scandalized His contemporaries, but claims to be invested with authority on the question (Mk 2²⁸). By His doctrine that that only could defile a man which affected his heart, He brushes aside the whole Levitical legislation as to cleanness, and raises the question from the region of the physical to that of the ethical.

It is true, indeed, that most of the elements of Christian doctrine may be found scattered throughout the OT. But they are found side by side with much else which Christ has rejected, and which, in juxtaposition with them, prevents them from having the significance they acquire in Christianity. That God is represented at times in the OT as a Father, e.g., is perfectly true. But the distinguishing feature in Christ's designation of Him as such, as compared with that of the OT, is that with Christ Father is the characteristic title for God, and He is never represented under any aspect that is inconsistent with His Fatherhood; whereas in the OT Father is only one, and not even the prevailing one, among various other titles for God, and God is represented at times under very different aspects. It is the same with the various other elements of Christian doctrine that have been found in the OT. They receive a new meaning from the place Christ gives them, the importance He assigns to them, and the consistency with which He insists on them. That God looks not upon the outward conduct but upon the heart, was a truth known to the OT writers no less than to Christ; but it is Christ who first consistently follows it out to its logical conclusions. That we should love our enemies is a doctrine that had been taught even in the OT; yet how much there is in the OT that breathes an entirely different spirit! When we put, not isolated utterances of Christ and of the OT, but the doctrine of Christ as a whole and the OT as a whole, side by side, then, in spite of the fact that we can trace the roots of Christianity down into Jewish soil and can find OT forecasts of much that appears in the teaching of Christ, the conviction is forced upon us that this doctrine of Christ as a whole, by the consistently lofty spirituality of its tone, by the inner coherence and harmony of its various parts in spite of the unsystematic form in which it was delivered, by its indifference to much which held a high place in the Jewish religion, is a new creation as compared with the OT upon which it is based. We feel too that only a mind of the highest originality could have evolved out of a religion in which there was much that was imperfect and unspiritual, a system so pure and lofty as that which we have in the Christian religion.

(2) Later Judaism.—But it is not to the OT alone that Christ's indebtedness is alleged. There are later developments of Judaism which are said to have exercised marked influence upon Him. It has been the custom to regard Christ's position as one of pure antagonism to the prevailing religious tendencies of His time, and to represent Him as standing in such irreconcilable opposition to the teaching of the Rabbinical schools that there can be no question of His being influenced by them, save in the way of being repelled. But in spite of the attitude of opposition that Christ took up to the religious authorities of His day, there was, it is alleged, much affinity between them. Like the Rabbis, He preached in the synagogues and taught in the market-places. Like them, He gathered a group of disciples round Him who called Him Master, and whom He sought specially to instruct. His manner of teaching is modelled on theirs. He delights in aphorism. He makes frequent use of illustration and example. It is from them that He has derived the parabolic method of instruction which is so characteristic a feature of His teaching. But not merely the form of His teaching, the matter also is in many cases similar to that of the Rabbis.

Many striking parallels to Christ's sayings have been found in Rabbinical literature. Hillel summed up the whole Law in the words, 'What thou wouldst not have done to thee, do not that to others.' He bade men not judge their neighbour till they came into his place. 'Raise not thyself above others.' 'If thou art where no men are, show thyself a man.' 'Be among the pupils of Aaron, who loved peace and pursued peace, who loved all creatures and guided them to the Law.' 'Be not as servants who minister to their masters upon condition of receiving a reward.' 'Do God's will as if it were thy will, that He may do thy will as if it were His will.' 'Let your neighbour's honour be as dear to you as your own.' Such are some of the more striking sayings of the Jewish Rabbis, which seem to breathe as pure a religious spirit as the teaching of Christ. Even the prayer which Christ taught His disciples, we are told, is but a shortened form of some of the older prayers of the Jewish Liturgy. It is true that in a great many cases the Rabbinical literature in which we find these parallels to the sayings of Christ dates from the 2nd cent. A.D.; and Christian apologists have endeavoured to make the most of the fact, suggesting that if there is any borrowing, the indebtedness cannot rest on the side of Christ. But that argument would be valid only if it were shown that there was any possibility of the literature in question having been influenced by Christian thought. But there is no such possibility. The Christian and the Jewish literature, as Renan (Life of Jesus, ch. v.) says, had scarcely any influence on one another before the 13th century. Though these parallels are from a literature which was compiled at a date later than the appearance of Christ, they are themselves older than Christ, and represent a purely Jewish development of thought.

One may dismiss this evidence against the originality of Christ in the words of Wellhausen (*IJG*²), 'Jewish scholars think that all that Jesus said is found in the Talmud. Yes, all, and a good deal more. Πλέον ἡμῖν πάντος. The originality of Jesus consists in this, that He had the feeling for what was true and eternal amid a chaotic mass of rubbish, and that He enunciated it with the greatest emphasis.' No doubt there are occasional parallels to the words of Christ to be found in the Talmud, but there is a vast amount in the Talmud to which no parallel can be found in the preaching of Christ, for it falls lamentably short of the lofty spiritual tone which characterizes every utterance of the Saviour. Even if it be the case that we can find something corresponding to every clause of the Lord's Prayer in the Jewish Liturgy, it might still be maintained that there was originality in selecting precisely these petitions and bringing them together in such a brief and simple prayer. But indeed we are not much concerned to defend the originality of the Lord's Prayer. Christ's object was not to teach His disciples some new form of prayer, but to give expression to the deepest longings of the human heart; and it would be strange if these cravings had not already found utterance in some measure in the prayers of His fellow-countrymen. When we turn to the parallels which have been traced between sayings of Christ and quotations from the Jewish Rabbis, it will be found, on examination, that in many cases they are not so striking as they appear at first sight. For instance, the saying of Hillel which has been often quoted as an anticipation of the Golden Rule of Christ really falls far short of it. Hillel merely warns us against doing to others what we would not that they should do to us. One might conform to that maxim on grounds of selfishness. At best it requires only that we do no evil. But Christ's maxim is positive. It insists not merely that we do no evil, but that we do good, and can be carried out only by one who has his heart full of love for his brother. And, further, with regard to the parallels that are drawn between the sayings of Christ and the words of the Rabbis, we must ask what place the quotations occupy in the respective writings from which they are taken. Quotations from the Talmud which have a striking resemblance to some words of Christ may prove, when we consider the context in which they occur, to bear a different meaning from what they assume when put into juxtaposition with similar words of Christ, or may lose a great deal of the impressiveness which attaches to them when regarded as isolated utterances. Upon the whole, we conclude that little weight is to be placed upon the occasional parallels which have been found in the words of the Jewish Rabbis to sayings of Christ. The general spirit of the Rabbinical teaching is very different from Christ's. When sayings are found which seem to approach to the teaching of Christ, they are rather to be regarded as isolated utterances which rise for the moment above the general level of Rabbinical theology.

There is another branch of late Jewish literature which, it is alleged, has had a marked influence upon Christ, and from which He is said to have derived many of His leading ideas, viz. the series of Messianic-Apocalyptic writings in which the hopes and aspirations of later Judaism found expression.

There are numerous points of contact between the teaching of Christ and the literature in question. His eschatology, e.g., is said to be almost entirely drawn from this source. Certainly the expectation of His second coming was a novel idea, as it presupposed a want of success on His first appearance which had not been anticipated by any of the later Apocalyptic writers. But otherwise, for the most part, He simply accepts the general eschatological programme which they had outlined. The sharp contrast in which the present age (ὁ αἰὼν ὄντων, Lk 16⁸ 20³⁴, Mt 12³²; ὁ παῖς ὄντων, Lk 18³⁰) and the future (ὁ αἰὼν ὁ μέλλων, Mt 12³²; ὁ αἰὼν ὁ ἐρχόμενος, Lk 18³⁰) are set to one another, the inauguration of the new era by the miraculous intervention of God, who is to bring in the Kingdom of God with power, the belief that the Kingdom thus to be set up is to come down from heaven, whence also is to come the agent to whom is entrusted its establishment, the series of dire calamities which are to herald the approach of the new era, the great judgment scene and resurrection of the dead with which it is to be ushered in,—all these familiar features of Christ's eschatology are to be found in the writings referred to. In painting the blessedness of heaven and the torments of hell, Christ uses the colours which the Apocalyptic writers have prepared,—Abraham's bosom, the great banquet, eating bread and drinking wine in the Kingdom of God, the furnace of fire and the outer darkness. Again, the Messianic hope which Christ cherished was largely influenced by the expectation which had found expression in the Apocalyptic literature. There was much, indeed, that was sensuous in the expectation of those writers which could not appeal to Christ, and which He put aside. But under their hands the Messianic hope of the OT writers had undergone a transformation which prepared the way for the more spiritual conception of Christianity. They had widened its scope so as to make it embrace not only the nation but the world; they had detached it from earthly political ideas, and raised it to the realm of the supermundane; they had deepened and developed that tendency to individualism which had begun to show itself in the later writings of the OT. In these respects they had prepared the way for Christ, and in much of His teaching He was in sympathy with the aims, and did but develop the doctrines, of the Apocalyptic writers of later Judaism.

One might admit the truth of most of what is thus said, without in any way detracting from the originality of Christ. It is no disparagement to that originality, as we have seen, to recognize that Christ stands in close and vital connexion with those who have preceded Him, and uses the modes of thought and speech which they have made familiar. Whether, indeed, the connexion between the Messianic views of Christ and those of later Judaism is as close as has been suggested, is a question upon which there is a difference of opinion. Baldensperger answers in the affirmative, maintaining that we must no longer regard Judaism as the dark background against which Christianity stands out as something quite different, but rather as a preparatory stage on the way to Christianity. He lays special stress upon the transcendent character of its Messianism as an advance towards the spiritualism of Christianity (Die messian.-apokalypt. Auffassungen des Judenthums, 1903, p. 232). This view of the relation of Christianity to later Judaism has not been accepted by other authorities. Wellhausen finds in Christianity rather a protest against the prevailing tendency of Judaism (Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, p. 98). So also Bousset (Jesu Preldigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judenthum, 1892), who has enumerated a number of points in which the teaching of Christ is in direct conflict with the spirit of later Judaism. In view of this difference of opinion, it is evident that no very strong case has been made out to prove Christ's indebtedness to the later Jewish Apocalyptic writings. That He used the eschatological data and many of the modes of thought which are to be found in this literature, may be readily admitted. But beyond that, His general line of thought must have been little in sympathy with its spirit. There is a wide gulf between the transcendence of later Jewish Messianism, which is sometimes coarse and sensuous, and the spirituality of the Messianic hopes of Christ. Many of the most marked characteristics of later Judaism, as Bousset points out, its withdrawal of God from the world, its asceticism, its world-weariness and lack of interest in the present and yearning for the future, are directly opposed to the spirit of the Saviour's teaching. In view of these and other points of difference between the doctrine of Christ and the tendencies of later Judaism, it seems rash to attempt to trace the origin of Christianity to a system of doctrine to which, in spite of certain superficial points of resemblance, it stands in deep and radical opposition.

(3) Essenism.—Attempts have frequently been made to connect Christ with the Essenes, and to account for many of the characteristic features of His doctrine by deriving them from the practices of this sect. But no evidence has been brought forward to prove that Christ had any connexion with them. It is true He never refers to them, while He frequently denounces the Pharisees and Sadducees. But that fact may be easily explained by the smallness and retiring character of the sect. Ginsburg (Essenes, p. 24) argues that every Jew had to belong to one of the three parties, Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, into which the Jews were divided at the time of Christ, and that Christ would naturally associate Himself with the Essenes as most congenial to His nature; but as his premises are quite unsupported, his conclusion has no weight whatever. The only valid ground upon which any plausible case may be made out in favour of the view that Christ had some connexion with the Essenes is, that there are several points in which His doctrine bears a considerable resemblance to theirs. Among these points of resemblance the following may be noted: prohibition of oaths, exaltation of poverty, simplicity of life, celibacy (Mt 19¹²), feeling of brotherhood issuing in mutual service. But most of these features merely represent the high moral tone which obtains on both of the sides thus compared, and no direct connexion is required to account for the resemblance. On the other hand, there are very marked features of difference which preclude any direct connexion of Christ with the Essenes. One of the most distinctive features of the sect was its withdrawal from the world and adoption of a monastic life. Contact with strangers was supposed to communicate defilement. The conduct of Christ presented a striking contrast. He mixed freely in the life of the people. He told His disciples not to hide their light under a bushel. And, so far from thinking that mere contact with strangers caused defilement, He did not shrink even from the touch of the woman who was a sinner, or hesitate to lay His hand upon a leper. In their asceticism the Essenes went to an extreme. 'The Son of Man came eating and drinking.' In their Sabbath observance they outdid the Pharisees. There was no point on which Christ gave such offence to the rigorists. The Essenes stood aloof from the Temple, and offered no sacrifice there. Christ repaired to Jerusalem to some of the great festivals, and taught daily in the Temple. The Essenes were scrupulous to a degree on the question of purity. They had washings innumerable. Christ paid no attention to such ceremonial observances, but esteemed only purity of heart. The differences which thus separate Christ from the Essenes are broad and deep. We cannot find any connexion between Him and a sect which, by its monastic tendency, its exaltation of ceremonial observances, its formal and precise rules, could have made little appeal to Him.

iv. The original element in Christianity.—When we turn from these attempts to disparage the originality of Christ, and proceed to consider wherein that originality consists, we find a great variety of opinions upon the subject. Some would place all the emphasis upon the Person of Christ; others lay weight upon His methods as a teacher; others think to find the original element in His doctrine, selecting now its universalism, now its individualism, now its practical moral tendency, now its lofty spirituality, as the characteristic feature of it; while others, again, contend that the specifically novel feature in the teaching of Christ is His announcement that the Kingdom of God is at hand, that God is about to intervene and bring in the Kingdom of God with power. We shall not confine ourselves to any one of these points of view, but proceed to indicate what appear to us some of the more important characteristics which go to make up the originality of Christ.

1. Without doubt the fullest emphasis must be laid upon Christ's personality. This is the most strikingly original feature in Christianity. We cannot separate the doctrine from the Person of Christ. He taught by His life no less than by His words, and it is His Person as much as His doctrine that has converted the world. There could be no more unsatisfactory method of attempting to estimate the originality of Christ than to single out various statements scattered throughout the Gospels which we believe to be unparalleled in any teaching that had gone before. 'It is not difficult to set over against every article from the preaching of Jesus an observation which deprives it of its originality. It is the Person, it is the fact of his life that is new and creates the new' (Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, Eng. tr. i. 73). When we approach the portrait of Christ presented in the Gospels, we at once feel that we are in the presence of One who is in the truest sense original. The moral grandeur of His character alone bears witness to the fact. It dwarfs the attainment of the greatest of human heroes, and leaves the ideals even of our noblest thinkers far behind. The very fact of its sinlessness stamps it with an originality that cannot be gainsaid. The perfect harmony that pervades the whole life, the holy peace which no trial or danger can disturb, the sublime faith, the noble optimism, the unquenchable love, the tender sympathy, the meek humility, the genial, kindly spirit which drew men to Him—these are a few of the features which go to make up that portrait which has produced such an impression on the heart of the world. We feel we are standing in the presence of One who has given in His own Person the perfect revelation of the Divine. One trait we may specially note as characteristic of that originality we are considering, viz. the tone of authority with which He ever acts and speaks. Meek and humble as He is, there is a certain majesty about Him that shines forth all the more forcibly because of the lowliness of the service to which He stoops. He sets up His own authority over against that of the Law: 'Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time . . . but I say unto you' (Mt 5²¹, etc.). He speaks of Himself as a greater than Jonah, a greater than Solomon (12⁴¹). He claims to be able to reveal the Father as no other can (11²⁷), for He stands in a relation of such intimacy to the Father that He can speak of the hidden mysteries of the Divine will as things into which He has Himself looked. Hence the ring of absolute certainty about the revelation He gives of God. Hence the tone of authority in which He announces the Divine will. Either He was the victim of the grossest self-delusion, or He stood in such a close relationship to God, and knew Himself, as the appointed Messiah, to be endowed with such authority as justified Him in speaking in a tone which in any other would be nothing short of blasphemy. There is nothing incompatible with this tone of authority, which marks the teaching of Christ, in the fact that much of His teaching, as we have seen, is closely related to the OT. In a sense His teaching may be said to be based upon the OT, in so far, viz., as in the OT He found the food which nourished His spiritual life. But it is out of the fulness of the spiritual life thus nourished that He draws His doctrine, and not directly from the OT. He speaks that He knows, and testifies that He has seen (Jn 3¹¹); and what of OT teaching is reproduced in His doctrine is so transmuted and ennobled, bears so unmistakably the impress of His own personality, that it may be fitly called original. We may apply to His relation to the OT the words of the poet, and say that He ‘made nobly his what he did mould;

What was another’s lead, became his gold.’

Closely akin to this tone of authority which Christ assumes in His preaching is another feature which contributes to the originality of His personality, viz. the feeling that with Him a new era has arrived in the history of the world. ‘The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand’ (Mk 1¹⁵)—that is the new message of which Christ is the bearer. The hope which animated the prophets has become a reality to Him. He told His disciples that they were blessed in that their eyes had seen the things which many prophets and kings had desired to see (Lk 10^{23f.}). His whole preaching rings with glad tidings that the long expected time has come. The period of waiting is past, the new era has begun. Already the Kingdom of God is in the midst of men (Lk 17²¹). Even the tragic catastrophe to which His life is tending cannot shake His conviction that with Him the Messianic age has come. He longs for the baptism of suffering which He has to undergo, as calculated to give a mighty impetus to the movement He has begun (12^{30f.}). And when the hour came for Him to lay down His life, so far from seeing in His death any frustration of the gracious work to which He had dedicated His life, He taught His disciples to look upon His blood as the seal of the New Covenant which it had been His life’s work to establish.

2. The originality which we have noted as characteristic of the Person of Christ, we should expect to find reflected in His doctrine. It was in His doctrine that He made His authority felt (Mt 7²⁹). The impression made upon those who stood in the closest relation to His Person was that He had a wonderful and life-giving doctrine to communicate (Jn 6⁶⁸). In place of His anointment to Messianic kingship, He substituted His anointment to the prophetic office (Lk 4¹⁸⁻²¹), and addressed Himself to the work of preaching in fulfilment of His vocation as Messiah. Was there anything original, we ask, in His preaching, anything to justify His feeling that with His entrance on His work as a preacher the new era might be said to have begun?

The impression made upon the people who first listened to His doctrine was that it was something new. ‘A new doctrine with authority,’ they exclaimed (Mk 1²⁷) as they listened to His preaching for the first time. Certainly there was much that was old in His doctrine, much that did but echo the teaching of the OT. The description He gives in one of His parables of the scribe instructed in the Kingdom of heaven, applies in the first instance to Himself. He was like a householder who bringeth forth from his storeroom things new and old (Mt 13⁵²). But if there was much that was old, there was much also that was new and original. As compared with the teaching of the OT, to which it stands in such close connexion, Christ’s doctrine was original, as we saw above, in the freedom with which He selected only what appealed to Him, leaving aside much which from the standpoint of His contemporaries was equally, if not more important; in the new emphasis with which it restates certain OT doctrines, and the new value it assigns to them. It was original in the simplicity of its requirements, as against the multitudinous demands which Judaism made upon the individual; in the consistency with which it pursued its few leading ideas—such, e.g., as the righteousness of the heart as that which alone avails in God’s sight—to their logical issues, not hesitating to enforce the conclusions which follow, even when they conflict with the recognized standards, as in the above case with reference to the Levitical law of cleanness (Mk 7¹⁴⁻²³). It was original in the feeling of confidence which it inspired in man in relation to God, banishing that spirit of bondage which the Pharisaic attitude to the Law had produced, and putting in its place the spirit of adoption whereby we cry, ‘Abba, Father’ (Ro 8¹⁵), assuring man of the love of the Father in heaven, of the preciousness of each individual in His sight, of His willingness to bestow blessings in rich abundance upon him, to forgive his sins and give him the Kingdom. But, indeed, to do justice to the originality of Christ’s doctrine, we should have to mention every feature of it. The purity of the ethical tone, the loftiness of the ideal it sets before us, the comfort it breathes to the sinful and the sinning, the depth of the love it inculcates, the zeal for righteousness it seeks to inspire, its indifference to the ceremonial in religion and interest only for the spiritual,—these are among the features which contribute to its originality. If it is true that there is scarcely a single doctrine of Christ of which we cannot find some anticipation in the OT, it is also true that there is no OT doctrine which Christ reiterates but receives a new significance from the setting it obtains in His teaching. This is the strikingly original feature about His doctrine,—how He makes the old new by the new light in which He places it, and the new value He assigns to it. Much that He taught had been taught before. But never had it been proclaimed with such assurance, never had it been brought home to the heart of man with such conviction, as when it was taught by Him who embodied in His own Person the truth He taught, who, when He spoke of the love of God, could point to His own presence among men as the confirmation of the message that He bore, and who sealed with His blood the truth that He had proclaimed in His life.

LITERATURE.—Bruno Bauer, Christus und die Cäsaren 2, 1879, Das Urevangelium und die Gegner der Schrift ‘Christus und die Cäsaren,’ 1880; E. OVEN (κλίβανος).—In the reference to fuel for the village oven (Mt 6³⁰, Lk 12²⁸) the term 'grass' is used generally for any wild produce of the fields, including thorns and thistles.

The Bible references to the baking of bread correspond to the three principal methods now employed in Palestine. (1) The simplest is that in use among the Bedouin or migratory Arabs of the desert. It is to make a slight hollow in the ground at the tent door, and burn upon it dry grass or twigs until sufficient hot ash is made for the baking of the bread cakes (Gn 18⁶, 1 K 17¹² 19⁶). An improvement upon this is seen in the small villages, where the conditions of life are more stationary. The hollow is deepened a little more, and covered with large pebbles in order to retain the heat, and the bread is either laid upon these after the ashes have been brushed aside, or, without removal of the ashes, the bread is laid upon a convex metal disc or griddle slightly raised above the fire-place. (2) The next stage of advance is seen in the large, pot-like hole dug in the ground, and lined with a smooth coating of plaster. The same kind of fuel is laid as before on the pebbles at the bottom, and the thin cakes are fired by being placed for a minute on the hot concave surface of the oven. The work of baking is done by a woman who sits beside the oven, and from time to time adds a few handfuls of fuel. She has on one side the tray of dough from which she tears out a small piece, and after rolling it out into a thin cake she distends it still further by slapping it over one arm and then over the other. She then lays it upon a circular cushion-like pad kept for the purpose, and thus applies it to the plaster surface of the pot oven. As each loaf, about a foot and a half in diameter and of wafer-like thinness, is rapidly fired, it is placed upon the pile of bread on her other side. This is the ordinary oven for home-made bread in the villages, the tannūr of the OT and the simpler form of the klībános of the NT. In the warning of Lv 26²⁶, the predicted scarcity of fuel and flour would be such that ten women in one cluster or section of the village houses, instead of using in turn the same oven for their separate households, would have to unite their little stock of flour to make a baking to be done by one of them, and then receive by weight the share of bread belonging to each.

(3) The final form is that of the baker's oven. The ordinary village usually has one of these, in which baking is done on three or more days of the week, and the towns are furnished with a larger number in daily use on account of the increased demand. The oven recess, instead of being a hollow in the ground, is now a vault about twelve feet long, four feet high, and eight feet broad, built in the bake-house. The pebbles of the primitive form are represented by a pavement of squared stone along the length and breadth of the semi-cylindrical vault. Upon it is laid fuel of the same kind as before, with an addition of thicker twigs and pieces of cleft wood, and the fire is kept up until sufficient heat has been produced. The hot ashes are then brushed off and banked up on each side, and the bread is laid on this cleared space of the hot stone pavement (Is 44¹⁹, Jer 37²¹). The heat is considerably greater than what is needed for the more gradual firing of our larger European loaf, and the Oriental oven thus became the emblem of vehement desire (Ho 7⁶⁻⁷) and the indignant anger of God (Ps 21⁹). OWNER (κύριος).—The word is found only once in the AV (Lk 19³³ 'The owners said (to the disciples), Why loose ye the colt?'). Luke alone indicates that there was any question asked when the disciples prepared to take the colt away. Probably the answer which the disciples were instructed to give ('The Lord hath need of him,' Lk 19^{31, 34}) was a prearranged sign between the owners and Jesus. Elsewhere in the Gospels the frequency of the occurrence of the word 'owner' is concealed from readers of the English versions by its translation as 'lord' (see art. LORD). 'Lord' (κύριος) has the sense of 'owner' in the phrases 'the lord of the vineyard' (Mt 20⁸ 21⁴⁰ || Mk 12⁹ || Lk 20¹⁵). In the phrases, 'the servant is not above his lord' (Mt 10²⁴), 'the servant showed his lord these things' (Lk 14²¹), 'the lord of that servant' (Lk 12⁴⁶), the relationship is that of master (owner) and slave (δοῦλος). By translating δοῦλος as 'servant,' the fact is concealed from English readers that slavery was an institution in the social life of the Jews. It was not so common among them as among the Greeks and Romans, and the condition of the slave in the Jewish social economy was much happier than in the Gentile world. The terrible punishment mentioned in Lk 12⁴⁶ ('the lord of that servant . . . will cut him in sunder [δικοτομέϊν], and appoint him his portion with the unbelievers') is probably taken from the punishments which were practised in the Gentile world. It is, however, mentioned as a punishment in He 11³⁷. On the different interpretations of Lk 12⁴⁶ see Godet, ad loc., and Meyer on Mt 24⁵¹. See also art. SERVICE.

PALACE.—In the Gospels the word is used in the text of Mt 27²⁷ and Jn 18^{28, 33} 19⁹, and in the margin of Mk 15¹⁶. In all cases it is the representative of πραιτώριον (see PRÆTORIUM), which was a term wide enough to include what would now be called a guard-room or the barrack-square adjoining (Mt 27²⁷, Mk 15¹⁶), as well as the actual place (referred to in the Johannine passages) in which a case was tried and the sentence pronounced.

PALESTINE.—The tendency, represented by historians like Buckle and his school, to write history in terms of environment, is one of those remarkable exaggerations of a valuable truth in which the 19th cent. was prolific. Every age which produces elemental theories and sweeping changes in the most widely accepted and venerable views, is liable to this kind of exaggeration. New ideas first stagger and then captivate men's minds, and the new names which these theories introduce assume magic powers for a time. The next generation smiles at the omnipotence of the catchwords of the first years of evolutionary doctrine, and remembers that other words—'sympathy' and 'perpetual motion' among the rest—had a similar vogue in their day. Most of all has the power of environment received undue emphasis and been credited with an influence far in excess of the facts, in the case of Jesus Christ. There is nothing which has doomed the work of His purely naturalistic biographers to premature obsolescence so much as this. Nowhere was Carlyle's protest in favour of the effect of great personalities so applicable as here. If anything in history is certain, it is that here we have a case in which a unique personality is seen mastering circumstances, rather than one in which circumstances are seen creating a conspicuous personality.

Yet the influence of Palestine on Jesus is equally unquestionable.

'We must not isolate the story,' says Dr. Dale, 'from the preceding history of the Jewish race. . . Many people seem to suppose that they may approach the subject as if the Lord Jesus Christ had appeared in Spain or in China, instead of in Judæa and Galilee' (Living Christ and the Four Gospels, 89). 'If, negatively,' says Hausrath, 'it be self-evident that Jesus' mission would have assumed another character had He grown up under the oaks of Germany instead of under the palms of Nazareth, that the subject of Arminius or Maroboduus would have been different from that of Antipas, that the opponent of the Druids would have differed from the opponent of the Rabbis, so, positively, it is indisputable that for Jesus Himself the facts of His consciousness were given Him under those forms of viewing things in which Jewish thought in general was cast. Only by a freak of the imagination can it be supposed that an historical personality becomes conscious of the facts of its own inner life by conceptions other than those in which the thought of the age in general finds expression' (Hist. of NT Times, ii. 225).

Thus we may take it that there is no sentence in the Gospels which can be fairly understood if it be regarded merely as the remark or question of a member of the human race who might have belonged to any nationality. Every word derives something of its significance from the place and time at which it was spoken. Jesus is the Son of Man, but He is also a Syrian teacher. It is Syrian landscape, Syrian history, and Syrian human nature with which the Incarnation works; and we of the West are confronted at every turn by the need to Orientalize our conceptions as we study these records.

In this article we shall consider the influence on Jesus (1) of Syria as a whole; (2) of the Gentile elements in the land; (3) of the open field and of Nature as seen in Syria; (4) of the town and village life with which He was familiar; (5) of the city of Jerusalem.

1. Syria as a whole.—Syria is an Eastern land, and the relations and differences between East and West are the first aspects of this subject which demand attention. No phenomenon of the kind is so remarkable as the combination of Eastern and Western characteristics in the thought and work of Jesus. Such books as Townsend's Asia and Europe and Fielding Hall's The Soul of a People (to mention two out of many popular accounts of East and West), though their generalizations are not always convincing, are full of suggestive illustrations of this. 'Though Asiatic in origin,' says the former writer, 'Christianity is the least Oriental of the creeds.' To find lives most typically Christian, we have to look chiefly to Western nations, France and Germany, Britain and America. Indeed, the astonishing fact is evident that in certain respects we have in Jesus an Oriental too Western for Asiatics, so that to a certain extent they have to Occidentalize their conceptions in order to become Christian. This strange fact has commonly been brought as a charge against the methods of Christian missionaries in the East. But there can be no doubt that in some measure it is due to the mind of Jesus Himself. His doctrine of personal immortality, e.g., and still more the triumphant and glad spirit in which He proclaimed it, have a far more congenial appeal to the West than to the East. 'Eternal consciousness!' exclaims Townsend: 'that to the majority of Asiatics is not a promise but a threat.' Similarly, the prominence given in Christianity to the command to love our neighbour as ourself, in the West will always find at least a theoretical assent, for it will be backed by the sentiment or at least the conscience of sympathy between man and man as such. The East, whose religion is fundamentally a matter of saving one's own soul, or at widest a matter of tribal loyalties, will find that a hard saying, and indeed has always so found it. Again, everyone must have noticed that in the battles of Jesus against the unintelligent and conventional doctrines of the Pharisees, His constant appeal was to common-sense and the facts of the case obvious to every unprejudiced observer. But that in itself was an instance of the Western type of intellect pitted against the Oriental.

Yet, at the depths, Christianity rests upon distinctively Oriental foundations. The very publicity of Eastern life has had its effect upon the Gospels. The whole ministry of Jesus was performed among crowds, in public places of assembly and on thronged highways. His thoughts were flung at once into the arena of public discussion, and even His protests and His disregard of ritual in such matters as hand-washing, fasts, etc., were made under the scrutiny of innumerable eyes. The whole Gospel shows traces of this lack of privacy, and the emphasis of its teachings is often fixed by the angle at which its detail was seen by the on-lookers. Again, the great Christian doctrine of renunciation is essentially an Oriental doctrine, typical of Hebraism as contrasted with Hellenism; so much so, that it is to the surprise with which that doctrine broke upon the West that its conquest was in part due. The Oriental has been kept from perceiving how Divine self-sacrifice is, by his familiarity with it as a commonplace of human life. 'The qualities which seemed to the warriors of Clovis so magnificently Divine, the self-sacrifice, the self-denial, the resignation, the sweet humility, are precisely the qualities the germs of which exist in the Hindu' (Asia and Europe, 69). Consequently, 'the character of Christ is not . . . as acceptable to Indians as to Northern races,' the former seeking in the Divine a contrast rather than a complement to their human thoughts. Again, that free play of imagination touching even the most everyday subjects, that direct statement of truth, unguarded by qualifications and unbuttressed by proofs, are Eastern rather than Western characteristics. These are but random instances, a few out of very many, and varying in importance from the most casual to the most fundamental, yet they are enough to prove that the thought of Jesus was cast in an essentially Oriental mould.

The geographical features of Palestine are strongly marked; and they include, in a very small field, mountains, rivers, plains, lakes and sea-coast. The story of Jesus brings Him in contact with each of these; but the only ones which can be said to have left very distinct traces are the mountains. The Bible is full of mountain scenery, and it owes much to that. The religious thought of the great plains of the world is one thing, that of sea-girt islands is another, and that of mountain-land is a third. The long ranges of Lebanon throw off their southern spurs in Galilee, and the range ends suddenly in the line of steep mountain-side which runs along the northern edge of the Plain of Esdraelon. Not far from this edge, nestling in hollows or crowning heights, lay the towns and villages among which Jesus spent His early years. Hermon is the one great mountain which Anti-Lebanon rises to, standing off to the south, and detached from the continuous range by the deep-cut gorge of the Abana, but sending on the ridge again unbroken, though rugged in outline, past the Sea of Merom on the eastern side, to the shores of the Sea of Galilee. Samaria lies to the south of Esdraelon, a region of finely sweeping valleys and hills of soft and rounded outline. But these hills grow less distinct as the road strikes southward through Judæa. The general level rises to a bare and lofty table-land, from which, near Bethel, rounded heights rise like huge breasts of grey stone from the upheaved bosom of the land. South of that, sheer gorges (geological faults, or the work of flooded winter-torrents) slash across the land from east to west, and open grim and sombre through precipices upon the sunken valley of the Jordan, where Jericho lies steaming in the heat, 6 miles west of the Jordan's channel-groove, chiselled deep below the level of the valley. Soon Jerusalem is seen, like a round nest among low mountains—a city thrust up from the summit of the land, and moated by deep valleys on two sides.

South of that, through the pasture-lands about Bethlehem and the wilderness of Judaea to the east of them, the land slopes down the rolling 'South Country' to the Arabian desert.

The traveller to-day is often disappointed in the emotions he had expected at sacred sites. The belief in miracle is nowhere so difficult as on the spot, where every detail of the scene seems so uncompromisingly earthly. If, however, he will follow the example of the Psalmist, and 'lift up his eyes unto the hills,' he will find the realization of Christ an easier matter. The great sky-lines are for the most part unchanged, and the same edges and vistas are to be seen which filled the eyes of Jesus. This is not merely the result of the fact that local tradition and foolish ways of honouring sacred places have disfigured and stultified so many spots of Palestine. It recalls the fact that Jesus came from the highlands of Galilee, and that He chose to associate many of the most outstanding events of His life with mountains. From the hill above Nazareth He looked abroad on an endless field of mountain tops. Hermon dominated the landscape on the north-east, and Tabor thrust its irrelevant cone, conspicuous and unique, over the undulating sky-line of the mountains between Nazareth and the Lake—a gigantic intruder which had reared its huge head to look down into Nazareth from over the wall of mountains. It was there, with countless mountain summits of familiar name about Him, that the Youth first encountered those tremendous thoughts which finally led Him to the Jordan. Driven thence by the Spirit into the wilderness, He fought His long fight with rivalschemes of greatness, in the tract which Judaea thrusts high into the air from the depth of the Jordan Valley, and holds balanced upon the edge of cliffs. Jericho looks up at that mountain of Quarantania, and sees its angular and tilted platform of a summit as a black space cut out of the brilliance of a living, starry sky. From the edge He looked down on Jericho (Mt 4¹ etc.), and knew the power of worldliness as He saw the palace-life of Herod there, and the glimmer of festive lamps among the palm-groves that had been Cleopatra's. Mountains were the congenial places for His great utterances in which the Old Law changed to the New, and the freshness as well as the exaltation of these words remind us from beginning to end of them that they are a Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5¹). Similarly, by a sure instinct, it was to the heights that He went to find by night the fullest sense of converse with His Father (Mt 14²³ etc.). Probably it was on some of the slopes of Hermon that such a season of communion brightened to the wonder of Transfiguration (Mt 17¹ etc.). Hermon's summit is always white, and many a 'bright cloud overshadows' it, until it shines upon the plain for miles around, in a white glory of frosted silver. It is not without significance that Matthew gives as the trysting-place between Jesus and His disciples 'a mountain of Galilee' (Mt 28¹⁶). There is a perceptible air of relief in the words, as if after all those stifling days in Judaea—days of judgment-halls and shut doors in upper rooms, of clouded cross and sealed sepulchre—an irresistible longing had seized Him for the sunlight and the wind-swept heights of His happier early days. Nothing fostered the patriotism of Israel so much as her mountains. From time immemorial they had been her defences in war, and the platforms of her worship. In the story of Jesus they are seen in both these uses, and the feel of the heights is upon much that He has said.

Palestine is a little and compressed country, where not only geographical features, but the facts and associations of national history are gathered, so close as to force themselves upon the attention at every step. While travelling there, it is a constant source of wonder that so much could have happened in so small a place. These continual reminders of the past history of the nation, which thrust themselves upon Israelites everywhere, and kept patriotism vehemently alive, had their effect also upon Jesus. The heroes of the past were much in His thought, and His journeys from place to place reminded Him of them continually. Elijah and Elisha, Solomon, David, and Isaiah, were figures not merely remembered from reading in the sacred books. They were the unseen inhabitants of the places where once they dwelt in the flesh, peopling for Him tracts over which He led His disciples. His patriotism is evident continually (Lk 19⁹ 13¹⁶). It was a great thing in His eyes to be a son or a daughter of Abraham. Jerusalem, for Him as for the Psalmist, is the 'city of the great King' (Mt 5³⁵). The waysides are hallowed by the footsteps of the dead. The tombs of the prophets are conspicuous monuments to His imagination (Mt 23²⁹). He lived among the dead, and they lived unto God and unto Him in the land where their bones had long crumbled to decay. He receives and is taunted with the title 'King of Israel' (Jn 1⁹, Mt 27⁴² etc.). The accusation on the Cross is 'Jesus, the King of the Jews' (Mt 27³⁷ etc.).

Two aspects of the land, taken as a whole, must be remembered, especially if we would understand what it meant to Jesus—Palestine as an oasis, and Palestine as a focus.

Palestine as an oasis.—It is shut off from the rest of the world by a complete ring of natural barriers. Mountains on the north; a vast desert on the east, with the deep and long trench of the Jordan Valley set as a second and inner barrier like a moat; desert again on the south; and the west wholly bounded by the alien sea which so few understood—these are the boundaries of Israel. And there was also a double ring of national barricades. At a distance had stood the great empires of the East, the Parthians having taken in His time the place of ancient Nineveh and Babylon. To the south-west lay Egypt. An inner ring of wild Arabian tribes wandered over the eastern desert, and now and then raided the land. Formerly an unbroken belt of neighbouring heathen enemies encircled Israel, and even cut her off from the sea by the Philistine wedge driven along her western coast, stretching from the Pillar of Egypt to the Phœnician seaports. All this was modified, and much of it broken up, in the time of Jesus; but the religious meaning of it all was thus being only the better understood.

The whole meaning of the land in OT times had been the isolation of Israel for religious ends. For her, 'to act like men' (i.e. to imitate the nations round about her) was denounced by her prophets as a betrayal (Hos 6⁷). As a matter of fact, every experiment which she made in such imitation of 'men' was a failure. Under Solomon she had adopted the 'Policy of Orientalism' of the great world-empires. Under Jeroboam she had sought to conform to the secular ideas of ritual then fashionable, and had even attempted something in the way of a democratic system of government. Under many kings she had sought greatness in aggressive wars. Under Omri she had, by her alliance with Phœnicia, tried for the position of a great commercial power. In every one of these attempts she had found herself defeated, and driven back on the one thing she could do as no other nation could. That one thing was religion, and the meaning of Israel's isolation was that worship of Jehovah which grew up with her institutions, and of whose revelations she was the destined recipient and repository.

For Jesus also Palestine was an oasis. It is indeed true that the Palestine of His time was no longer the 'garden enclosed' which the prophets had striven to keep it. All its hedges were by this time broken down and driven through by the relentless march of Rome. In the heart of the invaded country Jerusalem remained bitterly exclusive and hostile to all the world, so far as the Pharisees could keep it so. Galilee was much more open to the wider thought of the time than Judaea, and Jesus was in sympathy rather with the Galilean than with the Judæan spirit. Yet, so far as His own work went, He retained and utilized the oasis view of His land. His three temptations were an epitome of the nation's temptations—'to act like men' for bread, or for fame, or for power. In resisting them He was thrusting from His Kingdom the ideals of commercial prosperity, military conquest, and political empire, just as the prophets of Israel had fought against these as national ideals. He remained, and set His speech and His works, among those relationships where God had placed Him. He confined His own ministry and the earlier ministry of His disciples to the land of Israel (Mt 10⁵); and that land was still sufficiently isolated from the thought and life of the world to provide a true cradle and fostering-place for those thoughts which formed the nucleus of the Kingdom of heaven. Thus, in the earliest years, they were sufficiently aloof to gain intensity.

Palestine as a focus.—If Palestine was no longer an oasis in the full sense in which it had been so in OT times, it was more a focus than it had ever been before. In the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, a little hollow place with a flattened ball in it is still exhibited to the incredulous visitor as the centre of the world. The cosmography of the Middle Ages took this as serious science, Jerusalem being the antipodes of the island of Purgatory at the other pole. No doubt some such conception was in the minds of many who looked in early Christian times for new heavens and a new earth and a new Jerusalem. Such thoughts were true in a wider sense than the thinkers knew. At the time of Jesus, Palestine was the meeting-point of East and West.

For many centuries Israel had been a buffer State between the conflicting powers of Egypt and Mesopotamia. Now instead of Egypt there was Rome, at the height of its military power, and armed also with the spiritual weapons of Greece, whose national power it had destroyed and by the deed had set free its spirit. The eastern empires of Nineveh and Babylon were gone, and instead of them were those changing hosts of Persian and Parthian warriors who were soon to dispute the world with Rome. And behind them, more clearly visible since the campaigns of Alexander the Great, though still dim in the mists of vast distances, lay India and the Far East.

The Roman conquest of Syria had brought into immediate and hostile contact two nationalities whose whole history and thought placed them irreconcilably apart. Rome's ideal of secular empire confronted the Jewish hope of the universal reign of Messiah. Down to the minutest detail of life the two ideals were opposed. To Rome tribute was the obvious consequence of conquest; the theatre was at once a politic and a generous enrichment of the life of the conquered State. To Israel tribute was a sacrilege, and the theatre which rose in Jerusalem a blasphemy. So hateful was the Roman to the Jew, that Jews were a worthless commodity in the Roman slave-market. So unintelligible was the Jew to the Roman, that Tacitus speaks of the nation as 'given over to superstition, disinclined to religion' (Hausrath, i. 173-86). These facts are but illustrations of the wider principle, that when a nation with intense national sentiments encounters a nation with strong imperial sentiment, trouble of the most violent kind always ensues. For confirmation of this, one has only to remember the history of Switzerland, of Ireland, or of the Transvaal. In Israel the struggle was only the more acute and inevitable, because the Romanizing policy of the Herods had lent to it the additional aspect of a civil war. Nothing could be imagined more explosive than this state of affairs—a fact which was very clear to the enemies of Jesus (Jn 11⁴⁸).

That Jesus also saw this clearly there can be no question; and this, among other things, must have been in His mind when He spoke of Himself as sending a sword (Mt 10³⁴), and scattering fire on the earth (Lk 12⁴⁹). Towards the Roman power He, in contrast with such revolutionaries as Judas of Galilee, maintained a strictly neutral attitude. It is probable that no words ever uttered showed such consummate diplomatic skill as those in which He answered the question about the tribute money (Mt 22¹⁷ etc.). His prophecies (24² etc.) show how patent to Him was the coming explosion of the forces then at play. His policy was to set the word of the Kingdom so fully at the explosive centre, that when the crash came it would send Christianity across the whole world.

For that diffusion everything was ready. Great roads had long been open by land and sea for trade and commerce. Even then the Romans were laying down those indestructible causeways by which they united land with land. The Sadducees, who in some respects read skillfully the signs of their times, did all they could to encourage trade in Syria, and to break down the Pharisaic restrictions which hampered it; and in this Jesus was their powerful ally. From the heights of Nazareth He had seen the march of the legions on the Roman road across Esdraelon from Acre to the Jordan, and watched the long lines of laden camels moving slowly from the coast to Damascus and back, along the road that lies like a flung ribbon along the hillsides to the north. When in after years St. Paul utilized the Roman roads for the spread of the gospel, he was but carrying out the work which Jesus initiated when He placed that gospel within the charged mine of Palestine.

In the light of one further consideration we see the extraordinary Providence which watched over the situation then. It is a commonplace of history, that civilization and all higher developments of human life spring forward at a bound at the meeting-point of national currents. 'The great civilizations have always arisen in the meeting-places of ideas' (Martin Conway, The Dawn of Art, 76). The Norman Conquest offers one of the most conspicuous illustrations, but it is only one of many. The supremely influential meeting of national forces has always been that between the East and the West. 'The contact between East and West has always been the prolific source of the advancement of humanity' (op. cit. 59, 60). It was from this contact, induced by the Pilgrimages and the Crusades, that the Renaissance arose. But Christianity itself had arisen at that earlier point of contact, when the Eastern factor was the Hebrew religion, and the Western was Greece and Rome. At the focus of the world Jesus set the light of the world.

2. The relations of Jesus with Gentiles.—Not only was Palestine in close proximity with Gentile neighbours in the time of Jesus; the land itself was overrun with Gentiles, and no account of the meaning of Palestine for Jesus can ignore that fact.

His home in Galilee must have given from the first a very different outlook on the Gentile world from any that would have been possible in Judaea. Far from the centre of Jewish exclusiveness, crossed by great high roads from the sea to the east, and actually inhabited by multitudes of Gentiles from various lands, Galilee was the most open-minded and tolerant part of the land. Commercial and other interests made the Galileans acquainted with foreigners, and established much friendly human intercourse. Thus at the outset it must be borne in mind that Jesus was from His childhood accustomed to a more or less cosmopolitan world, and to the ideas current in such a society. The temptation of 'the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them' (Mt 4⁸), indicates no new discovery of worldly grandeur, but a knowledge which had been gathering during the experience of thirty years.

One fact of great significance in the life of Palestine was that it had to be lived in constant view of the desert tribes to the east of it. Kinglake has described the Jordan as the boundary-line between roofs and tents; and besides the tents of nomad tribes there were also those cities of Edom and the Hauran, where, in a rude kind of civilization, Arab kings ruled their kingdoms. The terror of the desert Bedawin and the barbaric splendours of these kingdoms both contributed a romantic element, which was enforced by the eternal mystery of the desert, in which all things are seen in a strong light which magnifies their significance and fascinates the imagination. Most of Jesus' parables of kings and their wars (Mt 18²³ etc.), and certainly His picture of a strong man armed guarding his house against a stronger (Lk 14³¹ 11²¹⁻²² etc.), tell of just such a condition of unsettled government and expectation of surprise as existed on the borderline between Arabian and Israelite territory.

In this border region stood the cities of the Decapolis, in which a wealthy and strongly defended Greek life held its own, by force of Roman garrisons, against the desert and the south. The marvellous ruins of Jerash, the two theatres and ornate tombs of Gadara, and the debris of carved stones above the dam which retained water for the naumachiai at Abila, tell an almost incredible tale of luxurious and ostentatious grandeur. The blend of civilization and savagery which such places produce is a phenomenon of the most startling kind. The fact that Jesus visited the Decapolis (Mk 7³¹; cf. Mt 4²⁶ and Mk 5²⁰), bearing His high and pure spirituality into that region of the Syrian world, suggests some of the strongest and most dramatic situations which it would be possible to conceive. In this light we see the extraordinary realism of the story of the Gadarenes and their swine and their devils (Mt 8²⁸ etc.). It was inevitable that they should have besought Him to depart out of their coasts. And the reaction on His own thought was equally inevitable. He saw the ideals for which He lived and was to die, not as spiritual visions remote from the actual world, or as an advance on its honest endeavours after holiness, but against the background of a life whose gilded swinishness threw it up in all the high relief of the holiness of heaven against earth at its most sordid. And yet it was to this region that He often retired for refuge from the Galileans of the western shore, and through this region that He chose to travel on His last journey to the Cross. The relief He sought in it was not wholly that of solitude. Even these degenerate races called for His sympathy; and being unprejudiced by religion, they at least let Him be alone.

The sea-coast comes little into the story of the Gospels. Afterwards, in the lives of Peter and Paul, Joppa and Caesarea were to assume an important place. But, so far as we know, Jesus visited it only once, when He retreated to the coasts of Tyre and Sidon from the Pharisees who had followed Him from Jerusalem. The few references which He made to the sea appear to be all subsequent to that visit. They are in every case characteristic of the inland Israelite's thought of the sea as a place of horror rather than of beauty (Mt 18^b; cf. art. POET below, p. 375^b). It was natural that the part of the sea-coast to which He went for concealment should have been that of Tyre and Sidon. We are not, indeed, told that He visited those towns, and the word 'coasts' may even refer to the landward district near them. Yet, obviously, no place could offer Him better hiding than a manufacturing seaport town, where He would be easily lost in the crowds of workmen which came and went about the dye-works and the glass-works and the shipbuilding yards, or in the many-coloured throngs of native and foreign sailors on the quays. It is characteristic of Jesus that the record of that visit ignores the whole splendour of the wealthy life of Phenicia; its temples with their sun-pillars, its markets, and its ships might have been non-existent for all the notice given to them. The one fact that has been found worthy of commemoration is that story where, in inimitable sprightliness and vivacity, we see for a moment the foreign mother, and hear her tale of human sorrow assuaged.

Samaria (wh. see) divided Galilee from Judæa by the alien race that is supposed to have originated in a cross between Mesopotamians and Israelites after the first captivity. During the centuries that had intervened there had been time for this nation to settle into a fixed and distinct type of its own, but the race still bore all the marks of its bastard origin. Luxurious and soft morally, with the fertility of the land encouraging the effeminaey, they seem to have relaxed their standards of purity in all directions, and the life of the woman of Sychar (Jn 4¹⁹) was probably typical of current views of sexual relations. The palace life of Herod at the central city of Samaria, and his intercourse with Rome at Caesarea, upon which he had spent fabulous sums, must have intensified the Bohemian and foreign elements in the national character. The tragedies of the palace, the wild story of the murder of Mariamne and what happened after it, and the subsequent strangling of her two sons in that same palace, were matters within the memory of living men. These, and the whole effect of Herod upon the place, must have been all on the side of those primitive and half-savage elements which entered largely into the Samaritan character. In religion the Samaritans had adopted a kind of blend of heathen and Israelitish worship, in which the centre of enthusiasm was a rival group of holy places set over against those of Jerusalem, and a passion for relic-hunting which, in Christ's time, took the form of a search for hidden treasure in Gerizim. This, too, reveals the primitive, in its frank blending of the greed of gold with worship, and it took so deep a hold as to draw the vengeance of Pilate upon a Samaritan religious assembly (Keim, ii. 334). The claims of Samaritan religion, and its compromise with relaxed morality, are reflected in the conversation of the woman at the well (Jn 4^{16a}).

The Jews of the time were always ready for vigorous hatreds, and in their relations with the Samaritans they showed that extreme rancour which religious bigots keep, not for opposition, but for compromise. The attitude of Jesus to Samaritans is one of the most illuminative of all the sidelights thrown upon His mind and character by the Gospels. On more than one occasion He took the unpopular direct route through Samaria while journeying between Jerusalem and Galilee (Jn 4⁴). In religion, when it comes to be a question of localities, He holds by Jerusalem, and refuses to admit that any other shrine can rival its claims (4²²). Yet the error calls for no anger in Him, inasmuch as His thought of worship transcends all place-limitations, and is as wide as the human spirit and truth (4²³). He allows for the unthinking brutality of inhospitable villages, and sharply rebukes disciples who would meet it in a like spirit (Lk 9⁵⁴). There is a most pleasant sense of tolerant and kindly interest in the alien Samaritans and their ways of thinking, which, while it asserts the higher morality (Jn 4¹⁷) and the higher worship, is yet ever friendly and gentle. He even goes out of His way to show how much nobler as a man a Samaritan may be than those Jews who professed superior nobility of faith. The parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10³³), and Jesus' words about the grateful leper (17^{17a}), are direct protests in the name of fairness against the common judgment and attitude of His countrymen.

A few words on the attitude which Jesus assumed to Rome and the Romans are necessary to complete the view of Palestine as He knew it. Rome thrust itself then upon the inhabitants of Palestine in two forms. In such governors as Pilate it was seen directly, as the hostile imperial power governing the province of Syria. From Antioch its roads and armies had subdued the land, yet had never broken the spirit of its people, or quenched their fierce hopes of reprisals and of deliverance. At every centre its tax-gatherers had their stations. Its Prætorium in Jerusalem was occupied by the palace of the hated Pilate, whose cruelties were held in check only by his fear of the still more cruel emperor, and whose desire to quell revolutions was hindered by the fear of complaints on the score of his financial crimes. On the other hand, there were the Herods, Idumæan princes whose policy was that of Romanization. With them, to a great extent, were the Sadducees, and under them the outward face of the country had rapidly assumed the appearance of a Western land. Architecture, commerce, amusements, and worship all showed the work of Rome through the Herodian house. There was a Roman theatre in Jerusalem, with lavishly appointed games; and a Roman eagle was set up on the Temple gates. Fortresses had risen along all the frontiers and in every part of the land, and it was Herod the Great who had cleared out the robbers from the Valley of Doves in Galilee, and so had opened Gennesaret and created Capernaum, thus unconsciously building the platform for a great part of the ministry of Jesus. At Jericho the palace-life was unrestrained in its luxury and licentiousness; in Jerusalem, Herod's palace overlooked the city from the Jaffa gate. Tiberias rose by the shore of the Galilean sea; but as it was built on an old graveyard it was avoided by religious Israelites, and Jesus never visited it, so far as our records tell. But all round the lake, villas had been built, and the shores of Galilee seem to have been a fashionable watering-place for Romans, a development which every Herod must have found to his own heart. The disciples, who were Galilean fishermen, must have found a market for their fish in many a Roman household.

The attitude of Jesus towards Rome is very clearly depicted in the Gospels. From first to last every point at which His life touches any of the Herods shows hostility of relations (Mk 8¹⁵, Lk 13³¹⁻³² 23⁹, etc.). He appears studiously to have avoided Tiberias, Cæsarea, and the city of Samaria. Herodism and its effects He accepted without further protest as the actual state of the world in which He had to live; but for that Herod with whom He had most to do He showed open contempt. To the popular mind, Herod was the murderer of John, who would also kill Jesus unless He sought escape (Lk 13³¹). To Jesus he was but 'that fox,' by no means of sufficient importance to make Him change His plans (13³²). He manifested no admiration for the great stones and buildings of Herod the Great in the Temple which he had erected (Mk 13¹⁻²). This scorn of Jesus reached its climax in His silence under Herod's examination at Jerusalem, and the contemptible revenge of the purple robe and crown of thorns (Lk 23⁹).

Towards the actual Roman Empire Jesus assumed another attitude. Galilee in Jesus' time was full of revolution. Along with its tolerant cosmopolitanism there always were elements of the most violent fanaticism there,—a combination by no means unusual in the history of nations. Judas of Galilee was the popular patriot and hero, and the sons of Judas, who grew up as boys near Jesus, were to perish on crosses after Him, for vain attempts against the Roman sway. Thoughts of such revolution may have been involved in the third temptation; but if so, they were immediately rejected. Pilate's eager question, 'Art thou a king?' (Jn 18³⁷), met with no response which could be used against Jesus as a serious charge. His payment of tribute, and the words He spoke about it on various occasions, show no sense of resented injury (Mt 22²¹). His absence of bitterness towards the tax-gatherers, and His calling of one of them to be a disciple, were among the bitterest sources of the hatred borne to Him by the Pharisees (Mt 9⁹⁻¹¹). He saw the publicans as human beings, and not as renegades and traitors. The absence of prejudice which enabled Him to adopt this attitude has been explained on the ground that He took 'no interest whatever in the burning questions of the times' (Hausrath, ii. 210). It would be more accurate to say that, so far as the political conditions were concerned, He accepted the facts and their inevitable consequences. He saw the coming destruction of Jerusalem with deep emotion (Mt 23³⁷), and He spoke of it as about to be trodden down by the Gentiles (Lk 21²⁴), but He put forth no effort politically to change the course of events. The words in which He spoke of Pilate's slaughter of the Galilæans, who were no doubt a band of revolutionary patriots, are certainly very remarkable. Not only did He refrain from any comment on the tragedy, or any tribute to their daring or their sacrifice; all He had to say of them was that they were not sinners above other Galilæans (Lk 13⁴).

By gathering these and other considerations together, we may gain a fairly accurate idea of the feeling of Jesus towards the Gentiles, who played so important a part in the Syrian world of His time. Around Him there was the Herodian attitude of Romanizing, and the Pharisaic and patriotic attitude which delighted in branding Gentiles with such names as 'dogs' and 'swine'; while between these two a considerable mass of the general opinion of the time regarded them neither with emulation nor with hatred, but simply accepted them as facts—'uncomfortable, unaccountable works of God,' as the Hindus are said to regard the English (Asia and Europe). To none of them all had it ever occurred to say, 'Suppose I were a Gentile?' and to try to look upon the world earnestly from the Gentile point of view—a quite

Was this the attitude adopted by Jesus? Whatever answer we give to that question, it is quite clear that His attitude was a different one from any of the three above indicated. Unlike the Herodians, He showed no interest in Gentile architecture or commerce, literature or art. He accepted their institutions in so far as these formed part of the ordinary life of the land, but He passed no judgment either of approval or of disapproval on them. He almost exclusively, and evidently with deliberation, confined His ministry, and that of His disciples during His lifetime, to Israel. While not going out of His way to avoid Gentiles, He did not cultivate them. On almost every occasion they came to Him, not He to them. On the other hand, He expressly forbade His disciples to go into 'the way of the Gentiles,' i.e. to utilize for the spread of the gospel, as St. Paul afterwards did, those great roads in which the ends of the earth met. He even forbade them to enter any village of the Samaritans (Mt 10⁵). In His initial words to the Syrophenician woman He contrasts the children of the Promise with the Gentile dogs (Mt 15²⁶), though probably there was that in His manner which encouraged her to her clever repartee. To the woman of Samaria He pointedly asserted that 'salvation is of the Jews' (Jn 4²²). He saw the failings of the Gentiles, and spoke of them as a warning to Christians. His disciples were to avoid their vain repetitions in prayer (Mt 6⁷), their greedy search and labour for food and clothes (Mt 6³²), their servility with princes, and their desire of honour (Mt 20²⁵). There is little doubt that His words (regarding John) about those who are clothed in soft raiment and who live in kings' houses, were meant to be understood in scorn of Herod (Mt 11⁸).

On the other hand, it is equally clear that He refused to countenance the virulent spirit of antagonism, either religious or patriotic. Nothing met with more frequent or more unsparing condemnation than the sanctimonious exclusiveness of the Pharisees, who made a religion of avoiding their fellow-men. Nor did He intermeddle with the revolutionary politics or methods of His day. On the contrary, He paid tribute; and when the servants of the high priest came to seize Him, He strongly condemned the use of weapons even in defence, and with a quiet request permitted Himself to be bound. The general impression which the narratives give is certainly one of kindly feeling for Gentiles. His interest and appreciation were always frank and open. He shielded His Roman judge from 'the greater sin' in His condemnation (Jn 19¹¹), and pleaded the ignorance of His actual murderers in His dying prayer (Lk 23³⁴). He evidently liked to point out cases of Gentile superiority to Jews. At the outset of His ministry He offended the Nazarenes by His words about Naaman and the widow of Sarepta (Lk 4²⁶⁻²⁷); and on a later occasion He made the men of Nineveh and the queen of Sheba a foil to the unbelief of His generation (Mt 12⁴¹⁻⁴²). The phrase which He used on several occasions of Gentile believers has become proverbial, 'I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel' (8¹⁰ etc.). The impression which such conduct must have produced was certainly one of strong Gentile sympathies, and Matthew aptly quotes regarding Him the words of Isaiah, 'in his name shall the Gentiles trust' (12²¹).

From this it is already evident that Jesus cannot be placed in the third class, with those who merely accepted the Gentiles as facts in the situation. Politically, that was His attitude towards them, but as individuals He often delighted in them. He appreciated their broader outlook and want of Pharisaic narrowness. He was frankly relieved by their unconventionality and naturalness, which gave Him air to breathe after the stifling atmosphere of Rabbinitism. To Him, in general, they stood for human nature, plain and unsophisticated.

When we inquire into the reasons for that Jewish exclusiveness against which Jesus thus protested, we come upon a fact of far-reaching significance. The Pharisees had much to justify their narrow views and practices in the fear of heathenism. The dearly won victory of the prophets over idolatry seemed to be in danger of being undone by the Græco-Roman invasion of a new heathenism. The old struggle renewed itself, and in Jesus' time the religious men of Israel were keeping back the encroaching worship of idols with both hands. In Samson's country the new Philistines (for so the followers of Epiphanees seemed to the faithful) had built an altar to Zeus (Haustrath, i. 29). Herod was known to have taken part in the completion of Jupiter's temple at Athens (ib. ii. 4). Much of the modern style, with its pictured art, must have savoured of idolatry to men who still took the Second Commandment literally, and the religious men of Israel were filled with the gravest apprehensions as they watched the advancing tide. In the whole speech of Jesus there is no attack upon heathenism to be found, nor any sense of serious danger from it. At Cæsarea Philippi He had seen the temple raised by Herod to Augustus, and the rock-cut niches dedicated to Pan and the nymphs where Jordan issued from its cave, yet no word of His is recorded in protest. True, He might upon occasion use such a current expression as 'Let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican' (Mt 18:17), but His own attitude to publicans would be sufficient commentary upon that for His enemies. Evidently He was not in the slightest degree afraid of heathenism as a real danger, and He set Himself systematically against those maxims and practices as to clean and unclean things in which the Pharisaic spirit saw one of its best safeguards.

The explanation must be found in His further doctrine of the Kingdom of God, and the methods of its coming. There are two ways of opposing heathenism. The Pharisaic way was the negative one of denouncing it and withstanding its encroachment. Jesus chose the positive method of supplanting it by the Kingdom of heaven. That strong leaven He cast into the lump of humanity, well knowing that it must work eventually far beyond the Jewish regions. This is the ultimate point in His relations with the Gentile world. When He spoke to Pilate of His Kingdom, the Roman was relieved to hear that it was 'not of this world,' and at once set Him down as a dreamer. But Jesus was no dreamer. He was deliberately setting an actual Kingdom over against the existing empire, and history was soon to show that this was in the region of the practical and effective forces of the world. The consequences of this leaven of the Kingdom could not possibly be confined to the sphere of religion. They must eventually take political shape, and indeed affect every department of human life and interest, and spread throughout every nation of the world.

All this was in the mind of Jesus. The Book of Jonah was a favourite with Him, and it is the OT manifesto of the imperial and world-wide power of faith. His parable of the judgment of the nations (Mt 25:32), and His prophecies of the coming of the East and West and North and South to the Kingdom of God (8:11), showed plainly His ultimate designs upon the Gentile world. He spoke of other sheep beyond those of the Israelite fold (Jn 10:16), and finally commanded His messengers to go out into all the world and teach all nations (Mt 28:19). When He spoke of Himself as the Light of the world (Jn 8:12), and of His life as given for the world (6:51), it was the world that He was speaking of, and His hearers understood that it was so (cf. also Mt 16:21 13:38 55. 13. 14).

At times there may have crossed His mind a thought of making the wider appeal in person before His death. The most striking instance is that of the coming of the Greeks shortly before the end (Jn 12:20). It may be, as has been held by high authorities, that He saw in that event the invitation to address to the Greek world the message which the Hebrew world was rejecting. He refused it, proclaiming, in the wonderful saying about the corn of wheat (12:24), His knowledge that it was through death that life must come. Yet He rejoiced in it with a sudden glory (12:23), and recognized in it the fulfilment of His life's far-reaching purpose. He rejected it only that He might attain it. His own light, like that of His disciples, must be set upon a candlestick if it was to give light to all that were in the house; and He reached the Gentiles most effectually by concentrating His ministry upon Israel.

3. The open field.—In order to estimate the influence of Nature upon the mind of Jesus, it is necessary, first, to distinguish between the various ways in which Nature has been conceived in relation to humanity. At the two extremes stand materialistic realism and the purely spiritual and idealistic views. The former sees in nature mere masses of living or dead matter, arranged in various shapes, quantities, and combinations, and moved by forces variously conceived. The latter sees in it the visual and sensuous revelation of the Divine life. It is 'the garment of God,' whose fine drapery at once hides and reveals the Spirit of the universe.

Between these extremes there are three main points of view. Art, searching for beauty, has discovered landscape, in which the detailed objects are grouped into larger unities invested with a larger and more composite character of their own. The experience of individuals and the history of nations have added to the facts of landscape or of single objects certain associations which give them their human interest. Thought, emotion, and imagination have discovered (some would say invented) a mysterious spirituality in Nature, variously described or confessed to be indescribable, but perceived or felt as in some way a haunting presence, a 'something more' than meets the eye or ear.

Often we find more than one of these ways of regarding Nature combined in the mind of a single thinker. St. Paul, e.g., seems to have had singularly little feeling for Nature in the modern sense. There is no landscape and hardly any reference to detail in his writings, though his travels had showed him much of the finest scenery of the Mediterranean and of Asia Minor. For him the open field apparently represented nothing but a set of distances to be traversed before reaching cities. Yet at times the mystery comes upon him, and he invests Nature with a dim life of her own, groaning and travelling in pain towards some grand event (Ro 8:22). Dante, amid much of the grandest scenery of Europe, sees only obstacles to the foot of the traveller. But for him every place has historical associations, in whose light it lives in his mind. Gray is the poet who discovered English landscape. Wordsworth reaches the highest point in spiritualizing nature:

'Great God! I'd rather be
A Pagan, suckled in a creed outworn,
So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;
Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea;
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathèd horn.'

WORDSWORTH, Miscellaneous Sonnets.

The age of Jesus was divided between the Greek and the Hebrew view of Nature, and both of these must have been familiar in Syria. The Greek view was devoid of landscape properly so called. It saw brilliant and well-defined masses of detail—the temple white on its hill, reeds in the river-bed, the numberless laughter of waves. Greece not only saw but felt these, as charged with a spiritual significance which could be apprehended only in fragmentary hints and glimpses, with more wistfulness than understanding. She sought to capture and retain that spiritual significance in the exquisite imagery of her mythological creations of nymph and faun, the dryad of the forest and the goddess of the fountain. Yet these delicate incarnations did not suffice for her expression of Nature. Behind them lay those unaccountable moods of delight and misgiving which Nature awoke in her soul. The unsolved mystery of 'the beauty and the terror of the world' emphasized in the main the misgiving, and produced 'the melancholy of the Greeks.' Death and change oppressed her spirit, and seemed to be ever the last word that Nature strove to say. The voice heard by the steersman had been heard by Greece before—'Great Pan is dead.'

How much of this may have directly presented itself to Jesus, we cannot tell. His answer, however, to the Greeks who came to Him in Passion Week, seems to be an answer to the spirit of their nation (Jn 12²⁴). It is to Nature that He leads them in His reference to the corn of wheat, and to the element of death in Nature. But He reveals in Nature what they had not strength to find, the promise of resurrection, and the assurance of life enriched and fructified by death.

The Hebrew view of Nature differs from the Greek somewhat as Browning's differs from Wordsworth's. To the Greek, Nature has a spirituality which is no doubt reflected, in part, from the soul of her observer, yet is conceived as residing in herself in one or other of many fashions of personification. To the Hebrew, Nature in herself is dead, and has no soul of her own. She is the tool of Jehovah or His weapon, according as He is working or warring against His enemies; or she is visible as a background over against human life, or at least as accessory to man and his needs or works in some way. In either case the point is that Nature for the Hebrew has no independent life or spirituality of her own. She shines ever in the borrowed light of human or Divine interest.

The Hebrew view of Nature, in its three main aspects, has been admirably described in the three expressions—(1) A stage for God, the 'place of His feet'; (2) a home for man; (3) the assessor at the controversy between God and man (Is 1², Mic 3²), a view in which the solemnity and austerity of Nature found a fitting metaphor to express them. Of each of these three aspects many instances might be quoted; but at present it concerns us only to remark that in none of them is Nature seen in herself, but always dependent on an inhabitant, Divine or human, who gives her soul. The third view, indeed, seems to conceive of Nature as independent, her mountains judging between God and man. But the personification does not go deep, nor is the consciousness of its figurativeness lost. The mountains, the heavens and the earth, are witnesses in much the same sense as a pillar set up by one who has made a vow. They are called upon to listen, to rejoice, to break forth into singing, not because they are conceived as living an independent life, but because the human or Divine event is conceived as of such vast import that even dumb Nature must feel its thrill, and for once awake from her inertness to do homage to the higher forms of being.

There is, properly speaking, no landscape in the Bible. Objects are seen in detail, or groups of objects, in connexion with the events or circumstances narrated. Through a cleft fissure in a mountain range a glimpse is caught of a 'land that is very far off'; but it is as a destination rather than as a picture that it is seen. The language spends its strength on those sharp and clear-cut names for natural phenomena which express so much—Jordan, the down-rusher; Ghôr, the scooped-out; Gilgal, the circular, and so on. The Song of Solomon is full of exquisite detail, with the aromatic scents of the East lingering about its voluptuous gardens and glades. But that is pre-Raphaelite art, of the same sort as those descriptions which are so common in the OT of a single tree or plant, a vine, an olive, or a gourd. It is characteristic of the Hebrew view of Nature that the Feast of Tabernacles, with its booths and illuminations, seemed to the Hebrew mind satisfactory as a piece of genuine rural life.

The life of Jesus was much spent in the open air, and His thought was full of the breezy freshness of the hills and fields; but they were Syrian and not European hills and fields, and their effect is that of Eastern nature, not Western. Samaria and Lebanon strike the traveller from England as most familiar. But there is no word of Lebanon in the Gospels, and Samaria was seen but casually in passing through. It was in one of Samaria's richest and broadest valleys that He told His disciples to lift up their eyes and look upon the fields white already to the harvest (Jn 4²⁵). The regions with which He was most familiar were the hills and Sea of Galilee, and the rocky heights of Judæa. These are the very regions where the scenery is most typically Oriental. The main difference between a Syrian and an English landscape is that in Syria there is none of that 'atmosphere' which softens outlines and tones down a wide stretch of country into a unity of vision. The colouring is faint, in delicate shades of grey and brown and lilac, broken by the most violently brilliant splashes of high colour, where a water-spring flings a patch of lush green vegetation upon the pale mountain side, or where in springtime a long thin flame of oleander blazes along the winding depth of a washed-out river-bed. The general impression of wide views either in Judæa or Galilee is that of a land sculptured out of tinted stones. In Judæa the hills are bare grey limestone, whose stoniness is intensified rather than softened by sparse and dingy olives. Along the sides of many valleys the strata run in many-coloured parallel bands, giving the effect of a gigantic but faded mural decoration; while the plateau on the heights round Jerusalem and on to the north lies bare in whitish grey. Galilee has more woodland, and some thin remains of what may once have been forests, but it also owes its general effect to rock rather than to vegetation. Allowing for the denudation caused by so many centuries of war and neglect, it is likely that even at its best the prevalent note of the land was that of sharp outline in faint colour, and its general impression that of huge-scale sculpture-work. Arriving from the West upon the edge of the hillside above Tiberias, the traveller catches his first sight of the Sea of Galilee. The writer may be permitted to quote a former description of his impression:

'This is not scenery; it is tinted sculpture, it is jewel-work on a gigantic scale. The rosy flush of sunset was on it when we caught the first glimpse. At our feet lay a great flesh-coloured cup full of blue liquor; or rather the whole seemed some lapidary's quaint fancy in pink marble and blue-stone. There was no translucency, but an aggressive opaqueness, in sea and shore alike. The dry atmosphere showed everything in sharpest outline, clear-cut and broken-edged. There was no shading or variety of colour, but a strong and unsoftened contrast. To be quite accurate, there was one break—a splash of white, with the green suggestion of trees and grass, lying on the water's edge directly beneath us—Tiberias.'

Of course, the colour changes with the seasons, and we know that Jesus sat upon green grass upon the slopes at the north end of the Lake. Wild flowers of all shades cover the land with richest colours in their season. By the shore, close to Capernaum, lies the wonderful garden of Genesaret, a reserve of shelter and of fountains filling a level fold of the hills, some three miles by one and a half in area, with exuberant fertility.

Such were the fields where the feet of Jesus trod. His speech of Nature has no landscape in it, but much clear vision of detail. There is singularly little mention of colour. He speaks of white sepulchres and a red sky (Mt 16²). He refers to the purple in which the rich man is clad (Lk 16¹⁹); and those lilies of the field of which He said that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of them (Mt 6²⁸ etc.), were purple irises. In the East every shadow turns to this colour, and it may perhaps have been a favourite of His. If so, the robe with which Herod's soldiers mocked Him gains a new and pathetic irony. His references to flowers (cf. art. POET) are pre-Raphaelite in their detail and delicacy. No Greek nymph was ever conceived more daintily than Christ's lily. He often refers to single trees, such as the fig-tree, but especially to the vine, from which He draws symbolic lessons in great detail (Jn 15¹). Thus He is true to that characteristic of Palestine which has given to it the true and happy epithet of 'the land of the single tree.'

But it was as a stage for human activities that Jesus chiefly viewed the earth. His delights and His interests were with the sons of men. Sometimes the exigencies of His own life force thoughts of Nature upon Him, as when the stones of the wilderness suggest loaves of bread (Mt 4³), or the holes of foxes and the nests of birds are contrasted with His own homelessness (8²⁰). He speaks much of those trees which grow fruit for the use of man, and acquiesces in their doom when they are barren. Yet there is a note of compassion in the parable of the Barren Fig-tree (Lk 13⁸) which reminds us of Jonah's 'pity' for his withered gourd (Jon 4¹⁰), and there is a sudden and striking description of a tree bursting into the full glory of its leafage. These, however, are exceptions. Man is almost always doing something to Nature as Jesus sees it,—ploughing, sowing, reaping; fishing, tending sheep, protecting them against wolves. Hot journeying and refreshing cups of cold water, wayside incidents of all kinds, abound in His parables. He sees the operations of the husbandman and fisher in minute detail, touches of nature everywhere telling of the keen eyes that let nothing escape their observation. Gennesaret (Mk 6⁵³, Mt 14³⁴) itself may have furnished Him with many of those vivid pictures of agricultural life and its occupations in which His parables abound.* He notes the robbers lurking by the highways (Lk 10³⁰), and the places where He stands are sometimes crowded with sick folk laid there of an evening for His healing (Mk 1³²). His world is always 'a field full of folk.'

The open-air character of His ministry lends a sense of freedom and of roominess to much of His thought. There is a feel of wandering in it, and a clean scent of cornfields and flowery meadows. There are references to the weather (Mt 16²), and He overhears His disciples remarking that in four months it will be harvest time (Jn 4³⁵). In such phrases as 'the birds of the air' (Mt 8²⁰) and 'the lilies of the field' (6²⁸), there is the delight in sky-space and field-breadth. Nothing could better express the leisurely and detached mood of the wanderer, in sympathy with wide open spaces, than such words as 'sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof' (6³⁴). While His days were spent in crowded thoroughfares of men, He felt the need of retreat and the refreshment of solitary places (14¹³). When no wider space was available, He frequented the Garden of Gethsemane. But that was at a time when the world had closed in upon His life, shutting Him in with men and human tragedy. There, in full view of the lights of Jerusalem, and with its murmur in His ear, He still found among olive trees a certain solitude. Earlier, there must have been many quiet days of retreat among the mountains or across the lake, when He felt the soothing and healing effect of Nature in all its power.

Yet the message of the open field was not for Himself alone. In contrast with modern views of Nature, the freedom and the beauty of the world filled Him with the most childlike and delightful thoughts. There was no shadow of separation between the Creator and His works, no sense of cruelty or savagery, no philosophizing consciousness of the tormenting questions of scientific doubt. In all simplicity, with the eyes of a child, He saw in Nature the handiwork of the Father. The heaven is God's throne, and the earth His footstool (5³⁴ etc.). Across the whole field of the world the Father's care is lavished, on birds (10²⁹) and beasts and the children of men. As to the mysteries of Providence, Jesus refused to admit the popular view of God's interference in such accidents as the fall of a tower in Siloam (Lk 13⁴). On the contrary, though without pursuing the subject to further consequences, He reminds us that the Father makes His sun to rise upon the evil and the good, and sends rain upon the just and the unjust (Mt 5⁴⁵).

There is a mysterious fact of sympathetic response between Nature and Humanity which has been variously explained, and yet never satisfactorily understood. It would seem as if Nature and Humanity had some mysterious understanding with one another, some subtle and occult system of signalling to one another across the gulf which separates the living world from the dead. In all the ancient religions of Asia this was a familiar idea. Baal-worship, in all its varieties, spread it across the Semitic world. The OT is full of references to spiritual presence associated especially with certain places or natural objects, or spiritual agency passing over from the deeds of man to the locality associated with them. The ground is cursed for man's sake in the story of Eden (Gn 3⁷); the place on which Moses stands is holy ground (Ex 3⁵). A 'hill of Jehovah' may often have been so called in rhetorical religious speech when all that was intended was emphasis on height or greatness; yet there can be no doubt that the words originally were meant of literal and peculiar possession. The whole ritual concerning clean and unclean animals is an instance of the same habit.

It would be enough, to prove that Jesus felt and utilized this strange and intimate connexion between Nature and the supernatural, to point to the miracles which He openly performed and professed. The Jews have a name for Him which is very significant in this connexion. By many of them He has been called 'The Good Magician.' This interesting fact throws light on the taunt of His enemies that He was a Samaritan, and had a devil (Jn 8⁴⁸). Samaria was famous for its magicians, who were for the most part addicted to sorcery and necromancy. Such mistaken interfusion of the material and spiritual world was regarded by His enemies as of the same kind as that which they saw and heard in Him. His prophecies of future judgment (Mt 25³¹ etc.) mingle the material facts of the world with spiritual forces and thoughts in very much the same fashion as they are blended in those flame-pictures which so interested Him in the Book of Daniel. His miracles involved the blending of the two spheres in every instance. On the other hand, He cut through the doctrines of 'clean and unclean' with a ruthlessness which stirred up the animosity of His enemies (Mt 15¹¹ etc.). Regarding the food provisions of the Jewish law, He said nothing, though it is unmistakably His spirit that we recognize in the vision of Peter a few years after His death (Ac 10⁹⁻¹⁶). But as for the curse of uncleanness which the Pharisees saw everywhere falling like a shadow over the whole life of man, He would have none of it, and (proclaiming eloquently His belief in the fresh wholesomeness of Nature) declared all things clean (Lk 11⁴¹).

Galilee was very superstitious, though in a more naive and less repulsive form than the necromancy of Samaria. On two occasions we hear of the disciples mistaking Jesus for a spirit (Mt 14²⁶, Lk 24³⁷),—in the former, apparently for the angry spirit of the Lake. On both these occasions Jesus reassures them, but says nothing to dispel or ridicule their views. On the other hand, there can be no doubt that He accepted the universal belief in demons, who haunted not men only, but places as well (Mt 12⁴³ ['dry places'], cf. Mt 8²⁸, Mk 5⁵).

Thus for Jesus Nature was indeed 'haunted.' The worlds of spirit and matter were, in His thought, full of interchange. Yet it is very remarkable how entirely He differs from the spirit of contemporary magic, as we know its development in the Rabbinical doctrines of the time, and in the later Asiatic and Egyptian schools. There is at once a reserve and a freshness about the narratives of the miracles of Jesus. They are not the dark ultimate result of fearsome dealing with the occult. They are the inevitable effect of the Divine love set free on the earth and in full play upon the facts of Nature—that same love which in less startling fashion He has already recognized in sunrise and rainfall (Mt 5⁴⁵). Consequently in Him the unwholesomeness of magic and spiritualism is entirely absent. He calls the dead as simply, and they obey as naturally, as we call the living and they come. He heals the sick just as a mother might caress her child.

One more note must suffice for this brief account of His connexion with Nature as Palestine showed it to Him. We have already referred in passing to some of His parables. It is very noteworthy that in so many of them He saw and used the symbolism of Nature. It would seem as if for Him every process of the field, the life of trees, the springs of 'living water,' the softness of sand and the stability of rocks, the saltiness of salt, the shining and the quenching of lights, were constantly suggesting symbols of that spiritual life of which He was at once the creator and the exponent. The earth was interesting to Him in its own right, but it was doubly interesting on account of its analogy with the Kingdom of heaven. Seeds of the earth, birds of the air, wind and flowing water and burning fire, were all unceasingly rehearsing under His eyes the operations of the Kingdom.

Nor did the analysis stop there. When the busy and thoughtful work of man had touched the natural world, new symbols sprang forth for His use on every hand. We shall understand better such a saying as 'I am the way,' when we remember how through His childhood He had watched the life of the great world passing along a Roman road and a caravan route in the north. We are reminded of more than one of His sayings (Jn 15¹ etc.) when we find that in vine-growing parts of Syria to-day the vine-plants are dug round and exposed to the depth of more than a foot, and all rootlets are cut off from the main root to that depth. If this were not done, the sun would scorch the roots near the surface, or the passing plough would bleed them. It is the deep roots only that are safe. At Hebron, a few years ago, a traveller noticing the fact that the sheepfolds were circles of stone wall broken by a gap in which there was never any door, asked a shepherd for the reason, and was answered, 'I am the door.' The shepherd lies down in the open space, and no wolf can enter nor can any sheep stray except across his body. That was a symbol worthy of the use of Jesus!

4. Towns and Villages.—For the understanding of anything connected with the life and history of a Semitic nation, nothing is of such importance as to study the growth and character of towns, and the changes which they produce upon those who exchange a nomad for a settled existence. To realize the times of Jesus, and still more those of the OT, we have to disabuse our minds of all that the modern world means by a city when we meet the word in the ancient writings. It is not without a feeling of amused surprise that one comes to identify those grotesque hamlets with the 'cities' of the Bible, and to recall the fact that their 'kings' must have often occupied a humbler station in the body politic of their times than the chairman of a parish council may occupy in ours. Of course, there have been incalculably great changes in a land which has been under the ploughshares of war for so many centuries, yet the sites remain, and it is often possible to rebuild the past. The very forces that have consigned so many of them to ruins have kept the rest alive through everything. The want of good roads, the uncertainties of government, the ancient feuds and avoidances, have preserved village communities apart and with little alteration.

Of cities in the Western sense, there were none in Syria. Yet Damascus, Beyrout, and Jerusalem stand out from the towns of Syria as places worthy of the name. Jerusalem we shall consider at a later stage. There is no record of any visit of Jesus to Berytus or Damascus, but Tyre and Sidon must have rivalled if not surpassed them in His time. G. A. Smith has suggested that in the story of the Prodigal Son we may have a reference to the fast city life where boys from country homes might be seen then, as in Beyrout they may be seen now, 'wasting their substance with riotous living' (Lk 15¹³). It was in Beyrout, only a year or two ago, that an American, trying to persuade a lad to come to America, received the answer, 'Suffer me first to bury my father'—the father standing by and acquiescing in the filial sentiment.

With several of the towns Jesus was familiar. They have changed more than the villages, and yet there is much in them still which enables us to reconstruct the life He saw. There are about a dozen of them, and they shine from far, white splashes on the hill-tops, like Jaffa, perched with a conscious pose above the rocks of its seashore; or Jenin, gleaming like a white bird from its nest of palm-trees. The streets are usually aggressively irregular, at once ancient and unfinished in their appearance. The wider spaces, where tents are pitched and camels and horses tethered, are full of noise and colour, a patchwork of brilliant and crowded human life. There are narrower streets, which often become tunnels, in which laden asses brush the wares of shopkeepers with their burdens, and the shrill talk of men and women intensifies the disagreeableness of the smells. Closely huddled together from the first, and kept from lateral expansion by their walls and gates, and the dangers of the open country outside, the houses are forced upwards for expansion, and the sky of townfolk is a narrow strip seen between lofty precipices of stone.

The villages are charming at a distance, but full of disillusion as one approaches. The difference between the distant view and the interior reminds one of the words of Jesus about the outward and inward appearances of whited sepulchres (Mt 23⁷). They are usually well set, on picturesque heights or hillsides, and the angular outline of flat roofs and walls lends them a suggestion of military fortification. Cultivated oliveyards or gardens give the promise of quiet prosperity, and groups of trees seem to have arranged themselves for a picture. But, on nearer approach, the trees appear to detach themselves and stand apart, and the houses to decay before the eyes of the spectator into ruinous heaps of débris. This is due partly to poverty, and partly to the pretence of poverty as a device for avoiding the rapacity of the tax-gatherer or of the robber. Even in the time of Jesus ostentation was dangerous. Those towns of which He speaks were walled and guarded. Towns and villages were eagerly watched by the tax-gatherers and sometimes ruined and burned by banditti, especially in outlying or frontier regions. When He spoke of an angry lord coming to avenge the murder of his son and destroy the city of the murderers (Mt 21⁴¹), the words would awaken no surprise.

Jesus was a dweller in towns. His longest homes on earth were Nazareth and Capernaum, both of them among the larger towns of Galilee. The significance of this fact is noteworthy. Most of the Syrian towns are to-day the mingling-places of the land, the crucibles wherein a composite race is molten out of many elements. One or two towns, indeed, like Nablus and Hebron, are fanatically Mohammedan, and the unwelcome alien elements of the population are kept apart, while the life of the whole community stagnates, immune to the infection of their uncleanness, but unprogressive as cities of the dead. But the other towns are open to the world. It is said that the sanitary conditions are such that if it were not for the freedom of intercourse the population would die off. The inhabitants often emigrate, and there is much inter-marriage with people of other towns, so that the life is varied and has other than purely local interests.

From the earliest times the population of these towns was recruited by Canaanites, Arabs, and Israelites from other districts. In the days of Jesus, Græco-Roman life was pouring into them, and there was always the presence of the imperial military contingent. The great roads and the Eastern campaigns of Rome had opened up and greatly developed foreign commerce, which found markets in all the larger centres. Jesus was a child and a man of the town. It was not, as in the case of John the Baptist, in desert places that He chose to teach, but in the crowded synagogues, clad in ordinary townsman's tasselled dress.

Urban communities arose from three main causes, viz. commerce (especially commerce in connexion with agriculture), war, and worship. In its various phases, town life bears marks of its threefold origin through all time. Christ touched this life on all its sides, and came into relation with each of these three aspects of it.

Commerce. Jesus knew from the first in Nazareth. The town lies in the oval hollow of a high mountain valley. The carpenter's shop there led Him doubtless to a knowledge of house building, and He knew the reasons why some houses stood the underwash of rainstorms and some did not (Mt 7²⁴). Tradition mentions 'yokes and ploughs' as among the chief objects which He manufactured as a carpenter; and there can be little doubt that this is correct. For Nazareth was just the place in which commerce was most sure to be closely connected with agriculture; and He who said, 'Take my yoke upon you' (11²⁹), and spoke of the light burden and the easy yoke, had doubtless in His mind much experience of the choice of timber and of accurate fitting of yokes to the necks of oxen. He knew the mat sets, and may not only have seen children playing in them, but have played there Himself as a child. Capernaum was a place of importance for the collection of revenue, being situated at an important point on a great Roman road. Jericho, famous for its rich trade in balsam, was a still more important tax-collecting centre, where a leading publican could gather many of his friends to a feast (Lk 5²⁹). Matthew and Zacchæus are links connecting Jesus with the receipt of custom. Capernaum also had its fishing fleet, and its extensive fish-market, and Peter's family resided there (Mt 8¹⁴). The traveller coming in from the eastern desert towards the Lebanon is astonished by the aspect of the town of Homs (Emesa), whose high square blocks of masonry and many chimney-stalks give it a striking resemblance to a Midland English manufacturing town. No doubt that is a product of modern industry. Yet, as He looked southward from His disciples' boat, Jesus must have often seen the cloud of smoke rising from Taricheæ, at the southern end of the Lake, where in His time a large trade in fish-curing was carried on.

War, also, had left its traces. As one advances farther and farther to the north-east from Damascus, one is struck to find the walls of oasis-towns grow thicker and higher, and to note the pierced loopholes in them, testifying to the nearness of the raiding Bedawin, and the precarious terms on which town life is possible there. Many such fortress-towns Jesus must have visited on His journeys. Ever visible from Nazareth itself, the crest of Tabor, to which some have seen an allusion in the 'city set on a hill' (5¹⁴), was crowned by a fort and occupied by a Roman garrison. The centurions whom Jesus met, and who impressed Him so favourably, were in command of detachments of Roman soldiers, who formed an important feature in all the town life of Syria, mingling at times in friendly intercourse with their neighbours (Lk 7⁴⁻⁵), and lending to the life of the place that unmistakable air of distinction which is ever to be found about the army of a great empire.

Worship, too, was an ancient and ineradicable feature of town life. Many towns owed their first origin to some holy place, whose associations were lost in the most remote antiquity, and many were glorified by historical associations of the religious past. Such holy places were scattered up and down the land, but the history of Jesus brings us into contact chiefly with two of them—Jacob's Well, near Shechem, and Bethlechem, the city of David. The concentration of the religious life of the nation in Jerusalem tended to discourage the attention paid to local shrines, and it is striking that to visit the former of the two above mentioned, Jesus had to journey into the heart of Samaria; while, as regards Bethlechem, we never hear of it after the stories of His birth. It was the synagogue which gave its religious aspect to the town life which Jesus knew. The first beginning of His ministry was in the synagogue of Nazareth. It is in connexion with the ruins of a costly synagogue that the controversy about the site of Capernaum still centres (cf. Sanday). While the Temple still gathered round it the national religious sentiment, the actual religious life of the people owed more to the synagogues than to the Temple. In them religion was surrounded by individual memories and family associations. In them the Scriptures grew familiar, and the Law was expounded and applied to the details of actual life. While the Temple revealed to every true Israelite Jehovah as the God of his nation, the synagogue kept about him the thought and presence of Jehovah as God of his home. Thus the idea of the city was more and more a religious idea in Israel, and her God was a city dweller. There is an Eastern proverb which speaks of homeless strangers as 'going to God's gate,' and the idea of the City of God, fostered indeed by Jerusalem, yet hallowed every city of Israel. Not of the capital only, but of all her towns she sang that 'unless the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain' (Ps 127).

There can be no question that the city conception entered largely into Jesus' view of His Kingdom. Josephus describes (perhaps in exaggerated terms) the Essene conception of the Kingdom of God as a spot beyond the ocean 'which is oppressed neither with storms of rain nor snow, nor with intense heat, but soft, cooling, zephyr west winds always blow' (cf. Hausrath, i. 164). That was Utopia seen from the wilderness—the Kingdom of God seen from the desert. But for Jesus the desert was but an occasional resort. It was the crowded streets of towns that set His point of view; and the life—not the retreat from life—of men and women, was the ideal of His Kingdom. In every parable and prophecy of His which describe it, we hear the hum of man's activity, and see him busy with human business.

The town life, however, which Jesus knew in Syria was very far from the ideal. Of course, in estimating such matters, a large allowance must always be made for the different tastes of Easterns and Westerns, so that many things which impress us as disadvantages may have been either unnoticed or actually enjoyed by Orientals. Nothing, for instance, strikes the traveller more than the constant publicity of life in the East, to which reference has already been made. There seems, at first sight, to be no private life at all. Every one knows everything about everybody. The intimacy of family life appears to be everywhere, but without its affection, and the unceasing sound of speech keeps up an unbroken and unseemly exposure of private affairs. That Jesus felt this oppressive at times is proved by those periodic retreats to desert places and to mountains which are so familiar to readers of the Gospels. The note of intimacy, the personal quality of intercourse even in crowded thoroughfares, appear in countless touches of the narrative. He Himself refers to it when He gives it as a thing to be counted on, that that which is told in the chamber will be proclaimed on the housetop (Mt 10²⁷, Lk 12³), (from which at least ten families would hear it). There is, behind the main speech of the Gospels, the sound of an eternal chatter among the 'rustling crowds.' Remarks of disciples and bystanders are often overheard either by Jesus or by the reporter (Mt 13⁵⁵⁻⁵⁶, Jn 4³⁵ etc.). Sins of speech are more frequently referred to and rebuked than other sins.

This publicity, however, is but one part of the general sense of comfortlessness which depresses the Western visitor in the East. At one time, when Jesus was homeless, He evidently felt this, contrasting His own wandering life with that of foxes and of birds (Mt 8²⁰). But the homes themselves are often such as to seem very comfortless to the traveller. Of course, comfort is a matter which very largely depends upon custom, and the apparent want of it is often illusory. The streets are filthy, and often untidy in detail; but the inhabitants seem to have a singular lack of sensitiveness to smells, and the sordid litter of odds and ends appears not to distract their eye from appreciation of the fine building that rises out of it. In many houses the floor is on two levels, the upper portion being for the human inhabitants, and the lower for cattle, whose mangers are hollowed out of the raised floor along its edge. Even in better houses the rooms are bare; and jars for olives, oil, or water, along with corn-baskets and agricultural implements, give to the reception-rooms the appearance of outhouses. The main desiderata seem to be heat in winter and coolness in summer, so that the interiors are generally dark—a state of matters which is not conducive to cleanliness. There is no glass, and the strong sunlight penetrates the rooms in shafts which end in brilliant jewel-like flames of colour where they strike upon a garment or a piece of coloured pottery, and throws the rafters and walls into shadows of the richest brown and indigo, while all recesses and much of the floor are in darkness unrelieved. That this was the state of matters with which Jesus was familiar, is strikingly borne out by His parable of the Lost Coin, where the woman lights a candle and searches the house (Lk 15⁸). That He is thinking of daylight is proved by the fact that the candle has to be lighted. It is narrated by Conder of a visitor to the cave of the Holy House at Nazareth, the reputed home of Jesus in His boyhood, that he remarked to the monk who showed him it, that it was dark for a dwelling-house. The monk answered that 'The Lord had no need of much light.' Yet it is evident from many sayings that Jesus was peculiarly sensitive to the contrasts of light and darkness. The 'outer dark' (Mt 22¹³) of unlit streets affected Him with a sort of horror; and He gloried in the claim, which He often repeated, that He was the 'light of the world,' or the light of men. In the still more striking phrase, 'the light of life,' we see something of what light meant to Him. It may have been suggested by the contrast of the dark interior of a tomb with the sunshine that struck upon its whitewashed outer walls. But these words could have been used only by One to whom light meant quickened and exhilarated vitality.

However much custom and race may have mitigated the trials which these matters would impose on Westerns, we know that there were other characteristics of town life which were wholly distasteful to Him, and which He denounced. From His speech we can gather that He was often in conflict with that sophisticated provincialism which was the besetting sin of country towns. Mingling-places of the national varieties, the towns were yet sufficiently complete in themselves, and apart from one another, to foster jealousy and local conceit. In places like Cæsarea Philippi, for instance, where to this day any passer-by may pick up large fragments of Roman mosaic floors or panels, the wealthy and luxurious life had given rise to a system of servility. Jesus had noted this, and warned His disciples against the Gentile practice of encouraging sycophants to address them as 'sweet lords' (Lk 22²⁵). Nor are the objectionable ways and manners of the town confined to the Gentiles. There are the local hypocrites among the natives, who love to pray standing at the corners of streets (Mt 6²). There is that feature of country-town life which appears to be ineradicable,—that excessive love for litigation (Mt 5²⁴),—the combined result of leisure and petty interests. Nothing is more striking in the narratives of the Evangelists than the frequency with which litigation is referred to, both by Jesus and His hearers. Again, the littleness and personal character of the habitual outlook on the world are illustrated by the fluency with which the Nazarenes enumerate the relatives of Jesus (Mt 13^{55, 56})—the speech this of tongues practised in the eloquence of local gossip. And it throws light on the meaning of Jesus when He spoke of Capernaum as 'exalted to heaven' (Mt 11²³). Capernaum physically was on the level of the Lake shore, and 682 feet below sea-level. It was the self-importance of the small provincial town of which He spoke. Jerusalem had its own sins, and the villages had theirs; but it probably was especially to the towns that He referred when He warned the forth-going Apostles of supercilious rejection, and instructed them to meet it by a symbol of still more emphatic rejection, shaking the dust of them off their feet (Mt 10¹⁴ etc.).

Still worse, and still more obvious and common in these narratives, are the tokens of the violent contrasts of avarice and misery in the town life. The selfishness of the town is there, in all its heartlessness, portrayed in such parables as those of Lazarus and Dives (Lk 16²⁰), the rich man and his barns (12¹⁸), and many others. Prosperity and adversity are in shameless and pitiless sight of one another. Cruelty and oppression have become the recognized convention of the powerful classes. Disease is rampant, and a class of rapacious quack doctors has sprung up to prey upon its victims (Mk 5³⁶). The moral tone of the town is such as to permit a prostitute to enter the feast of a wealthy Pharisee, and it is only when it appears that she is penitent that any one is shocked by the incident (Lk 7³⁷). The preference of Jesus for the town is part of His principle that the true physician goes where the sick are thickest, and the true saviour where sin is most unblushing.

The villages of Syria are a class of communities of a quite different order. The sheikh dwells in his ruined tower, overlooking the huddle of brown walls and roofs, and keeping his audience-hall open for the elders to assemble in and discuss the news of the countryside. They are inhabited now, as they have been largely all along, by fellahin, said to be to a considerable extent the descendants of the ancient Canaanites, practically unmixed in blood, owing to the almost unbroken custom of intermarriages. With these Jesus must have talked that Aramaic tongue which some five or six villages in the Kalamun mountain valleys still use as their vernacular, and which is heard to-day among the bakers of Damascus who come down to the city from the Syriac village of Ma'alula. So conservative is village life in Syria, that it is to village communities alone that we look to-day, in the assured confidence that we are seeing the very kind of life which Jesus saw. One result of this conservatism is, that extraordinary combination of ignorance and pride, superstitious fears and contemptuous effrontery, which is often the first impression produced on strangers. They preserve self-government of a kind, a hereditary rule within an imperial; but they appear to be very helpless against both nature and man. Usury and oppression cow the inhabitants, the insecurity of property renders them suspicious. The writer has accidentally roused a man sleeping through the night upon his haystack in an open field, and seen others sitting upon the top of the grain piled upon a truck on the railway. They are almost exclusively agricultural in their way of life, and their methods are primitive and leisurely. They leave their hardest work to be done by their women, and spend many hours of each day in absolute idleness. Over them hangs the acrid-smelling smoke of fires whose fuel is camel-dung, that has been dried by being plastered over the outside of ovens, which break the monotony of flat roofs by their rounded shape, and appear like blisters in the fierce heat of summer. The dirtiness of the streets and of some houses is incredible. The simple food and habits of life produce healthy bodies, but disease comes upon its victims unprotected by any skill of medicine, and the sick and the whole dwell together and mingle everywhere. The first impression is one of universal gloom, and the faces of the people are sullen and contemptuous. But that is in many cases but the first instinct of self-preservation in those who are accustomed to ill-treatment. A very little tact and kindness soon changes the aspect of things, and threatening looks give place to a smiling childishness.

Such were the villages with which Jesus was familiar, although their life was then more prosperous, and at least some of their homes more habitable. To their inhabitants He spoke His parables of simple life, such as that of the Friend at Midnight (Lk 11⁵). In one of them He blessed the children whom village mothers brought to Him (Mk 10¹³). In another He brightened the wedding feast with good wine (Jn 2¹). In the gathering dusk, the two villagers at Ennaus recognized Him in the act of breaking bread at their table (Lk 24^{28ff.}). From a village gate was heard the sound of swift footsteps, when a rich young ruler, within sight of the squalor which had enriched him, asked the question about eternal life, and was answered that he must sell all that he had and give to the poor (Mk 10¹⁷). Beside another village gate He stopped the funeral procession of an only son of his mother, and gave her back her dead restored to life (Lk 7¹¹). That was at Nain, one of the villages of that hill of 'Little Hermon,' on whose sides Endor and Shunem also cling—a hill of villages of resurrection. Bethany hardly counts among the villages, being almost a suburb of Jerusalem, and differing from the rest in consequence. But of all the villages of Palestine none brings Jesus so near as the little hamlet of Ephraim, perched far off on its hill in the lonely uplands to the east of Bethel. It was perhaps the remotest of the inland villages of Israel, and its rustic inhabitants dwelt alone. It was to it that He retired for His last retreat before the Passover of Death (Jn 11⁵⁴). To Him the sickness and helplessness of the villages of His native land appealed, and drew forth compassion and healing. The sullenness that sometimes rejected Him and would have none of His love awakened no resentment, but only a great and pitying distress (Mt 11^{20ff.} etc., Lk 9^{52ff.}). The childlikeness of the villagers refreshed Him after the sophisticated life of towns, and found response in His constant speeches in praise of children and the childlike spirit (Mt 18³).

5. Jerusalem.—For good or evil, no city in the world has exercised so strong and constant an influence on the world as Jerusalem. Some of her visitors have been filled with an unbounded enthusiasm, others have been depressed with a shattering disappointment; but in one way or other the city has influenced all comers. It has been the usual fate of sacred cities to gather to themselves much of the worst along with much of the best of earthly life. Jerusalem is no exception to the rule. It is the most sacred and the most sinister spot on earth.

From the day when David took it, the last stronghold of the Jebusites, and the battle-beaten old fortress-walls of rough stone opened their gates to the God of Israel, it had been the focus of the nation's life (2 S 6, Ps 24). Solomon glorified it as the secular and religious centre, drafting into it the wealth and nobility of Israel until the land became hydrocephalous—its metropolis magnificent and the rest shrivelled and impoverished. In a far more real sense Josiah made Jerusalem great; and now at length, after countless changes of fortune, Jesus found it a city of such unique importance and significance that it stood over against all the rest of the land, dividing the nation into 'dwellers in Jerusalem' and 'others'—a more effective division than any other of the time.

In the visits paid by Jesus to Jerusalem, from those of His infancy and the memorable first remembered visit—that paid when He was twelve years old—to the triumphal entry and the night journey as a captive from Gethsemane, there is an increasing intensity of interest. His arguments here are more of the nature of pitched battles than in the country (Jn 6, etc.); His acts of authority more decisive and dangerous (Mt 21¹²); even His healing of the sick more of the nature of a challenge (Jn 5¹⁰). Thus the history of Jesus fully confirms our sense of the importance of Jerusalem. The thrill of patriotic enthusiasm in such a word as His reference to 'the city of the Great King' (Mt 5³⁵) has already been alluded to. But more and more irrevocably that loyal sentiment changed its aspect as the facts thrust themselves upon Him. It was the impossible spirit of the city more than any other thing that changed Jesus' speech from the Sermon on the Mount to the terrible denunciations and warnings of the closing days. The sacred city, which at the first had been for Him, as for every religious man of Israel, the goal of pilgrimage and the embodiment and incarnation of spiritual thought and dream, came to be the arena of His life's supreme conflict, where spirituality would fight out its great battle with 'the world, the flesh, and the devil.' Here love would try the final issue with hate, and life with death. It is by a happy inspiration that Langland, in his Piers the Plowman, tells of Jesus 'going to a jousts in Jerusalem.' Nothing could more exactly describe His own view of the ease during His later journeys (Mt 16²¹, Jn 11¹⁶). His spirit as He journeyed was that of one who, having fought the battle of the Spirit across the whole field, is now going on to the storming of the citadel.

Such was the change in His own feeling as He approached the capital. Not less striking is the expression of His thought of its meaning and its fate. For the pious Jew, Jerusalem was Utopia; and the mediæval view, expressed in such enraptured poems as 'Pearl' (cf. Gollancz's tr.) and the Crusading dreams of Gerusalemme Liberata, were the natural continuation of the ideas of which Ezekiel's visions and the Apocalypse are the expression. Jesus accepted this estimate of its importance when He deliberately chose it as the one place on earth where the Messianic claim must be publicly made (Jn 5¹⁹ etc.), but He did this in the full consciousness that when it had served this purpose it would pass away. To Him it was a doomed Utopia, doomed beyond all hope of recovery. Had it known (Lk 19⁴²), had it understood the day of its visitation, it might have endured; as things were, it was for Him but a city of might-have-been. Yet, in the very hour when it was rushing to its doom, He seized upon it and forced it to fulfil the purpose towards which it had blindly struggled through all its eventful history. It linked on His work and Person with the past, and in crucifying Him sent on to the future the completed drama of redemption.

Subsequent history, with ruthless and terrific irony, has confirmed His view. The efforts of the Crusades to revive Jerusalem have only the more hopelessly marked it as the doomed Utopia. Every traveller is impressed with the same sense of its infinite loneliness and stony desolation. It looks like a gigantic fortress that has stood dismantled for ages, but retains for ever a weird air of petrified gallantry. It is a fossil city, fossilized when far gone in decay. The savage liveliness of the bugles which now shriek across its streets and houses, only adds to the sense of ancient death. Built for eternity, setting the pattern for men's dreams of the New Jerusalem, it stands for the sarcasm of promises unfulfilled, a city with a great future behind it. 'What,' we cannot but ask, 'has this relic to do with a blessed future for mankind?' History and religion seem to mourn here together, reiterating the lament of Jesus. One sees in every remembrance of it those two weeping figures, the most significant of all for its secular and religious life,—Titus, who gazed upon Jerusalem from Scopus the day before its destruction, and wept for the sake of the beautiful city so near its doom; and Jesus Christ, who, when things were ripening for Titus, foresaw the coming of the legions as He looked upon Jerusalem from Olivet,—'And when he was come near he beheld the city, and wept over it' (Lk 19⁴¹).

The appearance of the city, as seen from such a lofty vantage ground as that which the approach from Bethany gives from the shoulder of the Mount of Olives, must always have been to a considerable extent the same as it is to-day. It is true that there are now two Jerusalem side by side, the ancient city packed together firmly, and the more loosely scattered masonry of the new Levantine city that has risen to the south and west of the Jaffa Gate. Yet to the north there is still the mound of ashes said to have been carried thither from the Temple sacrifices of old; and ancient tombs fill the valleys and stretch along the northern plain. It is easy for the imagination to detach the modern buildings, and to regain the ancient impression. It has been pointed out (Hausrath, i. 38, 39) that Athens stands on an unfruitful cliff; Rome between a marsh and a wilderness; Jerusalem on a barren tongue of stone, where 'the mountain land gathers itself as to a natural centre.' The 'mountains stand round about Jerusalem,' but they lift her up to their height, and she stands as a mural crown upon the mountain land. The surrounding peaks are but little elevated above her level, and she is the climax as well as the centre of the land, set up to be 'the mountain throne and the mountain sanctuary of God.' And that tongue of land is so stony that even the denudation of sieges and of centuries cannot very greatly have changed the general aspect of the scene. There is no river in her landscape to redeem the hardness of the outlines. She is 'a city of stone in a land of iron, with a sky of brass' (Disraeli's Tancred). She has nothing in common with the villages of Judaea, the variety of her buildings differentiating her from the rectangular sameness of theirs. As if to accentuate the contrast, the village of Siloam still lies on the eastern slope of the Kidron valley, a drift of square hovels seen across a field of artichokes. Jerusalem 'sitteth solitary,' as she has always sat; unique in the land as she is lonely in history. The colours of her walls and buildings change in the changing lights from grey with a touch of orange to grey with a touch of blue. For there is no one colour of Jerusalem. In the changing lights of sunrise, noon, afternoon, and evening, its colour changes. At one time it hangs, airy and dream-like, over the steep bank of the Valley of Jehoshaphat; at another time it seems to sit solid on its rock, every roof and battlement picked out in photographic clearness; again, in the twilight of evening all is sombre, with rich purple shadows.

We have noted in the towns of Syria those moral defects of petty quarrelsomeness and provincial self-importance which appear constantly in the records of Jesus' ministry. The metropolitan pettiness which confronted Him at Jerusalem—the tenfold provincialism of the capital city, whose modern counterpart is so familiar in many lands to-day—was a much more serious matter. All the dreams of Utopia, religious and secular, had run into personal pride and vanity; all those Divine promises and guarantees on which the glorification of Jerusalem rested were interpreted by the citizens as a species of flattering Divine favouritism shown to themselves.

In spite of much disappointment, there were still many things which must have seemed in some sort the fulfilment of the ancient hopes for Jerusalem. 'The dromedaries of Midian and Ephah' had come to her, indeed, and they from Sheba bringing gold and incense. The flocks of Kedar and the glory of Lebanon were swelling her trade. Ships were flying as a cloud and as doves to their windows, making for her seaport with wealth for her (Is 60). And with that wealth came men also from east and west, from north and south. The Dispersion of the Jews had already made her Passover feasts almost as cosmopolitan as Mecca afterwards became. The Roman road, while it brought humiliation, brought also much else to Jerusalem. Feeling its way inland from the sea across the mountains of Judaea, it ended in the Jaffa Gate. It was but one of many roads from all points of the compass which, as they approached the city, grew broader and more thronged with passengers. From the account of Pentecost given in the Acts (2⁹⁻¹¹), we can see that at certain times the polyglot crowds must have been like those which are now seen in the Meidan of Damascus to welcome the return of the Haj.

The wealthy and luxurious inhabitants were obviously spoiled by all this grandeur, and in all the shamelessness of Eastern cities paraded it in the face of the poverty they should have sought to help. Those who favoured the Roman domination, and sought to make capital out of it, like the Herodians, prided themselves openly in Jerusalem as a Roman city, and did all they could to make it so. Those who simply acquiesced, like the Sadducees, in what their superior intelligence convinced them was inevitable, found enough in their wealth and in their pride in their old city and family connexions to keep alive their aristocratic spirit. Those who, like the Pharisees, stood for the ancient religious and national claims, fostered a still more bitter fashion of bigotry and exclusiveness. From Jerusalem they too, in their surreptitious way, tried to manage the world. They spent their strength in making proselytes (Mt 23¹⁵), and they sent out deputations to interfere in local questions as far off as Capernaum (Mk 7, Jn 1¹³). The crowd, who watched and copied the great ones from below, readily caught their tone, and, in an ignorant sense of superiority, were ready at any moment to raise a tumult at their instigation, and to shout for the crucifixion of a selected victim (Mk 15¹³ etc.). Altogether, so mighty was the self-importance of this little metropolis, that for its inhabitants the rest of the world was practically non-existent; and, as happens in all poorly equipped moral natures, their consciousness of their own better privileges and good fortune ran neither to interest nor to compassion, but only to scorn.

Of the more vulgar aspects of this metropolitan superciliousness the narratives present abundant examples. The contempt of Jerusalem for Galilee is everywhere apparent. It was not only on the ground of Messianic tradition, asking whether it were likely that Christ should come out of Galilee (Jn 7⁵²). The proverb was ready on their lips about no good thing coming out of Nazareth (1⁴⁶ 7⁴¹). The facility for inventing opprobrious names, and the unsparing use of them, had developed with them into a fine art (8⁴⁸). A man was an ignoramus, a blasphemer, a lunatic, if he brought any new thing among them from the provinces. The maid in the palace of the high priest did not show any originality in laughing at the accent of country people (Mt 26⁷³). If a provincial gathered crowds of a morning to hear his preaching, and men felt in him the advent of the Spirit of God, Jerusalem coarsely explained it all by the supposition that he was intoxicated (Ac 2¹³). Any traveller might have retorted that while they were managing the world from a distance, they were neglecting it at their own doors. The fishermen of Galilee were probably far less rude, either in speech or manner, than the semi-barbarous shepherds of the Judean mountains. But that was no concern of theirs. Their world was within their walls, and the curious and shameful result of their extravagant exclusiveness was that every Israelite was a foreigner in the capital city of his own country. Not Jesus of Nazareth alone, but every countryman was in Jerusalem 'despised and re-

The first impression made upon a stranger visiting the city in those days must have been that of an extraordinarily Roman city. Herod, the greatest of Romanizers, had utterly disregarded the lessons of past history, and repeated the mistaken policy of Solomon, which neglected the land to glorify the city. His architecture must have been as extravagant in costliness as it was poor in art. One of the grandest of all his palaces crowned the hill of Zion; his temple blazed forth its splendours from the grand platform on which it stood along the hillside of Moriah. The famous Tyropœon way spanned the ravine between the two, entirely Roman in its construction and design. Here stood a theatre whose Roman audiences listened to plays on such themes as Susanna and the Elders; there an amphitheatre at whose games rich prizes were offered. There was much barbaric splendour of a kind in the aspect of the city, but it was Roman splendour; and everything that caught the eye as impressive, led it back to the barracks and the courthouse near the tower of Antonia.

It was this aspect of Jerusalem which one might have expected Jesus to be most greatly influenced by. One of the most famous of the many would-be Messiahs, some years after this, went with a multitude of followers to blow his trumpets as the priests had blown their horns at Jericho. Jesus acted on principles directly the opposite of these. He saw the Roman buildings without either admiration or protest. His certainty of the end of all was no less positive than that of Theudas and such rash men, but it only made Him the more calm in His acquiescence until the providential moment should arrive. That was so sure—that day when the Rome which had glorified the city would destroy it—that the thought of hastening the doom, or of preventing it, never occurred to Him. Yet that very fact embittered and terrified His enemies. They did not, indeed, approve of the rebellious patriots; but that was because they regarded them as Galilaean bunglers who undertook work whose gravity they did not understand. Had any of them succeeded, Jerusalem would have welcomed him with shouts. But here was a far more serious offence. Macaulay's New Zealander on London Bridge represents to British readers a familiar and a quite legitimate kind of speculation. To Pharisees of Jerusalem such an idea was sheer treason even to think of, far more to discuss in public.

Not less directly did the attitude of Jesus to the Temple draw the nets of death around Him. Like all religious Israelites, He directed His steps to the Temple as to the natural seat and centre of His religious life. From the first it was in His Father's house that the Son of God found His appropriate home (Lk 2⁴⁶). But the pleasantness of that boyish visit yielded in later years to slow and deepening bitterness, as the accepted meaning of the Temple became more and more unmistakable. The Jews have a legend that in the sacred rock now covered by the Mosque of Omar there was inscribed the mystic name of Jehovah, and that Jesus alone of men had been able to discover and to read it. The heart of every Christian understands the unsuspected truth of that legend. Jesus ever went to that Temple as one going to His Father's house.

All the more tragic is the contrast, as it must have come upon Him, between the real and the ideal Temple of the Lord. The priestly families were Sadducees, men in whom the national hope had largely died out, and in whom His acquiescent attitude to Rome would awaken neither anger nor surprise. Indeed, it is probable that they mistook His views, and carelessly classed Him among the other revolutionaries of the time. At least the high priest frankly avowed that it was necessary that He should perish, to avert the Roman anger and revenge. But if it was only by mistake or by pretence that they found this ground of accusation against Jesus, there were other grounds on which they and He stood in plain and deadly opposition. The Sadducean priestly families were the chief representatives of a spirit of scepticism regarding spiritual things (in reaction from the Pharisaic spirit) which had lapsed into a kind of hard secularism, a lax morality, and an unconcealed worldliness which were indifferent alike to the glory of worship and to the shame of its degradation. The shadow of Herod had fallen across the Temple and its services. Herod, who at one time had thought of himself posing as Messiah, had built the Temple; and while the Roman idolater Agrippa had offered sacrifice there, Herod had sacrificed to Roman gods at Rome. With such a patron at its head, secular life flowed into the Temple unchecked. The courts were made into a market where fraudulent bargains were driven with country-folk in connexion with the very rites of their religion, and we see how Jesus resented this in the strange outburst of holy anger with which He drove these merchants forth (Mt 21¹²). A large number of synagogues had arisen within the precincts, but there is no record of His visiting them. By preference He chose the streets for preaching in, or He spoke in the open Temple court. In the East, religion tends ever to degenerate into ritual pure and simple, devoid alike of meaning for the intellect and of emotion for the heart (W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem. p. 16). Never had this taken place more completely than in the Sadducean priesthood at Jerusalem then. From the abode of holiness and the centre of truth, He found His Father's house become a den of thieves, and a patent sham of ritual whose performers never dreamed of treating it even as a symbol of realities. It is this that explains that most strange and ominous of records, where Jesus is described as sitting silently in the Temple during long periods of the latest days of His life (Hansrath, ii. 250). What thoughts were passing in His mind then we cannot know, and we hardly dare try to imagine. But one thing is clear. Just as He changed the conception of the Messianic Kingdom from the outward to the inner region, so He did that of the Temple. When the priests poured out the water from great jars at the feast, He cried aloud that out of those who believed on Him would come rivers of living water (Jn 7³⁸). And the words of which He was afterwards to be accused, as to the destruction and rebuilding of 'this temple,' were spoken 'of the temple of his body' (2²¹).

From all these points of view, Jerusalem had become a place of sinister prospects for Jesus. From the populace He had to expect the usual reception given to all provincials, and if more powerful enemies should require their aid, they might be counted on for darker deeds. By the orthodox religionists He would be treated as a heretic, disloyal alike to the traditions of the past and the pressing needs of the hour. By the latitudinarian priests He must be regarded with the double antagonism of worldly men to spiritual aspiration, and of ritual to spiritual reality. So Jerusalem came to be seen by Jesus under a death-cloud. Rome was free in her use of crucifixion for the better ordering of Eastern affairs, and Jesus must have seen many of His countrymen hanging on crosses beside village gates. So the certainty of the end would force itself upon Him, and the shadow of the cross fall ever more deeply. Tombs of prophets were everywhere to be seen, and many of them were martyrs' tombs (Mt 23²⁹). But it was round the walls of Jerusalem that such tombs were thickest, and for Him also Jerusalem was seen as the place for perishing in. From the far North He saw it so, saying at Caesarea Philippi that He must go to Jerusalem to be killed (16²¹). The final journey, eager and yet deliberate, had death for its goal in the Holy City. The disciples felt a horror in the thought of Jerusalem, as if the City of the Great King had changed to a shambles (Jn 11⁸). Thomas, more ready than the others to face the worst, boldly urged them to go on and die with Him (11¹⁶). When He came near, and seeing the city realized its hopelessness, and felt the flood of old associations sweep over Him, He wept over it (Lk 19⁴¹). But He went on, nevertheless, when for Him Jerusalem meant Calvary.

It is true that, in the memory of the early Church, Jerusalem was the place of rising again as well as the place of death, and of the New Evangel that had the city for its starting-point. Yet as far as the earthly life of Jesus is concerned, the associations of Jerusalem are of almost unrelieved antagonism, sorrow, and shame. The modern aspect of the city seems to the imagination of lovers of Jesus profoundly symbolic. What the first eye-shot gives, as one sees it from Olivet, is this: a sharp angle formed by the two valleys of Jehoshaphat and Hinnom; steep banks rising from their bottoms to the walls, which they overlap in an irregular and wavy line; within the walls, glancing back from the angle which they form above the junction of the valleys, the eye runs up a gradually rising expanse of close-packed building, which is continued more sparsely in the long rolling slope beyond, to the ridge of Scopus in the north, and to the distant sweep of long level mountain-line to the west. It is as if the whole city had slid down and been caught by that great angle of wall just before it precipitated itself into the gorges.

These gorges themselves are part and parcel of the city, and they stand for the overflow of her sad and desolate spirit. Their sides are banks of rubbish—the wreckage and débris of a score of sieges, the accumulation of three thousand years. One looks from the lower pool of Siloam in the valley of Hinnom up a long dreary slope of dark grey rubbish, down which a horrible black stream of liquid filth trickles, tainting the air with its stench. Far above stands the wall, which in old days enclosed the pool. Here the city seems to have shrunk northwards, as if in some horror of conscience. The Field of Blood and the Hill of Evil Counsel are just across the gorge to the south. The valleys are full of tombs.

The impression of this is overwhelming, and there is one point in the view which appears more than all else to embody and explain it. Right in front, as one looks from Olivet, is the line of the Temple wall, and it is broken by a double gate, built up with closely mortared masonry. That is the ancient 'Beautiful Gate' of the Temple, by which the scapegoat, bearing the nation's sins, was led forth to the wilderness. It was built up because of a Jewish tradition that Messiah would return and enter the city by it. So Jerusalem has indeed built up the exit for her sins and the entrance for her Saviour. The land seems, as one travels over its desolate mountains and valleys, still inhabited by Jesus; but He has forsaken Jerusalem.

PALM.—Palm trees, though frequently referred to in the OT, are mentioned in connexion with the life of Christ only once: viz. in the account of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Jn 12¹³). The English name (Lat. palma) is due to the similarity of the leaves of some kinds to the open hand. The term in Greek (applied only to a genus) is φοινίξ, which gave its name to a town in Crete (Ac 27¹²). The word also means 'a Phœnician,' 'a purple colour,' and the fabulous phœnix. In Rev 7⁹ it is used of the leaf (or so-called branch), which is usually called βατόν.

The palm tree is amongst the foremost both in beauty and in utility. It grows with uniform trunk, straight like the mast of a ship. The trunk is in some kinds smooth, in others clearly annulated, in others rough with the roots of former fronds. At the top the leaves (or fronds) spring out in a spreading circle or crown, while beneath them the flowers and clusters of fruit are formed. The tree is endogenous, without bark and without branch. The leaves vary in length from three to thirty feet. And along the stalk on either side long leaflets grow close, presenting in many kinds (pinnated) the shape of an enlarged feather, in others, including most of the fan-shaped palms, a rounder, broader form of palmate or webbed configuration, while in the bi-pinnate caryota and the mauritia they have a triangular (or fish-tailed or wedge-shaped) appearance. The fruit is often valuable, and by incision the juice is obtained that makes palm wine. Palm trees are tropical and semi-tropical. Some grow near wells, as the palms of Elim (Ex 15²⁷), but this may be attributed to culture; others flourish in sandy deserts; some are found in mountainous regions, and many rear themselves erect on wind-swept ridges. Besides yielding food, drink, and oil, they afford house-building material, and many are highly serviceable for the various uses to which fibres are applicable.

Palms have been divided into five tribes, over a hundred genera, over a thousand species; but there is a limited number of main kinds. The palm of Palestine is the date-palm. This tree (phœnix dactylifera, date being a contraction of dactylus, 'finger') rises gracefully to a height of from fifty to ninety feet. It grows in various climates and latitudes, but its fruit fails both in Europe and in India. The female tree (for the phœnix, unlike most others, is not hermaphrodite) bears a cluster which may contain 200 dates, and it may continue to bear for two hundred years. These fruits, which are half sugar, are a chief article of food in Arabia and North Africa. From an incision near the top the fermenting sap flows so as to yield in one month twenty gallons of wine or toddy. The pinnated leaves, which are of a deep green colour and from 9 to 12 feet in length, are used to make mats and baskets, and the fibres of their stalks make cordage. The leaves also make thatch, and the trunk is useful timber. This tree abounded in the valley of the Jordan, but Jericho was specially the city of palm trees (Dt 34³). A group of palms, with their magnificent crowns, might afford ample shade. Accordingly, we find that early in the history of Israel Deborah dwelt under her palm tree (Jg 4⁵), while in the time of our Lord many of the Essenes were said to live in palm groves. Fructification is artificial or accidental; and forests may be cultivated that in years of famine will support the population of a country.

The palm, being upright, green, fruitful, and imposing, was an emblem of the righteous in their prosperity (Ps 92¹²). In appreciation of the beauty of its form it was carved on the walls and doors of the Temple (1 K 6^{29, 32}, cf. Ezk 40¹⁶ 41¹⁸). Its leaves were borne as symbols of rejoicing at the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23⁴⁰) and also at the Maccabæan Feast of Dedication, of which the special feature was the illumination. This tall, firm, unbending tree, with its magnificent crown of fronds, with fruit and leaves that served for sustenance and ornament, was readily reckoned emblematic of moral qualities—rectitude, constancy, gracefulness, usefulness—such as are the constituents of success. The palm came to be regarded specially as the symbol of victory and triumph. It is in that sense that the name has acquired its metaphorical meaning. The winner (we say) carries off the palm. A period of exceptional prosperity is remembered as 'palmy days.' 'Another race hath been, and other palms are won' (Wordsworth).

The carrying of palm leaves (τὰ βῆλα τῶν φοινίκων) by the people in honour of the Messiah (Jn 12¹³) was in accordance with the custom observed at feasts and on great public occasions. Jesus was saluted as a king proceeding to His coronation. The palms symbolized His triumph and the people's joy. He allowed the homage of the multitude as the spontaneous expression of pure-minded loyalty. On the other hand, the Pharisees and officials regarded it as a challenge of their authority. The incident has been commemorated since the 5th cent. by the Greek and Latin Churches in the Palm Sunday (dominica palmarum, or feast of palm-leaves), immediately preceding Easter, at which palms are consecrated and a procession takes place.

The supreme expression of the palm as the symbol of triumphant homage is in the Apocalyptic vision, where the innumerable multitude who have come through the great tribulation, and who serve God day and night, stand before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed in white robes and with palms in their hands (Rev 7^{9, 14}).

PALM.—The word occurs (Mk 14⁶⁵, Jn 18²², cf. 19³) in the tr. of πάσισμα, a blow with the open hand. It refers to the stroke on the cheek (Mt 5³⁹, Lk 6²⁹), one of the affronts and indignities that may have to be borne cheerfully in representing and serving the Kingdom of heaven. In Mt 26⁶⁷, Mk 14⁶⁵, a distinction is implied between the rough jest of hitting with the fist (κολαφίζω) by the soldiers standing in front of Christ and the smiting with the palm by the servants of the high priests as they stood behind and challenged Him to tell from whom the blow had come. For all Christ prayed that the sin committed in ignorance might be forgiven (Lk 23³⁴). It is only by a Christian that affront can really be put upon Christ (Ph 3¹⁸). G. M. MACKIE.

PAPIAS.—1. Papias as witness to Gospels.—There is no early evidence as to our Gospels comparable to that of Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, even in the fragmentary and obscure form in which it has reached us through the pages of Eusebius (HE iii. 39). Eusebius' own slighting estimate of Papias' judgment was due largely to distaste for the highly realistic form in which he set forth the common primitive expectation of an imminent reign of Christ on a renewed earth, which Papias held, with the Apocalypse of John (20^{4ff.}), would last a thousand years. But, whatever his mental calibre, Papias' importance lies rather in his endeavour to keep in touch with historical witness, as far as possible first-hand witness, to the true or original meaning of the Lord's own teaching.

For realizing such an aim Papias had exceptional advantages. There is little doubt that after the destruction of Jerusalem and its Temple in A.D. 70, if not before, the Roman province of Asia was the chief centre of Christian tradition outside Palestine. The foundation for this had been laid by St. Paul, with Ephesus as base of influence; and hither were attracted not a few of the leading personal disciples of Jesus, including, perhaps, several of the original Apostles. Chief of all, we must reckon John, the son of Zebedee, whose presence at Ephesus for a period of years cannot be explained away by any confusion with another John. The latter's title, 'the Elder,' itself implies the need for distinguishing him from a greater namesake residing in the same neighbourhood.

The statement in certain late writers that John, as well as his brother James, had been 'done to death by Jews,' even if correct, would not negative this. But it is very possibly a mistake, since Eusebius, who was on the look out for all facts bearing on the lives of Apostles, says nothing of the kind. It probably arose from the misunderstanding of a passage in which Papias explained the 'cup' of Christ in Mk 10^{38f.}, Mt 20^{22f.} as 'martyrdom'—which in James' case was unto death, but in John's stopped short of that.

Hierapolis, Papias' home in South Phrygia, was well within the province of Asia and near the main road to Ephesus from the East, while it actually lay on another road running N.W. through Asia to Smyrna and Pergamum. A man so situated, and with a passion for first-hand information as to Christ's teaching, had special chances of intercourse with such disciples of the first generation ('elders' he calls them) as visited or worked in Asia, so far as his youth or early manhood overlapped their later years. But how far was this the case? For an answer to this question we have to rely on the chapter of Eusebius already referred to, and particularly on certain of Papias' own words there cited.

2. Papias' book and the situation it presupposes.—Papias wrote a work in five books, entitled 'Exposition of the Lord's Oracles (Logia).' Quoting from this, Irenæus wrote, about A.D. 180: 'These things Papias, too, who was a hearer of John and a companion of Polycarp, a man of the old time (ἀρχαῖος ἀνὴρ), further witnesses in writing.' This statement Eusebius, anxious to dissociate John from Papias' millenarian views, challenges, saying that he does not claim to have heard Apostles, but only associates of theirs. In support of this, he quotes a passage from Papias' preface which enables us to judge how far his own reading of it is warranted. In studying it, our chief care must be to read it in the light of what we can learn as to the scope of its author's preface as a whole.

(a) The Lord's 'Oracles' and their record.—We gather that Papias felt constrained to write by the needs of the times in the western part of Asia Minor, where much diversity of view existed as to the standard of Christian faith and practice, owing largely to uncertainty both as to the exact wording of Christ's sayings and as to their real meaning. Some, it is true, took no pains even to ground their practice in all things on Christ's own words as spoken to His personal disciples, but deferred to 'alien precepts' coming through doubtful media of Divine revelation, rather than direct from this supreme source of truth. But, to Papias, the only sure way of reaching the mind of Christ, the Truth itself, is to start from the Apostolic written collection of 'the Oracles,' as he conceived the Gospel according to Matthew to be, the one directly Apostolic document of this character (the Johannine Gospel is in any case of another type). To this method some—probably typical Greek or 'Gnostic' Christians, to whom its markedly Jewish and eschatological colour may have been an offence—might object that the accuracy of this Gospel itself was not above question, pointing to the differences between it and the Petrine Gospel by Mark. To meet some such difficulty,* which was perhaps meant to lower the authority of both Gospels (since Mark also had Jewish features of the kind in question), Papias cites a tradition derived from a man of the first Christian generation, 'the Elder' (? John, see below), as he styles him—

'And this the Elder used to say: Mark, indeed (αἰν), having been Peter's interpreter, wrote down with accuracy, yet not in order, everything he bore in mind—the things, namely, either said or done by the Christ (or Lord). For neither did he listen to the Lord nor did he follow Him, but later on, as I said, Peter, who adapted his instructions to the requirements, yet without intending to make a connected account of the Lord's sayings (συναξὴν τῶν κυριακῶν παύσιμους λόγων or λογίων). Accordingly Mark was in no way in fault in so writing certain things as he recalled them: for of one thing he took precaution, not to omit anything that he had heard or therein to state anything falsely.'

Here we have a defence of the trustworthiness of Mark's narrative, so far as it goes, save on the score of the arrangement of its material, which, having originally been delivered by Peter in an order determined by the exigencies of Christian instruction (διδασκαλίας, as distinct from public preaching, κήρυγμα), was reproduced by Mark with simple fidelity. A Gospel so composed made no claim to comparison, as regards the order of the Lord's sayings (so far as it recorded them), with a Gospel written by one of Peter's fellow-disciples on a different principle, that of collecting the weighty utterances of the Lord (τὰ λόγια), disposed in orderly grouping. Such, however, was the Gospel composed by the Apostle Matthew, as we may infer that Papias went on to quote 'the Elder' as saying in effect.

Probably the sentence beginning 'But Matthew,' which the 'Mark, indeed (αἰν), . . .' of the extract in Eusebius seems to imply, included a statement that Matthew wrote 'among the Hebrews,' i.e. in Palestine. At least this is an element common to Irenaeus (iii. i. 1), and the tradition preserved in Euseb. iii. 24, possibly from Clement of Alexandria, whose account of the Gospels as contained in 'a tradition of the elders of earlier times' (τῶν ἀνέκων προσηγορίων) he elsewhere cites (vi. 14). Now in ii. 15 Clement is cited by Euseb. for an expanded form of the Papian tradition as to Mark's Gospel, with the additional remark that Clement's account is confirmed by Papias of Hierapolis. Papias, in fact, was the nucleus of that tradition; and so his Matthaean tradition, as given already in iii. 24, is here omitted.

Thus the whole passage was a defence at once of Mark's Gospel and of Matthew's, with which Papias from the nature of the case is mainly concerned. Then in the extract which Eusebius immediately subjoins, Papias sums up (ὄν) the net result of his discussion touching the accuracy of 'the Oracles' as originally compiled by that Apostle.

'Matthew, then, for his part, in Hebrew compiled the Oracles; but their interpretation was determined by each man's ability.' In this rendering, which keeps as closely as possible to the order of the original,† emphasis no doubt falls on the fact that Matthew's authoritative collection of the Lord's Oracles was in Hebrew, or rather Aramaic, and not in Greek. Yet Papias does not seem to have said anything about the manner in which the Greek Matthew, as current in the region where he was writing, came into being, else Eusebius would have gone on to cite information so much to his purpose. Hence we may infer that the point of the citation lies in the words actually given, and that Papias is explaining why various versions of the Oracles (in whole or part) were then current side by side with the recognized Greek Matthew. They went back, that is, to the time when Matthew's collection of the Oracles existed only in a non-Greek form, various imperfect renderings of which passed into currency before the final Greek version was made. In this way he is able to set aside rival forms of certain sayings to those on which, as standing in the Greek Matthew, he bases his own exposition of the Lord's teaching.

* Other views as to the exact reason for the comparison of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark are possible; but the above seems best to fit in with the passage in Papias' preface touching his aim and method dealt with below.

† Ματθαῖος μὲν ὄν Ἑβραϊδὶ διαλέκτῳ τὰ λόγια συνετάξατο (preferable to συνεγράψατο, cf. συναξὴν above), ἡμῖν δὲ αὐτὰ ὡς ἐν δυνατὸς ἰσάσθαι. The Logia, then, is Papias' description of the main contents of Matthew's Gospel in terms of his special interest in it, not the actual title of any writing ever current under that name.

While it is likely that Papias based on the Elder's testimony his own assertion that Matthew himself wrote his collection of the Lord's Oracles, it seems precarious to lean much weight on the statement. Against this there are various objections. Thus the Preface to Luke's Gospel seems to exclude any such Apostolic record, and its disappearance would be hard to explain.

(b) Papias' relation to 'the Elders,' the prime witnesses to the meaning of the Oracles.—So much for the true text of such Oracles of the Lord as he chooses for comment. But what guarantee can he offer that his own exegesis of their meaning is preferable to that of other Christian teachers about him, abler perhaps than himself? This is the question to which the chief citation made by Eusebius is a reply. Its substance is as follows. He is far from piquing himself on his own insight or ingenuity in evolving, at no slight length, plausible views as to the meaning of such Oracles as may seem obscure even to a careful reader. His one object being to reach the true meaning of Him who was the Truth incarnate, he has no false shame in supporting his own 'interpretation' by such authoritative traditions as he had collected in years gone by—traditions derived from the men of the first Christian generation, particularly personal disciples of the Master Himself. His zeal in collecting such authentic oral comments, even at second-hand, was due, he explains, to the feeling that the vivā voce method of continuous transmission was more helpful, for reaching the true sense of the Lord's Oracles, than any books bearing on their elucidation. But before proceeding to draw further inferences from 'Papias' preface, so far as cited by Eusebius, we will quote the passage (HE iii. 39) to which we owe our knowledge of it—

'But I will not scruple to set down for thee everything, too, that once on a time I learned right well from the Elders and right well bore in mind—in juxtaposition with the (=my own) interpretations, so confirming their truth. For I used not to delight, like the many, in those wont to have so much to say (by way of comment), but in those wont to teach things that are true; nor yet in those accustomed to bear in mind the precepts of other masters (τὰς ἄλλοτριῶν ἐπιτάλας), but in those (wont to bear in mind) such as have been given once for all from the Lord to faith and reach (us) from the Truth itself as source (ἀπ' αὐτοῦ παρασημοεινῶς [αὐτῶν] πρὸς ἀληθείας). But if haply one also who had been a companion of the Elders came (my way), I used to make careful inquiry into the discourses of the Elders—what had been said by Andrew, or what by Peter, or what by Philip, or what by Thomas or by James, or what by John or Matthew, or by any other of the Lord's disciples, and what things Aristion and the Elder John, disciples of the Lord, have to say (λίγουσιν). For I did not conceive that the contents of (the) books [of comment] assisted me as much as vivā voce communications preserved continuously (τὰ παρὰ ζώσης φωνῆς καὶ μενούσης).'

The exact exegesis of this famous passage is still an open question. Much depends on the relation of the clause, 'But if haply one also who had been a companion of the Elders (=the worthies of the first generation, e.g. "disciples of the Lord," as also above) came my way,' to what immediately precedes. If it expresses a less direct contact with the Elders, then Papias virtually claims himself to have heard some Apostles or personal disciples of Christ. But if, as seems preferable, it expresses a more direct relation, Eusebius' reading of the passage will hold, and Papias implicitly resigns all claim to have heard any Apostle, and so John in particular. In favour of the former alternative may be urged Eusebius' obvious desire to dissociate Papias from the Apostles, as also the positive statement of not a few later readers of Papias, who must have known of Eusebius' challenge, and so been the more careful in their own reading of Papias' meaning (with the full context before them). In particular, one might cite the witness of Apollinaris, bishop of Papias' own Hierapolis,* within half a century of the date of his predecessor's writing, when he calls him 'Papias, the disciple of John.' Besides, was Eusebius entitled to assume that Irenæus, in calling Papias 'a hearer of John and a comrade of Polycarp,'—whom Irenæus elsewhere explicitly makes a disciple of Apostles and of John in particular,—was drawing on this passage at all, seeing that it does not itself suggest the second of the two descriptions here given? Nevertheless Eusebius' exegesis of the passage, viz. that Papias had heard 'from the Elders' only indirectly, though in certain cases at only one remove, best suits the extract as a whole. Nor does Papias' date depend very much on acceptance of the one view rather than the other. In either case he may well have been rather older than Polycarp (whose birth was as early as A.D. 69), though, unlike him, he was won to Christ's Gospel only after the death of His last Apostle. Yet even at that date two of His personal disciples, Aristion and the Elder John, were still living, most likely in Ephesus or its neighbourhood, somewhere about A.D. 100.

(c) Date of Papias' writing.—Against the above result nothing can be said on the score of the date of Papias' book. Not only does Irenæus regard it as the work of 'a primitive worthy' (ἀρχαῖος ἀνὴρ), but Eusebius himself classes Papias with Polycarp, Ignatius, Clement (in this order), and others of the next generation after the Apostles (iii. 36 init., 37 init., and ad fin.), all of whom he regarded as flourishing under Trajan (A.D. 98–117). Accordingly he deals with Papias before going on to describe events at the end of Trajan's reign (iv. 2), and the accession of Hadrian in 117, in connexion with whom he refers to the Apology of Quadratus. There is no external evidence, therefore, apart from a confusion long ago cleared up by Lightfoot, to lead us to assign to Papias' Exposition a date later than about A.D. 115. Many scholars, indeed, point to the sentence, 'Touching those raised from the dead by the Christ, that they lived until Hadrian,' following immediately on some Papias matter in an epitome (Cod. Barocc. 142), as though it also were based on Papias, so that his work must be at least as late as Hadrian's reign. But the epitome is really based on Eusebius (with a few touches added directly from Papias in this connexion), and here passes on from Papias in Euseb. iii. 39 to Quadratus as cited in iv. 2, as the very form of the sentence, 'Touching . . . that they lived . . .,' suggests.

With this agrees also the internal evidence, as it seems to emerge from a comparison of the erroneous tendencies implied by his work, on the one hand, and, on the other, the Epistles of Ignatius and Polycarp, which fall about A.D. 115. The affinities with Polycarp, whom Irenæus makes Papias' comrade at one time, are specially striking—

'Let us therefore so serve Him [Christ] with fear and all due reverence, even as He Himself gave injunctions, and the Apostles who brought us the Gospel, and the prophets who proclaimed beforehand the coming of our Lord. . . . For every one who shall not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is antichrist [cf. 1 Jn 4th]; and whosoever shall not confess the testimony of the Cross, is of the devil; and whosoever shall perversely interpret the Oracles of the Lord (μαθοῦναι τὰ λόγια τοῦ κυρίου) to his own lusts, and say that there is neither resurrection nor judgment, that man is the firstborn of Satan. Wherefore let us leave behind the vanity of the many [“vain and empty talk and the error of the many,” ch. 2] and false teachings, and turn unto the message which was delivered unto us from the beginning. . . .’ (chs. 6–7). Here we get the idea of safety in close adherence to the injunctions (ἐντολαί) of Christ and His Apostles, or 'the message which was delivered' by them 'from the beginning,' in contrast to 'false teachings' by which 'the many' were apt, in love of empty talk, to be led into error, especially through perverse interpretations of 'the Oracles of the Lord.' The motive of such misinterpretation was Docetic denial of the reality of Christ's human body and of the significance of bodily self-control in the Christian, since 'there is neither resurrection nor judgment.' This comes out more clearly in Ignatius, for instance in the warning, 'Keep your flesh as a temple of God,' in his letter to Philadelphia, which lay less than 50 miles from Hierapolis, on the main road to the coast. This letter affords marked parallels to the situation implied in Papias' preface. Its central idea is that Christ Himself is the Christian's standard, his law of thought and conduct (κατὰ χριστουαίαν, ch. viii.; cf. 'having Christ as law,' χριστονομίας, ad Rom. inscr.), and that all exegesis, even of the Scriptures, is to be tested by this criterion. Only Ignatius and Papias apply the supreme test differently. The former appeals straight to the notorious central facts of Christ's life and of Christian experience: 'His Cross and Death and Resurrection, and the faith that is through Him' (ch. 8). Papias essays the detailed task of supplying a standard exegesis of the Lord's own Great Sayings, in virtue of his special contact with authentic Apostolic tradition in Asia. The difference turns not only on the fact that the two men represent different types of Christian attitude, but also on their respective local traditions and opportunities; and it does not point to any real difference in date between their writings.

The milder tone used by Papias towards the errors in question (which are largely similar, as we see from Polycarp, who is a link between Ignatius and Papias), as compared with both Ignatius and Polycarp, is against the notion of a considerably later date for his Exposition. Indeed, it is hard, in the absence of any reference by Eusebius to Papias as engaged, like Ignatius, in refuting any deadly heresy, to believe that Papias was writing after Ignatius' polemic had sharpened, as it must have done, the Asian Churches' sense of the gravity of Docetism in Christianity. Its prevalence may, indeed, have led Papias to lay special emphasis on the realistic aspect of the millennium—a feature in which he was followed by Irenæus and others, to Eusebius' keen regret. But his attitude to gnosis seems less severe than we should expect after A.D. 115.*

3. Gospels known to Papias.—We have seen that Papias knew our Matthew and Mark. Eusebius tells us that he also used proof texts from 1 John, probably, e.g., the anti-Docetic 1 Jn 4th cited by Polycarp as above; and this certainly suggests knowledge of the Fourth Gospel, of which there seem also to be traces in the fragments of Papias' Exposition as known to us (cf. also Westcott, Canon (1889), p. 71, n. 2). Even the order in which he refers to Apostles by name in his preface is that of Jn 1st, while his reference to Christ as the Truth, and, as such, the Fountainhead of Divine precepts (ἐντολαί), points the same way. Probably, however, he used the Johannine Gospel only as a secondary source of exegesis for the standard Matthean collection of 'the Oracles'—as, in fact, a 'book,' and so less 'helpful' than direct oral tradition. In the Argumentum to John's Gospel in a 9th cent. MS., we read: 'The Gospel of John was revealed and given to the Churches. . . ., even as Papias of Hierapolis, a dear disciple of John, has related in his five books.' His knowledge of Luke's Gospel is probable both in itself (cf. Lightfoot, Essays on Supernatural Religion, p. 186) and in relation to a seeming knowledge of Acts, shown by his traditional amplification of the end of Judas as given in Ac 1st, which he apparently tried to harmonize with Matthew's account. But no doubt he preferred to cite Mt. where he could, as being to him a work of direct Apostolic authorship, while Luke's Gospel was not even, like Mark's, only one remove from an Apostle's witness.

Some not only see in the phraseology of Papias' apology for Mark's Gospel traces of the influence of Lk 1st, but also infer

* Papias' very archaic use of οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, for the men of the first generation, particularly Christ's personal disciples, is another indication of early date. In Irenæus this phrase always describes those of the second generation at least.

* Thus he, unlike most others, does not need to describe Papias as 'bishop of Hierapolis.'

that Papias is there meeting the criticism of a party in Asia who held to Luke's Gospel, if not exclusively (like Marcion later), yet in so preferential a way as to make it, and not our Matthew, the standard by which to criticise Mark's work (so Domi Chapman in Revue Bénédictine, July 1905). This is more than dubious.

In a word, if our reading of the situation which Papias had in view in writing be correct, his attitude to our Gospels is just what we should expect from other sources that it would be, if he were writing in Asia about A.D. 115-120. At that time, not the form but the substance of Christ's teaching, whether oral or written, was still the prime matter. The Canon, or 'rule' of faith, consisted of the Lord's words, however obtained, if only it were in purity (cf. Polyc. ad Phil. 2, 'remembering what things the Lord said when teaching'). These constituted 'the Gospel' that lay behind the Gospels, and secured their general use, particularly in public worship—out of which canonical authority itself gradually grew (see B. Weiss, Manual of Introd. to the NT [1887], i. 32 ff.). This must be borne in mind in estimating the use of all New Testament books in early Christian writers, and makes the task of identifying Evangelic quotations so delicate an art (cf. Sanday, The Gospels in the Second Century, and The NT in the Apostolic Fathers, Oxford, 1905). But once it is allowed for, Papias becomes a valuable positive witness to our Canonical Gospels, as distinct from other Gospel writings which, no doubt, existed at that time in considerable numbers. Whether he used any apocryphal Gospel is quite doubtful. Eusebius' statement that 'he has set forth another story also about a woman informed against to the Lord on the score of many sins, which the Gospel according to the Hebrews includes,' by no means proves that Papias got his version of the story from the Gospel in question (cf. Bacon in Expositor, 1905, pp. 161-177).

4. General reflexions.—Although we are unable to conceive in detail the exact character of Papias' Exposition of Oracles of the Lord, even our meagre knowledge of it, especially when taken in connexion with other Christian writings of the period, helps us not a little to realize the way in which our Gospels, and Gospels generally, were viewed and handled early in the 2nd century. Both it and the Oxyrhynchus Gospel—fragments of which have been found by Grenfell and Hunt—teach us not only that Christ's sayings were the most prized part of the Gospel tradition, but also how strong were the tendencies at work making for change in their meaning and even wording. They were heard or read in environments of thought far other than those for which they were first spoken; and just because they were taken so seriously and practically as Divine 'oracles,' as religious laws of life, their historical or original meaning was apt to be lost as soon as they passed beyond Palestine, and the fresh meanings or glosses put upon them tended insensibly to replace the Master's ipsissima verba. Here the instances afforded by the Oxyrhynchus Gospel of how in all good faith such a process of transformation took place, are most suggestive. They show how needful something like a standard exegesis, based on knowledge of the original historical sense, was becoming to the genuine transmission of Christ's own teaching, if it was not to be sublimated away in terms of Greek idealism and Oriental mysticism. Such a consummation was averted only by strenuous insistence on the part of the local Church leaders, that every care was to be taken to keep in touch with the historic meaning of the Lord's earthly teaching, as certified by Gospels historically known to be of Apostolic or quasi-Apostolic authorship, and expounded in the first instance by the aid of continuous local tradition going back to similar sources. Thus was the mass of Gospels once current in the 2nd cent.—and varying as between Syria and Rome, Asia Minor and Egypt—gradually sifted out; until by the close of the century, and a good deal earlier in some places, our four authentic Gospels emerged as the Church's standard, or Canon, of the Lord's own teaching and its true significance.

VERNON BARTLET.

PARABLE.—1. Definition and Classification.—

The word 'parable' is an oft-recurring one in the Synoptic Gospels, appearing altogether 48 times. Otherwise it is found in the NT only in He 9^o 11¹⁹ (RV), where it has the meaning of 'type' or 'symbol' (AV 'figure'). The Evangelists' use of it suggests that for them it was a technical term designating a certain form of discourse or method of teaching, and they report Jesus as employing it in like manner. It is always introduced as something well known, and nowhere defined. The readers are assumed to be as familiar with it as are the writers. This occasions no surprise, for we know that the term had long been current in the circle to which the Evangelists belonged, appearing, as it does, often in the LXX. The connexion between the NT usage and that of the LXX is expressly pointed out by St. Matthew (13³⁵), who sees in Jesus' use of parables the fulfilment of Ps 78².

In the LXX παραβολή serves frequently, though not uniformly, to tr. the Heb. māshāl (מָשָׁל). The practice is sufficiently constant to warrant the assumption that it had much the same range of meaning. But, accepting this as true, we have made little progress in determining the exact significance of παραβολή, for as yet agreement has not been attained with reference to the definition of the Semitic original (שָׁר, Aram. מְשָׁל). By some scholars the root is thought to mean primarily to represent or stand for something (so Fleischer; cf. Franz Delitzsch, Com. zu Prov., Leipzig, 1873, p. 43 f.; Gesenius-Buhl, HWB; Bugge, Die Haupt-Parabeln, i. 20 f.); while others, following a different line of derivation, make the conception of likeness or resemblance to be fundamental (König in Hastings' DB iii. p. 661; cf. Jülicher, Die Gleichnisse Jesu, i. p. 36 f.). An examination of the OT makes it evident that Hebrew writers employed the term in the broadest and most inclusive way. Allegory, similitude, parable, proverb, paradox, type, and even riddle could be so designated. Jülicher concludes (op. cit. i. p. 37) that the most that can be done in the way of definition is to say that in the OT māshāl is a discourse expressing or implying comparison. The limitations thus suggested are, that it be a complete statement and not merely a word or phrase, and that it employ or rest on comparison.

The modern understanding of the word 'parable' has not as yet become well defined. One naturally expects this to follow the Greek conception, but in many definitions one finds a considerable infusion of the Semitic point of view. παραβολή (from παρά 'beside,' and βάλλειν 'to throw or cast') signifies literally a placing beside, and in ancient rhetoric designates an illustration or comparison. The fundamental idea is thus in agreement with that which is found by some in the Heb. māshāl. Aristotle classes parable and fable together as means of indirect proof, more convenient and easier to use than historical example for one who is able to detect resemblances, but less effective.

That the Synoptists should entertain this narrower and more definite view of Greek and Roman writers is not to be anticipated. One expects to find in them rather the wider and more indefinite application of Semitic authors, and in this one is not disappointed. Proverb (Lk 4²³), paradox (Mk 7¹⁷), similitude (4³⁰), allegory (4¹³), and example or illustrative instance (Lk 12¹⁶) are so named. The word appears with sufficient frequency to make evident its wide application. This does not prove, of course, that in the NT it has a meaning identical with that which it bears in the OT. It is Jülicher's view that a new element entered in during the period of the Jewish-Hellenistic literature. Besides being a complete thought and expressing or implying comparison, the parable is now understood to veil a hidden meaning. The real teaching is not in what the words seem to say, but in their deeper import. We shall have occasion to return to this topic after reviewing the range of the parabolic material.

It is not to be assumed that the Synoptists have prefixed a title to all the sections that they regarded as παραβολαί. On the contrary, they have done so only incidentally as occasion required, since they had no particular interest in rhetorical categories. In Mk. the word παραβολή is found 13 times, with reference to 6 different sections; 17 times in Mt., with reference to 12 sections; and 18 times in Lk., with reference to 13 sections. It is not used in Jn., but παραμίμνη occurs with much the same meaning. Deducting parallels, there are 20 passages in the Synoptic Gospels that are spoken of as parables. How far short this comes of full enumeration is made evident by noting the number of parables recognized by modern expositors: e.g. van Koetsveld, 79 (including Jn.); Bugge, 71; Weinel, 59; Jülicher, 53; Heinrich, 39; Lisco, 37; Bruce, 33, and 8 parable germs.

This divergence of opinion makes it evident that it is not easy to determine the precise extent of the parabolic material. Nor is it easy to discover a satisfactory principle for classifying it. This has been attempted from various points of view. Some have sought to make the truth taught a standard for grouping. So Bruce distinguishes (1) Theoretic parables, or those embodying a general teaching regarding the Kingdom of God; (2) the parables of Grace; (3) the parables of Judgment. Others have made the realm from which the illustration was taken the criterion of division. More satisfactory results are obtained by paying heed to the form of the parable, that is, to the character of the illustration and the manner of its introduction. From this point of view a large portion of the material falls within one general division. To this belong all the sections in which a spiritual or moral truth is established or enforced by the use of an express or implicit comparison. An appeal is made to common experience, to what is recognized and accepted by all, in support of less evident truths pertaining to a higher realm. The tacit assumption is that the same laws are valid for moral and religious as for daily practical life. If assent is yielded without hesitation in the one case, it cannot be withheld in the other.

At times the comparison is expressly made by some formula, or by some word or particle (e.g. ὁμοίον, ὡσπερ, or ὡς). Attention is in this way directed to the resemblance between two distinct relationships. The writer makes his readers aware that a concrete experience is being used to teach some moral or spiritual lesson. Parables of this kind have been happily called Similitudes. The passage regarding the Fig-tree, found in all the Gospels (Mk 13^{28f.}, Mt 24^{32f.}, Lk 21^{29f.}), and designated in them all as a parable, is a good example. 'Now from the fig-tree learn her parable: when her branch is now become tender and putteth forth its leaves, ye know that the summer is nigh; even so ye also, when ye see these things coming to pass, know that it is nigh, even at the doors.' All the dwellers in Palestine knew that the bursting buds and tender shoots of the fig-tree gave unmistakable indication that summer was at hand. The application is that the nearness of the Parousia can with equal certainty be inferred from the signs that immediately precede its coming. There is here no thought of the resemblance of details, as, for example, between summer and the Parousia; but in both instances it is pointed out that with equal certainty, from the signs of the coming, the nearness of the coming itself can be inferred. The likeness is one of relationships and not of details. In the pair of parables of the Hidden Treasure and the Pearl of Great Price we have two illustrations of like character to enforce the one truth, that to gain a possession of greatest value no sacrifice is too great. The Synoptic records afford evidence that not infrequently Jesus thus employed a double illustration. The attempt to discover resemblances between the Kingdom of heaven and the treasure or the pearl may be homiletically admissible, but it is exegetically beside the mark. Equally irrelevant are the ethical discussions regarding the conduct of the man who found the treasure. Jesus no more approves the quality of his act than He does that of the younger brother, or that of the unjust steward.

The following inferences regarding the character of a Similitude are possible in view of what has been said: (1) Fundamentally it is a comparison. Often this is expressly indicated, as above. (2) It is a comparison of relationships and not of details. There may chance to be some suggestive resemblance in details, but this is immaterial to the real purpose of the illustration. (3) In each Similitude there is one main comparison and one application, one truth that is unfolded. (4) Since there are two parts, the statement needing proof and the illustration supplying this, it is wrong, as is often done, to speak of the illustration alone as the Similitude. (5) The purpose of the Similitude is manifestly to elucidate or to prove, to win assent for what is unfamiliar by an appeal to what is well known.

A group of passages of lesser extent than the one just considered makes a like use of sayings which were apparently proverbial. Lk 4²³ is an instance of this: 'And he said unto them, Doubtless ye will say unto me this parable, Physician, heal thyself: whatsoever we have heard done at Capernaum, do also here in thine own country.' Jesus' conduct is likened to that of the physician in question. The proverb by itself does not constitute the parable, but the proverb used as an illustration. Since such proverbs are the concise and pointed formulations of the truths of common experience, we need not differentiate these parables from those last discussed—no further, at least, than to make them a subdivision of the Similitudes. Besides the passage quoted, others, such as M. 5^{14b}, 6²⁴ (Lk 16¹³) 15¹⁴ (Lk 6³⁹) 24²⁸ (Lk 17³⁷), Mk 2¹⁷ (Mt 9^{12f.}, Lk 5^{31f.}), would be included.

Often the illustration from experience is not stated as a general inference, recognized always and by all, but is embodied in the form of a specific incident, in what was done by some person or persons, or in what happened to them. Thus Lk 15¹¹⁻³² begins, 'A certain man had two sons,' and Mk 4³⁻⁹ 'Behold, the sower went forth to sow.' In purpose and in the way the illustration is employed there is close resemblance between this group and the Similitudes. The difference is mainly in the definiteness of the experience. Here it is presented as a single occurrence. It may still be, and no doubt usually is, wholly imaginary. All that is required is a degree of naturalness and probability sufficient to command unhesitating assent. Such a story, formed by the imagination from the material of actual experience, might be classed as a Fable, had not this name gained in the course of time a restricted meaning. By many writers it is looked upon as applicable only to the small group of animal fables in which the main actors are animals or inanimate objects. Since such stories often serve merely to entertain or to teach worldly prudence and discretion, the difference between parable and fable is made by some to consist in the kind of truth enforced. The latter is restricted to the lower realm of worldly knowledge, while the former is assigned to the service of the higher truths of morality and religion. We need not further discuss the distinction, because fable has become exclusively associated in most minds with the type of teaching attributed to Æsop. To connect it with any of the discourses of Jesus would occasion misunderstanding. Jülicher's proposal is to retain for this group the name Parable in its narrower meaning. Until a better designation is found, it will be well to accept this.

The Gospel of Lk. contains at least four sections differing in character from any previously considered. They have the narrative form, but the illustration is taken, not from a different realm, but from that to which the truth under discussion belongs. A specific instance wherein this is exemplified is recited to win the approval or call forth the disapprobation of the hearer. The application is made, not through analogy, not by some word expressing likeness or resemblance, but by simple affirmation: 'So is it' or 'so should it not be.' The Good Samaritan (Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁷), the Foolish Rich Man (12¹⁶⁻²⁰), the Rich Man and Lazarus (16¹⁹⁻³¹), and the Pharisee and the Publican (18⁹⁻¹⁴) belong to this group. Possibly, as Heinrici suggests (*PKE*³, vi. 692), we ought also to add the accounts of the Importunate Friend (11^{58c}), and the Unjust Judge (18^{35c}), since the lesson is gained in these instances by reasoning a minori ad majus. It is often difficult, as here, to determine to which division a given section may be most properly assigned. Comparison enters into this class only through the demand made upon the listener to test his life and conduct by that depicted in the story. The abstract truth is commended to him in concrete form. We might call such illustrations, which stand apart from the groups previously enumerated, Narrative Examples, or perhaps it will be better to term them, with Jülicher, Illustrative Instances.

On the basis of the reference in Mk 7¹⁷ (Mt 15¹⁵) it has been proposed (cf. Bugge, op. cit. i. pp. 59, 15, and 16) to regard the Paradox as a class of parable. That the name might be so applied may, in the light of Semitic usage, be assumed as probable, though there is wide difference of view regarding this particular passage in Mk. and Mt. Expositors have not, however, generally made paradoxes a distinct group in their treatment of the parables.

It now remains to ask whether there is another class of passages that should be brought together under the head of Allegory. This question has recently been much discussed, and opinion is still widely divided. It is variously affirmed that, even according to the Synoptists, Jesus never spoke in allegories (Weinel, Die Gleichnisse Jesu, p. 30); or that He is mistakenly reported by them as so doing (Jülicher, op. cit. i. 61 ff. etc.); or that He did make use of allegories, and is correctly reported in this respect (Bugge, op. cit. i. 40 ff. etc.). Allegory (ἀλληγορία, ἀλληγορεῖν) comes from ἄλλο, 'other,' 'something else,' and ἀγορεύειν, 'to speak.' The word occurs as a substantive nowhere in the NT or in Biblical Greek, nor does the verb appear except in Gal 4²⁴, where St. Paul makes use of the participle ἀλληγοροῦμενος. It is a mode of speech whereby one thing is ostensibly described or narrated, while the primary reference is to something very different. It is thus closely akin to the metaphor (wh. see), differing from it in consisting not of a single word or concept, but of a series of concepts belonging to the same realm, and so related as to form together a continuous and intelligible narrative. Since the several details are introduced, not because they are the component parts of a vivid and artistic picture, but because of their suitability to portray the desired meaning, the best of allegories are marked by some degree of artificiality and incongruity. The attentive listener is made aware that the story is being told to convey some deeper meaning and not for its own sake. Often it will be impossible for him to determine what this is until the allegory has been wholly or in part interpreted. In other instances the setting in which it occurs may afford the needed clue. To understand it fully, he must be able to translate the terms one by one and read their hidden meaning. Naturally no one but the framer of the allegory can be his infallible guide in this. In the similitude and parable we do not feel the need of seeking for any meaning beyond that which the words usually bear, whereas in the allegory the deeper, hidden significance is of first importance. Are there sections in the Gospels of which this is true? It seems to be, to some degree, in at least five. Three are in the Synoptic Gospels, namely, the accounts of the Sower (Mk 4³⁻⁹, 14-20, Mt 13³⁻⁹, 18-23, Lk 8⁵⁻⁸, 11-15), of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mk 12¹⁻¹², Mt 21³³⁻⁴⁶, Lk 20⁹⁻¹⁹), and of the Tares (Mt 13²⁴⁻³⁰, 36-43); and two are from the Fourth Gospel, the Door of the Sheepfold (Jn 10¹⁻¹⁶), and the Vine and the Branches (15¹⁻⁸). In each of these, except the Wicked Husbandmen, an allegorical interpretation is expressly added, while in this latter the setting, the comments, as well as the character of the narration, suggest an allegory. According to the definition given above, none of the five passages can be regarded as a perfect and fully developed allegory, because each has unimportant details that are not, and clearly were not intended to be, interpreted. They are introduced as natural parts of the picture, without reference to a hidden meaning. For instance, in the Sower no deeper meaning attaches to the way, the thirty, sixty, and hundredfold, as would be the case in a carefully developed allegory. The Wicked Husbandmen and the Tares are better examples of allegory; but even in these there are several features without allegorical significance. The passages in the Fourth Gospel differ quite markedly from those in the Synoptics. The literal and the figurative are blended in such an unusual way that it has not been possible for commentators to agree in their classification. In ch. 10, following the first interpretation (vv. 7-10) comes a second (vv. 11-16), which seems to presuppose a closely related but really different allegory. Or we can regard these last verses as a new allegory with continuous interpretation. The discourse of ch. 15 is of exactly the same type; parallel to 'I am the good shepherd' we there have 'I am the true vine.' Besides lacking the unity that usually marks the allegory, these Johannine sections contain many terms that have no significance beyond that belonging to them in ordinary speech. It seems, nevertheless, more correct to class them as allegories than to call them parables with an allegorical interpretation, or collections of related metaphors.

In addition to these passages there are numerous others where little doubt can exist that the Evangelists understood some details allegorically, for they suggest, even if they do not give, such an interpretation. By way of illustration the reference to the whole and the sick (Mk 2¹⁷) may be cited, so also the taking away of the bridegroom (22^o), and the blind who lead the blind (Mt 15¹⁴, Lk 6³⁹). Jülicher maintains that they looked on all parables as allegories. They have given, it is true, few allegorical interpretations, and have not often indicated that they felt such treatment necessary, but this is only because their practice is not in accord with their theory. Whenever they reflect (as they do in Mk 4¹⁰⁻¹², 33-34 || Mt 13¹⁰⁻¹⁵, 34^{ff.}, Lk 8⁹⁻¹⁰), they think of parables as always veiling a hidden meaning, one hard to be understood and intelligible to the disciples themselves only after interpretation. This conception, as was stated above, is not held to be their own creation, but is thought to be one that came to them from the age of the Jewish-Hellenistic literature. It was the product of scribal activity. Such an explanation is open to serious question. It may be doubted whether existing evidence proves that the notion of mystery belonged so exclusively to this later period. It is true that with the decadence of prophecy men looked for the message of God in what had been said rather than in what was being said, and that the allegorical method of exegesis was assiduously cultivated. It may also be true that the Gospels indicate that, at the time when the Evangelists wrote, the words of Jesus received to some extent like treatment; but that it went to the length that this theory supposes is not attested. Such a claim could be more reasonably made for the Church Fathers and the interpreters of later generations. From post-Apostolic days even down to the present the prevailing method of exegesis has been allegorical. (On its prevalence in Alexandrian and Palestinian circles before and after Christ, see Hastings' DB, art. 'Allegory,' i. p. 64). Representatives (e.g. Chrysostom, Calvin, Maltonatus) of sounder interpretation have not been altogether wanting, but they have been little heeded. There is no parable or detail of a parable that has not received many and conflicting interpretations. The judge of Lk 18², for example, according to some stands for God, and according to others for the devil. Elsewhere results are no less incongruous (e.g. Mt 24²⁸, Lk 17³⁷; Mt 24³⁵, Lk 12³⁹; Lk 11⁵⁻⁸). So great was the contradiction, that in the 17th cent. the thesis was proposed that parables should not be used as a source of doctrine, but only to illustrate and confirm what was otherwise established ('theologia parabólica non est argumentativa,' cf. Jülicher, op. cit. i. p. 277). The form of the disciples' question (Mk 4¹⁰, cf. 33, 34) might at first incline us to agree that the Church Fathers were but following the Synoptists, were it not that so many parables are recorded without even suggestion that they need interpretation. Jülicher finds it a priori improbable that a popular teacher, who expressed himself without any considerable deliberation or preparation, should employ such a highly artificial, rhetorical form as the allegory. This tends to veil rather than to reveal, and belongs to the writer rather than to the speaker. He concedes that Jesus may on occasion have made metaphorical or allegorical application of certain suggestive details of some parable, but finds little or no evidence of His having done so. Everything indicates, rather, that all the passages to which we have alluded derive their allegorical features and interpretations from the writers. Originally, as spoken by Jesus, the Synoptic accounts were parables in the narrower meaning of the term.

This extreme position of Professor Jülicher has been opposed by many, and unqualifiedly approved by few. Admitting the proclivity of Jesus' hearers, by reason of their traditions, to give an allegorical interpretation to many details, admitting that this might be increasingly done as men recalled these discourses and reflected on their import and sought to apply them to existing conditions, still to deny to Jesus all allegorical application of details and restrict Him to simple comparison, is unwarranted. If along with comparison (e.g. Mt 23³⁷ [Lk 13³⁴] 10¹⁶ [Lk 10⁸], Lk 10¹⁸) He made frequent use of metaphor, as the Gospels indicate (e.g. Mk 5³⁴ 10²¹ [Mt 19²¹], Lk 18²² 12⁴⁰ [Lk 20⁴⁷]), and if He expanded comparison into parable, is it unwarrantable to assume that occasionally metaphor might be so extended as to become virtually an allegory? As long as such an interpretation of suggestive particulars contributes in a natural way to the enforcement of the main lesson, it cannot be considered irrelevant or artificial. Weinel has pointed out (*Die Bildersprache Jesu in ihrer Bedeutung für die Erforschung seines inneren Lebens*², 1906) that in its psychological origin the parable is closely akin to the allegory. It springs often from some suggestive analogy of detail which might well be made evident in the progress of the discourse. Such an assumption does not, to be sure, account for all the allegorical features that a sound exegesis will discover in the Gospels, but it enables us to understand how Jesus may, in the case of some parables, have added an application distinctly allegorical, as, for example, in the account of the Sower. And if He wished to address to His enemies such thoughts as are contained in the Wicked Husbandmen, could they have been more suitably presented? The great service of Jülicher and of B. Weiss before him in effectually discrediting false methods of interpretation and establishing true, can hardly receive too great recognition. But past extravagances and present danger of their perpetuation do not furnish adequate reason for denying to Jesus the use of allegory, or of parables so developed as to be hardly distinguishable therefrom. We accordingly admit allegory as a division of our classification.

2. Purpose.—Why did Jesus make use of parables? It would occur to hardly any reader of the Gospels to-day to be in doubt as to their purpose, were it not for the statements of the Synoptists. Parables have been used by teachers of all ages to unfold and enforce their instruction. Was it otherwise with Jesus? Is it otherwise, for example, in His use of the story of the Prodigal Son? The passage which occasions the perplexity is as follows: 'And when he was alone, they that were about him with the twelve asked of him the parables. And he said unto them, Unto you is given the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all things are done in parables: that [i.e.] seeing they may see, and not perceive, and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest haply they should turn again, and it should be forgiven them. And he saith unto them, Know ye not this parable? and how shall ye know all the parables? . . . And with many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it. And without a parable spake he not unto them: but privately to his own disciples he expounded all things' (Mk 4¹⁰⁻¹², 33, 34, cf. Mt 13¹⁰, 34^{ff.}, Lk 8⁹). These words are beset with difficulty from any point of view. Taken by themselves they affirm that parables lead to the hardening of men's hearts, and were intended so to do. Notwithstanding differences in statement, all three accounts are in substantial agreement as to this. It is instinctively felt, however, that Jesus could not possibly have entertained a purpose so at variance with the spirit of His whole ministry. He went forth to seek and to save that which was lost. To win, not to harden; to enlighten, not to mystify, was ever His endeavour. Otherwise, why should He express surprise at the failure of His hearers to comprehend His parables? Why should He exhort them to hear? Can we think that He would mock at their helplessness? Why should He speak to His own disciples as well as to the multitude in parables which they could not understand without interpretation? Does not the parable of the Sower, to which these words are joined, imply an understanding on the part of all classes, even though all do not alike heed and profit by what is heard? It is evident that the statements cannot be attributed to Jesus in their most obvious meaning. While this is generally conceded, there is disagreement as to how they are to be qualified and the extent to which this should be done. A few have resorted to text emendation for the removal of the difficulties, but most have preferred to keep the form and seek for a new interpretation. Some expositors suppose that the truths needful for salvation were not presented after this manner, but in a way intelligible to all. What is here said refers only to parables dealing with the mysteries of the nature of the Kingdom of heaven, or the one mystery of its gradual development. Or this reference is limited to the parables of this chapter, or to the parables of Judgment. Such teaching, being suited only to those who are already disciples, is so conveyed that they alone receive it, while outsiders hear without understanding. The improbability and unnaturalness of such a supposition are too apparent to need refutation. The harshness of the view is softened by assuming that the un-receptive and unworthy multitude already stood self-condemned because of their rejection of the message of salvation. Teaching in parables is part of their just punishment, and serves also to keep the door open for those who may become receptive. Another way of removing the harshness is to say that the parable, while executing God's judgment, was at the same time a merciful provision, preventing an increase of guilt. Had the un-receptive understood what was taught in these parables regarding Jesus and themselves, or had it been spoken openly, they would have added to existing sins those of hate and blasphemy, and fallen into a passion, making all hearing impossible for themselves and others.

A different explanation is proposed by those who see here the enunciation of a pedagogical purpose. No class of hearers, not even the disciples, can understand the truth so presented, but the receptive will reveal themselves by their questions as to the meaning of the parable, while the unresponsive remain indifferent, and thereby make clear the hopelessness of their condition. Plain speech would have been equally unintelligible to such hearers, whereas the parable was calculated to quicken in them a spirit of inquiry, if anything could. This, again, is a very improbable supposition. Another interpretation sees in these words a reference not to intellectual comprehension, but to the inner spiritual appropriation of the truth set forth. Jesus seeks for this on the part of all, but finds it wanting in those who were dulled and hardened in their short-sighted self-righteousness and superficial self-satisfaction. Their hearing is as though they heard not. The parables are thus a summons to the conscience of the hearer, and bring about a separation between the receptive and the unresponsive.

Professor Jülicher, together with other recent writers, accepts the verses in their most obvious meaning, but assigns them to the Evangelists. When Jesus' words were collected after His death, the large proportion of parabolic material attracted attention. An explanation was sought, and it was found in the character of those to whom the parables were addressed, and in their attitude toward Jesus. The multitude had not accepted Him as the Messiah. What had happened must have been in accord with the Divine plan. This plan had been fulfilled through the use of parables. Paul's teaching in Ro 9-11 is here applied by the Evangelists to the history of Jesus. J. Weiss, indeed, holds that Mk. was acquainted with Romans, and followed St. Paul (Die Schriften des NT, i. p. 101). Whatever may be thought as to the dependence, the likeness of conception is obvious.

This explanation has in its favour a full and frank recognition of the difficulty as well as the avoidance of forced and unnatural interpretation. Many who think that the passage goes back to Jesus admit that the Evangelists in their report have been in some measure influenced by the hostility and opposition of unbelieving Israel, so pronounced at the time when they wrote. The explanation gains added support from the fact that the existing difficulty is not confined to the words of Jesus, but is occasioned in part by the appended comments of the Evangelists. Still, it cannot yet lay just claim to the validity of a demonstration. That the Evangelists should feel the need of accounting for the large proportion of parabolic material in Jesus' teaching is not obvious. The proportion in Mk., with whom we have primarily to do, is not striking. We should need to postulate, what many deny, his acquaintance with the Logia. Again, if the Evangelists evolved this whole conception, it is certainly strange that they should make so little use of it. Writers are not wont thus to forget or neglect their own pet hypotheses, as Mk. apparently did, even in the course of ch. 4. Could he fail to notice, too, how his theory was contradicted by the readiness with which Jesus' hearers understood the account of the Wicked Husbandmen? With all their freedom in transmitting Jesus' words, is it probable that the writers would venture upon an entirely new creation of this kind at so late a date?

There is greater likelihood that we have to do in this passage with a saying of Jesus that, in the course of time, has been modified, or received a false emphasis. At what stage of the development of the Gospels the change took place we cannot be certain. The lack of responsiveness on the part of His hearers and the growing opposition of which we learn in the Gospels, may have caused Jesus to apply to His ministry the words of the prophet Isaiah (6^{9c}). The outcome of His mission might appear, on first thought, to be a repetition of this experience; but a deeper insight revealed as true what the parables of this chapter (Mk 4) teach. The despair of the prophet's words receives its answer. That it was the Evangelists who first brought this OT quotation into such connexion can be doubted, though we can no longer be certain of its exact application, and though the text does not seem here to be in order. If Jesus used the words ironically, they might be cherished by the Christians of the later days of conflict as a statement of the Divine purpose. There is, in any case, too much contradictory evidence to admit of our receiving them as the deliberate statement of Jesus' intention.

3. Interpretation.—In what sense is it permissible to speak of the interpretation of a parable? If we mean thereby an allegory, the need of translating its terms into their equivalents is evident. This will be required by the hearer in more or less fulness, according to circumstances. The statements of the Synoptists (Mk 4¹⁰⁻¹², 33-34 ||) are then comprehensible so far as they may refer to allegories, but can the same be claimed if the remaining parabolic material is likewise included? By some it is said that it can be for the narrative parables, or parables in the restricted meaning of the term. Similitude and Illustrative Instance are excepted, as necessarily clear from the way in which they are introduced, but narrative parables, being complete and independent accounts, require interpretation. The hearer is as little aware of their real significance as was David when listening to Nathan's story of the poor man and his lamb (2 S 12^{1ff.}). This view evidently represents Jesus as wont to relate incidents that had no apparent connexion with what was being said or done, and then to add an application, as the moral is appended to the fable. One, for instance, who heard about the Treasure in the field (Mt 13⁴⁴), or the Two Debtors (Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰), would have no reason to think of the Kingdom of heaven, or the duties of the sons of the Kingdom, until it was demanded by the application. The Gospels are not responsible for this theory, for they do not give the impression that Jesus kept His hearers in suspense. Either an explicit statement, as in the first example, or the occasion, as in the second, left commonly no doubt as to the topic under discussion. Furthermore, there seems to be no good reason for making such a distinction between this group of parables and the Similitudes and Illustrative Examples. Two parts are here essential to constitute a parable, the illustration and the truth illustrated. That the illustration appears in a slightly modified form does not involve a change in the parable's essential character. And can we suppose that Jesus ever told the people one story, or a series of stories, and withheld all indication of His purpose? What could be expected to result therefrom beyond a little entertainment? And even this would be of short duration, unless the stories were longer than most of our parables. How can we harmonize the fact that the parables, as they now stand, set forth in unparalleled clearness and beauty the deepest truths of the gospel, with the assumption that they were used by Jesus as a means of punishing the unrepentant by hiding the truth?

It is not improbable that oftentimes the illustrative half of a parable alone was preserved by tradition. In such cases we can speak of interpretation if we mean thereby the discovery of the original setting and application, whether this service is performed by the Evangelists or undertaken by their interpreters. Such an understanding of the term is, however, misleading, as it obviously does not represent the thought of Mk 4 and parallels. The demand of these passages is satisfied only when we assume that interpretation means an unfolding of details such as is provided for the story of the Sower. This would not be required for all parabolic material, but only for those parables that were considered to be allegories. We have found above that it is not easy to decide how many were included by the Synoptists in such a point of view. A priori considerations or ingenious conjecture cannot decide the question, but only the internal evidence discovered by detailed exegetical study.

4. Transmission and Value.—Have the Evangelists rightly understood and faithfully reported Jesus' parables? Had the tradition, upon which they were dependent, preserved an exact recollection of His words and their application? The parables were quite certainly spoken originally in Aramaic, and many of them, after being preserved for a time by oral tradition, may have first been written down in this same language. But even if the bulk of them were first written in Greek, we should, of course, still possess them only in translation. The possibility of modification accordingly exists, even if an earnest endeavour at historical accuracy, as we conceive of it, could be postulated. A comparison of the records of even the shortest parable appearing in all the Gospels, or in two of them, reveals many variations. While the major part are trifling, others may affect materially the meaning and structure of the parable. In the description of patching the old garment, for instance (Mk 2²¹, Mt 9¹⁶, Lk 5³⁶), the casual reader of the English notes the striking variation in Luke. The defenders of the validity of the several accounts in all their details have been wont to explain the divergences by advancing the hypothesis of the use of the same parable on different occasions. In some parables common to Mt. and Lk. such a view may be advocated with a show of reason, but when these two Gospels are following Mk. it has little support. There are parables, furthermore, like the one just noted and the Sower and the Wicked Husbandmen, that are spoken under conditions and with applications so much alike and at the same time so peculiar as to exclude any thought of repetition. The differences in the accounts of the Evangelists are unquestionable, and they leave the interpreter no choice. He must seek to ascertain the original form of the parable. If we say that these differences existed in the sources, we simply carry the problem back to an earlier stage and contribute nothing to its solution; and even then the personal equation of the Evangelist enters in, through the choice and arrangement of the details of his narrative. When we observe Mt.'s tendency to group material, revealed in so many connexions, we can but conclude that this purpose, rather than special knowledge of the occasion, has often determined the setting of his parables. A comparative study shows that each of the Synoptists has peculiarities which reveal themselves in his report. Lk.'s interest in the individual and his love of the beautiful are as noticeable as Mt.'s regard for the OT and discovery of allegorical meanings.

If the existing evidence proves that Jesus' words were not at first treated as unalterably holy, it does not, on the other hand, show that there was such freedom as to cast doubt on all His reported sayings, or justify giving them a value secondary to that of the narrative portions of the Gospels. Notwithstanding differences, the Synoptists show such essential agreement that we feel little doubt regarding most parables. The wonder is that there should be so little divergence, even though so short a period separated our records and their Aramaic sources from the original utterances. It can be urged in explanation that Jesus' teaching was too well remembered to admit of the incorporation of new creations. What He had said became early a precious heritage for all believers, and, besides, the parables are of a character to make them especially well remembered. Their freshness, beauty, and earnestness attest their originality and faithful transmission, as does also, in a special degree, their suitability to explain and enforce the teaching in whose service they are employed. That they can be so varied and at the same time so simple, excites wonder. One turns from Rabbinical literature to the parables of Jesus with an increased appreciation of their literary excellence, to say nothing of the marked contrast in dignity and grandeur of theme. Nor is there any writer of early Christian literature worthy of a place in this field beside the Master. An observation of the details and relationships of common life and an appreciation of their significance is revealed that is unparalleled. We gain an insight into the inner life of Jesus Himself, as well as into His teaching, that is afforded by hardly any other portions of the Gospels. The parables are rightly regarded as a most valuable part of the Evangelical tradition, and they will so continue when their right to be heard in their simplicity is generally recognized.

PARACLETE (παράκλητος).—The term is used only in RVm; and is applied to Christ in 1 Jn 2¹, and to the Holy Spirit in Jn 14^{16, 26} 15²⁶ 16⁷. For an examination of the Greek word and its cognates, see 'Paraclete' in Hastings' DB iii. 665 ff., also art. ADVOCATE in present work. A passive meaning, 'called to one's help,' is required by both the form and the classical usage, in which generally the word is technical, and denotes the adviser of a defendant, or his representative and counsel in a court of law. Gradually the two ideas of previous engagement by a client and of action only in the court or presence of a judge fall away, and the word comes to denote one who, in something of a representative character, carries on the cause and promotes the interest of another.

In Philo the process of the widening of the meaning of the word, used by him sometimes in a technical and sometimes in a more general sense, may almost be traced (cf. Hatch, Essays in Bibl. Greek, 1889, 82 f.), without the assumption of any Johannine dependence upon Philo. In the Talm. and Targ. the word is transliterated פִּרְקֵיט or פִּרְקֵיטָא. In the Targ. at Job 33²³ פִּרְקֵיט is rendered 'paraclete,' the idea being apparently that a special agency from God is needed 'to show unto man what is right,' and so produce repentance. Pirke Aboth, iv. 15, represents obedience to a single precept of the Law as a man's paraclete, averting punishment from him. In Shabb. 32a, the technical use of the word occurs, and the passage proceeds to assert that repentance and good works act in a similar way as paracletes for a man, ensuring his salvation. Similarly Baba bathra, 10a, makes all acts of charity and benevolence paracletes between Israel and the Father in heaven. The two daily offerings and the sin-offering (Zebahim, 7b) are paracletes, interceding for man and securing the favour of the King. In Talmudic times, consequently, the process of change had been carried so far that the word was capable of an impersonal use, and even the plants of Succoth might be spoken of as paracletes, praying in man's behalf for rain (T'arait, i. 63c). An earlier stage is occupied by the Johannine writings, where the word is still personal, though the strictly passive sense had already gone, and the judicial suggestiveness was disappearing.

A Babylonian origin has been claimed for the doctrine of the Paraclete on such grounds as that Nusku is persuaded by Ea and Marduk to join in the intervention against the revolted evil genii. But Nusku was only a messenger of Bel (Jensen, ZA xi. 29; Jastrow, Rel. of Bab. 220 f.); and though he continued for some time to be known to the northern Semites (cf. the Nérab inscr. in Cooke, North-Semitic Inscr. 186 f.), his assumed functions differed generally from those of a paraclete, and entirely from those referred to in the Fourth Gospel. The term is certainly not Babylonian in its origin; and preparations for its NT use may be found not only in Philo and the Targums, but even in Ps 347 and Joh 3323, though neither Jesus nor the author of the Johannine literature needed such preparations. Both had sufficient literary faculty to be able to pass without guidance from the literal to a metonymous sense of a word, and to place it appropriately amid new connexions.

The term is applied both to Christ Himself and to the Holy Spirit in meanings that may be classified. Christ is referred to as a Paraclete in two passages. 1. During His historic manifestation (cf. 'another' in Jn 14¹⁶) He acted in two ways concurrently upon men, promoting the interests of God. Immanently He was in them 'the light which lighteth every man' (Jn 1⁹); and objectively He brought to bear upon them from without the influence of His example and teaching. It is in the latter sphere that His provisional work as Paraclete, agent for God amongst men, is to be found. Evidently He regarded it as less permanently valuable for man than the indwelling life, which the coming of the Spirit would enrich, securing thus the control and the development of the regenerate heart from within; and hence He could say, 'It is expedient for you that I go away' (Jn 16⁷). 2. Since Pentecost, Christ acts as Paraclete for man with God (1 Jn 2¹). In His immanence He represents all, as His propitiation avails for all; but specifically His immanent union with believers is made more effective by their attitude of consent and devotion, and He carries on their cause with the Father, covering their sins and acting personally in their behalf (cf. He 7²⁵, Ro 8³⁴, Lk 2³² 23³⁴, Jn 17²⁴).

On the other hand, the Spirit is the Paraclete of God with and in man, sent to carry on His cause and to make perfect the surrender to Him and the service of His people. The term 'sent' is used officially of the Spirit, as of the Incarnate in regard to His historical manifestation. The distinction must not be unduly pressed; but the Paraclete's work in the hearts of the disciples themselves is the prominent assurance of Jn 14¹⁶ 26. His work through them on the world that of Jn 16⁷, whilst Jn 15²⁶ is intermediate, and combines the qualifying grace with the incitement to witness.

The Paraclete is not mentioned by that name elsewhere in the Gospels; but His functions as such are referred to not only in the intimate conversation on the evening of the betrayal, but in such preparatory words as Jn 13³ 7³⁸. And though the word is Johannine, the teaching has its parallels in the Synoptics (Mt 10²⁰, Mk 13¹¹, Lk 11¹³ 12¹² 24⁴⁹); and the general idea which our Lord, according to the testimony of all the Evangelists, sought to communicate and to expand, seems to have been that since He could no longer remain in the flesh to promote the cause of God in His disciples, He would act in heaven as their representative with the Father, and the Holy Spirit would come to dwell in them and to further whatever tended to their perfection and to God's glory.

PARADISE.—The word is a Persian one, and was adopted by the Hebrews from the mildest and most benevolent of their conquerors. Like most words with sufficient impetus to find their way into another language, it brings with it something of the character of the race from which it comes. It means something that the NT receives 'Legion' and 'Prætorium' from Rome, and 'Paradise' from Persia. It seems in its first home to have denoted a park-like garden,—an enclosure fenced in from evil influences outside, and yet not so artificial as to be solely the work of man and devoid of natural landscape beauties. Herds of deer and other wild animals found a happy home in the old Persian paradises (Xen. Cyr. i. 3. 14, Anab. i. 2. 7). But a word entering the speech of a strong nation does not remain unaltered. The strength of Israel was religious, and the word 'Paradise' became on her lips restricted to the great garden where God at the first had talked with man. Paradise became to her the lost Eden, the garden of the four rivers and the two mystic trees. It was impossible, however, to the Hebrew that anything religious should remain a mere memory. In process of time it became a heavenly and an inspiring hope. A cool and fragrant Paradise awaits the faithful Hebrew after death. The Golden Age creates the future home of the people of God.

It was to little purpose that the Alexandrian Jewish school combated this conception as too materialistic and earthy. The popular mind saw nothing attractive in the allegorizing which taught that Paradise meant 'virtue,' and the trees of the garden the thoughts of spiritual men. The strangely mingled life man lives, half in, half out of the spiritual world, will not suffer a system which ignores so large a portion of his consciousness.

This was its meaning to the mass of men in Gospel times. It appears thrice in the NT,—in Lk 23⁴³, in 2 Co 12⁴, and in Rev 2⁷,—and its history on the sacred page seems that of a spiral curve upwards. St. Paul's reference is so mystic as to remain somewhat indefinite, yet it is up to Paradise he is caught. But in Revelation the spiritual meaning shines through the thin veil of the pictorial promise to the Ephesian 'angel.'

It is not without interest to observe that in later times and outside Scripture the word seems in two directions to take a downward slant: first, among Mohammedans as applied to their carnal heaven, and afterwards in the Mediaeval Church as indicating a place (the Limbus Patrum) reserved for departed souls who are only in partial and imperfect communion with the faithful.

Our Lord's solitary use of the word constitutes by far its greatest interest to Christians. He who spoke of 'the kingdom of God' or 'the kingdom of heaven' to the Apostles, used the word 'Paradise' to the dying brigand on the cross. The connotation of a term rises and falls with the mood of the speaker. But with the Speaker on this occasion, His mood is always regulated by the receptivity of the hearer. This man never knew much of any world beyond his own world of violence and rapine. He was dying now. What he needed was a form of comfort—real and true, no doubt, but such as he could reach and relish. He was writhing in thirst and agony, and the simple, common, current idea of Paradise, with its rest and relief, was to him, for the time being, the chiefest good. The hope of such a change was a simple hope; but a plain thought may be as true, as far as it goes, as a complex one; just as an outline may be as correct as a finished portrait. Anything more advanced would have meant nothing to the repentant robber. He who 'knew what was in man' gave the promise. See, further, art. M. P. JOHNSTONE.

PARADOX.—The paradoxes of the Gospels may be divided into three kinds. (1) Truth may be expressed in a way to shock opinion from its dogmatic slumber. Brief and vivid statements are made without qualification or explanation; metaphors are used to arrest the attention and stimulate the imagination, rather than to give a definite picture of the truth; a contrast which will force the hearer to think for himself is preferred to an argument which he need only follow. 'Paradoxes,' it has been said, 'are the burrs of literature—they stick.' (2) Truth often appears paradoxical at the time of its discovery, because it runs contrary to current conventions. Our view of men and things contains little knowledge, but much opinion. Custom alone makes us forget that we are living upon a volcano, until the revelation of some new truth revolutionizes all. So the fact that the world moves appeared paradoxical enough in the 16th century. Its strangeness was due to the environment into which it was thrust. (3) But sometimes the most adequate expression of a truth that we can reach still retains its paradoxical character in spite of time and familiarity, owing to the conflict of the conceptions united in its expression. We believe that the opposition is harmonized in reality, but we have as yet no clear and distinct idea of the reconciliation.

Each of these three kinds of paradox may be abundantly illustrated from the Gospels; and some of the most remarkable of the sayings of Jesus exemplify all three (Mt 5³⁹, Jn 12^{24, 25}).

1. Much of the teaching of Jesus naturally took the form of condensed and vivid aphorisms. Systematic discourse, such as a moral philosopher might attempt, would not have been appropriate. It could hardly have been recorded; it would not have been understood. Moreover, Jesus was setting forth fundamental principles which could not be demonstrated, but appealed directly to the moral intuition for acceptance (Mt 5^{37, 39ff.}). Further, He often suggested spiritual truths through analogies or metaphors, which, however suggestive, cannot be pressed in detail (Mt 11^{12, 17}, Lk 18²⁵, Jn 13³⁻¹⁷). Again we find contrasts that were clearly intended to enforce reflexion (Mt 7^{1-6, 10³⁴⁻³⁹}, Lk 14²⁶, Jn 15^{12, 17}). In short, Jesus would naturally avoid expressions which could be taken quite literally (Mt 5^{38-41, 18^{21, 22, 6³⁴}}, 25¹⁻¹³). For He came to give a new spirit to the world, not to lay down a detailed scheme of life and order of society, which in time must have become antiquated, if not lifeless.

2. The moral and religious teaching of Jesus, though foreshadowed by the Law and the Prophets, came into sharp conflict with the formalism that petrified Jewish life in His day (Mt 15¹⁰⁻²⁰, Mk 2^{18-28, 3¹⁻⁶}). More paradoxical still must have appeared His condemnation of the Pharisees (Mt 23¹⁻³⁸), His friendship with publicans and sinners (Mt 9⁹⁻¹³, Mk 2^{15, 16}, Lk 19¹⁻¹⁰), His conception of the Messiah (Mk 10^{45, 8²⁷⁻³⁸}).

3. Finally, there is the important class in which opposite and apparently conflicting aspects of truth, life, and duty are expressed in a form which does not completely harmonize them. In the teaching of Jesus we have unworlly simplicity united with worldly shrewdness (Mt 7^{15, 10^{16, 17, 16⁶}}, 18^{2, 3}, Lk 16¹⁻¹²), the universal beneficence and compassion of God bound up with severe and inexorable justice (Mt 5^{45, 11^{20-30, 18^{15-35, 20^{1-16, 25¹⁴⁻³⁰}}}); we have the great and deep conceptions of life through death, joy through suffering, love through severance, peace through conflict, victory through surrender, self-realization through self-renunciation, the conquest of the world through the cross of shame (Lk 14²⁵⁻³³, Jn 12^{24-28, 16^{20, 33, 12³²}}). Here are the profoundest truths, and yet the most paradoxical, for they are expressed through ideas that are partially contradictory to one another. We believe that if we could apprehend the whole truth, if we could understand through and through the whole meaning and purpose of creation, we could express these truths in a manner that would not shock our reason. But in the twilight of our knowledge we must be content to hold fast to half-truths, none of which is quite free from error or, at any rate, indefiniteness. Some who prefer consistency to comprehensiveness would sacrifice one part of the antithesis and elaborate the other. But though these may play a useful part in the dialectical movement of progress, they appear to be further removed from the whole truth than those who embrace the seeming contradiction, unable to fathom its depths, yet assured that in it is realized a perfect reconciliation. See also art. PARABLE, p. 314^a. A. J. JENKINSON.}

PARALYSIS.—In the NT the terms παρληνικός (Mt 9¹⁻⁸, Mk 2¹⁻¹²) and παρληνμένος (Lk 5¹⁷⁻²⁶) are employed to designate the nervous affection variously known as paralysis or palsy. Palsy commonly denotes loss of motor power in a muscle or set of muscles, and is equivalent to motor paralysis. When the power of transmitting sensory impressions to the brain centres is lost, we have sensory paralysis. The affliction is due to disease of the cerebral centres or of the nerves, owing to injury or morbid changes. In some cases the paralysis depends on removable causes; most commonly, however, upon alteration of structure involving permanent loss of function. There are two forms of paralysis: hemiplegia, where one side of the body is affected; and paraplegia, where the lower limbs are rendered useless. In the instance above given in the Synoptics the term used by Lk. (παρληνμένος) indicates that it was not a case of hysterical paralysis where a shock would be available to remove the trouble (Bennett), but that it was rather paralysis arising from serious nervous disease. All three Evangelists make prominent the impression of Divine power and majesty caused by this significant healing work of Jesus. And St. Luke prefaces his account with the additional reference to the power of God. 'The power of the Lord was with him to heal' (εις τὸ ἰασθαι). All the accounts likewise record a mighty expectation of healing on the part of the friends, leading them to overcome all obstacles in the path to the great Healer—an expectation which we may believe energized also in the one to be healed. The combination of a vitalizing faith on the part of the people, and the activity of Divine power and healing purpose in Jesus, was precisely such as was most favourable to efficient curative action. St. Luke's account may be placed side by side with his record of our Lord's words ascribing His healing to the direct action of the Divine power (Lk 11²⁰), and the whole compared with the statement repeatedly ascribed to Jesus in the Fourth Gospel, that the source of all healing power (as of true wisdom) was in the Divine indwelling (see art. MIRACLES). For the question arising here as to the connexion between the infirmity and human sin, see art. IMPOTENCE.

The case of the Centurion's servant (Mt 8⁵⁻¹³, Lk 7²⁻¹⁰) is marked by one feature which is significant. The patient was 'grievously tormented' (δεινός βασιλιζόμενος), where, however, the description is not given by Luke, but by Matthew. The indication may therefore not be medically so suggestive. Bennett (Diseases of Bible) inclines to regard it as a case probably of 'progressive paralysis attended by muscular spasms and involving respiratory movements,' while Macalister (art. 'Medicine' in Hastings' DB), on the ground of Matthew's description of the pain involved, prefers to regard it as one 'possibly of spinal meningitis.' The narratives are, however, not medical, and their central interest lies in the centurion's 'great faith' so warmly eulogized by Jesus, and in his simple straightforward conception of the nature of the power and authority possessed by our Lord. He compares it to the authority conferred upon and exercised by himself—on the one hand being a power derived from the supreme source of all authority, and on the other being absolute in enforcing and obtaining promptest obedience. It is significant that our Lord accepts this conception, and commends in the fullest fashion the faith of which it was a part (see art. CURES).

PARENTS.—1. Jewish parents.—A few introductory remarks on the conjugal relation are necessary. The husband was supreme in the household, his authority recognized by the wife—and here it may be noted that, while polygamy was permitted by the Jewish law, the principle of 'one man one wife' had won general acceptance. As for the legal status of the wife, the provisions in respect to some things (see DIVORCE) were one-sided; but her position, if subordinate, was by no means one of absolute dependence, nor was she relegated to the seclusion common in other Oriental nations. The husband ruled; the wife's influence in all domestic concerns was great. Fidelity was expected on both sides. The match might have been arranged by other parties (see MARRIAGE), but the relations of the wedded pair would be characterized by a growing love. The honourable position of the faithful wife (Pr 31¹⁰⁻³¹) would be evidenced in countless Jewish homes. To the strong attachment of husband to wife, of wife to husband, there is frequent and touching allusion in later Jewish literature. It would make itself felt in the whole family life.

This brief notice of the conjugal relation should help to a correct appreciation of the relations now to be considered, viz. the parental, and, by consequence, the filial. At once it may be set down that the requirements of the Fifth Commandment had taken deep hold in Jewish life. As Bousset (Rel. d. Jud. 402) remarks, it was not forgotten that in the Decalogue the duties of children to parents follow immediately upon those which turn on matters religious and ritual. The requirements, it should be noted particularly, place both parents on the same level. In practice the supremacy of the father as ruler of the household was, indeed, recognized; his power over his children was almost absolute: at the same time, the utmost respect and obedience to both father and mother were demanded and yielded. Domestic discipline was exceedingly strict; the behaviour of child to parent would be marked by that courtliness of etiquette which was once a feature of English family life; there was, perhaps, little demonstrativeness of affection in the case of the father. Restraint is, in short, observable; but it formed no barrier to a love deep and strong which knit child to parent and parent to child: the full pathos of the love which linked a Jewish father to his son cannot be set down in words. The joyousness of child-life was in no wise cramped; allusion is met with to the readiness of parents to provide for, and to enter into, the amusement of the children. Not until the 2nd cent. was the maintenance of children the subject of legal enactment; fulfilment of the duty had probably been taken as a matter of course. It was certainly expected that children should minister to the necessities of aged parents. See, further, BOYHOOD.

2. The home at Nazareth.—Joseph was in any case the legal father of Jesus (Dalman, The Words of Jesus); hence the parental and filial relation as illustrated in the Holy Family may be discussed apart from questions treated of elsewhere (see VIRGIN-BIRTH). The glimpses afforded are but few: there are the stories in the opening chapters of Matthew and Luke, and some incidents in our Lord's ministry. Fragmentary notices; and yet a great deal may be read into them when studied in connexion with the preceding paragraphs.

What, then, is discernible in the parents of Jesus? Conjugal attachment; so also a genuine and simple-hearted piety. They are punctilious in the observance of religious duties (Lk 2^{21, 22}); if attendance at the Passover was only demanded of men, Mary is quick to avail herself of a privilege which had been extended to women also (Lk 2⁴¹). That the child Jesus 'increased in wisdom' (Lk 2^{40, 52}) is a statement not to be interpreted without thought of the parental care which watched over His ripening intelligence. If His 'understanding and answers' were cause of astonishment (Lk 2⁴⁷), the explanation points, in part at any rate, to early training given by His mother; to the careful discharge, by Joseph, of the paternal duties, so preparing Him for the eventful day when, arrived at the age of twelve years, He would become a 'son of the Law.' There was the further discharge of paternal duty as the lad was taught a trade (Mk 6³). The strict discipline above spoken of is implied in Lk 2⁵¹ (καὶ ἦν ὑποτασσόμενος αὐτοῖς): the respect and obedience which Joseph and Mary claim as their due are promptly rendered by the boy, the growing youth.

There the narrative of the early life of Jesus breaks off; of Gospel record of the next eighteen years there is none. With the resumption of the narrative Jesus has arrived at manhood; Joseph disappears from the scene, and attention accordingly centres on the relations of Jesus with the widowed mother. No longer is He a member of the family circle; Mary is cared for by sons and daughters; but the respect, the affection, the loving solicitude of 'her firstborn son' is still enjoyed by her. He asserts His independence, but with perfect courtesy (Jn 2⁴; 'the address is that of courteous respect, even of tenderness,' Westcott). He is not to be understood in Mk 3²²⁻³⁴ as disowning parental ties; rather as speaking of a family of God that is greater than the human family. The touching incident recorded in Jn 19^{26, 27} is significant of maternal and filial devotion to the very end.

3. Sayings of our Lord.—Attention must now be directed to notes struck by Jesus where recorded sayings of His have reference to the parental and filial relations. Few in number, they are significant. For Him parents are the natural guardians (Lk 8⁵⁶). He has scathing condemnation for the legal fiction which affords means of escape for children unwilling to contribute to their parents' support (Mt 15³⁻⁶, Mk 7⁹⁻¹³); the Fifth Commandment, for Him, is paramount above other religious duties (see CORBAN). He takes obedience to the Fifth Commandment for granted (Mt 19¹⁹, Mk 10¹⁹, Lk 18²⁰); its observance is a condition of 'eternal life.' If in days near at hand parent will betray child and child parent, the unnatural circumstance will be but evidence of tribulation predicted by Him (Mt 10²¹, Mk 13¹², Lk 21¹⁶). What He says in Mt 10²⁷ (Lk 14²⁶) is tantamount to a recognition of the strength of family ties. Very beautifully has it been said that His favourite illustration was drawn from the home. Thus in the Lord's Prayer it is the idea of the home that governs the Prayer. The relations between the Heavenly Father and His children are set forth in terms richly suggestive of the human relationships. 'Reverence and submission—that the parent has a right to obtain from the children; support, forbearance, and protection—that the children on their part have a right to ask from the parent' (A. W. Robinson, Church Catechism Explained).

Two sayings may present difficulty. One of them occurs in Lk 18²⁹; it must be compared with Mt 19^{29, 30}, Mk 10^{29, 30}, where descriptions of the blessings of the Messianic Kingdom are set forth in terms familiar to the Jews of our Lord's day. Mention is indeed made of circumstances under which the renunciation of earthly ties may be demanded; they are, however, exceptional circumstances, where the ties in question are incompatible with a higher allegiance. The other saying occurs in Mt 8²¹ (cf. Lk 9⁵⁹). Request and rejoinder have been explained of proverbial allusion (Adeney); it has been held that the permission really sought was to remain and support an aged father until he died (Theophylact); and this is possible. It is certainly hard to believe that, with burial following so quickly upon death as is the case in the East, a request so thoroughly in accord with Jewish feeling (cf. To 4²⁻⁴) was abruptly refused by Jesus. His reply is, perhaps, capable of metaphorical interpretation: 'Think not only of the dead, remember the needs of the living.' There may be, however, a reminder in it of the exceptional circumstances above alluded to. Besides, the teaching of Jesus had its sterner aspect.

PARONOMASIA (Gr. παρονομασία, Lat. annominatio)*.—A play on words of similar sound. This linguistic use, which in the present day is usually confined to humorous writing, is found in ancient, and especially Oriental, works in the most serious passages. In Hebrew it is frequent, largely with proper names. There are many examples in the OT, e.g. Gn 9²⁷ 25²⁶ 48²², Ex 2¹⁰, Ru 1²⁰, Is 63¹, Mic 1¹⁰⁻¹⁵.† In the New Testament the writings of St. Paul, whose early training had been Jewish, furnish some instances of paronomasia (e.g. Philem¹¹, Ὁνήσιμον—ἀχρηστον—εὐχρηστον), but in the Gospels it is rare, being found chiefly, if not wholly, in the Hebraistic Gospel according to St. Matthew. The best known and most certain example is Mt 16¹⁸ σὺ εἶ Πέτρος (a rock), καὶ ἐπὶ ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρῃ (? fragment of rock) οἰκοδομήσω μου τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. If, as seems probable, our Lord spoke in Aramaic, the word used would be kepha (כֶּפֶה), cf. Heb. כִּבְשֵׁי Jer 4²², Job 30⁶ = 'rocks'. The paronomasia makes the reference to St. Peter certain, although there may still be room for doubt whether Christ meant that St. Peter, as the leader of the Apostolic band, should be the human founder of the new Church, or that it should be built on the foundation of the confession, Σὺ εἶ ὁ Χριστὸς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος. The former of these views is the more reasonable, and would probably have been almost universally accepted had it not been for the extravagance of some Roman Catholic commentators.

* Winer in his NT Grammar (tr. Moulton, 1882, pp. 793-796) distinguishes between paronomasia and annominatio, defining the former as 'a combination of like-sounding words' (e.g. Lk 21¹¹, Mt 21⁴¹), and the latter as 'having respect to the meaning of the words as well as to their similarity in sound' (e.g. Mt 16¹⁸). See also Blount, NT Grammar, tr. Thackeray, 1898, p. 298.

† Cf. also Ec 7^{1a} כֶּבֶד, לִבְשֵׁי.

There are also possible examples of paronomasia in Mt 2²³ 3⁹. In the former of these passages the words Ναζωραῖος (=an inhabitant of Nazareth) κληθήσεται are not found in any prophet, but it seems not unlikely that they contain an allusion to the language of Is 11¹ where Messiah is called ῥαβὶ (=a branch), and possibly also to the word ῥαβὶ (to preserve); cf. Is 49⁶. In Mt 3⁹ (cf. Lk 3⁸) the Baptist says δύναται ὁ θεὸς ἐκ τῶν λίθων τούτων ἐγείραι τέκνα τῷ Ἀβραάμ. The Hebrew words for λίθοι and τέκνα are similar in sound. There may therefore be a paronomasia here: 'God can from these stones (עֲבָדָה ἄβανίμ) raise up children (עֲבָדָה בָּנִים) to Abraham.' These passages have been used to support the view, which is as old as Papias, that parts at least of Mt. had a Hebrew or Aramaic original.*

PAROUSIA.—In connexion with the intimations of His approaching death, Jesus frequently spoke of His coming again to earth in a way that would give proof of His indestructible life and power. It is evident, however, that in those predictions of the future it was not always in exactly the same sense that He meant His coming to be understood. His sayings on the subject from time to time obviously pointed to several comings, each of which was to have its peculiar character and aim (see COMING AGAIN). But there was one coming which He foretold in language of exceptional emphasis and impressiveness,—His appearance in celestial majesty at the end of the world, to perfect the work interrupted by His death, but still to be renewed and carried on through the ages by His spiritual energy. This was to be the supreme manifestation of His glory; and to it the term Parousia (παρουσία) is distinctively applied (Mt 24^{3, 27, 27}). It will signalize the final triumph of His cause, and the complete establishment and consummation of the Kingdom of God. It is the great crisis which has been designated in common usage the Second Coming.

It was at Cæsarea Philippi, after His first announcement of the tragic end awaiting Him at the hands of men, that Jesus made also the first announcement of His future glorious return (Mt 16²⁷, Mk 8³⁸, Lk 9²⁶). He repeated it subsequently under varied circumstances and to varied groups of listeners, and towards the close of His ministry the Parousia, or Second Coming, assumed a marked prominence in His teaching.

In His utterances regarding it, as recorded in the Gospels, there are three points which call specially for consideration,—its time, its manner, and its decisive significance.

1. Time.—As to the time of the Parousia, we find two classes of statements that are somewhat perplexing to reconcile. In one set of passages Jesus looks forward to its early, and even speedy, approach. The existing generation was to witness it (Mt 24³⁴). On one occasion He told those standing by that some of them should not taste of death till they saw the Son of Man coming in His Kingdom (Mt 16²⁸; cf. Mk 9¹, Lk 9²⁷), and the same idea of nearness is expressed in Mt 10²³ and Mk 14⁶². Yet we are confronted by another set of passages that suggest a lengthened period of waiting, and

* It is, of course, possible that in our Lord's discourses, spoken originally in Aramaic, there were examples of paronomasia which have been lost in the Greek version. Eichhorn (Einkl. in d. NT, i. 504) and others have made conjectural attempts to restore some of these, but they are not convincing. Mt 10²⁵ may contain a paronomasia if Βιελζεβούλ is to be connected with βίβλι and made = 'lord of the dwelling' (οἰκοδεσπότης).

the probability of the Parousia being deferred. Such are the parables of the Ten Virgins (Mt 25¹⁻¹²) and the Tyrannical Upper Servant (Lk 12⁴²⁻⁴⁶ and Mk 13³⁵). Jesus did not Himself profess to define the time; indeed, in one memorable saying He disclaimed with the utmost distinctness all positive knowledge of the day and hour of the supreme consummation (Mt 24³⁶ || Mk 13³²). In the great Eschatological Discourse recorded in Mt 24 and Mk 13 (cf. Lk 21), the subject is complicated by the manifest reference in certain sections to the disastrous collapse which threatened the Jewish State.

Some, taking the discourse as a homogeneous unity, have been led to maintain that the predictions of Jesus respecting His coming were all fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem (Stuart Russell, Parousia). Many critics, however, find themselves unable to regard the discourse, in the form reported, as one continuous and connected deliverance of Jesus. Wendt and Charles, following Colani, contend that some parts of it are interpolations from an apocalyptic document of Judæo-Christian authorship, belonging to the year A.D. 67-68. It seems more reasonable to adopt the view, advocated by Professor Bruce and others, that in this discourse the Evangelists have gathered together in one place words spoken on different occasions, and have connected future events more closely than the utterances of Jesus justified. It is at least clear that certain passages in the discourse point to the judgment on Israel as a nation and the impending fall of Jerusalem and its Temple-worship, whilst it is equally clear that other passages refer to a crisis, certainly to be looked for, but still lying in the distance (Mt 24⁴³⁻⁵⁰, Mk 13³⁴⁻³⁷).

With the purport of these latter passages, indicating a possible delay in the coming, there are several other sayings of Jesus that distinctly agree, as, e.g., the two parables already mentioned (Mt 25¹⁻¹² and Lk 12⁴²⁻⁴⁶), and also the parable of the Unjust Judge (Lk 18¹⁻⁷). We find, besides, that in a particular group of parables—the Mustard Seed, the Leaven (Mt 13³¹⁻³³), and the Growing Grain of Corn (Mk 4²⁶⁻²⁹)—the Kingdom He came to establish is represented as subject to the law of growth. Evidently Jesus was not unmindful of the preparatory process it might be necessary for the world to pass through ere He could usher in the Kingdom in its full glory. His words can be interpreted as indicating a recognition of the natural course of human development as an essential factor in determining the time when the world would be ripe for the final manifestation of His power. Moreover, He spoke also of the evangelization of the Gentile races as a work to be undertaken ere the end should come (Mt 24¹⁴ 26¹³, Mk 13¹⁰). The gospel was first to be published among all nations, that they also might have an opportunity of accepting the offer of grace; 'the times of the Gentiles must be fulfilled' (Lk 21²⁴). Here again there is foreshadowed a lengthened process, requiring, not a generation only, but an era, for its accomplishment. Manifestly Jesus took into account the gradual evolution of human affairs in contemplating the triumph of His Kingdom, while at the same time His faith in that triumph was so real and assured, and His vision of it so intensely clear, that it seemed to Him imminent, on the eve of fulfilment; and when He spoke under this feeling His disciples gathered the impression that it was close at hand, and they naturally understood the supreme event to be synchronous with the fall of Jerusalem, though in this, as it proved, they were mistaken.

2. Manner.—As to the manner of the Parousia, a considerable number of passages represent it as altogether startling and unexpected. It is to break in upon the world as a sudden surprise, while men are busied with their earthly affairs, like the Flood in the time of Noah, or the destruction of Sodom in the time of Lot (Lk 17²⁶⁻³⁰, 34). Its approach shall be as that of a thief, stealing into the house without warning (12^{39f.}), or as the arrival of an absent master at an hour when his servants are not looking for him (vv. 42-46), or as the return of the bridegroom in the night-time, leading his bride and the marriage party to the wedding-feast (Mt 25¹⁻¹³). On the other hand, there are passages in the Eschatological Discourse in Mt 24 and Mk 13 which seem to represent the final coming as preceded by certain manifest signs which shall give evidence of its nearness—the appearance of false Christs (Mt 24⁵, Mk 13⁶⁻²²), wars, earthquakes, and famines (Mt 24⁷, Mk 13⁷⁻¹⁰), persecutions and tribulations (Mt 24⁹, Mk 13¹¹⁻¹³), the darkened sun and falling stars (Mt 24²⁹, Mk 13^{24, 25}). If, however, the view of the composite character of that discourse, as we now have it, is accepted, the passages describing such arresting phenomena may be interpreted as vivid pictorial forecasts of the calamitous state of things by which the threatened Jewish crisis would be ushered in. But whether that view is accepted or not, special weight must be attached to the warning given by Jesus that even the most striking and palpable signs might be misread. The heralds of the great climax, He declares, must not be taken as the climax itself; 'All these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet' (Mt 24⁶). After all, apparently, whatever may be the catastrophic social or other upheavals by which it is precluded, the signal event is to come suddenly and unexpectedly, at such an hour as men think not (Mt 24⁴⁴, Lk 12^{40, 46}). Yet, when it does come, there shall be no dubiety; the splendour shall be dazzlingly patent, like the lightning-flash illumining all the heavens (Mt 24²⁷).

3. Significance.—The decisive significance of the Parousia was expressed by Jesus in words of profound solemnity. What it will involve, according to His teaching, may be briefly summed up as follows:

(1) The Divine dignity of His Person shall then be disclosed. He will appear in heavenly majesty, attended by His holy angels, and His glory and power shall be fully revealed (Mt 24³⁰ 25³¹ 26⁶⁴, Mk 8³⁸).

(2) His authority as Judge shall be put in force. Entrusted by the Father with supreme judicial functions (Jn 5^{22, 23}), He will gather all nations before Him to receive a reward according to their works (Mt 16²⁷ 25³²); the secrets of all hearts shall be unveiled (Lk 12²); there shall be a sifting and separation of the good from the bad, the spurious from the true (Mt 7^{22, 23} 13^{41, 49} 25³²); and the sentence of approval or of condemnation passed shall depend on the attitude and spirit towards Himself by which the life has been swayed (25³⁴⁻⁴⁶).

(3) The future destinies of men shall be determined. The day shall at last have arrived—'that day' (Mt 7²², Lk 10¹²) so momentous to every soul—when there can be no more self-deception, and the results of the law of recompense shall have to be faced, the righteous and pure-hearted being raised to eternal life and blessedness in the presence of the Father, and the unworthy and insincere cast into the outer darkness (Mt 13⁴¹⁻⁴³ 22¹³ 25³⁴⁻⁴⁶, Mk 8³⁸).

Thus (4) the Kingdom shall be exalted to its triumph and perfection. It shall be cleansed of all things that offend, and them that do iniquity (Mt 13⁴¹); the supremacy of righteousness shall be vindicated by the elevation of the godly to salvation, the ingathering of all elect souls (24¹³), and the exclusion of the wicked from the eternal inheritance.

Then (5) the existing world-order shall come to an end. In the teaching of Jesus Himself there is no trace of the thought that the Parousia would inaugurate an outward visible sovereignty on earth, when He should assume the reins of government, and rule as King in the realm of temporal affairs. That thought arose among His followers only at a subsequent period. The idea implied in His utterances is rather that His final glorious advent shall mark the definite close of the long drama of human life on the earth, by the removal of all His true disciples to the heavenly state, and the consignment of the unfaithful to the doom prepared for them. That shall be the Last Day, when the human race shall have had its full trial under the dispensations of the Divine truth and grace,—the winding-up of the world's history.

PASSION WEEK.—What origin can we assign to the sacred institution known variously as Holy Week, Passion Week, or the Silent Week? What documentary evidence have we for the belief that the Triumphal Entry took place on a Sunday, so that exactly a week elapsed between that event and the discovery of the empty tomb?

1. Investigators of the Life of Jesus find a fulcrum in Jn 12¹. Even Keim, who puts no faith in the narratives of the Fourth Gospel, least of all in its chronology, accepts its testimony in this particular passage (see Jesus of Nazara, v. 274). It is there stated that Jesus 'six days before the Passover (πρὸ ἕξ ἡμερῶν τοῦ πάσχα) came to Bethany'; and (12²²) that He went to Jerusalem next day. But it is a little difficult to understand what the narrator means by the 'six days' in question. The idiom of πρὸ ἕξ ἡμερῶν τοῦ πάσχα (cf. LXX, Am 1¹ πρὸ δύο ἑτῶν τοῦ σεισμοῦ), which bears a resemblance to the Latin formula ante diem tertium kalendas (cf. Inscr. Insularum Mar. Æg. iii. 325, πρὸ ἑκαταδῶν Ἀγούστῶν), is genuine primitive Greek (Moulton, Gram. of NT Greek, i. 100 f.). The question is, then, whether the Passover day, the 14th Nisan, on which the Passover was eaten, is or is not included in the number 'six.' If it is included, Jesus must have arrived in Bethany on the 9th Nisan; if not, then on the 8th. The latter alternative is the more natural, since the six days are spoken of as coming before the Passover; and on this assumption Jesus must have entered Jerusalem on the 9th Nisan. Now, since according to Jn 19³¹ the 15th Nisan was a Sabbath, the 8th must likewise have been a Sabbath, and the day of the Triumphal Entry a Sunday. It is to these Johannine data that we trace our Passion Week.

2. Now the Johannine reckoning appears to be corroborated by at least one of the Synoptics, viz. Mk. For one thing, Mk. assigns the death of Jesus to the παρασκευή (15⁴², cf. Mt 27⁶², Lk 23⁵⁴), His repose in the sepulchre to the Sabbath, and the finding of the empty tomb to the Sunday (16², cf. Lk 24¹, Mt 28¹), and consequently the Last Supper to the Thursday evening. Further, it is obviously the design of our Mk. to number the days in proper order, as may be seen in its striking succession of morning and evening, thus:

11² Morning of 2nd day: καὶ τῆ ἑσπέρῃ ἐξελθόντων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ Βηθανίας . . .

11³ Evening of 2nd day: καὶ ὅταν ὁφίῃ γίνεσθαι, ἐξεπορεύετο ἔξω τῆς πόλεως.

11⁴ Morning of 3rd day: καὶ παρασκευάσμενος πρωΐ . . .

13¹ Evening of 3rd day (?): καὶ ἡπορευομένου αὐτοῦ ἐκ τοῦ ἱεροῦ . . .

To this point the enumeration is quite clear. We may ask, indeed, whether the various colloquies of 11²⁷-12⁴⁴ all took place on a single day.

But in view of the care with which Mk. distinguishes the previous days, we can only infer that the absence of time references in the disputations is likewise a matter of design.

We must now inquire, however, how 14¹ is connected with what precedes. Are the words ἦν δὲ τὸ πάσχα καὶ τὰ ἀξύμια μετὰ δύο ἡμέρας meant to imply that the foregoing discourse of Jesus on the Mt. of Olives was spoken two days before the Passover, i.e. on the very day the religious authorities held their conference? And must we suppose the Anointing at Bethany (14³ καὶ ὄντος αὐτοῦ ἐν Βηθανίᾳ) to have taken place that day also, i.e. on the evening of the third day, and after the Parousia discourse? Again, on what day does Mk. place the betrayal by Judas (14^{10f.} καὶ . . . ἀπῆλθεν . . . καὶ ἐξήρει . . .)? On the day following, i.e. the fourth? In truth, the Evangelist's chronology in these passages is as vague as in 11¹¹⁻¹² 19. 20 it was unmistakable.

Nor is Mk.'s enumeration of the days between the decision of the Sanhedrin and the Last Supper quite explicit. If we regard 14¹² καὶ τῆ πρώτῃ ἡμέρᾳ τῶν ἀξύμιων, ὅτε τὸ πάσχα ἔθον as referring to the 14th Nisan, then in all probability 14¹ synchronizes with the 12th Nisan, and 14^{10f.} with, say, the 13th. But this is not said in so many words. Nevertheless, the writer possibly had in his mind some such synopsis as follows:

- 1st day, 11¹¹⁻¹¹: Sunday, 10th Nisan.
- 2nd day, 11¹²⁻¹⁹: Monday, 11th "
- 3rd day, 11²⁰⁻¹⁴⁹: Tuesday, 12th "
- 4th day, 14^{10f.}: Wednesday, 13th "
- 5th day, 14¹²⁻⁷²: Thursday, 14th "
- 6th day, 15¹⁻⁴⁷: Friday, 15th "
- 7th day, 16^{1a} Διακαινησίμου τοῦ σαββάτου, Saturday, 16th Nisan.
- 8th day, 16^{1b}: Sunday, 17th Nisan.

It is also possible, however, that there is an interval between ch. 13 and 14¹, so that the Anointing would fall on the day after the Parousia speech. This would so far dislocate the above scheme by making the first day coincide with Saturday, 9th Nisan (as probably in Jn.), the second day with Sunday, the third with Monday, and the anointing with Tuesday. If this be so, we must allow for a period of nine days between the Entry and the Resurrection. In point of fact, we cannot solve the difficulty from Mk.'s data; its mode of reckoning still leaves a residuum of doubt. In particular, we are at a loss regarding what Jesus does and where He is during the day previous to the Anointing. But, notwithstanding these obscurities, it is an unmistakable fact that Mk. makes an attempt—though by no means an entirely effective one—to distinguish and enumerate the days between the Triumphal Entry and the Resurrection. Especially does the sequence of chronological references seem to postulate a definite calendar of the interval in question.

3. We turn now to Mt. and Lk. Mt. indicates a clear break only at the close of the Triumphal Entry day (21¹⁷ καὶ καταλιπὼν αὐτοῦς ἐξῆλθεν ἔξω τῆς πόλεως εἰς Βηθανίαν καὶ ἠύλισθη ἐκεῖ). The second day runs without interruption from 21¹⁸ to the end of 25. In passing to the narrative of the Passion proper, Mt. exhibits the same ambiguity as we found in Mk. We cannot decide whether the words of Jesus in 26^{1c} were spoken on the second day, or whether we must assume an interval between chs. 25 and 26.

Possibly, however, we err in looking for chronology at all in this section of Mt. We can understand the narrative quite as well on the hypothesis that the writer was not in the least concerned to tabulate the days, but simply joined incident to incident without regard to time. We find a similar uncertainty in Lk.: the writer's own words in 20¹ ἐν μιᾷ τῶν ἡμερῶν clearly imply that he had no distinct idea of the number of days between the Triumphal Entry and the Passover (cf. also 21³⁷ ἦν δὲ τὰς ἡμέρας ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ διδάσκων). This lack of precision admittedly extends also to the story of the actual Passion. Instead of the 'two days' (Mk 14¹, Mt 26²), Lk. says only ἡγγίξεν δὲ ἡ ἑορτὴ τῶν ἀζύμων (22¹), and in place of the precise reference of Mk 14¹² τῇ πρώτῃ ἡμέρᾳ τῶν ἀζύμων, ὅτε τὸ πάσχα ἔθνον, Lk. simply has it that the day of unleavened bread 'came' (22⁷). This loose way of indicating time in Mt. and Lk. strikes us as strange in view of the generally accepted theory of their common dependence upon Mk., which designedly and explicitly gives an all but complete diary of the time. How are we to explain the fact that the two Evangelists who make use of the oldest Gospel are here less precise in details than their common source?

4. The recognized explanation, viz., that the later writers did not trouble about such matters of detail, is most unsatisfactory, as all investigation of the growth and progress of the Evangelical record goes to show a constantly increasing interest in such minutiae as time and hour, place and number, name and personality; witness, e.g., the NT Apocrypha. In fact, had we not other grounds for deeming Mk. the oldest of the Gospels, its ostensible precision in such things would lead us to regard it as the latest.—The present writer is of opinion that we can best explain Mt.'s and Lk.'s omission of the time references of Passion Week, by the hypothesis that the recension of Mk. used by them did not itself contain these references (Ur-Markus Hypothesis). Or, in other words, our Mk.'s enumeration of the days is the work of a later hand, a redactor, the Deutero-Mark. This view is so far confirmed by the presence of a certain artificiality in the arrangement. It would seem as if a definite scheme had been forcibly stamped upon the material. The first trace of this appears in 11¹¹. While Mt. and Lk. quite simply and naturally make the Cleansing of the Temple succeed the Triumphal Entry, upon the same day, Mk. has it that Jesus, having come to the city, spent the rest of the day in seeing the sights (as if He had not been often enough in Jerusalem during His thirty years), and that then, as it was late in the day (too late, i.e., to begin His great work), He went out to Bethany with His disciples. This apparently so exact piece of information really strikes us as utterly trivial and pedantic. What interest could Mark suppose his readers to have in such a petty detail? or what concern had he himself, so indifferent, in general, to all chronology, in such exactitude at that particular point? There is, as it seems to us, but one explanation of the anomaly, viz., that the writer of 11¹¹ was anxious to intercalate one day more than the facts naturally allowed; that is to say, he figured to himself a definite number of days, and must distribute them somehow in the material before him. A second trace is found in the circumstance that Mk. divides the incident of the Barren Fig-tree between two days (11^{13f.} 20^t). Here, too, Mt. gives the more natural account. For, granting the miracle of judgment upon the ill-starred tree, it is much more in harmony with popular views that the blight should instantly follow the curse (Mt 21^{18f.}). In Mark's report, according to which the word of Jesus takes a day to work its effect, we seem to discern a rationalizing tendency. The Evangelist, with all his belief in the miraculous, can more easily grasp the phenomenon by allowing for some sort of natural process.* Further, the partition of the Fig-tree incident enables the redactor of Mk. to give a sharper distinction to the two days (11¹²⁻¹⁹ and 11²⁰⁻¹³) by means of the two morning walks from Bethany to Jerusalem (11¹² 20). A third indication of the artificiality of Mk.'s arrangement is seen in 14⁴⁹, where Jesus speaks in such a manner as to imply that He had taught in the Temple for several days. But according to the said scheme, again, the whole of the teaching at this time occupies but a single day (11²⁰⁻¹²), or, at most, two days if we include also the day of the Cleansing. Hence we are justified in inferring that the diary is not only not organic to the events, but actually at variance with them. In fact, the sayings and discourses at Jerusalem, as set down in Mk., give no hint whatever of a chronological order. They are as exempt from time references as are the five controversies of Mk 2¹⁻³. The true design of either series is to illustrate the antagonism between Jesus and the hierarchy, and they may have been uttered either on one day or on several successive days.

We would therefore hazard the suggestion that our Mk.'s tabulation of the interval under consideration, and notably the passage 11¹¹⁻¹², is due to the redactor, and that the latter was imbued with the Johannine tradition. For our own part, indeed, we have been able to collate a mass of evidence in support of the theory that the text of Mk. has been very thoroughly revised from the Johannine standpoint, that a host of Johannine characteristics were inserted into it at some period subsequent to its use by Matthew and Luke. It is, of course, impossible here to submit the detailed proof of such a theory, and we can but invite the reader to test it for himself. The design of the present article does not carry us beyond the advocacy and proof of the thesis: As originally the Synoptic tradition neither contained a complete diary of our Lord's last visit to Jerusalem, nor implied that His stay covered exactly one week, it is in the last resort to Jn. that we must trace the order of our Passion Week. PASSOVER (I.) (Heb. פֶּסַח pesah, Aram. מִסְפָּח mispha, in Greek πάσχα, pasék, and πάσχα [Jos.], NT πάσχα).—The most distinctive festival of the Jewish religion. Its origin, significance, and method of celebration are given in Ex 12¹⁻⁴⁹ 23¹⁸ 34²⁵, Lv 23⁵⁻⁸, Nu 9¹⁻¹⁴ 28¹⁶⁻²⁵, Dt 16¹⁻⁸. *

Modern criticism has discovered certain variations in the ritual and significance, has distinguished layers and stages in the ideas the festival was to suggest, and has sought to connect it with earlier and ethnic rites. Without accepting all such contentions, it may be granted that there is, at least, the union of an agricultural feast with a commemoration of the Exodus out of Egypt, in which commemoration certain of the circumstances which marked the historic deliverance are more or less literally repeated. Jewish expositors distinguish between 'the Egyptian Passover' and those which were subsequently observed,—'the perpetual Passover' or 'Passover for the generations,'—and narrate the points in which they differ from each other; in the former the impure partook, the blood was sprinkled on the lintels, the fat was not burned, and no hymn was sung; with other details.

The references in the OT to the observance of this festival are comparatively rare. There was the observance at the time of the Exodus, in the second year after coming out of Egypt (Nu 9⁵), at the entry into Canaan (Jos 5¹⁰ 11). The feast was apparently observed during the reign of Solomon (2 Ch 8¹³). Under Hezekiah there was a great act of observance, but in the second month, when the feast was prolonged by one week, and even the

* The derivation of the word is uncertain. It may be derived from a root meaning to leap or pass over, used of the sun at the spring-time; or to pass over, in the sense of sparing, the traditional meaning.

Leviticly unclean were permitted to participate (30¹⁵⁻²³). At the period of the revival of religion during the reign of Josiah, there was another celebration that stood out conspicuously among the memories of the festival (2 K 23²², 2 Ch 35¹⁻¹⁷). One Passover is also recorded as kept by the returning exiles (Ezr 6¹⁹). With the period of the NT writers, of Josephus, and the Mishna, the feast has become one of regular observance, drawing multitudes to Jerusalem from many lands, and forming a strong bond of unity to the scattered nation.

From the references outside of the Pentateuch little can be learnt as to the details of the celebration of this feast. Nor is much to be gathered from the NT apart from the history of the Last Supper, regarding which there is doubt as to whether it was a true Paschal celebration, and whether the ordinary ritual was observed, or whether it was purposely modified and departed from (see following art. and LAST SUPPER). We are driven for information as to the order and details of celebration to the Mishna (c. A.D. 200), the Gemara, an ancient supplement of the same, the commentaries of later Jewish Rabbis, as Maimonides and Bartenora. There is consequently a certain doubt as to how far the practices enjoined in the Mishna were observed in the time of our Lord; but, since the traditions are for the most part very ancient, the regulations laid down give a fairly accurate representation of the feast as observed at the time of the Evangelists.

One month before the feast, preparations for the same were put in hand. Roads and bridges were repaired for the companies of pilgrims, and burying-places which were lying in the way, and likely to be unnoticed, were whitened, that the travellers might avoid defilement. Flocks and herds were tithed, and persons ceremonially unclean went up to Jerusalem out of the country to purify themselves (Jn 11⁵⁵). As the time drew nearer, the significance and laws of the feast were explained in the academies and synagogues, the last two Sabbaths before the Passover being specially occupied with this exposition.

The number of those who took part in this festival was enormous. Every male Jew residing within fifteen miles of Jerusalem, and not ceremonially unclean, was required to do so, and in addition, numerous visitors from other parts of the Holy Land, and from other countries near and far, travelling with their gifts, and with song, swelled the number of residents. Women as well as men were eligible for participation, and though the observance was not compulsory, the privilege was often embraced (1 S 13⁷, Lk 21⁴², Jos. BJ VI. ix. 3, Mish. Pesachim ix. 4). The nearest approach to a census is that given by Josephus, and, though certainly exaggerated, it shows the vast concourse which the feast brought together. He states that at the Passover of A.D. 65 there were 3,000,000 persons present (BJ II. xiv. 3), while in another place (VI. ix. 3) he relates that, at the request of Cestius, the priests counted the number of lambs slain as 256,500. Remarking that the minimum number permitted for a lamb was ten persons, Josephus calculates the number at 2,700,000. An ancient Jewish tradition gives the number of Passover lambs on one occasion as 1,200,000. It was customary to extend hospitality to the numerous visitors. This was done without charge, but as a return the host received the skin of the lamb and the vessels used by his guests. Many must have tented outside the city. In this vast crowd, with the sense of nationality strong, and its religious feelings at the highest tension, it is easy to understand the dread of possible disturbance which from time to time appears in the Gospel narratives (Mt 26⁵, Lk 23²⁴, Jn 18³⁰).

The feast proper began with the evening of the 14th Nisan; it must be borne in mind that, according to Jewish reckoning, this was the first half of the day. It was succeeded by the days of Unleavened Bread, which sometimes gave a name to the whole festival (Lk 22¹). On the evening of the 14th it was the duty of the master of each house to take a lighted wax candle, in silence thoroughly to search all the house for leaven and to remove it to a safe place. This investigation was preceded and followed by prayer. A portion of leavened food sufficient for the family requirements had been put aside, and it was lawful to eat this until 11 o'clock on the morning of the 14th, though a stricter school drew the limit at 10 o'clock. At midday all leaven was to be completely and solemnly destroyed, by burning or otherwise. The times of this obligation were notified in the following way: 'Two cakes of thanksgiving offering which had been desecrated were exposed on a bench or gallery of the Temple. While they lay there all the people yet ate leaven; when one was removed, they abstained from eating it but did not burn it; when both were removed, all the people commenced burning the leaven' (Pes. i. 5). Secular work was gradually ceasing. In Galilee the whole day was one of rest. In Judæa work continued till noon; but only what had been begun could be finished; no new work could be commenced. Only tailors, barbers, and sandal-strap makers were allowed to follow their avocations. At 1.30 o'clock the daily evening sacrifice was killed, and at 2.30 it was offered up. In each case this was one hour before the usual time of killing and offering; if the 14th Nisan fell on a Friday (i.e. Thursday evening and Friday morning according to our reckoning), these times were made each yet an hour earlier to avoid possible desecration of the Sabbath. By the time this daily sacrifice was offered, the lambs had been brought to the Temple by those who had been selected to represent each Passover group at the slaughter of the victim. Each lamb was required to be not less than eight days or more than one year old. The great company was divided into three sections, the ritual observed being the same in each case. The first section entered the Court of the Priests, the gates being thereupon closed, and the trumpets blown three times. Although the priestly course on duty for the week attended to the daily sacrifice, to meet the necessity of the Passover the whole priestly body was in attendance. It stood in two lines which ended at the altar, one row holding silver, the other golden bowls. Each man representing a Passover group killed his own sacrifice, the nearest priest caught the blood in his bowl, passed it to a fellow-priest and he again to another, while each as he received the full bowl handed back an empty one. The bowls were made without bases, and could not stand if placed on the ground, coagulation being in this way avoided. When the bowl was received by the priest nearest to the altar, he cast it with one jet at the base. Meanwhile the 'Hallel' (Psalms 113 to 118) was recited, the Levites leading the song, the people repeating the first line of each Psalm and also three others of the closing Psalm, but otherwise responding 'Hallelujah' to each line. If the sacrifices were not completed, the Hallel was sung a second or even a third time.

The preparation of the sacrifice now took place. The lambs were hung on iron hooks fastened to the walls and pillars of the court, and when these were all in use, upon staves which rested on the shoulders of two men; if the day were a Sabbath, the use of staves was not permitted, and two offerers laid one the left hand the other the right on his neighbour's shoulder and so suspended the lambs. The sacrifices were then skinned, the portions appointed for sacrificial use (Lv 3¹⁻⁵) were removed and cleansed, the fat separated and placed on a dish and then offered with incense on the altar. The company was then dismissed to their dwellings to partake of the feast, the incense was burnt, the lamps trimmed, and the Temple court washed. If the sacrifice fell on a Sabbath, the first and second divisions stayed in appointed parts of the Temple until the whole of the victims had been sacrificed, that they might not profane the Sabbath by bearing a burden.

It was required that careful attention should be given to the cooking of the lamb. It was to be roasted, in an earthenware oven; a spit of pomegranate wood was to be put in at the mouth and to pass through at the vent; Justin Martyr (Tryph. 40) states that a transverse spit was passed through the victim, thus forming a cross. If any part of the lamb touched the oven, it was to be pared off, as was also the case with any part on which fat from the oven had fallen. No bone of it was to be broken, no part was to be taken out of the house where the feast was held, and none of it was to be left over.

The meal was partaken of, not as at the first Egyptian Passover, in travelling dress, 'with loins girded, with shoes on the feet, and staff in the hands,' but in festive garments, and reclining on the left side 'as free men do, in token of their freedom.' The table was probably arranged as a triclinium, and this explains the position of St. John, the question addressed across the table by St. Peter, and the unheard conversation of our Lord with Judas Iscariot (Jn 13^{23, 24}, Mt 26²⁵). See art. UPPER ROOM.

A cup of red wine, mixed with water, was poured out for each guest, not by the host but by a servant, for all things were on this night to be done with distinction; and over it the following blessing was spoken:

'Blessed art Thou, Jehovah our God, who hast created the fruit of the vine. Blessed art Thou, Jehovah our God, King of the Universe, who hast chosen us from among all people, and exalted us from among all languages, sanctified us with Thy commandments. And Thou hast given us, O Jehovah our God, in love the solemn days for joy, and the festival and appointed seasons for gladness; and this feast of unleavened bread, the season of our freedom, a holy convocation, the memorial of our departure from Egypt. For Thou hast chosen us, and hast sanctified us from among all nations, and Thy holy festivals with joy and gladness hast Thou caused us to inherit. Blessed art Thou, O Jehovah, who sanctifiest Israel and the appointed seasons. Blessed art Thou, Jehovah, King of the Universe, who hast preserved us alive, and sustained and brought us to this season.'

The use of wine at this festival was compulsory, even upon the poorest; it might be the gift of charity, or procured by selling or pawning raiment or hiring out one's labour; but used it must be, even by persons commonly abstaining and young persons. After this, each participant washed his hands, our Lord apparently varying the custom and teaching a new and deeper lesson by Himself washing the feet of His guests (Jn 13^{3ff.}).

The Paschal table, with its appropriate viands, was then placed in position. These comprised the lamb, the bitter herbs (lettuce, endive, garden endive (or succory), artica, and bitter coriander (or horehound)), and the harôseth, a paste of dates, raisins, etc., with vinegar, which was held to represent the mortar of Egypt, and salt water. The president of the company took some of the bitter herbs, dipped them in salt water, ate a portion the size of an olive, and gave a similar portion to his companions. A second cup of wine was now poured out, and this was followed by the Haggādāh or 'showing forth' (cf. 1 Co 11²⁶ 'ye proclaim'). The son of the family or the youngest member of the company inquired the significance of the feast in which they were participating: 'Why is this night distinguished from all other nights?' 'Then the father instructs his child according to the capacity of his knowledge, beginning with our disgrace and ending with our glory, and expounding to him from 'A Syrian ready to perish was my father' (Dt 26⁵), until he has explained all through, to the end of the whole section' (Pes. x.). This involved a recital of the national history from the Patriarchal times to the deliverance out of Egypt, and the constitution of the emancipated people by means of the covenant at Sinai. After this, the president explained the significance of the Passover-lamb, of the bitter herbs, and of the unleavened bread. In acknowledgment of the great redemption, the first part of the Hallel (Pss 113, 114) was sung, and a benediction added: 'Blessed art Thou, Jehovah our God, King of the Universe, who hast redeemed us and redeemed our fathers from Egypt.' The second cup of wine, which had been previously filled, was now drunk.

After a second washing of hands, one of the two unleavened cakes was broken, and pieces containing between them bitter herbs were, after dipping in the harôseth, handed to each one in the company. This was probably the sop which Judas Iscariot received (Jn 13²⁶). After this the Paschal lamb was eaten, the hands were again washed, a third cup of wine filled, a blessing said, and the cup drunk. This was known as 'the cup of blessing,' and was probably that in which our Lord instituted the cup of the Eucharist, which is called by St. Paul 'the cup of blessing' (1 Co 10¹⁶). There remained another cup to be drunk, for the number four was insisted upon, and became the subject of various interpretations; the second part of the Hallel (Pss 115-118) was sung—probably the 'hymn' after which 'they went out unto the mount of Olives' (Mk 14²⁶)—and the feast ended with a benediction, 'the blessing of the song.'

On the next day, the 15th Nisan, sacrifices additional to those offered ordinarily were brought (Nu 28¹⁹), and peace-offerings, the hagigah—which on this day was compulsory, but on the 14th needed not to be offered except where the lamb would not suffice for the feast—were presented. On the 16th day the barley for the omer (Lv 23¹¹) that was to be presented was cut; this was threshed in the Court of the Priests, parched, and then ground fine. When sufficiently fine, one omer by measure was taken and mixed with oil; frankincense was placed upon it, and it was 'waved'—moved to and fro—before the Lord. The 17th to the 20th days were the Mô'ed Kāton, or 'lesser festival,' when no new work might be commenced. With the 21st Nisan the feast ended, the day being kept as a Sabbath.

In the case of persons Levitically unclean or living at a distance, it was permitted to celebrate the Passover on the corresponding day of the following month (Iyyar), according to the legislation of Nu 9⁹⁻¹², 2 Ch 30²; but in this case there was no search for and removal of leaven, no Hallel was sung at the supper, and no hagigah offered and eaten.

PASSOVER (II. : in relation to Lord's Supper).—1. The historical relation.—The chronological difficulty raised by this topic having been adequately discussed in previous articles (see DATES, vol. i. p. 413 ff., LAST SUPPER, and LORD'S SUPPER (I.)), it is unnecessary to reopen it here. It may be assumed as certain that the Last Supper of Jesus took place not on the night of the general Jewish Passover, but on the evening preceding. It does not follow, however, that the Last Supper was not a Paschal meal. To the present writer it seems impossible to set aside the distinct evidence of the first three Gospels on this point, reinforced as that is by the language of St. Paul (Mt 26^{17ff.}, Mk 14^{12ff.}, Lk 22^{15ff.}; cf. 1 Co 5⁷⁻⁸ and 11²³⁻²⁶).

(1) It has been objected by Spitta (see the essay, 'Die urchristl. Traditionen über Ursprung u. Sinn des Abendmahls' in his Zur Gesch. u. Litt. des Urchristentums; cf. G. H. Box, JThSt, Apr. 1902), the most prominent representative of the view that the Last Supper bore no resemblance to the Passover, that the descriptions of it given in Mt. and Mk. do not suggest a Paschal meal, and in particular that the lamb is never mentioned. This has been called a 'significant omission'; a remark which assumes that, if Jesus had been observing the Passover, the Evangelists would naturally have given some account of the proceedings at the Jewish meal. But, since they had already stated with the utmost plainness that the meal to which He sat down with His disciples was an eating of the Passover, it was quite unnecessary for them to describe it in detail, since all Passover suppers were exactly similar. What they were concerned with were those novel and significant acts and words of their Master by which, while sitting at the table of the OT feast, He instituted the sacrament of the New Covenant.

(2) A similar objection is that at the Passover supper each participant had his own cup to drink from, while in the celebration of the sacrament there was only one cup. But this is to confound two things that are perfectly distinct. The fact that at the Jewish meal there was a cup for each person present is surely no reason why Jesus, in appointing the new rite of the Christian brotherhood, should not have taken one cup and passed it round to His disciples, saying, 'Drink ye all of it.'

(3) A further ground of objection is found in the fact that Jesus draws no parallels between the Paschal meal and the Christian sacrament, and in particular that, when He is choosing a symbol to represent His body, He takes a loaf of bread for the purpose, and not a portion of the roasted lamb. To speak in this way suggests a poor conception of our Lord's insight into the nature and destiny of His own religion. For, unless Jesus was altogether lacking in this respect, He must have foreseen, as clearly as we can see today, that the broken loaf of bread was infinitely better suited than a piece of the Jewish Paschal lamb to serve to the Church of the future as the symbol of His sacrifice of love.

Criticisms like these seem trivial at the best. And it must be remembered, on the other hand, that those who deny that there is any outward connexion between the Passover and the Lord's Supper have to meet difficulties of the most pressing kind, and above all the difficulty of accounting for the unanimous testimony of the Synoptics on this very point. What are we to make of this testimony, and especially of the testimony of Mk., presumably the most original of all? It is suggestive that Spitta solves the difficulty by pronouncing the whole paragraph in which Mk. affirms the Paschal character of the Supper (14¹²⁻¹⁶), to be an interpolation that stands in no organic connexion with the rest of the narrative (op. cit. p. 228). But even if there were any grounds of textual criticism for regarding the statements of the first three Gospels as later interpolations, we should still have to explain how it came to pass that at a very early date in the history of the Apostolic Church a false tradition not only sprang up but became dominant, according to which the Last Supper of Jesus with His disciples took the form of a Passover meal. Spitta admits that in St. Paul's view of the Sacrament the connexion with the Passover meal is evident (op. cit. p. 265; cf. Box, op. cit. p. 365). How, then, are we to explain this entire transformation of what, according to this theory, was the original tradition—a transformation so early that it must have been completed before Paul became a Christian and received from the first Apostles the story of what took place in the Upper Room on that night in which the Lord Jesus was betrayed? It is hard to see how, within a few years of Christ's death, and at the headquarters of the primitive Church, there could have grown up a tradition as to a simple matter of fact that was an entire falsification of what the Eleven knew to be the truth.

We regard it, then, as practically certain that the Last Supper took the form of a Passover meal. And since it was held on the evening before the general Jewish observance, it must have been an anticipated Passover (cf. Sanday, Hastings' DB ii. p. 634; Zöckler, PRE³ ix. pp. 32, 42). It is sometimes affirmed that this view will not bear the slightest examination (Box, op. cit. p. 360; cf. Gwilliam, art. LAST SUPPER, p. 8^a). It is assumed, e.g., that it would have been impossible for our Lord and His disciples to procure the sacrifice of a lamb before the following day. But Chwolson, an expert in Jewish antiquities, anticipates these and similar objections, and shows how precarious the grounds are on which they rest (Das letzte Passamahl Christi, p. 37 ff.). And he further makes the interesting suggestion that a very slight textual error at this point in a supposed Aramaic source would account for the apparent identification by the three Synoptics (Mt 26¹⁷, Mk 14¹², Lk 22⁷) of the occasion of the Last Supper with the regular night of the Jewish Passover (ib. p. 11).

2. The spiritual connexions.—In order to establish these, two things are necessary. First, we must understand what the Passover meal meant to Jesus and His disciples; next, we must trace the links between the Paschal supper in the Upper Room and the Christian sacrament that sprang out of it.

(1) What did the Passover mean to Jesus and the Twelve? For evidently it is with the Passover of our Lord's time that we have primarily to do. It is not uncommon to meet with doctrinal constructions of the Lord's Supper (e.g. Gore, Body of Christ, p. 12 ff.; Illingworth, Divine Immanence, p. 126 ff.) in which a leading rôle is assigned to ideas drawn from the modern study of Comparative Religion as to the significance of the ancient rite of the blood-covenant (see Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant, p. 203 ff.), or as to a sacrificial 'eating of the god' on the occasion of a harvest festival (see W. R. Smith, RS p. 461; Frazer, Golden Bough², ii. ch. 2). But it seems safe to conclude that archæological considerations such as these were not uppermost in the mind of Jesus when He said to His disciples, 'With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer' (Lk 22¹⁵), and that what He and they alike were thinking of was the Passover of Jewish history and tradition. Nothing could be further from the minds of a pious Jewish company at the dawn of the Christian era than the notion that God would partake of human food, or that they could enter into communion with the Highest by drinking the blood of a slain animal, or even by drinking wine considered as a substitute for blood (cf. Ac 15^{20, 29}). What, then, did the eating of the Passover primarily mean for Jesus and His disciples?

(a) In the first place, it was the memorial of a great historical deliverance—that redemption of Israel from her bondage in Egypt which was also her birth-hour as a nation (Ex 12^{2a, 26^a}).—(b) But further, the Passover was a covenant-meal based on the fact of the covenant made by sacrifice at Sinai (Ex 24⁸⁻⁹). It is certainly impossible to find within the circle of ideas suggested by the narrative of the first Passover in Egypt a full explanation of the words of Jesus at the institution of the Lord's Supper. One of the special merits of recent critical investigations into the nature of the sacrament is that they have brought fully into view the connexion between our Lord's words about the New Covenant (Mt 26²⁸ ||) and the story of the covenant at Sinai, taken along with the great prophetic anticipations (Jer 32⁴⁰, Ezk 34²⁶ 37²⁶, Is 55³) of what the author of Hebrews calls 'a better covenant established upon better promises' (He 8⁹). It does not follow, however, as some have thought, that the covenant idea excludes that of the Passover, much less that the combination of them was altogether impossible (so Schultzen, Das Abendmahl im NT, p. 40). On the contrary, the narrative of the first Passover in Egypt appears to anticipate that of the covenant made at Sinai, while apart from the former the latter would have no historical explanation. In any case, in the time of our Lord, the Jewish Passover was an annual covenanting feast at which the nation's covenant fellowship with Jehovah was solemnly renewed. The narrative of Ex 24⁸⁻⁹ makes it clear that the original covenant rested on the fact of a covenant-sacrifice, and there seems little reason to question that in its essence this sacrifice was of a peculiar nature (cf. A. B. Davidson in Hastings' DB i. p. 512). The annual renewal of the covenant at the Feast of Passover evidently rested in like manner on the sacrifice of the Paschal lamb, and that this sacrifice also was conceived of as having a propitiatory effect it is hardly possible to doubt. —(c) Once more, the Passover was a joyful social meal, the meal of Jewish brotherhood, in which the participants, as members of the Divine covenant, gave expression to their covenant fellowship with one another as well as with Israel's God.

(2) If the Lord's Supper in its external relations sprang out of an immediately preceding Passover meal, and if that meal had for those who partook of it some such meaning as has just been described, the spiritual connexions between the two are evident. The thought of the Jewish Passover underlies the Supper, helping us to determine its true nature and purpose and religious significance.

(a) This outward relation between the Passover and the Lord's Supper goes far to decide the question whether or not the Supper refers to our Lord's death. Spitta's elaborate efforts to dissociate the Last Supper altogether from the Jewish Passover find their chief motive in his theory that the Supper had no bearing whatsoever on the death of Jesus, but was meant to have a purely eschatological reference, as an anticipation of the glorious Messianic meal in the heavenly Kingdom (op. cit. pp. 266 ff., 282 ff.). But if, on the other hand, it was at the close of a Passover meal that Jesus broke the bread and gave it to His disciples, saying, 'This is my body for you,' the analogy between the slain lamb and the broken bread can hardly be mistaken. —(b) It bears, again, on the question whether or not the Supper was meant by Jesus to be repeated. From the fact that in the Mk.-Mt. text of the institution of the Supper we do not find that command for a repetition of the observance which is given in Paul-Lk. (1 Co 11²⁴⁻²⁵, Lk 22¹⁹), a number of critical scholars have concluded that Jesus never spoke the words, 'This do in remembrance of me'; that He had no thought of instituting a rite for perpetual celebration by the Church; and that His purpose in breaking the bread and passing the wine was merely to bid His disciples a solemn farewell, to set before them a striking parable in action, or at most to point them forward to the hope of a glad reunion in the heavenly Kingdom (Jülicher, Theol. Abhandl. pp. 235 ff., 245 ff.; Spitta, op. cit. p. 301 ff.; cf. P. Gardner, Origin of the Lord's Supper). But to a Jew the Passover was essentially a memorial feast to be kept by Israel throughout all her generations (Ex 12¹⁴). And if the Supper was deliberately set by Jesus in the closest relation to the Passover,—so deliberately that He even anticipated by a day an observance which otherwise His death would have rendered impossible,—this goes to confirm the view, supported not only by the text of Paul and Luke, but by the unhesitating praxis of the earliest community from the first (Ac 2⁴²⁻⁴⁶; cf. 20⁷, 1 Co 10¹⁶), and the Apostolic tradition as that was handed on to St. Paul at the time of his conversion (1 Co 11²³), that Jesus both intended and commanded that the Supper should continue to be observed in remembrance of Himself. —(c) If the Lord's Supper sprang historically out of a Passover meal, it naturally falls heir to the chief meanings and associations of the more ancient rite. It is not only a memorial of Jesus, but a memorial of His sacrifice. 'Our passover also hath been sacrificed,' says St. Paul, 'even Christ' (1 Co 5⁷); and he tells us that as often as we eat the bread and drink the cup, we 'proclaim the Lord's death till he come' (11²⁶). The Passover was a renewal on the part of the OT Church of the covenant with God that had been made at Sinai; and every Supper is a renewal by the Christian people of the covenant made for them upon the Cross. The Passover was not only a renewal of the covenant fellowship with God, but a festive social meal at which the links of Jewish brotherhood were forged afresh. And the Lord's Supper is the occasion of a glad spiritual communion of those who belong to the household of faith, both with Christ Himself—the Elder Brother and the Head—and with their fellow-members in the one family of God.

PAST.—'Let the dead past bury its dead,' is the unequivocal counsel we derive from the Lord's reply to a lukewarm disciple (Mt 8²²). In Christ no past is irretrievable; Divine forgiveness may blot out what men consider it impossible to forgive (Lk 18²⁷). Habit and custom may be burst asunder in a moment, like the rocky tomb that could not imprison the risen Lord. The motto of the Cliffords (Désormais) may recall a Christian truth of priceless value: 'Henceforward' sin no more (Jn 8¹¹). God gives a fresh start for Christ's sake to each one who prays for forgiveness in the spirit of forgiveness (Mt 6¹⁴). The tyranny of the past led the Galileans to ask, 'Is not this the carpenter?' (Mk 6³); but, as signally in the call of Levi, the disciple of Christ must be ready to throw aside the past altogether for His sake (Mt 9⁹).—There is a dead past to be forgotten and forgiven, for God is God of the living (Mk 12²⁷). And there is a living past to be remembered and commemorated. Thus all generations call her blessed who was the mother of the Lord (Lk 1⁴⁸). The loving gift of a forgiven woman who had been a sinner is still told for a memorial of her (Mk 14⁹). Yet the Christian hope looks ever forward to the brightness of the coming day, when the shadows shall flee away.

PATIENCE (ὑπομονή, Lk 8¹⁵ 21¹⁹, and throughout NT; μακροθυμία, 'long-suffering,' only in Epp.; verbal form appears Mt 18²⁶⁻²⁸, with significance 'Give me time').—The moral attribute which enables men to endure afflictions and to employ strength wisely. It is essentially a Christian grace. The classical conception of virtue was mainly active. 'The old pagan world meant by a virtuous man, a brave, strong, just, energetic human being, who might be, but who probably would not be, also humble, submissive, self-subduing' (Liddon, Christian World Pulpit, vol. xxiv. 138). The Oriental idea touches the opposite extreme, in which virtue consists not in such qualities as patience, but in the passivity from which feeling is expelled (cf. Newman Smyth, Christian Ethics, pt. i. ch. 2, iii.). As a Christian grace, patience is inculcated in the NT (1 Ti 6¹¹, Tit 2², He 10³⁶, Ja 1⁴, 2 P 1⁶), and exemplified in the life of Christ. His patience is referred to directly only once in the NT, and then incidentally (2 Th 3⁵ AVm and RV); but examples of it are mentioned in the Epp. as incentives to believers (He 12², 1 P 2²³).

1. The patience of Christ may be regarded (1) in itself. It constitutes one of the most remarkable features of His manhood. It is not visible upon the surface of the Evangelical narratives, but it becomes impressive the moment that reflexion begins to deal with His Personality in the light of the events of His life on earth. Whatever His consciousness of Himself, He was evidently aware that extraordinary forces were at His command (Mt 4³ 26⁵³). 'Just in proportion to the eminence of a man's sphere and the genius of a man's endowments, the quality of patience is necessary.' To none, therefore, was it more necessary and more difficult than to our Lord, and by none was it more perfectly possessed. He set before Himself an aim which marks Him as the supreme Dreamer of history; yet, with the vision always before Him, and the longing for its fulfilment pressing on His heart (Lk 12⁵⁰), He moved unhesitating, if unpausing, towards the goal. The second temptation (Lk 4^{5f.}) was a trial of patience. In it He met the temptation to accomplish His purpose prematurely and superficially by means of an appeal to forces which lay ready to hand in the temper and expectations of the Jews. He preferred the patience that works perfectly, and therefore slowly, to the passion that strikes swiftly and works partially and imperfectly. At the same time, His temperament could not be described as phlegmatic. His patience was not the placidity of a pool secluded by surrounding woods from storm, it was rather the calm of an ocean which refuses to allow any gale to rouse it to anger. Not incapability of passion, but perfect self-control, lay at the heart of the patience of Christ.

(2) In its manifestations. (a) As a man, He had to endure the irritations from which none is exempt, e.g. interruptions (Mk 5^{21f.} 6^{30f.}, Jn 4^{6,7}), the suspicions (Lk 14^{1f.}) and the provocations (Lk 10²⁵ 11⁵³) of His foes; the spiritual dullness (Mk 9¹⁹, Lk 10^{40f.} 24²⁵) and carnal expectations (Mk 9^{33f.} 10^{35f.}) of His friends. 'He was subjected to trials of temper . . . ; He was harassed by temptations caused by nervous irritability, or want of strength, or physical weakness, or bodily weariness; unfair opposition was constantly urging Him to give way to undue anger and unrestrained passion; or rejection and desertion would, had it been possible, have betrayed Him into moodiness or cynical despair. The machinations of His foes, the fickleness of the mob, even the foolishness of His disciples, were scarcely ever wanting to try His spirit, and would often goad Him beyond endurance' (Bernard, Mental Characteristics of the Lord Jesus, cited in Stalker's Imago Christi, p. 192 f.). It is not enough to say that our Lord endured these temptations without showing any impatience; there was a positive radiance about His patience that makes it the supreme example of the grace as manifest in human life. (b) As a teacher, the patience of Christ was manifested (i.) in dealing with individuals, e.g. Philip (Jn 14⁵ 6^{5f.} 14⁸), Thomas (20^{27f.}), Peter (14², Mt 14^{28f.}, Lk 22^{31f.} 61 24³⁴, Jn 21^{15f.}); (ii.) in training the disciples, e.g. explaining His parables to them (Mk 4¹⁰⁻¹³); teaching them only as they were able to receive the truth (Mt 16²¹, Jn 16¹²); repeating lessons only partially understood (Mk 9³¹ 10^{32b f.}). It was through His patience as a teacher that our Lord was able out of very raw material to educate the men who were the founders and Apostles of His Church. (c) As a sufferer, His patience is conspicuous in the scenes connected with His passion (see esp. Mt 26^{52f.}, Mk 14^{60f.} 65, Jn 18^{22f.}, Lk 23³⁴, Mk 15^{29f.}). No one ever suffered so terribly and so patiently as He. There was the extreme of physical pain, of mental torture, and of spiritual agony. The suffering was unjustly inflicted, and was accompanied by almost every possible indignity, but the patience of the Sufferer rose above it with a quiet dignity that makes those scenes the most wonderful in history.

(3) In its limitations. The patience of Christ had its limits, as every noble patience has. Those limits were not where, at first, we might expect to find them; He was patient with His disciples' dullness, though it grieved Him (Lk 24^{25f.}). He never lost patience under the opposition of His enemies (11³³ 20^{30f.}). But when it was suggested that He should avoid the cross (Mt 16^{22f.}), and when He was confronted with the spiritual assumptions of the Pharisees, His patience reached its limits. Self-indulgence and self-deception were sins with which Christ had no patience (see Stopford A. Brooke, Sermons, 2nd series, 'Patience and Impatience').

(4) In its implications. The patience of Christ is set before believers, directly (2 Th 3⁵) and indirectly (1 P 2^{21f.}), as an example and an inspiration. There is in Christ 'a type and fountain of patience' in which the possibilities of endurance are exhibited, and from which the grace for endurance to the uttermost may be gathered. The patience of Christ represents the passive side of Christian goodness, 'its deliberate, steady, hopeful endurance, in the spirit of Him who was made perfect through suffering' (Denney, Expos. Bible, 'Epp. to Thess.' p. 372).

2. Human patience is mentioned: (a) in Lk 8¹⁵, with reference to the perseverance with which the fruit of God is brought forth in the believer's life. Spiritual fruitfulness is not easily attained. A consistent Christian character is wrought only by long patience. Christ sets the staying power of vital faith in contrast with the passing fervour of those who lightly receive and as lightly abandon the word of truth (cf. Lk 8¹³). (b) In Lk 21¹⁹, in the course of Christ's prediction of the sorrows that should befall during the struggle with Rome. RV is much the preferable rendering. Its meaning may be summed up thus, 'Heroic perseverance wins the crown' (Lindsay, Gospel of St. Luke, in loc.).

PAUL.—See APPENDIX.

PAYEMENT.—The word occurs only in Jn 19¹³ as one of the names by which was known the locality otherwise called Gabbatha (wh. see). In classical usage λίθαστρον denotes a stone pavement, and later a mosaic or tessellated pavement, in which sense the word passed into Latin. Of recent years beautiful pavements have been found in many places in Palestine; but so far there is no evidence outside the NT that any locality in Jerusalem was generally known as either Gabbatha or the Pavement, and no attempted identification of the spot is quite satisfactory. The easiest course is to regard the passage as unhistorical, and the allusions as derived only from the writer's imagination and introduced to give verisimilitude to the narrative; but such an explanation is itself as subjective as the pleas it adopts. That the reference is to the paved forecourt of the Temple, or to the usual meeting-place of the Sanhedrin, is rendered unlikely by the absence of the designation from Jewish literature, as well as by the improbability that Pilate would choose any partially consecrated spot for the inquiry. On the other hand, there are Latin usages which seem to connect the locality with the governor's official or temporary residence. Julius Caesar is described by Suetonius (Vit. Div. Jul. 46) as carrying about with him on his military expeditions a tessellated pavement, which was laid down in his encampments as marking the spot from which judicial decisions and addresses to the soldiers were given. Jos. (Ant. XVIII. iv. 6) reports that Philip the tetrarch similarly carried his tribunal with him (τοῦ θρόνου εἰς ἃν ἔκρινε καθεζόμενος ἐν ταῖς ὁδοῖς ἐπομένον), but there is no reference to a portable mosaic. In the case of Pilate, it is possible that he would be disposed to imitate the procedure of the Emperor, or even that of a petty sovereign, but in this matter no record to such an effect has been found; and whilst the course would not be without danger, it is not easy to think that a locality would derive its name from being one of many places on which a movable pavement was once or occasionally laid. That, moreover, there were, as a rule, in the larger centres of population, fixed places for the administration of justice is not unlikely. The provincial basilicas were often law-courts as well as exchanges, the tribunal being set in the semicircular apse, of which the raised floor was certainly paved, and exactly the kind of spot to attract a designer. There may not have been any such basilica at Jerusalem, or at least the remains of one have not so far been clearly identified. Jos. (BJ II. ix. 3: καθίσας ἐπὶ βήματος ἐν τῷ μεγάλῳ σταδίῳ) has been cited in support of a view that Pilate used 'the open market-place' (so Whiston, followed by many) at Jerusalem for the administration of justice; but the passage refers to Caesarea, and the rendering of στάδιον as a synonym of ἀγορά is not well established. Each stationary camp, again, had its tribunal, sometimes formed of turf but more frequently of stone, and from it the general addressed the soldiers and the tribunes administered justice. In Jerusalem the garrison occupied the castle of Antonia, within which would be the tribunal used in cases of military discipline, but probably not for the hearing of Jewish complaints and causes. Pilate himself would reside in Herod's palace (cf. Philo, ad Gaium, 31, and the practice of Gessius Florus in Jos. BJ II. xv. 5), as did also the procurator at Caesarea (Ac 23³⁵). It was a magnificent building, lined outside with spacious porticoes. Here it was natural that the Jews should present themselves when seeking the execution of Jesus (Jn 18²³ 19⁴), who was apparently confined in the palace (19⁹, 13^a). And one of these paved porticoes may well have been known within the palace as the Pavement, upon which stood the judgment-seat, under an open cupola or within a rounded porch.

PEACE.—1. The word frequently occurs in the Gospels in the idiomatic phrase 'to hold one's peace,' i.e. to keep silence, representing (both in RV and AV) no fewer than four different verbs in the original—ἡσυχάζω, σιγάω, σιωπάω, and φιμώω. ἡσυχάζω (Lk 14⁴) is the most general term (fr. ἡσυχος, 'at rest'), denoting a state of restfulness in which silence is included (cf. Lk 23⁵⁶ τὸ μὲν σάββατον ἡσύχασαν, 'and on the sabbath they rested'). σιγάω (Lk 20²⁶) has been distinguished from σιωπάω (Mt 20³¹ 26⁶³, Mk 3⁴ 9³⁴ 10⁴⁸ 14⁶¹, Lk 18³⁹ 19⁴⁰)—the former as referring to a silence induced by mental conditions (fear, grief, awe, etc.), the latter as a more physical term denoting simply an abstinence from vocal utterance (so Schmidt in his Synon. d. gr. Sprache, quoted by Grimm-Thayer, Lex. p. 281). But in classical Gr. such a distinction between σιγάω and σιωπάω can hardly be said to be ordinarily observed (cf. Liddell and Scott, Lex. s.vv.), and in the NT ἡσυχάζω, σιγάω, and σιωπάω, when used in the sense of holding one's peace, appear to be employed without any real discrimination.

On the other hand, φιμώω is a stronger and rougher word, which properly means 'to muzzle' (fr. φίμω, 'a muzzle'). It is noticeable that our Lord addresses it only to an unclean spirit (Mk 1²⁵ = Lk 4³⁵) or to the raging sea (Mk 4³⁹, where EV gives 'Be still!'). Once Mt. uses it to describe how Jesus put the Sadducees to silence (22³⁴); and in the parable of the Wedding Garment it is used (v. 12) to express the speechless condition to which the intruder was reduced when challenged by the king (cf. *Twent. Cent. NT*¹, 'the man was dumb-founded').

2. In the ordinary sense of rest or tranquillity, in antithesis to strife and war, 'peace' (εἰρήνη) is found, c.g., in Mt 10³⁴ = Lk 12⁵¹ (note the contrast with μάχηρα), Lk 14³². Generally, however, εἰρήνη in the NT means more than this, and clearly inherits the larger suggestions of the Heb. שָׁלוֹם, which primarily denoted a state of wellbeing, safety, and blessedness, of which, however, peace in the common acceptation of the term would be one of the most important conditions. It is in this way that we are to understand expressions like 'Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace' (Lk 2²⁹), 'his goods are in peace' (11²¹), 'the things which belong unto thy peace' (19⁴²). This also is the connotation of 'Peace!' when used as a form of salutation (Mt 10¹², 13 = Lk 10⁵, 6 24³⁶, Jn 20¹⁹, 21, 26); though, as employed by our Lord, and by His disciples according to His instructions, the salutation is weighted with the larger Messianic meaning (see below).

3. But in its predominating and characteristic use in the NT, εἰρήνη is distinctively a Christian word, being employed especially to describe the mission, the character, and the gospel of Jesus Christ.

(1) Peace was a distinctive feature of Christ's mission.—In prophetic anticipation the coming of the Messiah was to inaugurate a reign of peace (Is 9⁷, Ps 72⁹, 7), and He Himself was to be 'the Prince of Peace' (Is 9⁶). In the Gospel story of His birth, the promise of peace heralds His advent (Lk 1⁷⁹), and 'on earth peace' is sung by the angels on the night in which He is born (2¹⁴). His earthly ministry was a ministry and message of peace. 'Have peace one with another' was one of His injunctions (Mk 9⁵⁰), while of those who not merely live in peace, but are peace-makers (εἰρηνοποιοί), He said that they shall be called sons of God (Mt 5⁹). 'Peace' was the salutation which both the Twelve and the Seventy were bidden to use when sent forth on their respective missions (Mt 10¹², Lk 10⁵); it was the word spoken by Jesus Himself in dismissing those whom He had healed of their physical or moral plagues (Mk 5³⁴, Lk 7⁵⁰ 8⁴⁸); and again the greeting with which He met His disciples after He was risen from the dead (Lk 24³⁶, Jn 20^{19, 21, 26}). And in all these cases it seems evident that 'Peace be unto you!' and 'Go in peace!' are not merely conventional forms of salutation or farewell, but refer to the blessings guaranteed by Jesus as the Christ of God.

And yet there is a sense in which Jesus came 'not to send peace, but a sword' (Mt 10³⁴, cf. Lk 12⁵¹). For there is a false peace (Jer 6¹⁴ 8¹¹); and with that He could have nothing to do. Jesus would never compromise, or permit His followers to compromise, with falsehood or error or sin; and so, in a world where these things abound, His coming inevitably meant division and struggle and suffering (cf. Lk 2^{34, 35}). Yet, for all that, peace was the purpose of His mission, even though it had to be attained by sending forth a sword—sharp and two-edged, as the seer saw it (Rev 1¹⁶)—a sword which will ultimately secure the victory of the good in the conflict with evil, and bring in the peace that rests on righteousness (cf. Ps 72⁷ 85¹⁰).

(2) Peace was a quality of Christ's character.—The words 'Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you' (Jn 14²⁷) strike one of the fundamental notes of His personal being as that is revealed to us in the Gospels. Men have been known to make bequests when they had nothing to leave; but peace was a blessing which Jesus had power to bestow, because it was His own peculiar possession. At the very centre of His earthly life, amidst all its vicissitudes, there always lies a profound peace, which is quite different from impassivity, for it is something vital and flowing like a strong calm river (cf. Is 48¹⁸). It was, without doubt, the magnetism of this peace-possessing and peace-diffusing strength of Jesus that drew troubled hearts around Him; and it was the consciousness of having it and being able to bestow it that inspired that most characteristic invitation, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest' (Mt 11²⁸).

This personal peace of Jesus must be distinguished, of course, from the peace of outward circumstances. When He said, 'My peace I give unto you,' He was just about to go forth to Gethsemane and the judgment-hall and the cross. But the peace He was conscious of lay deeper than all trials and sufferings, for it came from the assurance of a perfect union in thought and heart and will with His Father in heaven (Jn 14^{11, 20, 31}). Christ's peace was like that of a white water-lily—tossed to and fro by the surface waves of the lake, but unshaken from its place because its roots are buried deep in the soil beneath (cf. Wordsworth, Excursion, v. 555). All through His earthly life He realized, as no other human being ever could, the full meaning of the prophet's word, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee' (Is 26³).

(3) Peace is a characteristic blessing of the gospel of Christ.—Thus we find it constantly described when we pass from the Gospels to the Apostolic teaching. So characteristic of Christ's gospel is it that this gospel is itself described by St. Paul as 'the gospel of peace' (Eph 6¹⁵), and St. Peter in the Acts speaks of those who publish the message of salvation as 'preaching good tidings of peace by Jesus Christ' (Ac 10³⁶). 'Peace,' indeed, becomes, like grace, a virtual summary for gospel blessings, and so in the benedictory salutations of nearly every Apostolic writer it is combined with 'grace' as the distinctive gift of 'God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 1⁷, 1 Co 1³, 2 Co 1², Gal 1³, Eph 1², Ph 1², Col 1², 1 Th 1¹, 2 Th 1², 1 Ti 1², Tit 1⁴, Philem 3, 1 P 1², 2 P 1², 2 Jn 2, Jude 2).

It is St. Paul, however, who works out most fully the place of peace in the Christian gospel and its immediate relation to Christ Himself. With him 'peace' has two distinct meanings, corresponding to two different facts of Christian experience.

(a) First, there is an objective peace—the peace of reconciliation with God through our Lord Jesus Christ—which follows as the result of being justified by faith (Ro 5¹ [vv. 1-11 show that the εἰρήνη of v. 1 is the same as the καταλλαγὴ of v. 11], Eph 2¹⁴⁻¹⁷; cf. 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²¹). (b) Next, there is a subjective peace—the peace of conscious fellowship with God—which results from a living union with Christ the Saviour. This subjective peace finds its ground in the objective peace of reconciliation, but it is clearly distinguished from it. The other is 'peace with God' (Ro 5¹); this is 'the peace of God which passeth all understanding' (Ph 4⁷). This inward peace is one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5²²), it forms part of our joy in believing (Ro 15¹³), it is a power that guards our hearts and thoughts in Christ Jesus (Ph 4⁷). And it is of this peace, as a glad sense of sonship and trust wrought in the soul by Jesus Christ, that the Apostle is thinking when he writes: 'The Lord of peace himself give you peace at all times, in all ways' (2 Th 3¹⁶).

PEARL.—This jewel, specially esteemed and familiar in the East, is twice used by our Lord as an image of the preciousness of the Christian religion: once in the saying, 'Cast not your pearls before swine' (Mt 7⁶), and again in the parable of the Pearl of Great Price (Mt 13⁴⁶). A distinction should be observed in the choice of this jewel as a metaphorical expression. In the case of coined money such as talents or pounds, the side of religion emphasized is the active life of good works, and the lesson conveyed is that of duty. The value of the pearl is not primarily a commercial value; it is something which appeals to its possessor as a unique and priceless possession, precious for its own inherent qualities of beauty and rarity, something for which all that a man has may be sold, itself to be jealously treasured, not to be cast at the feet of those to whom it has no meaning. The pearl is not, from the purchaser's point of view, merely a counter of commerce, it has a beauty which is its own, and which can be appreciated only by him who knows. It stands not for any utilitarian aspect of religion, but for the secret shared between the soul and God, which loses its beauty and its value if it is paraded before those who do not understand its sanctity. The main points of the two passages would seem to be the transcendent beauty and preciousness of personal religion, and the need of reticent reverence to guard it. M. R. NEWBOLT.

PENTECOST (ἡ πεντηκοστή) was one of the three great national festivals of Israel at which all the males of the people were required to present themselves every year before the Lord their God, with an offering according to their means (Ex 23¹⁷ 34²³, Dt 16^{16, 17}, 2 Ch 8¹³). There is evidence that in the time of Christ multitudes assembled for the Feast of the Passover, the Feast of Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles, not only from all parts of the Holy Land, but also from the Jewish communities scattered throughout the Roman Empire. The attendance at the Passover would probably be the largest, while the numbers at Pentecost would embrace more Jews from foreign countries, the season being more favourable for travel. All three feasts have (1) a basis in the agricultural life of Canaan, (2) a reference to the history of the nation, and (3) a spiritual and typical significance. Of the three, the Feast of the Passover came first in the natural year, signaling the commencement of the barley harvest and the dedication of the first ripe sheaf by waving it before the Lord; commemorating the deliverance of the people from Egyptian bondage; and pointing forward, by the lamb without blemish sacrificed on the occasion, to the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world. Of the series, the Feast of Tabernacles was the last, celebrating with great rejoicings the completion of harvest and vintage; commemorating, by the erection of booths in which the people dwelt for the week, the wanderings of their fathers in the wilderness on the way to settled life in Canaan; and having its antitype in the rest that remaineth for the people of God, or, better perhaps, in that great Harvest Home yet to come, when there shall be gathered before the throne a multitude which no man can number, out of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues, clothed in white robes and with palms in their hands.

Between these two national festivals came Pentecost. As Passover signaled the commencement of the grain harvest, Pentecost marked its conclusion; and as Tabernacles was a great national thanksgiving for the completed vintage and fruit harvest of the year, Pentecost was a thanksgiving for the completed grain harvest.

1. Names.—The actual word 'Pentecost' does not occur in the canonical books of the OT, but it is found in To 2¹ and 2 Mac 12²². Neither does it occur in the Gospels, where the Feast itself is not mentioned. It occurs in NT three times outside the Gospels (Ac 2¹ 20¹⁶, and 1 Co 16⁸), and in these passages it is employed not as a numeral adjective, but as a substantive. The Feast is called Pentecost because it fell on the fiftieth day counted from Nisan 16, the day after the Passover Sabbath (or festival day), and fulfilled the ancient command: 'Ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the sabbath, from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave-offering: seven sabbaths (or weeks) shall be complete: even unto the morrow after the seventh sabbath shall ye number fifty days, and ye shall offer a new meal-offering unto the Lord' (Lv 23¹⁵⁻¹⁶, cf. Dt 16⁹). The names by which the Feast is known in the OT proper exhibit its basis in the agricultural life of the people. It is the 'Feast of Weeks,' called from the seven weeks reckoned from the morrow after the Passover when they began 'to put the sickle to the corn' (Ex 34²², Dt 16⁹⁻¹⁰, 2 Ch 8¹³); the 'Feast of Harvest,' 'the firstfruits of thy labours which thou hast sowed in the field' (Ex 23¹⁶); the 'Day of First Fruits,' a day of rest and holy convocation (Nu 28²⁶, cf. Ex 23¹⁶ 34²²), although, like the other Feasts, it was actually of a week's duration. By later Judaism it was styled Azereth ('conclusion'), which appears in Josephus as Ἀσάρθᾳ; and 'Day of the Giving of the Law' in commemoration of the revelation of the Divine Will to the people at Sinai (Hamburger, RE, 'Wochenfest'; Edersheim, The Temple, p. 227).

2. Agricultural basis.—The distinctive features of the ritual observed at Pentecost are those of a harvest thanksgiving. When barley harvest was begun at Passover time, the omer or sheaf was brought to the priest to be waved by him before the Lord; and this was followed by a burnt-offering of a 'he-lamb without blemish of the first year,' with appropriate meat- and drink-offerings (Lv 23¹⁰⁻¹⁴). When the grain harvest which had been proceeding through the following seven weeks reached its completion at Pentecost and the thanksgiving celebration for it took place, a larger offering was prescribed. Instead of the omer of barley—whether presented in the sheaf or, as would appear from later practice, threshed and parched and made into flour—there were now two wave-loaves of the finest wheaten flour to be brought by the people out of their habitations and offered as a new meal-offering unto the Lord. In contrast to the Passover bread, which was unleavened, these two loaves, forming the peculiar offering of the Day of Pentecost, were 'baken with leaven,' which, as the Mishna informs us, was the case in all thank-offerings. These loaves are declared to be 'the firstfruits unto the Lord' (Lv 23¹⁶⁻¹⁷), and formed with the peace-offering of two lambs the public thank-offering of the nation to God for His goodness. Instead of the single lamb of the Passover, there were now to be presented as a burnt-offering 'seven lambs without blemish of the first year, and one young bullock, and two rams,' with appropriate meat- and drink-offerings; whilst a kid of the goats was to be sacrificed as a sin-offering (Lv 23¹⁸⁻¹⁹). It was in keeping with an occasion of national thanksgiving that freewill offerings were to be brought by the people, each as the Lord had prospered him: 'And thou shalt rejoice before the Lord, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy manservant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates, and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are among you. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt: and thou shalt observe and do these statutes' (Dt 16¹¹⁻¹²). Although the festival proper, as we have seen, was confined to one day, it continued in a minor degree for a whole week, and was celebrated with gladness and rejoicing. All this made it peculiarly popular; and the season of the year being favourable, as we have seen, for travel, it seems from notices in Josephus, and from references in the Acts of the Apostles, to have been frequented by a large concourse of pilgrims from all the lands of the Jewish Dispersion. It is now the custom among the Jews to decorate the synagogue at Pentecost with trees and plants and flowers,—a modern substitute for the harvest festival of former times (see Jewish Encyc., art. 'Pentecost'; Rosenau, Jewish Ceremonial Institutions, p. 86).

3. Historical reference.—Whilst the notices in the OT, mainly in the Pentateuch, regard Pentecost simply as a harvest festival, it came to be regarded among the later Jews as commemorating the giving of the Law at Sinai. The Book of Jubilees, in the 1st cent. A.D. (Schürer, GJV³ iii. 277), makes the Feast of Weeks as old as Noah, and associates it further with the later Patriarchs. Josephus and Philo do not mention the giving of the Law among the associations of the Feast, yet many authorities, like Edersheim (loc. cit.) and Ginsburg (Kitto's Cyclopaedia, 'Pentecost'), hold it to be certain that the Jews as early as the time of Christ commemorated the giving of the Law at Pentecost. With this was incorporated the legend of the Law being delivered in seventy languages, the number of the nations of the earth, and therefore meant for all the families of mankind. (See Spitta, Apostelgeschichte, pp. 27, 28.)

4. Antitypical significance.—Giving of the Holy Spirit.—As the Passover has its antitype in the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, Pentecost has its antitype in the shedding down of the Holy Spirit, by whom the Law is written upon fleshy tables of the heart, and the bonds of intercourse between God and man are re-knit in a spiritual and enduring communion. St. Paul describes the Pentecostal gift as 'the first-fruits of the Spirit' (Ro 8²³), in accordance with the purpose of the day. Of this momentous event we have the record in Ac 2. If in Jewish tradition the first Pentecost after the great deliverance from Egypt was, through the giving of the Law, the birthday of Judaism, in Christian history the first Pentecost after the true Passover Lamb had been slain was, through the outpouring of the Spirit, the birthday of the Church. The presence and working of the Spirit within the Church form the distinctive characteristic of Christianity. Gracious and beneficent as was the presence of the Master with His disciples, it was better, so He Himself declared, that He should go away (Jn 16⁷), and that in His stead the Paraclete, with His threefold conviction for the world, should come (vv. 8-11). 'Behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you,' said Jesus to the Eleven and them that were gathered with them as He was about to ascend up into heaven; 'but tarry ye in the city till ye be endued with power from on high' (Lk 24⁴⁹). Then, as the Evangelist records, He led them out until they were over against Bethany; and while His hands were lifted up in blessing, He parted from them, and was carried up into heaven. 'And they worshipped Him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy: and were continually in the temple, blessing God' (Lk 24⁵²⁻⁵³).

The Temple was the chief resort of the disciples during the period of tarrying which their Master had enjoined; but they continued also to frequent the Upper Room, now hallowed to them by its memories of the Lord (Ac 1¹³), continuing 'steadfastly in prayer, with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.' And so they waited and prayed; and, lest anything should be lacking to their readiness for the promised blessing, they filled up, by the questionable arbitrament of the lot, the place in the number of the Twelve rendered vacant by the fall of Judas. It was now the eve of the second return of the Resurrection-day since the Lord had ascended, and the city was crowded and astir with the pilgrim bands which had come up to Jerusalem for the great annual harvest thanksgiving. No doubt they had counted the days; and they may well have divined that on Pentecost, the fiftieth day since their Lord had suffered as the Passover Lamb, their expectations would be fulfilled (Baumgarten, Apostolic History, i. p. 41).

'The day of Pentecost was now come,' and at an early hour the disciples, filled with anticipations awakened by the day, were all together in one place. That this place was the Temple seems natural, considering the occasion. It is a fair inference from the passage in St. Luke already quoted (24⁵²⁻⁵³), and it harmonizes with the statement that 'the multitude came together' (Ac 2¹) when the descent of the Spirit became known abroad. It is said that the sound heard from heaven filled 'all the house' (ἔπλησεν τὸν οἶκον) where they were sitting,—an exaggerated form of expression if only a private dwelling is meant, whereas 'house' is the regular designation of the Temple in the LXX and in Josephus. Hallowed as the Upper Room had become by the institution of the Last Supper and the fellowship the disciples had there enjoyed with the Risen Lord, there was a significance beyond even that in the Temple, which had been so long the earthly dwelling-place of Jehovah, now being the place of the inauguration of the dispensation in which the believing soul is to be the temple and dwelling-place of the Spirit.

To those praying disciples, and to the Church of which they were the representatives, came on that eventful day the fulfilment of 'the promise of the Father.' Suddenly a sound from heaven as of a mighty rushing wind fell upon the ears of the expectant band, and filled all the house where they were sitting. It does not appear that there was an actual wind, but only the sound of it pervading all parts of the house. Then, as they looked around, they beheld tongues like as of fire distributing themselves through the building, and alighting each upon a disciple's head. 'And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance.' 'They were all filled with the Holy Spirit' is the supreme and enduring blessing of Pentecost. It is the central fact of this remarkable narrative. Side by side with the Incarnation, and the Atonement, and the Resurrection, and the Ascension of the Lord, stands the Mission of the Comforter in the gospel scheme. As the Mosaic dispensation was inaugurated with miracles and supernatural signs, it was meet that the dispensation which replaced it should likewise be ushered in with miraculous manifestations.

These manifestations must be briefly noticed. Wind and fire are elemental emblems of the Spirit occurring from time to time in the OT. 'He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire' (Mt 3¹¹) was the Baptist's prediction concerning the Messiah, now clearly fulfilled. 'The wind bloweth where it listeth . . . so is every one that is born of the Spirit' (Jn 3⁸), was the Lord's own shadowing forth of the Spirit's power to Nicodemus.

To the miraculous associations of Pentecost belong the 'tongues' with which the Apostles spake. Not unknown tongues, however, nor such ecstatic utterances as became familiar afterwards at Corinth and in the early Church, but tongues in which the strangers from distant countries, who had come to Jerusalem for the Feast, at once recognized their own speech, and heard the mighty works of God proclaimed. That the gift of tongues was a permanent endowment of the Apostles for their great work of proclaiming redemption to all the kindred of mankind, cannot be maintained. There is no proof that any of the Apostles of whose labours we have a record in the Acts was thus saved the trouble of acquiring foreign tongues, and supplied with the linguistic qualifications necessary for ministering to people of other races than their own. In fact, within the Roman world of that day such tongues were by no means indispensable. The Roman world, whithersoever the Apostles went on their missionary journeys, was to all intents and purposes of one speech, and they could make themselves understood in Greek in almost every ordinary case. It was only when they travelled to the far East, or to the bounds of the West, or away up the Nile, that their message required another tongue. The Jews who had come to the Feast at Jerusalem, or perhaps, as was the case with some, were sojourners in the Holy City, from out of every nation under heaven, recognized at once the vernacular of the several peoples among whom they were scattered—the tongue of Parthia, of Mesopotamia, of Phrygia, of Egypt, of Arabia—on the lips of one or other of the Apostles; but Greek was yet the lingua franca by which they could almost everywhere make themselves understood. 'The tongues' served the immediate purpose on this historic occasion of conveying to the assembled multitudes the great facts of the completed redemption, in familiar speech, yet with unwonted impressiveness and solemnity. But they were, over and above this, a supernatural sign, not only affording a striking proof at the moment of the presence and power of the Holy Spirit with the Apostles, but also furnishing a symbol of the universality of the new faith, and pointing forward to the proclamation of the glad tidings of great joy to all the families of mankind. Thus the legend of the giving of the Law in seventy languages on Mt. Sinai was matched by the fact of 'the tongues' at Pentecost; and the preaching of the gospel, first in all the lands of the Jewish Dispersion and then in all the earth, was emphatically shown forth.

5. Abiding significance.—The gift of tongues which marked the effusion of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost was only one of several extraordinary gifts bestowed at first upon the Church by the Ascended Lord. These gifts continued through the Apostolic Age, and were not only varied in their character, but wholly distinct from the ordinary quickening, sanctifying, and ministerial gifts which abide in the Church through all her history. They have passed away, and though in an Edward Irving and other saintly and gifted souls some of them may seem for a little while to reappear, it is His gifts of quickening, sanctifying, and enabling that are the abiding blessing of the Holy Spirit to the Church, and that perpetuate the grace of Pentecost. The permanent blessing is not for a few, but for all believers. The Spirit had at the Creation brooded over the face of the deep; He had moved holy men to utter the oracles of God; He had rested upon anointed kings, like Saul and David; and He had dwelt without measure in the Incarnate Son of God. Now the blessing was to be for all. 'They were all filled with the Holy Ghost,' is the fulfilment of the prophecy of Joel (2^{28, 29}). It is the realization also of our Lord's promise (Jn 7³⁷⁻³⁹). And St. Peter in his discourse to the multitudes on the day of Pentecost confirms the universality of the gift (Ac 2^{38, 39}).

Whilst the experience of the disciples on the day of Pentecost shows the universality of the gift, it also attests the working of a new power of spiritual quickening and transformation. The Apostles themselves were transformed into new men. By the baptism of fire they were made courageous and brave; their eyes were opened to see the spirituality of Christ's Kingdom; and they were filled with a great enthusiasm for the salvation of men through the preaching of the crucified Christ. And such was the power of the Spirit accompanying St. Peter's words, that the multitude who had assembled to see and to hear were pricked to the heart, and cried, 'Men and brethren, what shall we do?' And with three thousand souls added to the little band of Apostles and believers, a Church was born in a day. 'With great power gave the apostles witness,' and that power was the gift of the Holy Ghost. Under the working of the Pentecostal gift a new spirit of love takes possession of them that believe, a new fellowship is established, a new service and varied ministry instituted. Throughout the course of the Church's history it has been the mission of the Comforter to convince the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment; to glorify Christ to His believing people; to lead the Church into all truth, and to show her things to come; to sanctify them that believe; and to bestow grace upon all who serve in any ministry according to the requirement of the office which they fill. It is His mission still; and the great hope of the Church and of the world lies in the renewal of Pentecost, with its breath of refreshing and its tongue of fire, in each successive age.

PEOPLE.—This collective term, which occurs about 120 times in the Gospels, is used to denote sometimes in a lesser or more general way the people (λαός) among whom Christ lived and fulfilled His mission, but oftener the smaller or larger crowds of people (ὄχλος) who, from time to time, and in the various scenes of His labour, waited upon His ministry (see art. CROWD). But 'people' (λαός) is several times employed in the religious sense that attaches to such phrases as 'the people of God,' or 'Christ's people' (Mt 1^{21, 26}, Lk 1^{17, 77} 2³² 7¹⁶). It is only in this latter sense that the word calls for special notice, and as so viewed it possesses considerable importance.

The most noteworthy thing in regard to the religious use of the word in the Gospels is, that it is never in any of them employed by Christ Himself. All the instances in which it is found are in narratives connected with His birth and infancy, except the one in Lk 7¹⁶; and in this case it was the people who beheld the restoration of the widow's son to life who said, 'that a great prophet is risen among us; and that God hath visited his people.' The fact that Christ discarded the use of the word 'people' in its religious sense cannot be regarded as a matter of little or no consequence. In doing so He must have acted with deliberate purpose, and for reasons considered by Himself to be valid. This view is evident from a variety of considerations: (1) The religious sense of the phrase 'the people of God' had occupied a place of high importance in the historical relation between God and the Hebrew race. (2) It had been organically associated by the OT revelation with the prospective advent of the Messiah and His Kingdom. (3) According to Messianic prophecy, the one people of God would eventually consist of all the peoples of the earth united in a common relation to Him. (4) Christ was aware of these facts. He knew that He was Himself the Jewish Messiah and the Saviour of the world. And He was inspired and controlled by the idea that the object of His mission was to bring the true and full sense of the phrase 'the people of God' to perfect realization in the Kingdom of heaven. (5) If He had chosen to do so, it would have been easy for Him to express all the essential truths of His message to mankind in terms of 'the people of God.' Moreover, this phrase could not be without attractions for Him. Why, then, did He never let it fall from His lips when addressing His audiences in public and in private?

One of His reasons must have been the significance of the phrase as it presented itself to His own mind. The ideas with which He would charge it may be inferred from the essential nature of the truths embodied in the message He left behind Him. In thinking of God and His people, He would think of Him as a moral Being and of them as moral beings. He would think of the relations between Him and them as moral, and therefore as founded in this direct inward relation to them as individuals. He would think also of His relation to them as absolutely impartial, and of their relations to Him as absolutely equal. And for all these reasons He would think of the relation between God and His people, as His people, as in no sense legal, and as not permitting Him to show towards any people in particular either national favour or political privileges. Finally, all this implies that Christ would think of God and His people in terms of purely moral universality. But if such is the meaning that He would attach to the phrase alluded to, does not that seem to favour His use of it, and to make His rejection of it still more difficult to understand? Quite the reverse, as another reason shows.

As a teacher, Christ had to consider not only the meaning that He attached to the phrase Himself, but also the meaning attached to it by the Jews among whom He taught, and who believed that they themselves were the people of God, and they alone of all the peoples of mankind. The people of Israel were the people of God. This was one of the most essential and distinctive dogmas of the fully developed, orthodox, and official Judaism with which our Lord everywhere and always had to reckon as a teacher; and this dogma, adhered to and upheld by the fanatical zeal of the rigid and conservative devotees of Judaism, was the most embarrassing that He had to reckon with as a teacher sent from God. For what did the dogma in question mean and imply? It rested upon a denial of the essential oneness of the relation of God to all the peoples of the world, and of the essential oneness of the relation of all the peoples of the world to Him. It was founded in the notion that the relation between God and His people was national, and that the nature of the national bond was not moral but legal. For Divine righteousness and the obedience of faith, the only real and permanent, because moral, conditions on which the relations between God and His people repose, it substituted ancestral descent from Abraham, and the observance of the national rite of circumcision. And the only way, it contended, for Gentiles to obtain admission within the circle of the people of God, was to become Jews by observing this national rite. It is manifest, then, that the ideas of Judaism and the ideas of Christ on the subject of 'the people of God' were in direct and complete antagonism to one another. This fact Christ had to consider, and it was necessary for Him as a teacher to weigh the question as to what the inevitable consequences would be for Himself and His cause, if He attempted in the course of His teaching to present and explain His ideas on the subject of 'the people of God' in their real and inherent antagonism to the ideas on the same subject which had become fixed and hardened in the perverted Judaism of His time. Evidently He came to the conclusion that the handling of this subject would involve Himself and the interests of His mission in great risks and dangers. It is certain that such would have been the case. For if He had taught and insisted on the acceptance of the truths of moral unity and universality that belong to the relations between God and His people as He understood them, the bigoted adherents of Judaism would have forthwith resented His teaching and made Himself the object of their fanatical and malignant hostility. He therefore persistently ignored the phrase 'the people of God.' It was highly expedient for Him to do so.

But the adoption of this course did not entail any compromise of those truths of moral unity and universality that are of the essence of the relations in which God stands to His people and they to Him. He showed His sense of the greatness and validity of these as well as of other moral truths, and secured the interests attaching to them, by two other vastly important things that He did as a teacher. In the first place, He embedded all the truths of moral unity and universality referred to in His parables, which He spoke as illustrative of the rich and diversified order of ideas presented by Him under the designation of 'the kingdom of God.' His reason for couching these ideas in parabolic forms He Himself explained (Mt 13¹⁰⁻¹⁶). His explanation implies that He would have preferred to employ a more explicit way of communicating the ideas in question if circumstances had permitted; that the hearts of the adherents of the existing perverted Judaism had been blinded and hardened by the influence of their system; that it was impossible for them to see the truth and validity of these ideas; and that they were not in a mood to extend to them or to Himself toleration. Such was His reason for speaking of the Kingdom of heaven in parables. The true meaning of the latter was veiled from the enemies of the truth by the blindness of their eyes. But, on the other hand, the parables, He knew, would preserve the essence of the truth as He had taught it, and to all who were of the truth the latter would in due time become revealed.

But, secondly, Christ guarded and effectively secured the interests of the truths of moral unity and universality, which are of the essence of His gospel, in another way. In the Kingdom of God and in the relations between God and His people, moral unity and moral universality are founded on their human side on moral individuality. In any case, therefore, it would have been necessary for Christ to give to moral individuality a place of supreme importance in His teaching. And this is precisely what He did. He knew and never lost sight of the truth that moral unity and universality can never come to actual realization in the Kingdom of heaven, or, in other words, in the relations between God and His people, unless in so far as men are saved, and become morally perfect as individuals. And therefore He not only gave His just and constant consideration to the individual, but held up before His disciples the moral perfection of God, their Father in heaven, as the ideal which they should strive individually to realize in their own character and life (Mt 5⁴³⁻⁴⁸). This is the basis on which moral unity and universality are realized in the relations of men to God as His people.

PERÆA.—1. Name and extent.—The name (ἡ Περæα), while constantly used by Josephus, is not found in LXX or NT, in both of which it is represented by the equivalent πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου = עַבְרֵי-יַרְדֵּן (cf. Is 9¹ [Heb. 8²³], Mt 4²⁵, Mk 10¹). Judæa, Galilee, and Peræa were reckoned by the Jews themselves as the three Jewish provinces. The division is repeatedly assumed in the Mishna (Schürer, HJP, II. i. 2; cf. Jos. BJ, III. iii. 3). The population of Peræa was, however, never so thoroughly Jewish as that of Judæa, or even of Galilee. In both Galilee and Peræa political vicissitudes had occasioned a large intermingling of Jewish and Gentile elements. Notwithstanding the close neighbourhood of the three provinces, the differences of their experience had produced differences of customs and manners, which gave to each of them an independent life of its own, and caused them to be regarded as in certain respects different countries (Schürer, l.c.).

The name 'Peræa,' like the names of many of the districts east of the Jordan, was somewhat loosely used, having a wider and a narrower signification. Josephus (l.c.) states the length of Peræa as from Machærus to Pella, i.e. from the Arnon to the Jabbok, and its breadth as from Philadelphia and Gerasa to the Jordan, limits corresponding with those of the modern Belkâ. But in BJ, IV. vii. 3, he calls Gadara 'the metropolis of Peræa.' In what sense he uses this term there is no means of ascertaining, but he must intend to include under the name 'Peræa' the region extending north from the Jabbok to the Yarmuk (Hieromax), close to which river Gadara stood, that is to say, all that the Hebrews meant by 'beyond the Jordan.' His usage may depend on whether he happened at the moment to be referring to the district which was more completely Jewish, or to the whole region, which was governed as one, and which included the Hellenistic towns of the Decapolis (Ant. XIII. ii. 3, iv. 9). Peræa in its more limited sense corresponded with the kingdom of Sihon, or Reuben and a part of Gad. In its larger signification it was from 80 to 90 miles from north to south, and about 25 from east to west.

2. Characteristics.—As regards its physical features, Peræa consists for the most part of an elevated tableland, rising rapidly from the Jordan valley, but broken by frequent gorges and mountain torrents. It was, according to Mukaddasi, proverbially cold. Josephus (BJ, III. iii. 3) says that, while larger than Galilee, it is mostly desert and rough, and much less adapted than that province for the cultivation of fruit. Still he admits that it is in parts very fertile, and produces all kinds of fruits, and its plains are planted with various trees, chiefly the olive, the vine, and the palm. It is sufficiently watered by streams from the mountains and by springs which do not fail even in summer.

Mukaddasi (c. 985 A.D.) says that the Belkâ district is rich in grain and flocks, and has many streams which work the mills. He divides Syria into four belts, from the Mediterranean eastwards. Of the third and fourth he writes: 'The Third Belt is that of the valleys of the Ghaur (the Jordan valley), wherein are found many villages and streams, also palm trees, well-cultivated fields, and indigo plantations. . . . The Fourth Belt is that bordering on the desert. The mountains here are high and bleak, and the climate resembles that of the waste; but it has many villages, with springs of water, and forest trees.' He also mentions the hot springs of the district, naming those of Al-Hammah. Guy le Strange, whose translation has just been quoted, thinks that the hot springs of Gadara or Amath in the Yarmuk valley are those referred to, and he adds in regard to them, that 'round the large basin may still be seen the remains of vaulted bath-houses. The sanitary properties of these sulphurous waters are highly extolled by many ancient writers, and to this day they have maintained their reputation among the Bedawin and fellahin of Palestine, so much so that the bathing-place is regarded by all parties as a neutral ground' (Description of Syria, by Mukaddasi, tr. by Guy le Strange [Pal. Pilgr. Text Soc.]). Of the Jordan valley Merrill (East of the Jordan, p. 438) says: 'From the Zerka (Jabbok) to the Sea of Galilee (ib.) it is exceedingly fertile; and in any period when the country was settled and a good government in power, it must have been one of the most wealthy and important sections of Palestine for the raising of wheat and other products, while the foot-hills would afford excellent pasturage.'

3. History, population, etc.—Under the will of Herod the Great, Galilee and Peræa were united for purposes of government under Antipas, and this arrangement was confirmed by Augustus. As these two provinces had but a very short common boundary where Galilee touched the Jordan north of Samaria, it might have seemed more natural to combine Peræa with the regions north of the Yarmuk, or with Samaria. But affinities of race and religion (cf. Jos. Ant. XX. i. 1; G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 539) plainly suggested the wisdom of governing them together. For the same reasons Jews journeying between Galilee and Judæa often preferred to go by way of Peræa, where they were among their own countrymen, rather than pass through Samaria (the more direct route), where they incurred the risk at least of insult (Lk 9⁵³, Jn 4^{4, 9}; cf. Edersheim, LT, i. 394; Jos. Ant. XX. vi. 1). They used the fords opposite Beisan, north of Samaria, and Jericho, south of it. The northern parts of Peræa mingled with the region of the Decapolis, where in the towns there was a vigorous Hellenistic civilization, and apparently north of the Yarmuk the Jewish element of the population was inconsiderable. The strongly Jewish character of Peræa is indicated in the Gospels. John the Baptist worked there during part of his ministry (Jn 3²⁶ 10⁴⁰). In Peræa multitudes gathered round Christ, among whom were Pharisees who entered into controversy with Him and displayed all the animus of their sect (Mt 19³⁷). Mothers, evidently Jewish, brought their children to be blessed (Mk 10¹³), and the ruler who had kept the whole Law sought an answer to his question (Mt 19¹⁶). The mission of the Seventy was to Peræa, and although the restriction laid upon the Twelve (whose number corresponded with that of the tribes of Israel), 'Go not into any way of the Gentiles' (Mt 10^{5, 6}), is significantly absent in the case of the Seventy (whose number is typical of the nations of the earth), yet the scope of our Lord's ministry makes it evident that they were to encounter, at least for the most part, Jews.

The immigration of Greek settlers into the country east of Jordan probably began with the presence there of Alexander the Great, and the towns of Pella (no doubt named from the Macedonian city which was Alexander's birth-place) and Dion may have been founded by him, as Steph. Byz. states in a somewhat corrupt passage, or by some of his followers. Besides these towns, many other powerful Hellenistic communities sprang into existence, and flourished in the midst of a population from which they were separated by their distinctive culture, and, in so far as it was Jewish, by the practice of heathen worship. The Maccabees (B.C. 166-135) endeavoured to withdraw the Jews (who presumably were at that time the smaller section of the inhabitants) to Judæa (1 Mac 5⁴⁶⁻⁵⁴). John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135-105) possibly first adopted the opposite policy, which was vigorously carried out by Alexander Jannæus (B.C. 104-78), who brought the country from Lake Merom to the Dead Sea completely under his control (Jos. Ant. XIII. xv. 4; Schürer, HJP, I. i. 192, 297, 306). He took Hippos, Gadara, Pella, Dion, and other important towns, and extinguished the Greek culture which had flourished in them. He forced them to assimilate Jewish manners and ideas, and those places which would not submit he destroyed. In B.C. 64 the Roman province of Syria was formed, and under Pompey and Gabinius the procurator the ruined cities were rebuilt, and the Hellenistic communities regained their independence. Indeed, the sympathy of Pompey was long remembered by them, as is attested by the numerous coins which have been found impressed with his era. It was probably he who organized the Decapolis (the term ἡ Δεκάπολις is found first in the Roman period). See DECAPOLIS.

In B.C. 20, Herod the Great obtained permission to appoint his brother Pheroras tetrarch of Peræa (Ant. XV. x. 3; BJ, I. xxiv. 5). Pheroras afterwards incurred the enmity of Herod, and retired or was driven to Peræa, where he died, not improbably by poison (BJ, I. xxix. 4). At his death (B.C. 4) Herod left Galilee and Peræa to his son Antipas (Ant. XVII. viii. 1). The tribute paid by these provinces was 200 talents (Ant. XVII. xi. 4). Antipas ruled with the title of tetrarch till his banishment in A.D. 39 by Caius Cæsar, who added his tetrarchy to the dominions of Agrippa (Ant. XVIII. vii. 2). Antipas was therefore in authority in Galilee and Peræa during the whole lifetime of John the Baptist and of Christ.

Among the towns of Peræa, Pella has a special interest as having been twice the refuge of the Christians fleeing from Jerusalem, in A.D. 68, and again in A.D. 135, when under Hadrian Jerusalem was taken for the second time and its name changed to Ælia. The fact that Pella was a heathen city may have been an inducement to the Christians of Jerusalem to seek refuge in it, as it would not attract the hostility of the Romans. Merrill (East of the Jordan, p. 462f.) thinks that Christ probably several times passed through the Jordan valley and may well have visited Pella itself. His preaching may have been successful there, and His connexion with the town such as to suggest it as a refuge to the Christians.

PERFECTION (OF JESUS).—Christian writers generally take for granted the perfection of their Lord. They point to the records, and declare that such is the impression which they make on the honest reader. And that is not the mere begging of the question which it seems. Men judge of goodness by the eye. The vision of faith comes first; thought comes later with its justifications.

1. One note of perfection, though merely a negative one, is sinlessness. He 4¹⁵ says that though He was tried in all things as we are, Christ remained without sin. Can that be proved or made clear? Certain difficulties suggest themselves. (1) Only the merest fragment of that life is known. Before His story begins, Jesus had lived for thirty years in this world, which is full to overflowing of all manner of sin. How can we be sure that no stain ever touched the purity of His soul during all those buried years, silent for ever now in quiet Nazareth? (2) There is also the whole story of a man's inward life; the dreams of the secret heart, the fancies cherished in the recesses of fond imagination, the converse which the soul holds with itself. What record can lay bare that hidden and withdrawn, but most real and vital, region of the spirit's life, with all its startling depths and unexpected glories?

One witness can testify of that—the spirit's own consciousness in the presence of God, who has been the unseen companion of all that life. And we gather from the Gospels that Jesus was weighed down by no sense of sin. It is the saints who have the keenest sense of sin. Their inward thought has always placed them in a line with the publican in the Temple who would not so much as lift his eyes to heaven, but smote on his breast and cried, 'God, be merciful to me a sinner' (Lk 18¹³). Jesus, among the saints, is unique in this matter: no word of self-reproach, no hint of any thought or inward struggle which He deplored, ever falls from His lips. See, further, art. SINLESSNESS.

2. Another note of perfection is that Jesus stands above the various types and classes of men. Humanity is parcelled out among men. They have their peculiar excellences and differences; but these are usually only a part of our human nature. The most royally endowed among men are but fragments. Our life is composed of three elements—thought, and will, and feeling; and according as one or other of these may preponderate, we have men of action, men of thought, men of passion. Jesus eludes any such classification: He has affinities with each of them; their excellences inhere in Him with none of their defects.

(a) Jesus has affinities with the artist and the poet. His eye rested on the beauty of the earth with the poet's joy and understanding. The common sights mirror themselves in His teaching: the lilies in their glory, the birds among the branches, the ravens seeking their food from God, seed-time and harvest, sowing and reaping. The face of this goodly universe spake joy within His heart. And He looked with loving, discerning eyes on all the pageant of human life. When we read His words, the life of His day flows past us. And His glance was deep as well as wide. With what irony He sketches the indecision of the Pharisees, in the story of the children who will play neither at funerals nor at weddings! What deeper criticism of a prudential morality is there than in the words 'he that saveth his life shall lose it'? what clearer perception of the hopelessness of a man's attempt at self-deliverance than the parable of the house swept and garnished but empty? There is His indictment of the Pharisees (Mt 23). It is the most passionate invective in literature. But the marvel of it, the inner justification of it, is that there with utter clearness and precision He lays bare the essential evil of Pharisaism. Passion easily contents itself with strong denunciation. The words of Jesus are a stream of lava seven times heated from a burning heart; but they are full of light; they track the hidden ways of pride and self-seeking in the religious heart. We see in them the thinker, the seer before whose glance secret things lie open and bare, as well as the prophet with his passion for simplicity and truth.

Jesus was an artist also in His teaching. He was not content to bring before men truths about God and the way of life. He clothed His teaching in beauty. He uttered the deep things of the Kingdom in parables. And these are simple, pellucid, beautiful as with the loveliness of waters stilled at even. See art. PŒT.

(b) There are the men of action, men in whom the will is predominant. Jesus shows them their ideal. He was no dreamer, but a man of deeds. Will was as mighty in Him as thought. He impressed all with a sense of power and mastery. The people recognized that note in His teaching: He spake with authority, and not as the scribes. It was felt at Nazareth when they took up stones to stone Him and He passed through their midst (Lk 4³⁰), and at Gethsemane when the soldiers fell back before the majesty of His bearing (Jn 18⁶). He dominated friend and foe by the calm strength of a sovereign will. And His days were filled with active service, teaching and healing, so that St. Peter summed up His life as that of One 'who went about doing good' (Ac 10³⁸). Men of action have their limitations. Their energy outstrips the illumination of their minds; they work for the day and its needs; their outlook is narrow and dim. But Jesus ever fed the springs of action with thought. He was no less than thirty years of age when He was baptized in Jordan. He had been content to live with His thoughts and simple duties, perfecting there, in patient obedience, mind and heart and will for the great work. And even after the baptism, when the call had come, He went first to the wilderness, there in prayer and meditation to understand His work and His own heart. And often He stole away from the crowd, from the blinding pressure of constant activity, to gather light and balance in prayer (Mk 1³⁵ 6⁴⁶, Lk 6¹², Jn 8¹). Hence the crown which rests on His activities. He never turned aside from His path. One purpose shapes every word and act from the beginning. Will sits untroubled on its throne, whatever dissonances of earth be round Him, though world and friend and foe conspire to turn Him aside. And peace rests upon all He does. There was no hurry in His hands, no hurry in His feet. His life was full, crowded with incident; but it flowed on quiet, unchanging, harmonious as a poet's dream. The mountain with its peace and quietness, its hours of prayer and still thought, was His place of transfiguration. There He looked into the Father's purpose, till the glory that lay beyond and the love that shone through it kindled their reflexion on His face, till He saw His way so clearly that He could never miss it, never be in any hesitation about it,—the way, amid the conflicting passions of men, to His throne on Calvary.

(c) There remains another great class, the men of passion. Among them have been some of the greatest and sweetest of the children of men—gentle souls with the grace of sympathy and self-forgetfulness; generous and magnanimous souls like David, whose inspirations have been to men an abiding memorial of the beauty of chivalry; heroes of faith like Paul and Luther, who change the current of human life. Jesus is the Lord of all such. Men of thought or action grow great oftentimes at the expense of their heart; but in Jesus the heart has equal sway with the mind or the will. He was full of sympathy. The sick and the sorrowful never appealed to Him in vain; His hand was laid gently and lovingly on the loathsome body of the leper; the sinful and outcast knew there was understanding and gentle judgment with Him. And His miracles of healing were never demonstrations, seals of His Messiahship; personal sympathy was their source and regulator. But Jesus does not throw the reins to sympathy. 'His sanity of judgment is as extraordinary as His depth of sympathy' (Peabody, Jesus Christ and the Social Question, p. 85). He could not look on the adulterous woman brought to Him for judgment—He felt for her so; but though He would not condemn, neither did He excuse; He said, 'Go, and sin no more' (Jn 8²⁻¹¹). His gospel was that there is infinite patience and forgiveness with God; and yet there are no sterner words in the NT than His. He who told the parable of the Prodigal Son told also the parables of the Ten Virgins, the Man without the Wedding Garment, and the Talents. And the woman who bathed His feet in Simon's house, and Zacchæus who lodged Him for the night, and Peter who listened to Him in the boat, all bear witness how, in His gracious presence, the sincere soul felt the evil of sin and the inflexible order of righteousness as it had never felt them before.

3. The law of His life, its ultimate value.—It is objected that an essential imperfection cleaves to the individual, however balanced the elements of humanity in him may be. He belongs to one age and people; and the ideal of his day, which is only in a state of becoming, and is surely passing away into some higher, fuller ideal, as the thought and experience of the race widen, inevitably bounds his spirit. Growth is the mark of all things human. The ideal of the good man grows; it draws to itself elements from different nations and different times; it passes through subtle changes and permutations. God speaks to men at sundry times and in divers manners; and not only great men, but nations, are His prophets to the spirit of the wide world which is travelling with the perfect ideal of man. So the individual can never have permanent or universal value. As the Abbé Galièni says, 'One century may judge another century, but only his own century may judge the individual.' That may be true of the ordinary man, or even of national heroes and saints, whose character ever seems strange and partially distasteful or even unintelligible to men of other races and times; it is conspicuously untrue of Jesus. He stands not at the bar of His century. He judges it and all times: He judges His own people and all peoples. He took their highest ideas of God and of moral duty and purified these, making them the light of to-day. Jehovah, the Holy One of Israel, became the Father in heaven whose name is Love; and the chosen people of God, all the immortal spirits God has made in His own image. And that idea wrought itself out perfectly in His teaching and conduct. It is in particulars that the prophet's insight is tested. Jesus identified the will of God with the good of men; and He found that good in the universal elements of human life. He emptied religion of all national and accidental elements. He passed by all customs and observances that were of His day and race; He removed all barriers and limits which men put to human brotherhood. And so, though born among the most exclusive of nations, a son of Abraham after the flesh, He is no Jew: He is the first Citizen of the world; in Paul's revealing phrase, 'the last Adam.'

Nor is the ideal of Jesus subject to time. There is progress in all things, but not in the same way. Knowledge moves from point to point. In mathematics and in all the mechanical sciences we pass with sure foot from one thing gained to another. But as we enter the region of personality, all that is changed. The art of to-day, whether in literature, painting, sculpture, architecture, is not necessarily better than the art of even a distant yesterday. There are creative times in the world's history when a great idea is expressed, and it becomes the task of centuries to understand and assimilate it. Jesus is the Creator of a new spiritual era. His work was to found a Kingdom, spiritual in nature, world-wide in extent. That Kingdom is based on what is ultimate in our nature—the Fatherhood of God, whose name is Love, and the brotherhood of men. Such a Kingdom is the finer breath and inspiration, the inner meaning and end, of all the imperfect, transient societies of earth. And such alone will satisfy the individual; for the end of personality is love. The ideal of Jesus may gather content in and through all the experiences and relations and offices of those who live in this Kingdom. His spirit will bear fruit within the Kingdom beyond what it could bear during the days He lived on earth, revealing its infinite riches. But never will the mind of the world pass beyond the bounds of that ideal, or draw light from any further source.

Jesus is the Lord of the new society, not only because He enunciated with perfect clearness its ultimate law, but because He Himself followed this law unerringly in His own life 'without being let or hindered, as we are, by the motions of private passion and by self-will' (M. Arnold, St. Paul, p. 45). The absoluteness of this obedience is attested by the trials to which it was put. The perfectly good man must not merely show flawless, joyful obedience; he must be sifted as wheat; he must meet trial and temptation in their extremest rigour and subtlest form. Only so can the supremacy of goodness in him be affirmed. Jesus was thus tried. And the trial served only to make clear the perfect identification of His mind with the heart and will of the Father. (For the possibility of the temptation of a sinless Being, see art. TEMPTATION).

(1) Filial relation to God.—In the wilderness Jesus met the trials of the future. He had there to come to an understanding with Himself, to know precisely what His mission was and what were the means of its accomplishment. One suggestion was to turn stones into bread. The loving soul will be tempted from the side of pity. To the heart of Jesus His countrymen's need of bread and of help to a better social state would always be present. But He turned aside to His task, which was to feed them with the words that proceed out of the mouth of God.

Renunciations are the lowly gateways on the narrow road of obedience. They are a measure of a man's moral sagacity, his clearness of vision both of his duty and of the means of realizing it, his simplicity of spirit and freedom from vanity or self-will. Men are readily drawn aside, the lower sort by suggestions of vanity and self-importance, the higher by the vision of some good more quickly realized. The world of political and industrial and social problems is a lower world than that in which Jesus wrought. It is a realm of expediency; its conditions change from age to age. The leaders there are men of affairs, men of practical wisdom, taught to discern what is immediately possible. The world will never lack such guides, for riches and honour and power gather quickly to them. Jesus kept aloof from such questions. He walked a more self-denying road, though one more fruitful of good to the world. He was not sent save as the physician of sick souls and the shepherd of lost ones. It was His to found a Kingdom not of this world, the Kingdom of God: and to provide, by His teaching and by the manifestation of His own loving heart in suffering and in death, what would quicken faith, and hope, and love in men throughout all lands and all times.

The Messianic idea was another great temptation. Evil is here entwined in all things; temptation lurks within a man's purest and highest aspirations. Men must always work with the instruments at their hand. Jesus came with the consciousness of being 'God's final messenger, after whom none higher can come' (Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, Eng. tr. i. 45). He had to appeal to the popular expectation, their hopes of the Messiah soiled by ignoble thought. The popular thought is ever on a lower plane than the Divine, and becomes a difficulty and a temptation to the servants of God. When Jesus saw Himself as the long-looked-for Messiah, all the worldly hopes that clung to the office in the thoughts of Rabbi or people flowed in upon Him. There were the expectation of political glory, and the worship of force, in the popular mind. There was the Rabbinic expectation of a kingdom of right obedience set up miraculously by God through the sudden appearance of the Messiah—a more refined, seemingly pious expectation, full of trust in God only and of zeal for His glory. These were the thoughts and hopes which rose up at the claim of Messiah. In the wilderness Jesus had to face them: He had to come to a clear understanding of the nature of the Messianic Kingdom and of the means He had to use to establish it. There everything material and external fell from His idea of it. The earthly kingdom became spiritual; the glory of Israel became universal; the way of its establishment was to be through an appeal to the honest heart's faith in God as the highest good and the convincing vision of goodness; and for Himself not any success and glory, but suffering, and shame, and death. These elements of His purification of the Messianic idea only emerged gradually in His teaching, but they were present to His consciousness at the beginning, when He determined to worship God only, and to serve Him in simple obedience to His highest thought, making no compromise with the Prince of this world (Mt 4¹⁰).

Jesus had to meet again in the world all those temptations which He had vanquished in His thought. The people desired to make Him king (Jn 6¹⁵). He made it the occasion of showing clearly the spiritual nature of His mission, and reaped for His faithfulness their disbelief. The temptation came closer. Peter, in love, took Him aside and rebuked Him when He sought to prepare the disciples' hearts for the shame and death before Him. Peter was the mouth-piece of the Prince of this world, pointing out the lower way (Mt 16²¹⁻²³). From the lips of mother and brethren the same temptation came. His mother whispered, 'They have no wine' (Jn 2³); His brethren said, 'Go into Judaea (where the great and powerful are), that thy disciples also may see the works that thou doest' (Jn 7³⁻⁴). Temptation thus entrenched itself against Him among the sanctities of the heart. Jesus, as in the wilderness, triumphed by simple obedience. He put the temptation aside with the words, 'Mine hour is not yet come' (Jn 2⁴). He had no ear for any of the suggestions of policy or worldly prudence, whose hour is always ready; He was a man under authority, waiting for the call of the Father; and clear and sweet above the discordant voices of the world that call ever came, and He followed it to Calvary. There His obedience was perfected (Jn 14³¹).

(2) Brotherly relation to men.—There were no limits to Jesus' sympathy and love for men. (a) The religious prejudices of His day did not impair His brotherhood with the sinful and the outcast. He discerned clearly their worth. That is a witness to His brotherhood. For interest and affection are the lights which illumine the personality of others; only by them can we read their hidden worth, especially when obscured by the dominant thought and prejudices of the day. Jesus discerned the spiritual soundness which might underlie sins of passion, the capacity of generosity with its healing power, the quick and deep response to a gospel of forgiveness in the humility of self-accusing hearts, the sacred soil where love grows (Lk 7⁴⁷ 18¹³, Mt 21²⁸⁻³²). And He drew nigh unto men in brotherly love as the physician of sick souls, the faithful shepherd seeking the lost sheep of God, though thereby He outraged the sentiments of the Pharisees (Mt 9¹¹ 11¹⁹, Lk 15² 19⁷), though His friendship with them was helping to raise the cross on which He was slain. The simplicity of Jesus' feeling of brotherhood for them is witnessed by the fact that they drew near to Him gladly (Lk 15¹, Mt 9¹⁰).

(b) 'No single social type monopolized the sympathy or acceptance of Jesus' (Peabody, op. cit. p. 204). The zealot and the publican met in the inner circle of His disciples: Mary of Magdala, out of whom went seven devils, and Joanna, the wife of Herod's steward, united to minister to Him of their substance. He was equally at home in Simon the Pharisee's house and at the table of Levi or Zacchaeus, with their different clientèle; in private talk with Nicodemus, a master in Israel, and at the wayside well with the woman of Samaria. His help in sickness was for rich and poor, in all circumstances and conditions—the solitary leper, and the mourning widow in the streets of Nain; the paralytic of thirty-eight years, friendless and helpless, and the bond-servant of the household of the Roman centurion, whose name was held in honour throughout all Capernaum; the daughter of Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue, and the daughter of a nameless Gentile woman of Syro-Phœnicia. And His brotherhood went beyond the bounds of nations. He made the Samaritan the hero of His story of neighbourliness; He praised the faith of the Roman centurion; He pointed to God's care of Naaman the Syrian captain, and the widow of Zarephath. Jesus might not formulate in express terms the doctrine of the brotherhood of man. That was not His way. He dealt not in notions or abstractions. He rather inspired a spirit which sooner or later would burst all the swaddling-bands that confined humanity, and which expressed itself in the words of him who understood best the spirit of the Master, 'Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free' (Col 3¹¹). Illumination rises from the heart.

(c) In Him love won also its ultimate triumph, viz. over wrong and hate. 'I say unto you, Love your enemies,' etc. (Mt 5⁴⁴). That is an ideal which thought may win; but it has been fully realized only in Him who suffered the contradiction of sinners with unfailing patience and serenity of heart, and who prayed on the cross for those who placed Him there, and who reviled Him in His agony, 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do' (Lk 23³⁴).

Jesus' filial relation of love and obedience to the Father and His brotherhood to man reach their absolute expression on Calvary. That death was no accident, provoked by the invectives against the Pharisees; it was seen afar off as the end of His mission. It looks through the sad irony of His answer to the Pharisees when they complained of the religious light-heartedness of His followers and He said, 'The days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days' (Mk 2²⁰). And as soon as the disciples had come to clear faith in Him as the Messiah, He began to prepare them for disappointment and tribulation and His death. This was the inevitable end of the method He had chosen in the wilderness, when He renounced all powers of persuasion but that of an appeal to the heart. The Kingdom of loving and obedient souls could be established only on the perfect sacrifice of love and obedience, and Jesus gave Himself absolutely in response to that vision of faith. In this sacrifice the law of His life, ultimate law for man, declares its victory.

4. As a result of His perfect love and obedience the character of Jesus shows certain notes of perfection, qualities in which He is unique and unapproachable among men. (1) There was in Him the union of the loftiest self-consciousness and the utmost sobriety of mind and lowliness of heart. 'I am the light of the world' (Jn 8¹²); 'No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 11²⁷). A self-consciousness more than human is in these words. And this self-consciousness dominates all His work. He brushes aside the teachings of the scribes and the traditions of their schools; He speaks to the people as one having authority, who is greater than Jonah or Solomon (Mt 12⁴¹⁻⁴²), who stands above all the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5^{17, 18} 21³⁴⁻³⁷). He made also the most tremendous claims on men. He bade the rich man sell all and follow Him; His disciples were to hate wife and family for His sake. The experience of failure and the approach of the Cross availed nothing to abate these claims. At the visit of the Greeks He said that, were He lifted up, He would draw all men to Him (Jn 12³²); He told the high priest that He was the Son of God, and that he would see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven (Mk 14⁶²). And yet Jesus ever showed the utmost sobriety and lowly-mindedness. He always prayed humbly and submissively to God the Father. The Son did nothing but what He learned from the Father (Jn 5¹⁹). And in the wilderness He recognized that He was to tread life's common way. Savonarola and St. Francis might offer to pass through the fire, but Jesus expected no guarding or attesting miracle. He must not cast Himself from the Temple. He must accept all the ordinary conditions of life in His work. And He accepted them. Meekly He went down the darkening ways, accepting failure and disappointment and hatred and shame as the portion appointed by the Father; and there is no sign of any inward rebellion or amazement. He walked humbly before God.

He was with men also in lowliness and meekness. When the Samaritan villagers would not receive Him, He restrained His disciples' indignation and went to another village (Lk 9⁵²⁻⁵⁶); He took a place in the lower seats in the Pharisee's house (Lk 14⁷⁻¹¹); He was infinitely approachable by all the outcast and needy. Though He proclaimed, when need was, His greatness as the Son of God, yet He turned aside from personal questions as to whether He was the Messiah. His aim was to create in men's hearts faith in God as their Father, and He was content to let that faith come to its own appreciation of Him and His claims. The man who would not follow Him, but yet wrought cures in His name, was not to be rebuked (Mk 9³⁸⁻⁴²); and any blasphemy against Him personally would be forgiven (Mt 12^{31, 32}). His greatness among men was the greatness of service. This union of lowly-mindedness and loftiest self-consciousness is reflected, as in a mirror, in His parable of the Last Judgment. He sees Himself attended by all the holy angels, and seated on the throne of glory to judge men. But there His royal robe is the self-forgetting humility of love. For there no wrongs done to Himself are thought of, no disbelief in His claims, no offence against His majesty: it is the helpless and the suffering forgotten by their brethren who fill His mind. His glory vanishes within the light of love.

(2) Jesus faced the sorrow and sin of the world, and yielded nothing of His faith and joy. It has been said that He was a man of melancholy, one who never laughed, one marked and scored by the world's evil, grown old before His time. That is an a priori interpretation of His character. In the Gospels it is the note of joy that strikes us. Jesus Himself says to the complaining Pharisees, 'Can the children of the bridechamber fast while the bridegroom is with them?' The joy of the bridegroom was in His heart. His life then was empty of all the things in whose abundance the world thinks that man's life consists. But the sources of happiness are all within. And Jesus' joy reveals His victory over the tyranny of things. He was rich inwardly. That arose from His cheerful faith 'that all which we behold is full of blessings.' This world, to His vision, was God's world. It is He who clothes the lily with beauty, and feeds the ravens, and knows when a sparrow falls to the ground, and numbers the hairs of His children's heads. And He had faith in man. He saw in the Temple's outcast children marks of good. They could love much: the authentic Divine seal was still on their hearts. Such an outlook brings riches of interest and joy to the whole nature.

But how did that faith and that joy fare in their encounter with the world's sin and sorrow? It was tried to the uttermost. Jesus met with all the sorrows of life in others' experience, which His sympathy made real to Him, if not in His own. He met the world's sin; He had to endure the disbelief of His brethren and the forsaking of His followers; He was led to see the very throne of Satan in the hypocrisy of religious men, and in the cruelty and inhuman pride of earth's saints. But that did not touch the inward joy and peace of His faith. As He went up to Jerusalem, where alone the blood of the prophets was shed, there was a glory in His face which held His followers awed and silent (Mk 10³²⁻³⁴). It was the inward rapture of a heart that saw, beyond the darkness, light; beyond the hatreds and crimes of men, the love of the Father turning sin to blessed account. It is true that Jesus' latest words are words of judgment. That could not but be; for the days of Judah's visitation were hurrying by, and the truth which the hour revealed must be spoken. The shadow of Israel's rejection is over them. But peace, 'subsisting at the heart of endless agitation,' was His. It is present everywhere in His last discourse in the Upper Room (Jn 13^{31-17²⁶}). A sober colouring as of even is there; but it speaks quiet assurance of victory. 'Be of good cheer: I have overcome the world.' That is its note. Peace breathes through it, peace 'whose other names are rapture, power, clear sight, and love.' Only twice during that night was this peace greatly disturbed: in Gethsemane when He prayed, 'Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me' (Mt 26³⁹); and on the cross when the cry burst from Him, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (27⁴⁶). These are mysteries where we pass beyond mere moral questions into the theology of the sin-bearing. Could such an unique spirit pass through such an experience without striking notes too profound and strange for our conceiving? But only for a brief space rested His soul within the shadow. There was peace in His heart after Gethsemane, when Judas came, and when He stood before Caiaphas and Pilate, which made Him the Lord of all that evil night. And there was peace on the cross, that throne of love and obedience; peace before the darkness, when sympathy for others filled His heart, and He prayed for those who slew Him knowing not what they did, and comforted the repentant thief, and gave His mother into His loved disciple's care; peace after the darkness, when He surveyed His work, and seeing it finished thus in sacrificial death, commended His soul to the Father, whose will He was obeying. There is the perfection of Jesus' victory over the world. He yielded no hostages of joy or faith. He confronted the world's sin, the very darkness of evil where God seemed not to be, and He remained with inward glory crowned, His soul full of the joy and peace of the vision that He and all His lay in the bosom of the Father.

PERFECTION (HUMAN).—Perfection is one of those 'terms which, however they may have been perverted to the purposes of fanaticism, are not only scriptural, but of too frequent occurrence in Scripture to be overlooked or passed by in silence' (Coleridge, Aids to Reflection, xli. c.). In the Sermon on the Mount the second grand division of the thought culminates in the command, 'Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt 5⁴⁸). The verb in this sentence is a future indicative, but practically all scholars agree that it has the force of an imperative (Meyer, Holtzmann, Dods, Weiss, Votaw, etc.). As a command of our Lord, this saying clearly sets before His disciples the possibility and the necessity of their perfection in conduct and character; and it becomes of supreme importance to know what the adjective τέλειος, 'perfect,' here means. It cannot stand for absolute perfection, which is defined as 'entire freedom from defect, blemish, weakness, or liability to err or fail' (Century Dictionary). Such perfection is clearly incompatible with finite being. Every man must confess that he falls far short of this glory; it belongs to God alone. The NT has little to say about this absolute perfection of God. It is everywhere assumed, but the word 'perfection' does not occur in any direct statement of it anywhere. When we are told here that the Father is perfect, we know that His absolute perfection is not in view, since the Master says that men may and must attain unto a like perfection. The context must determine the meaning of the word in this command.

The first portion of the Sermon on the Mount sets forth the character of the citizens in the new Kingdom which Jesus preached (vv. 3-16). The Beatitudes are pronounced upon those who meet the conditions for seeing God and becoming the sons of God. Since those who see God become like Him (1 Jn 3²), and the sons of God are to be like the Father who is in heaven (Mt 5⁴⁵), the character pictured in the Beatitudes is one of God-likeness (vv. 3-12). The influence of such character is next presented under the figures of the salt which preserves and the lamp which illuminates. The preserving and enlightening work of the Heavenly Father is to be manifest in the lives of His sons. Their works are to parallel His. They are to reproduce and represent Him. He is glorified in the good works of His children, because their works are like His own (vv. 13-16). Like Him in character and conduct, what will be the law of their life? That question is answered in the second great division of the Sermon. It will not be any code of external regulations. The Father is governed by nothing of that sort. He is a law unto Himself. His conduct is the spontaneous outcome of His own being. Even so the life of His children will not be measured by the standard of any written code, but by the unwritten law of a heart in perfect sympathy with the will of God (vv. 17-48). This law of the highest and purest possible motive will preclude not only the external act of murder, but the cherishing of anger against a brother (vv. 21-26). It will render impossible not only adulterous acts but impure meditations (vv. 27-32). It will render oaths unnecessary (vv. 33-37). It will counsel the surrender of rights in the maintenance of peace (vv. 38-42). It will demand the constant exercise of love towards enemies as well as friends, towards Gentiles as well as Jews, towards the just and the unjust alike (vv. 43-48). This law of the inner life in harmony with the Father's will is in no danger of coming into conflict with any righteous system of legal regulations, and least of all with the Law of God as revealed in the OT. It will not destroy this Law, but fulfil it in a righteousness far exceeding that which any mere legalists can maintain (vv. 17-20). It will lift the life above the plane of morality into the realm of genuine religion, in which the thoughts and the affections will be as pure as the outward conduct is righteous. As all the Father's acts are the proof that His thoughts towards us are of good and of good alone, so all His children's deeds will evidence their desire for the universal good; and they will be blessed as the Father is blessed, and active for the good of all as the Father is active for the good of all, and their motives will be as single and pure as the motives of the Father Himself. In such case, said the Master, 'ye shall be perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect.' The statement is a culminating summary of all that the Master has said up to this point. The citizens of the Kingdom are to be the sons of God. The sons of God are to be like God. The children are to be like their Father in their character and their conduct and the law of their life. In love to all and in doing good to all they give the clearest and the most indubitable proof of their likeness to Him. In this their perfection consists. In this the end of their being is reached.

The root idea in the adjective τέλειος, 'perfect,' is that of τέλος, the 'end.' The perfect man is the man who has reached the end designed in his creation, the man who represents the ideal set before his own being. The Father may be said to be perfect, as completely and constantly realizing the end of His own being. God is love (1 Jn 4⁸). His providence is the continuously perfect manifestation of His love (Mt 5⁴⁵). Jesus commands His disciples to be perfect in the continuous maintenance and manifestation of the spirit of love. They must love the Lord their God with all their heart, and with all their soul, and with all their mind; and they must love their neighbour as themselves. On these two commandments hung the whole Law and the Prophets (Mt 22³⁷⁻⁴⁰). He who kept these two commandments was perfectly obedient. He met the whole requirement of loyal service. He realized the end for which he was created.

To many persons 'counsels of perfection' are synonymous with 'demands of the impossible.' A large part of the difficulty in such minds is relieved, however, when the Master's limitation to perfection in love and loving service is made. This is seen at once to be compatible with imperfections of other sorts. The child may love his father perfectly, though he be weak in body and immature in mind. Absolute perfection belongs to God, and is demanded of no one of His creatures. Perfection in love God shares with man. He asks man to love Him with undivided loyalty and affection, and to prove his love to God in the service of his fellow-man.

PERPLEXITY.—The word 'perplexity' (ἀπορία) occurs but once in the NT (Lk 21²⁵), in that reminiscence of Daniel which foretells the day of terrors that shall usher in the presence of the Son of Man. But the idea has remarkable associations with Christ in the Gospels. Not only is perplexity discernible in His own experience, but He was then (as now) a frequent cause of it in others. His powers, and the amazing insight of His wisdom, were a continual occasion of astonishment to the mere onlookers (Mt 13⁵⁴⁻⁵⁶, cf. Lk 4²²). To explain His exorcisms, the Pharisees were driven to the confusing theory of demonic possession (Mt 9³⁴ || 12²⁴, Mk 3²², Lk 11¹⁶). His disciples would listen to His unconventional judgments with blank perplexity. Had He not, for example, taught them the blessedness of charity, and the law of love for one's neighbour? What, then, could they make of His defence of 'this waste' of a box of precious ointment (Mt 26⁹ || Jn 12⁴)? It was hard for a disciple to understand why He should resist an opportunity of helping the poor: men are slow to learn the value of a rightful surrender of our most beautiful and treasured possessions for the purpose of reverence only. Not a little of the disciples' perplexity arose from their own materialistic preconceptions. When Jesus used the language of parable or metaphor, they made no attempt to reach the deeper and more spiritual meaning—as when He spoke of the Sower (Mk 4¹³ || Lk 8⁹), or of the 'leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees' (Mt 16⁵⁻¹² || Lk 12¹). Once the awful terror which is sometimes the accompaniment of perplexity seized them—when Jesus spoke with such dread certainty of the presence of one among them who was ready to give Him up, and they 'looked one on another, doubting of whom he spake' (Jn 13²²). Yet, while Christ perplexed others, especially those who knew Him least, they seemed powerless to perplex Him. Perfect obedience to the will of God in all things left no room for that flickering of faith which blurs the answer or the gospel of so many teachers. When questioners deliberately attempted to puzzle Him, He unravelled their tangles with instinctive ease (Mt 9⁵ || Mk 2⁹, Lk 5²³; Mt 12⁴ || Mk 2²⁶, Lk 6⁴). Sometimes in a phrase He re-tied the knot into a problem which they were unable to resolve, as when they asked by what authority He did these things (Mt 21²⁷ || Mk 11²³, Lk 20²), or in the question of the tribute money being paid to Caesar (Mt 22²¹ || Mk 12¹⁷, Lk 20²⁵), or the casuistry of the woman with the seven husbands (Mt 22³⁰ || Mk 12²⁵, Lk 20³⁵). The pain of perplexity seems to have come to Jesus only towards the end of His life on earth, and then it was more from within than from without. In those closing days the burden of His mission, and all that it would entail in the far future of the world, seemed to weigh heavily upon Him. Near at hand He felt the weakness of His disciples' loyalty, and was especially 'troubled in the spirit' about Judas (Jn 13²¹). As He looked forward into the days to come, there fell upon Him the knowledge of divisions, feuds, persecutions that would arise in His name 'to incarnadine the world.' He was face to face with the baptism of all leadership: it would be His to kindle the flaming passions of men, Prince of Peace as He is (Lk 12⁵¹). Is it any wonder that on the threshold of such a task He should be distressed, perplexed (συνέχουαι, RVm 'pained')? He is moved to hesitate: at least the temptation arises when He feels spiritual perplexity (Jn 12²⁷). And in Gethsemane the overstrained humanity utters the cry of longing for escape—'Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass away from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt' (Mt 26³⁹). In that last sentence He reveals to us the key of deliverance from all cankering perplexity, all that uncertainty which confuses and enervates the will. He shows the world the supremacy of a will resigned to God. It is the truism of the choice—'No man can serve two masters: . . . Ye cannot serve God and mammon' (Mt 6²⁴ || Lk 16¹³). 'Try to serve both, and you have strife and confusion within and around: life becomes a war of irreconcilable ideals. But bend all thoughts, desires, will, towards God; learn the worth of Christ's word, 'Be not anxious' as to food, life, raiment, and the rest, 'for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of these things' (Mt 6²⁵⁻³³ || Lk 12²²⁻³⁶). There are no more troubled hearts and perplexed wills for those who rest in God and live in Christ (Jn 14¹), for to them the prayer, 'Thy will be done' (Mt 6¹⁰), finds its invariable answer in a sublime and heavenly peace. PERSECUTION.—(1) Christ foresaw that persecution would be His inevitable lot and that of His true followers. Repeatedly He foretold the main incidents of His Passion (Mt 16²¹ 17²²⁻²³ 20¹⁸⁻¹⁹ 26², Mk 8³¹ 9³¹ 10³²⁻³⁴). (2) Christ also forewarned His disciples that they too must suffer persecution (Mt 24⁹, Mk 4¹⁷ 10³⁰, Lk 11⁴⁹ 21¹²⁻¹⁶, Jn 16²⁻⁴ 33). (3) Persecution was the test of true discipleship. It was mentioned in the parable of the Sower as the cause of defection among superficial believers (Mk 4¹⁷, Mt 13²¹). (4) It was the sure means of gaining a blessing, and as such is particularly referred to in the Beatitudes (Mt 5¹⁰⁻¹²).

The methods of persecution adopted against Christ and His immediate followers were such as contempt and disparagement (Jn 8⁴⁸); ascription of Christ's miracles to the power of the Evil One (Mt 12²⁴); expulsion of those believing on Him from the synagogue (Jn 9²²⁻³⁴); attempts to entrap Him in His words (Mt 22¹⁵, Jn 8⁶); questioning His authority (Mk 11²⁸, Mt 21²³); (after the failure of the former) illegal arrest and the heaping of every kind of insult upon the Prisoner, who was entitled to protection from the authorities until the authorized penalty was laid upon Him (Mt 26^{67ff.} and parallels). See also art. NAME, p. 217^b.

It was the fear of persecution that drove the disciples to forsake their Master at the hour of His arrest (Mt 26⁵⁶ and parallels).

PERSON OF CHRIST.—See DIVINITY, HUMANITY, INCARNATION, SON OF GOD, SON OF MAN, etc.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE.—See CHRIST IN ART, vol. i. p. 314 f.

PERSONALITY.—1. Definition and analysis.—Personality is the substance and summary of a man's qualities, or rather it is the man himself, discovered in the last analysis and in the highest category of being short of God. Indeed, 'complete personality can be in God only, while to man can belong but a weak and faint copy thereof' (Lotze, Outlines, p. 72). The truth is that through the limitations of bodily existence there are mental and moral workings which do not at once cross the threshold of consciousness, but may at any time surprise the soul, as in the flash of genius or the turn of conversion. But personality implies a grip of these things as our own. We know that we exist when self is revealed to us over against the world. There the self-conscious life begins. But it is not until God is revealed over against both self and the world that personality is fully exercised. The recognition of a moral authority is the touchstone of the self-determined life. Thus, for popular purposes, personality may be expressed in terms of character. 'It is made up,' says F. W. Robertson, 'of three attributes—consciousness, character, and will.' In other words, it is the power of self-assertion on lines of character. But, philosophically speaking, the two chief factors in personality, in so far as it can be analyzed, are self-consciousness and self-determination, the contents of which it will be necessary to examine. Put briefly, self-consciousness is the soul's utterance 'I am'; self-determination is the soul's assertion 'I will.'

(1) Self-consciousness is the soul's utterance 'I am.' (a) I am myself and nobody else (cf. Jn 9⁹ ἐγὼ εἰμι). Almost the first sense of personality is that it speaks from behind closed doors. It can look out on others, but they cannot enter uninvited to share its life. This point is brought out in Holman Hunt's famous picture 'The Light of the World,' in which the door has no handle outside. 'Each self is a unique existence, which is perfectly impervious to other selves—impervious in a fashion of which the impenetrability of matter is a faint analogue' (Seth, Hegelianism and Personality, p. 216). (b) I am myself amid the varied functions of my being. Spinoza based personality on the intellect, Schleiermacher on the feeling, Schopenhauer on the will. But personality subtly underlies thinking, feeling, and willing. They are only modes of the soul's self-expression. They are unified in the intuition 'I am.' In Jn 6²⁰ there is an illustrative use of ἐγὼ εἰμι, when Jesus assured the disciples of His personal identity behind an unfamiliar appearance. (c) I am myself in a continuity of experience. In all movement of time and change of circumstances the soul still knows itself as the same. We cannot get rid of our own past; it is with us still. And no sceptical philosophy can dissolve this elemental fact. There is a corresponding sense of ἐγὼ εἰμι in Jn 8⁵⁸, where Jesus says, 'Before Abraham was, I am,' and reveals the wonderful secret of His self-consciousness.—These modes of the soul's utterance 'I am' enter into the basis of our understanding, on which is erected that faculty of the soul called reason, by which we cognize and construe the world. But the soul must be considered not only in this static, but also in its dynamic aspect, in its—

(2) Self-determination, which is the soul's assertion 'I will.' The soul selects and pursues its own ends at the bidding of its own desires. It has music of its own to beat out, by appreciating and appropriating objects in its own environment. The whole range of enjoyment in the pursuit of happiness on the one hand, and of endurance in the path of duty on the other, rests on the use of this power of self-determination. But that which moralizes the human will is that it responds to two voices—(a) 'I can.' The sense of liberty therein expressed is an essential element of personality, and through the intuition of the soul it has held its own as an assertion of free will in spite of the affirmations of reason respecting the will of God (in theology) or the laws of nature (in science). Our moral sense is strictly bound up with this assertion of the soul, without which there can be neither merit, nor blame, nor any accountability. It is this which binds up our being with that of God.

'So near is glory to our dust,
So nigh is God to man,
When Duty whispers low, "Thou must,"
The youth replies, "I can."' (Emerson).

(b) 'I must.' Not, however, until 'I will' is consummated in 'I must' is the height of personality reached, for its liberty of will is given for the sake of its voluntary obedience. When the personality has found its master, its resources are all enlisted on the side of self-determination, especially when for love's sake we lose ourselves. In other words, the highest outgoing and incoming of personality in self-determination is in the exercise of love.

'Love took up the harp of Life, and smote on all the chords with night, Smote the chord of Self, that, trembling, passed in music out of sight.'

2. Christ's influence on the conception of personality.—The full extension of the possibilities of personality is due to Jesus Christ. He opened up new vistas for the soul's self-consciousness by revealing the inherent but hitherto hidden natures of God, the world, and the soul, whereby the value of the personality has been infinitely enhanced; and higher ways for the soul's self-determination by bringing the gift of the Holy Spirit, in the strength of which the soul overcomes the world, submits to God, and thus realizes itself. This is what the world was waiting for. Prof. Bigg (The Church and Roman Empire) shows that the Eastern religions of Isis and Mithras were being welcomed because by their virtual monotheism and their proffer of peace and happiness they seemed to meet the needs of the newly discovered personality. Christ did this completely. He supplied the key of knowledge to self-consciousness and the nerve of power to self-determination. Henceforth the soul is a possibility to be realized through knowledge in obedience. These are the two factors of faith, for 'faith is at once a vision and an allegiance' (Hort). Prior to Christ, and still apart from Him, the conception of the world has largely absorbed both the notion of God (in Polytheism, Pantheism, and Fatalism), and that of the soul (in Naturalism and Materialism). But through Christ, God and man draw out apart from the world, apart from each other too (sin being the 'sunderer'), and yet more truly close to each other, under the common conception of personality in which both share as distinguished from the world. Illingworth has put the whole point finely at the end of his 5th Bampton Lecture: 'As reason qualifies and conditions our whole animal nature by its presence, so that we are never merely animals, spirituality also permeates and modifies all that we call our natural faculties; and our personality itself is, in this sense, as truly supernatural as the Divine Person in whom alone it finds its home.'

'God . . . soul . . . the only facts for me.
Prove them facts? That they o'erpass my power of proving Proves them such.' (R. Browning, La Saisiaz).

Through Christ man has learned to read God and himself as being gathered under the same categories, perfect and infinite in the one, derivative and fettered in the other. But that is only the intellectual aspect of what we owe Him. And, as Martensen has said (Dogmatics, p. 154), 'No intellectual creation can ever be perfected by dint of a mere psychological possibility; it must first be fructified and awakened by a higher inspiration.' Christ has shown us the way to the consummation of our personality in the voluntary and glad surrender to God and in fellowship with Him through the Holy Spirit (1 Jn 1³), so that we learn to say—

'Our wills are ours, we know not how;
Our wills are ours to make them Thine.'

There is such an utter absence of the language of the schools in the speech of Christ, that one might be tempted to think that He made no contribution to the subject of personality. And it is true He was no philosopher in the accepted sense of the term. But He gave philosophy a new world to discover. He roused and satisfied experiences of the soul which at length called into being a new terminology. The fact that the analysis of personality first went to the depths in Paul's Epistles, argues that the first perfect exposition of personality was in Paul's Master. For a thing must be before it is thought upon. Where even Plato and Aristotle had groped blindly because they had no true conception of personality, Christ moved with perfect assurance. What was hidden from them, 'the wise and prudent,' was all in all to Him. It might truly be said that personality is the pivot of the gospel. 'The gospel was in the highest and most perfect sense a personal religion' (Bousset, Jesus, p. 164). It does not move in the regions of mere intellect or will or feeling, nor even in the field of their joint exercise. It moves throughout in the region of the man himself, in his self-consciousness and self-determination, and finds its highest expression in the Divine passion for the soul and the human hunger for God. Christ did not coin terms, and yet there is what may be called with Rothe, a 'language of the Holy Ghost.' His psychological expressions do not travel beyond the accepted antitheses of soul and body, flesh and spirit, using the first to express simply the two elements in man's nature (Mt 10²⁸), and the second to emphasize their distinction in origin (Jn 3⁶) and divergence in character (Mk 14³⁸). Indeed, Jesus did not make use of the psychology available in His own day, e.g. μακάριος οὐ οὐ κατέγνω ἡ ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ (Sir 14²), which is a plain reference to conscience.

Although the word 'spirit' (πνεῦμα) is reserved in the Gospels chiefly for super- or sub-human agencies, it is also used indifferently as a synonym for ψυχή or 'soul', to express the region of the inner life where the feelings especially have full play. In fourteen instances of such a kind, πνεῦμα occurs seven times (five times in reference to Jesus), and ψυχὴ also seven times (in reference to Jesus only twice). (With Paul, however, these two words fall apart in psychological connotation. The favourite word of the Evangelists, and presumably of Jesus Himself, is καρδιά, which is not only the region of the feelings, but the seat of the will (βίλημα) and of the thoughts (διανοητισμοί). In fact, throughout the Bible it means the organ of the personality (cf. Hastings' DB, art. 'Psychology'). It is, by the way, suggestive of the moral emphasis of Christ's teaching that He never uses οὐκ, διάνοια, σύνεσις or their correlatives. But, while Jesus employed terms simply in their popular connotation, He sometimes transfused them with His own transcendental conceptions, and then they stand in excess of light. Thus, 'If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light' (Mt 6²²); 'Whosoever will save his life (ψυχὴν) shall lose it' (16²⁵); 'Blessed are your eyes, for they see' (13¹⁶); 'The things that proceed out of a man defile him' (Mk 7²⁰); 'He that believeth on me, out of his belly (καρδία) shall flow rivers of living water' (Jn 7³⁸).

But Christ's exposition of personality was not vocal, but vital. It was essentially the realm in which He lived, moved, and had His being: it was the true life to which He invited the careworn and heavy laden, and those who were entangled in their material and worldly environment. Secure in the possession of His own personality, His self-consciousness being at one with God, His self-determination being merged in the will of God, He could affirm, 'The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me' (Jn 14³⁰); 'I am in the Father and the Father in me' (14¹⁰); 'I do always the things that please him' (8²⁹). That personality is the pivot of the gospel which Jesus lived and taught may be illustrated in detail.

(1) The personal temptation of Jesus is given as the record of a unique struggle within the chambers of personality. It was associated with that enhancing of His self-consciousness which was represented by the descent of the Spirit as that of a dove, and the hearing of a voice, 'Thou art my beloved Son' (Mk 1¹⁰). The first temptation was overcome by His affirmation that the soul is infinitely more precious than the natural life, and that there is eternal provision for it in communion with the Father (Mt 4⁴). As Christ said afterwards to His disciples, 'I have food to eat that ye know not of' (Jn 4³²). The second temptation was resisted on the ground that man has the responsibility of cherishing his life and using it wisely, as the vehicle of a God-given personality. To depend on the aid of angels would be an act of presumption (Mt 4^{6c}). God has chosen that they should minister only when personality has achieved its proper work (Mk 1¹³), or before personality is permitted to begin it (Mt 18¹⁰). A true man scorns the aid of impersonal forces when affairs of the soul are at stake (26³⁵). The third temptation was met in the confidence that personality is of itself worth more than all the world. It may subject itself only to God (4¹⁰), by whose gentleness it is made great; for it is meant to be king of all, but not through the acknowledgment of Satan (cf. 1 Co 3²³). So Jesus taught elsewhere, 'What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?'; but 'The meek shall inherit the earth' (Mk 8³⁶, Mt 5⁵).

(2) The public teaching of Christ never moved far from the personal character of true religion. (a) The Kingdom of heaven is essentially the realm of personality. It thus calls for no less an analogy than a new birth, and the breath of the Spirit (Jn 3⁷⁻⁸). Its boundaries are specifically in character, for it is inherited by such as are poor in spirit, pure in heart, and peaceable in will (Mt 5³⁻⁸⁻⁹), and those who revert to the attitude of children (18³). Deeds of themselves, however zealously performed, are outside this realm (7^{22c}), for a house may be swept and garnished, yet vacant for evil spirits (12⁴). But even our words will witness against us, for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh (12³⁵). The approach of this Kingdom, therefore, is a call to repentance (Mk 1¹⁵): its entry involves the 'binding of the strong man' (Mt 12²⁹); and its extension needs such a personal influence as the word or the gospel incorporated in the lives of the disciples (5^{14c}). (b) The inner righteousness is only another way of stating that in true religion the personality must come to its own, as the character of fruit is fixed by the tree on which it grows (7¹⁷). Nothing done by rote or for show is worthy of the soul's approach to its God (6¹⁻⁸). The only genuine worship is in spirit and in truth (Jn 4²³), in the consciousness that the best things may be asked for from a Father (Mt 7¹¹), who in turn expects the inward attitude of a believing (6³¹), lowly (Lk 18¹⁴), and forgiving heart (Mt 6¹⁵). The only defiling thing in life is the effluence of a man's personality (Mk 7²⁰). The only unforgivable sin is the sin against the Holy Ghost, which is essentially a sin against one's own personality (Mt 12³¹). And behind Christ's teaching were His miracles of mercy, which were sacramental of this rescue of personality from its fetters (Mk 2^{5ff}, Lk 13¹⁶). In short, with Christ, religion is positive because it is spiritual. Saintliness is not by contraction, but by expansion. Keeping the Law is acting the Good Samaritan. In a word, religion is raised to personality-power.

(3) The private training of Christ was always and wholly exerted on the personality of His disciples. He left behind Him no documents, nor any organization, only men who knew whom they believed (2 Ti 1¹²). He was satisfied, therefore, that they should be with Him (Mk 3¹⁴), sure that afterwards they would become 'fishers of men' (Mt 4¹⁹), 'lamb in the midst of wolves' (Lk 10³), all because of His influence on their character. They had nothing else to carry with them but the secret of this wonderful change (Mt 10^{7ff.}). This change was due to something deeper than even the personal magnetism of Jesus. It was due to a revelation at the core of a man's nature (16^{17f.}), by an organ of personality undiscovered by the wise (11²⁵), and unappreciated by the rich (19²³). The Church rests on the confession of a convinced personality (16¹⁸), in whom it has pleased God to reveal His Son (16¹⁷, cf. Gal 1^{15f.}). And this revelation provides the clue to spiritual truth and the criterion of religious authority (Mt 10^{34f.}, 23⁹, Jn 8^{31f.}, cf. 1 Co 3²¹⁻²³, 1 Jn 2²⁷ [cf. art. AUTHORITY IN RELIGION (iii.)]). It is worth while for a disciple to 'lose his life' in order to gain the hidden life of his true personality (Mt 16²⁵); and if he finds stumbling-blocks to this in his nature, he must act with surgical severity (18⁸⁻⁹).

On the other hand, there is an infinite range to the possibilities of personality clear to the mind of Jesus, but hardly fathomable to ourselves, as where He says that to receive a disciple is to receive One who is greater than he (10⁴⁰), and the service even of the helpless and forlorn is done to Himself (25⁴⁰, cf. 26¹¹). (Is it on this account that 'the least in the kingdom of heaven' is greater than John the great individualist?) Another great saying which suggests that we are more than ourselves through Christ, is, 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them' (18²⁰); and yet one more, 'Lo, I am with you all the days' (28²⁰). In such utterances, which give ample support to Pauline and Johannine mysticism, Christ at least suggests that personality, when once released, is not bounded by the limits of the individual, but is only fulfilled when lost in union with Himself, as the Spirit of all Love. In the words of Dr. Moberly (Atonement and Personality, p. 254), 'Personality is the possibility of mirroring God, the faculty of being a living reflexion of the very attributes and character of the Most High.' But for the final expression of this profound truth we turn to the words of our Saviour in His intercessory prayer: 'I in them, and thou in me, that they may be perfected into one (eis ἓν) . . . that the love wherewith thou lovedst me may be in them, and I in them' (Jn 17^{23, 26}).

3. New factors introduced by Christ.—The way in which He directly met the needs of personality was twofold—by a revelation and a reinforcement. (1) To man's self-consciousness He revealed God as our Father, with the full illumination of man's worth, hope, and destiny which this truth brings. (2) To man's self-determination He brought the gift of the Holy Spirit, as a power in aid (παράκλητος) of the fettered personality. The essential conjunction, in the view of the early Church, of these two elements of redemption, which are ours through Christ, is well illustrated in the variant of St. Luke's recension of the Lord's Prayer. After the acknowledgment of the Fatherhood stands the petition, 'Thy Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us.'

(1) Jesus made the soul aware of its high origin and destiny, for the acceptance of the Fatherhood of God clears a path through Time and through Eternity. The issues of life become of supreme account to those who believe in One who lives and loves, watches and listens, provides and controls, and will at length either welcome or reject. There is a place for the least, the last and the lost. The angels of the little ones, who have achieved nothing and possess nothing, are before the face of the Father (Mt 18¹⁰). Though uncounted in a nation (Lk 19⁹), though unvalued by society (7⁴⁷), though classed with publicans and sinners (15¹), a man is counted among the Father's children, and valued in the Father's heart (Mt 12⁵⁰, Lk 15^{20f.}). 'It is not the will of your Father in heaven that one of these little ones should perish.' But the greatest hindrance to the full emergence of personality is not so much the lack of outward respect as the loss of self-respect through sin. Self-consciousness becomes thereby a conscience of slavery, of impotence (Ro 7, esp. vv. 7-11). When St. Paul speaks of having been once 'alive apart from the law' (v. 9), he means a non-moral existence, before true self-consciousness was born. In the words of Schleiermacher, 'The sinner prior to conversion is overlooked, and is not in this respect a person at all in the eyes of God. He is a particle of the mass, out of which the continued operation of the same creative act of God which gave us the Redeemer does, through Him, call him into personality' (A. Vaughan, Works, vol. i. p. 87; cf. Aug. de Pecc. Or. 36). The process in the experience of many is a painful one. And although for others it is gradual and apparently natural, there does not seem to be much footing in the NT for those whom F. W. Newman designated as the 'once-born' (cf. James, Varieties of Religious Experience, p. 80 and Lect. 3 and 4).

'Thus conscience does make cowards of us all;
And thus the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought.'

The tying to a dead past cramps the soul's activities. 'Now was I sorry' (says Bunyan in Grace Abounding, 87, 88) 'that God had made me a man, for I feared I was a reprobate. . . . Yea, I thought it impossible that ever I should attain to such goodness of heart, as to thank God that He had made me a man.' Yet, as St. Paul implies in the above reference, this humiliation is the way to the heights of self-consciousness, for 'guilt is the awful guardian of our personal identity' (Illingworth). Simon Peter only half knew himself when he cried to Christ, 'Depart from me: for I am a sinful man, O Lord' (Lk 5⁸). The lost son did not 'come to himself' fully until he was at home with his father, reconciled. Here we come upon the great doctrine of Justification (wh. see), which is St. Paul's interpretation of the Father's forgiveness in forensic terms. In the experience of the justified man, the 'conscience of sins' is transmuted into a consciousness of 'peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 5¹). 'Actually and in fact Justification is only accomplished by an act of human freedom, an act of the deepest self-consciousness in man, appropriating the redeeming love of the Son of God by the power of awakening and life-giving grace' (Martensen, Dogmatics, p. 391).

Starting from this point, the revelation of God as Father is the means of the enlargement of our personality in three ways, through (a) His forgiveness of us, (b) our imitation of Him, (c) the communion between Him and us.

(a) God's forgiveness, gratefully received, is the first stage of man's moral freedom. It must always be a factor in our filial consciousness, but at first it may be said to be the only, or at least the chief one. Thus it was the message in which Christ first expressed the meaning of the Fatherhood (Mk 2⁵), and which He ever delighted to bring to the children who felt themselves farthest from home (Lk 15^{4, 32}). Their repentance made joy in heaven (15⁷), while the Divine forgiveness woke love in their hearts (7⁴⁷). For it is the spiritual release that goes to the root of our being, and sets free the wholesome springs of goodness, long sealed and ignored (18¹⁴, 19⁸). But forgiveness was more than a 'word of grace': it was a gain for the world at the cost of Calvary (Mt 26²⁸). And that cost was ultimately met out of the treasures of the Father's heart, 'who so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son' (Jn 3¹⁶, cf. Ro 8³²). Forgiveness in the name of Christ is thus the measure of the estimate in which our personality is held in the sight of God.

(b) Our imitation of God.—Sonship, being ours potentially through forgiveness, becomes ours actually through imitation. If one may venture to say so, without seeming to undervalue the continuity of grace, in forgiveness God pays our debts, in order that in imitation we may pay our way. We are 'made nigh' (Eph 2¹³), that we may grow like our Father who is in heaven. Having 'received the adoption of sons' (Ro 8¹⁵, Gal 4⁵), we are to become 'imitators of God as dear children' (Eph 5¹). 'Even as God (or the Lord) forgave you, so also do ye' (Col 3¹³). For the standard of our new nature is nothing less than κατὰ θεόν (Eph 4²⁴). This connexion of thought is as clear in John as in Paul. 'Herein is love . . . that God loved us, and sent his Son. . . . Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought to love one another . . . because as he is, even so are we in this world' (1 Jn 4^{10, 11, 17}). These words point to their original in the teaching of Christ, who bade us give 'mind, heart, will, and strength' to this holy task (Mt 22³⁷). To 'be perfect, as our Father in heaven is perfect' (5⁴⁸), to forgive as He forgives (6¹² 18³⁵), to make peace and love our enemies that we may prove ourselves His sons (5^{9, 45}), is the Christian standard of conduct, and the final challenge to our personality.

(c) Communion between God and man.—If personality finds its release in the forgiveness, its scope in the imitation, of God, it finds its fulfilment in communion with Him. 'Religion is nothing if it is not the vital act by which the whole spirit seeks to save itself by attaching itself to its principle. This act is prayer' (Sabatier, Philosophy of Religion, p. 28). But prayer, to be real and effectual, must rest on faith in the Father revealed by Jesus Christ. 'He who makes prayer simply a way to reach God "invents a god for himself, and one that does not hear." . . . There can be no true worship unless we come through Christ into the relation of children towards God' (Luther, quoted by Herrmann, Communion with God, p. 244). This is the prayer that is surely answered by God (Lk 11⁹⁻¹³, Jn 15⁷), the worship that is in spirit and in truth, which He Himself both inspires and seeks after (Jn 4^{23, 24}, Ro 8^{26, 27}). This is praying after the manner of the Lord's Prayer, when 'the storm of desire dies away into stillness before God.' Yet 'whatever really so burdens the soul as to threaten its peace is to be brought before God in prayer, with the confidence that the Father's love understands even our anxious clinging to earthly things' (Herrmann, p. 247). There is no higher employment of the powers of personality than real (Mt 6^{5, 6}), believing (Mk 11²⁴), consecrated (Jn 14¹³), persistent (Lk 18¹) prayer, from a forgiving heart (Mk 11²⁵), when it throws itself without reserve upon the loving will of the Father (Mt 26^{39, 42}). Such prayer is far more than an act: it invests all the outgoings and incomings of life with the sacred sense that the Father is 'over all, through all, and in all' (Eph 4⁹). Thus prayer has 'a natural effect in spiritualizing and elevating the soul. A man is no longer what he was before. Gradually—imperceptibly to himself—he has imbibed a new set of ideas, and become imbued with fresh principles. He is as one coming from kings' courts, with a grace, a delicacy, a dignity, a propriety, a justness of thought and taste, a clearness and firmness of principle, all his own' (J. H. Newman). Resting on life eternal as a principle, a man cannot sink into being the mere plaything of events, a puppet in his environment. Christ has invited him to ascend a higher storey of his being, whence he can see the hosts of God beyond the encircling enemy. 'Heaven lies about us in our infancy.' And the fulfilment of that truth is when the saint, with the heart of a little child, endures as seeing Him who is invisible.

On these three steps of heightened self-consciousness—forgiveness, imitation, and communion—stands the temple of immortality for the soul.

(2) Jesus made the soul capable of attaining its high destiny (in correspondence with its Divine origin) by the gift of the Holy Spirit. This was the one great object of His saving ministry besides revealing the Father. It is not that there was no Holy Spirit except for the ministry of Jesus Christ. The Holy Spirit, we must believe, was as truly at the centre and circumference of the universe as the Father Himself. But none the less, for the purposes of human personality, the Fatherhood and Spirit of God were alike the creation of Jesus Christ. On these twin pillars His Kingdom of the redeemed is founded; Justification being the result of the Father's relation to personality, and Sanctification being the effect of the Spirit's influence on personality: both being secured through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. It were of little use to heighten the soul's self-consciousness without increasing its powers of self-determination. The knowledge that God is our Father, with all it implies, must be completed by our receiving the 'spirit of adoption' whereby we cry 'Abba, Father' (Ro 8¹⁵), and the 'power to become sons of God' (Jn 1¹²). The connexion between this Spirit of God and our spirits is too subtle for our analysis. 'In the ephemeral and empirical Me, there is a mysterious Guest, greater than the Me, and to which the Me instinctively addresses its prayer and its trust' (Sabatier, Religions of Authority, p. 318). But there can be no doubt (and this is the meaning of Ro 8) that the result is an enhancing of the soul's power to realize itself in respect of character which is the real realm of personality. In other words, the Holy Spirit is pre-eminently the mainspring of the life inspired by Christ (vis vicaria, Tertullian), not, however, as substitute for the will, but as its partner and prompter (cf. Gal 2²⁰ with 5²⁵ and Eph 3¹⁶ with v. 17). 'The Spirit and faith,' says Dr. Denney (art. HOLY SPIRIT in vol. i. p. 738^b), 'are correlative terms, and each of them covers from a different point of view all that is meant by Christianity. Regarded from the side of God and His grace and power in initiating and maintaining it, Christianity is the Spirit; regarded from the side of man and his action and responsibility in relation to God, it is faith.' The bearing of the Spirit on man's self-determination (i.e. as a moral motive) may be viewed in two aspects.

(a) There is the entrance of the Spirit, which is sometimes called simply a gift (Lk 11¹³), but also 'a new birth' (Jn 3^{3rd}), because its origin is behind the will of man (1¹³), and a 'baptism' (Mk 1⁸), because its outcome is in the will of man, in his personal dedication (cf. Ph 2¹²).

'My heart was full; I made no vows, but vows
Were then made for me; bond unknown to me
Was given, that I should be, else sinning greatly,
A dedicated Spirit' (Wordsworth, The Prelude, iv. 334 ff.).

And cf. Paracelsus:—

'As He spoke, I was endowed With comprehension and a steadfast will;
And when He ceased, my brow was sealed His own.'

In any case, it brings the power of the Highest (δύναμις ὑψίστου, Lk 1³⁵) to those who have high work to do. Christ began His public ministry (4¹⁴) in the power of the Spirit, who first brooded over Him and then drove Him forth (Mk 1^{10, 12}). The Spirit also endowed the behaviour and bearing of Jesus with its unique characteristics (Mt 12^{17th}). But this belongs more properly to the section below. The most critical act of the soul's self-determination is known as conversion, which is the final acceptance of the will and love of God as revealed in Jesus Christ, so that the motives stored in the gospel become henceforth dominant partners in the life of the soul. 'In conversion' (says Starbuck, quoted in James, Religious Experience, p. 210) 'a person must relax, i.e. must fall back on the larger power that makes for righteousness, which has been welling up in his own being, and let it finish in its own way the work it has begun.' This is the true leverage of all moral possibilities; and it is due to the entering of the Spirit, which has its own heavenly ways (cf. Lk 9⁵⁵ AV), and releases the soul from the encumbrance of habit and the tyranny of desire. The entrance of the Spirit thus brings the release of the personality. 'The unseen region is not merely the ideal, for it produces effects in this world. When we commune with it, work is actually done upon our finite personality, for we are turned into a new man, and consequences in the way of conduct follow in the natural world upon our regenerative change' (Professor James, op. cit. p. 516).

(b) The indwelling of the Spirit is the consummation of the Christian faith, its distinctive feature and peculiar power (Lk 11¹³ 24⁴⁹, Jn 7³⁸ 14¹⁶ 20²², cf. Ac 11¹⁵⁻¹⁸ 19¹⁻⁶, Ro 8², 2 Co 3, Gal 5¹⁶). The human problem is stated in a famous chapter (Ro 7) by Paul, in a memorable sentence by Christ (Mk 14³⁶). Without the higher inspiration the mind becomes carnal instead of the body being consecrated. Christ Himself suffered from no division in His nature (cf. Harnack, What is Christianity? p. 32 f.), because He was filled with the Spirit (Lk 4¹): the Prince of this world had nothing in Him (Jn 14³⁰). And this is the summum bonum to which He invites His disciples: 'Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you' (v. 27). It resolves the antinomies of flesh and spirit, body and soul, whereby the self-determination of man is tested, enabling us to believe, and live by the truth, that our bodies are 'temples of the Holy Ghost' which is in us, which we have from God (1 Co 6¹⁹); or, using the original analogy of Christ, that we are branches of the true Vine, into which, and through which, the sap of His ever-living word is to flow, producing fruit to the glory of God (Jn 15¹⁻⁸). The fruitfulness of life in character, which is the crown of personality, depends in short on the partnership of our personality with the Paraclete, whose dominion brings us liberty from the Law, as the obverse of our obedience to Love (Ro 8¹⁵ cf. v. 9, Gal 5²²⁻²³ cf. v. 16, 18, 2 P 1⁸ cf. v. 4). All this is the process of sanctification. 'If it has come to pass that the saints of the New Covenant have a higher idea of holiness, have walked by a more perfect rule, have shown forth a more excellent and lovely character, these are the fruits of the blessed Spirit' (Dean Church, Village Sermons, p. 121).

The manifestation of this spiritual fact was at Pentecost (Ac 2), and it presupposed two prior events—the advent of Jesus, and His ascension. And the meaning of these three events for man's self-determination lies here.

(i.) The Spirit as revealed in the earthly life of Jesus was the unique illustration of a Personality moving only in the direction of truth, holiness, and love, and yet on the lines of human nature. And this was manifestly due to the unhindered operation of the personal Spirit of God. Henceforth the association between Christ and the Spirit is so close for us, that we may say that the Spirit is Christ interpreted in terms of our experience; even as the Father is Christ read into the Eternal. To use the fine analogy of Martineau (Essays, iii. 1, p. 50), 'If it has pleased God, the Creator, to fit up one system with one sun, to make the daylight of several worlds, so may it fitly have pleased God, the Revealer, to kindle amid the elliptic of history One Divine Soul to glorify whatever lies within the great year of His moral Providence, and represent the Father of Lights.' Only we must go on to say that, in the name of God the Redeemer, Jesus represents the sunshine as well; for it is through Him the Holy Spirit is mediated to us. 'The truth is' (as against Beyschlag, vol. i. p. 279), 'not that the Spirit is identical with Christ, but that it was from the first so entirely the principle of His personality, and He was throughout so completely one with it in His Divine humanity, that He became its perfect organ and expression, not merely in a temporal and impersonal sense, but in a personal and abiding sense. . . . The Holy Spirit as it comes to us in Christianity, therefore, includes the personal presence of Christ' (Walker, Spirit and Incarnation, p. 85).

(ii.) But it is equally true that the earthly life of Jesus had to be superseded if it was to have its full effect on man's personality. On the one hand, He Himself said, 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me' (Jn 12³²); and, on the other hand, the response came from the experience of an Apostle: 'Even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more' (2 Co 5¹⁶). 'If any one have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his' (Ro 8⁹). Faith is more than an outlook; it is also an uplook and an inlook. The Christ of history must become the Christ of experience. Just as the painter passes from the stage of imitation to origination before he becomes an artist, so a Christian is one who, looking away to Christ, loses himself in Him, and so finds himself again as a new creation (2 Co 5¹⁷; cf. Mk 8³⁵). Thus 'the Lord is the Spirit.' Christ in whose face was the glory of God becomes 'Christ in us the hope of glory' (2 Co 4⁶, Col 1²⁷). 'He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things' (Eph 4¹⁰).

(iii.) The significance of Pentecost is, in brief, that Christ is now to be made known to the world through 'living epistles, known and read of all men, written by the Holy Spirit on the fleshy tables of the heart,' i.e. in the promptings of conscience and compassion, which prove the working of the Spirit of Christ (2 Co 3²⁻³). In other words, the honour of Christ's name and the success of His cause are thrown upon the personality He has evoked,—that personality which in partnership with the Spirit of God, and in union with fellow-Christians, is to do even greater things than Christ in His earthly life could accomplish. And who is sufficient for these things? But we have the mind of Christ and the ministry of the Spirit (1 Co 2¹⁶, 2 Co 2¹⁶ 3⁶).

4. The redeemed personality.—For the redeemed personality, Justification is its liberty; Sanctification its law. These great words were invented to express personality at its highest, and in its fulfilment, from the point of view of self-consciousness and self-determination respectively. It may fairly be said that this redeemed personality has been the keynote of Christendom, the secret of its history, the source of its progress—often misleading and misled, but having the power of an endless life. This sketch of the subject may be completed by a few suggestions as to the significance of the redeemed personality for the history of Christendom. It has caused man (1) to stand for his rights and liberties, (2) to recognize his debts and duties.

(1) The rights and liberties of the soul.—Modern history is the steady unfolding of the powers of the personality in answer to the challenge of the civilization by which it is surrounded. The world is so much with us through facilities of knowledge, communication, and enjoyment, that the inner life of the soul would have little chance indeed were it not continually replenished in spirit and in truth. But because personality is conscious of its eternal environment, it can 'endure as seeing him who is invisible,' and must assert itself in the name of its Creator and Redeemer. Steadily it has been rising to the height of its possibilities against the weight of an accumulating tradition and venerable institutions, in the belief that the word of God comes most directly to this world through its dedicated personalities. That 'word' has always breathed Justice as the social, and Liberty as the personal ideal. And reformers have always found their inspiration for the former in the OT, for the latter in the NT. Constitutional history could not be explained but for the continual inflow of these principles upon the consciences of the people from their springs in the Christian faith. We cannot fail to observe that the action of the Christian conscience through the leaders of the Church had much to do with the Magna Charta. The uprising from the condition of villenage in the 14th cent. was vitally connected with the Lollard movement and the distribution of the Bible in the English tongue. The Peasants' Wars in Germany which followed, and the national movements in all the northern countries of Europe, found the secret of their power in the recovered gospel. It is the testimony of all who know, that the rights of the Christian man were the first objective of our own Puritan Revolution. Said Pym, its typical exponent: 'The greatest liberty of our country is religion.' The American Commonwealth was founded, as to its true nucleus, in the passion for 'freedom to worship God.' And although the French Revolution triumphed in an 'age of reason,' in defiance of Church and creed, its passionate hope was derived from the Christian conception of the rights of man which had certainly drifted into the mind of Voltaire.

Finally, in religion itself personality has played its true part only under the aegis of Jesus Christ. In Mohammedanism the political and social bonds are drawn very closely, and its military associations have tended to promote the type of the devoted soldier (Moslems)—'Thiers not to reason why, theirs but to do and die.' Under such a form of religion personality has little chance. The Hindu philosophy which underlies Buddhism regards personality as the chief seat of evil in the universe, and works towards its obliteration. Socially, this philosophy results in the caste system, which is well calculated to this end. The religion, if so it may be called, of Confucius, throws the weight of every moral sanction on the dead past, and, by the worship of ancestors, depreciates to the utmost extent the homage due to the living soul. Christianity has no doubt many points of contact with these and other religions; but in this respect it is utterly antagonistic, in that its unit is the individual, whatever his race, colour, or class, on the sublime ground that God seeks him and needs him. Hence its life has always been fed by personalities, whose love to God has been with the heart, mind, soul, and strength. As Christ founded His Church on Peter, so on the man who adopts the motto of the Northern university—'Men say: Quhat say they: lat them say'—in the spirit of Peter (Ac 4¹⁹), has the Church as a matter of history always been refounded. By the touch of Christ on the individual all bands and bars have snapped, and in the inspired personality the word of God has found free course and been glorified. It might almost be said that no other religion is anything but a framework. Only in the religion of Jesus Christ do we see the face of a renewed personality changed into the same image from glory to glory.

(2) But the new-found personality has not only rejoiced in rights and liberties, political and social, mental and spiritual; it has also made an ever fuller discovery of its debts and duties. The Fatherhood of God means the promise at least of personality in every human being, and that means the essential brotherhood of men. The Incarnation has drawn them into one by declaring them one; so that each must bear the others' burdens, and so fulfil the law of Jesus Christ. The Atonement on Calvary has focussed the conception of vicarious suffering, and summoned Christians to fulfil that which is lacking of the sufferings of Christ (Col 1²⁴). In the train of Christian salvation mutual service becomes the truest expression of the bond of union (Jn 13¹⁵⁻¹⁷). So we are bidden to respect one another's personality, to 'honour all men,' to 'receive one another as Christ also received us to the glory of God' (Ro 15⁷). Being hopelessly in debt to God, we are to pay off all we can on the altar of humanity's need. Our indebtedness to God involves our forgiveness of others (Mt 18³²⁻³³), our help of any one in every time of need (Mt 10⁴, Lk 10³⁷), and especially our hope and labour for their spiritual welfare (Mt 28¹⁹, Lk 10²).

This consciousness of duty to humanity for Christ's sake soon showed itself in the breaking of yokes, although the yokes crumbled rather than snapped under His humane influence. It worked upon pagan notions of slavery and conquest, and after abolishing the gladiatorial shows, first eased and finally freed the human chattel. The rights of woman, too, as partner rather than subordinate, and the honour paid even to children, as against the Roman practice of infanticide, have gradually come into being through the changed standpoint from which personality is regarded through Christ. Continuing the story thus begun, the recognition of our debt and duty towards others on account of their personality has (a) secretly undermined the resistance of racial barriers. More than this can hardly be said in view of events East and West. But at any rate the Christian Church, now a fellowship of many peoples, kindreds, and tongues, has to a large extent anticipated the fulfilment of the ideal which leaped to the imagination of St. Paul, when there shall be 'neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female; for all are one in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3²⁸). (b) It has slowly produced an attitude of tolerance, i.e. a recognition of the rights of others in thought. That is a position far in advance of the claim to personal independence. Liberty of thought for others, with a resulting equality of opportunity, is an ideal hard of attainment. But because humanity is logical, though men are not, it will at length be established as the corollary to the rights of personality. (c) It has steadily permeated law with the larger justice of mercy. This is another comparatively recent development of the Christian consciousness. The criminal code and the service discipline were both administered on brutal lines, and the industrial system was beset by conditions hardly less degrading. But the claim of personality is steadily laying hold of the popular imagination and conscience, and asserting itself in the acts of our statute-book. (d) It has turned older methods of education upside down. The claim of the personality is now respected even when in the bud. The teacher now learns to sit first at the feet of the child, who is no longer trained to be a kind of imitation adult, but is desired to develop on the lines of its own personality. (e) It has inspired all crusades of compassion. Christianity has led the way, to the marvel of the world, in the provision of hospitals, asylums, orphanages, etc. And this consideration for the blind, the insane, the leper, and such afflicted ones, is the monument to Christ's care of the body as the home of the personality. (f) It has been the fulcrum of foreign missions; for there are souls to be saved wherever humanity is to be found. This is the most beautiful and characteristic task of the Church of Christ.

These are some of the modern developments of personality as to its rights and duties. By means of their proper balance and mutual influence, Christendom makes its advance. And this balance is maintained so far as man is in Christ. For from Him alone comes the ultimate sense of human dignity both for oneself and for all. At His feet we learn that personality is given its full enfranchisement in order that it may co-operate with the Father in the employments of perfect love.

PERVERTING (διαστρέφω, Lk 23²; ἀποστρέφω, v. 14).

—The word occurs principally in the trial of Jesus before Pilate, where the first charge brought against Him was that of 'perverting the nation.' Such a charge, though somewhat vague, implied that He was a conspirator against the State, spreading a spirit of disaffection and rebellion among the people, and thus turning them against the Imperial Government. The charge was utterly false, but it revealed the bitter malice of the Jews and their determination to bring about the death of Jesus. The power of life and death was not possessed by the Sanhedrin: no merely religious offence could be visited with capital punishment (Jn 18³¹), and therefore the object which they clamoured for could be accomplished only through the instrumentality of the civil power. Accordingly, the leaders of the Sanhedrin lay aside the charge of blasphemy, which really weighed with themselves, but of which they knew Pilate could take no cognizance, and they bring Jesus before the Roman governor as a political offender, guilty of setting Himself and others in opposition to the ruling power of Rome. A charge of this character Pilate was in duty bound to consider and examine. DUGALD CLARK.

PESTILENCE (λοιμός).—The word is found twice in the Gospels, in both cases in the prophecy of Christ regarding the last days (Mt 24⁷ [AV; RV, following WH and others, omits], Lk 21¹¹). In the OT the word is used in a generic sense, and usually indicates a direct Divine visitation (Lv 26²⁶, Nu 14¹², 1 Ch 21¹⁴, Ps 78⁵⁰ etc.). The disease, whatever its nature, is not rarely associated with war and its consequences (Jer 24¹⁰ 29¹⁷ 34¹⁷, Ezk 6¹¹ etc.). Thus it seems to be used by Christ in the texts quoted.

The specific meaning of the word λοιμός is not easily determined. It seems to indicate a swiftly-developing and mortal illness, contagious or infectious in its nature, as we may infer from Ac 24⁵. It may point to the glandular or bubonic plague, well known and universally dreaded by the ancients, and the great scourge of the world in the Middle Ages. (See Hastings' DB, iii. pp. 324, 755).

HENRY E. DOSKER.

PETER.—The use of the names Simon and Simon Peter in the Gospels is instructive. Mt., when he first mentions the Apostle, calls him 'Simon who is called Peter' (4¹⁸); he uses the same language in his list of the Apostles (10²). Again, with most obvious appropriateness he calls him 'Simon Peter' at the time of his celebrated confession (16¹⁶), while on the two occasions on which our Lord addresses the disciple directly, he is 'Simon bar-Jona' (16¹⁷) and 'Simon' (17²⁵). In Mk. the name 'Simon' is employed up to the selection of the Twelve, and thereafter 'Peter' is used; but when our Lord accosts him in Gethsemane, He names him 'Simon' (14⁷). In Lk. also he is designated 'Simon' with a single exception (5⁸) till the choice of the Apostles, after which he becomes 'Peter'; but when our Lord speaks to him he is 'Simon, Simon,' which is softened to 'Peter' (22³¹⁻³⁴). His fellow-believers give him the same name when they relate that our Lord appeared to him after His resurrection (24³⁴). The practice of Jn. is equally notable. Before Peter appears on the scene at all, his brother Andrew is described as 'the brother of Simon Peter' (1⁴¹). This double name is that which the Evangelist chiefly employs; in fact, he prefers it except when its repetition would seem pedantic. At the same time, he indicates clearly that the Apostle's original name was 'Simon' (1⁴²), and he places this name on the lips of Jesus just as the other Evangelists do (1⁴³).

The life of Peter has a triple interest. (a) His personality is attractive because of its naturalness, buoyancy, and vigour. Belonging to the class of men who are readily understood, his impetuosity, candour, freedom of speech, transparency of motive, his large and genial humanity, appeal strongly to our hearts. Peter is the Luther among the Apostles. (b) Again, he is the most representative of the Apostles. Were it not for him, our knowledge of their views, tastes, hopes, prejudices, and difficulties would be scanty; but, owing to his words and acts, these stand out in bold relief. It is in Peter that we see the kind of men whom our Lord deliberately chose to be His closest friends and the agents for the fulfilment of His purposes. The methods, too, by which the disciples became qualified for their great functions are most fully revealed in the treatment of Peter by Jesus—the patient wisdom, the boundless charity, the humour, the severity, the perfect frankness, the unreserved intimacy. (c) Again, the career of Peter after the Ascension is the most striking evidence at once of his natural capacity and of the transformation effected in him by his friendship with Jesus. The disciple is now worthy of the designation 'Rock.' He shows himself to be the natural leader of the new community: its most powerful and energetic member both in counsel and in act.

The career of Peter falls into two great sections, divided by the Ascension: his life as a disciple and Apostle under our Lord, and his life as the first leader of the Christian Church.

1. Prior to our Lord's Ascension.—Simon Peter was the son of a man called Jonas (Mt 16¹⁷) or John (Jn 1⁴²), or possibly Jonas John, a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee. His mother's name is not recorded. The place of his birth was probably Bethsaida (Jn 1⁴⁴). No mention is made of the date of his birth; but, as he was a married man when our Lord's ministry opened, it is likely that he was born about the same time as Jesus. How long his parents lived is not known: they may have died before he became intimate with Jesus. It may be assumed from his later life that he was brought up by them in habits of temperance, frugality, diligence, and piety. He could read and write, and had considerable acquaintance with the Greek tongue as spoken in Galilee. He followed his father's occupation, obtaining by it an income adequate to all the wants of his household. By the time he is first spoken of in the Gospels he is married, and living in Capernaum, where he has a house of his own, which at a subsequent date appears to have been the centre of the labours of our Lord in Capernaum (Mk 1²¹⁻²⁹ 9³³).

Attracted by the Baptist, Peter and his brother Andrew became his disciples. Andrew was one of the two disciples of the Baptist who heard him declare that Jesus was the Lamb of God (Jn 1³⁵), and who, after their interview with Jesus, were convinced that He was the Messiah. He communicated to his brother the great discovery he had made, and brought him to Jesus, who, reading his very soul, and perceiving what he was and what he was capable of becoming, announced that he should bear the name Peter or 'Rock' (Jn 1⁴²). The acquaintanceship thus formed passed after an interval of a few months, during part of which Peter was with Jesus, into discipleship and permanent fellowship. When our Lord began His ministry in Galilee, the two brothers Peter and Andrew were summoned by Him to become, in His own striking language, 'fishers of men': and this call was immediately followed by that of two other brothers, their partners in business, James and John (Mk 1¹⁶⁻²⁰). The final stage of Peter's relationship to Jesus was that of Apostle. Our Lord had determined to select a very few persons from the larger number of His adherents to be constantly in His society, and to act as His messengers. Peter was the first to be chosen (Mk 3¹³). This place was not given him by accident. He was the first of the Apostles, not in authority or rank or precedence, for ideas of this description were utterly foreign to the mind of our Lord; but his courage, resourcefulness, energy, and devotion constituted him the natural leader of the new body. He was their spokesman, the interpreter of their wishes, hopes, desires, and purposes. Many words specially uttered by him or spoken by our Lord to him are preserved in the Gospels, and in several of the miracles of our Lord he has a unique place. The perception of our Lord's character, and familiarity with His views of God, of man, of righteousness and of salvation, as well as with His hatred of unreality and formalism, and with the depth and range of His sympathies for the common people and even for social outcasts—set up an intellectual ferment in the mind of Peter which ultimately engendered a fixed and definite view of our Lord's Person. On two occasions that conviction was expressed in memorable terms. At Capernaum, Peter, undismayed and unmoved by the rapid fall in our Lord's popularity due to His refusal to become a political instead of a religious leader, affirmed Him to be the only possessor of the words of eternal life, the Holy One of God (Jn 6^{66ff.}). Then, not long after, when the common people had ceased to regard our Lord as the Messiah, and assigned Him only the subordinate place of a forerunner, Peter, without a moment's hesitation, clothed in fit words the conviction which had now attained maturity and consistency in his mind—the ripe fruit of his intercourse with our Lord; he affirmed that He was the Messiah (Mt 16^{13ff.}). This confession was rewarded with the famous promise, the sense of which is still in dispute—'Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my church.' The common view among the Fathers that the rock is Jesus Himself has scarcely any support among the interpreters of to-day. A number of Protestant scholars agree with the Roman Catholic Church in understanding the rock of Peter himself; but this explanation fails to answer two questions. Why, if Peter is the rock, did not Jesus simply say 'on thee'? Whence, too, the distinction in the present text between the two words for 'rock' (πέτρος and πέτρα), a distinction which must surely have been found in some form in the original Aramaic? But be the rock Peter himself or his confession, it is clear that our Lord was deeply gratified with the declaration, and that He recognized in it a spiritual insight and capacity which qualified the speaker for high office and service in the Kingdom of God. But, though Peter had grasped the truth that Jesus was the Messiah, he was still in bondage to the traditional conception of the Messiah as a conqueror. For hardly had our Lord, relying on his confession, proceeded for the first time to announce plainly His impending death, when Peter, shocked at His apparent despondency, remonstrated with Him, and thus drew from His lips the rebuke, 'Get thee behind me, Satan' (Mt 16²³).

The prediction of His death was made by Jesus at least thrice, in language which admits of but one meaning; but neither Peter nor any of the Apostles appears to have believed that the words were intended to be taken literally. Not one among them seems to have accepted the truth that Jesus would be crucified. But that event drew near, and Peter, as was to be expected, figures largely in the closing scenes. He refuses to allow his Master to degrade Himself by washing his feet; but when told that this refusal involves forfeiture of all interest in Him, under the impulse of the reaction generated by this reproof, he wishes that his hands and head as well as his feet should be washed (Jn 13^{6ff.}). Conscious of his devotion to his Lord, he declares that though all men should stumble at Him, he never will, but would die for His sake; and draws from our Lord's lips the sorrowful announcement that he is about to deny Him thrice (Mk 14²⁹). When our Lord is arrested in Gethsemane, he has the courage, perhaps rather the rashness, to draw a sword and seek to cut down the very person who, it may be, was making the arrest (Jn 18¹⁰); he follows our Lord into the palace of the high priest, and there, outworn, perplexed, thrown off his guard, unmanned, he three times declares that he knows nothing of Jesus. Then, having met the eye of his Master as He was led from one room to another, the sense of his guilt becomes intolerable, and he bursts forth into tears of deepest penitence and self-abasement (Lk 22^{54ff.}). What the Apostle did after he quitted the palace of the high priest, has not been told us. Whether he was too overpowered by emotion to draw near the cross we cannot tell, but it is certain that his hopes were buried in the grave of Jesus. He and the rest of the disciples must have poured out their hearts to one another, suggesting, doubting, fearing, unable to resolve as to the future.

Not two days after the Crucifixion, Mary of Magdala informed Peter and John that the grave of Jesus was open and no body there. The two disciples started off in hot haste to verify the statement. John, the younger and fleetest, reached the tomb first, but awe prevented him from entering. Peter, unaffected by this motive, went into the grave as soon as he arrived, and then both disciples saw the grave-cloths lying in orderly array, with the napkin which had bound the head rolled up in a place by itself: facts which excluded the view that the corpse had been removed by enemies. The meaning of the words which they had heard again and again from Jesus as to His rising again from the dead began to dawn on their understanding: He was risen from the dead (Jn 20^{1ff.}). Soon the testimony of the women confirmed the inference they had drawn, and if any doubts continued to haunt the Apostle's mind, they were finally dispelled by a personal appearance made by Jesus to himself. The interview stands with no record save the bare circumstance, but is possibly on that account only the more impressive (Lk 24³⁴). It formed perhaps the most important event of Peter's life, and certainly produced on him the most extraordinary effects. What was soft and fluid in his ideas and convictions now hardened into rock: his courage acquired a new temper: his passionate loyalty to our Lord became measureless trust and devotion, chastened by a new reverence and awe. All that he had ever ventured to hope regarding Jesus was now confirmed, and rested on a basis of adamant.

Another scene is related in the appendix to the Fourth Gospel (ch. 21), which forms the fitting close to the earthly relations of the Master and His disciple. Here again Peter and John are the two chief actors, and each exhibits his distinctive characteristics. John is the first to identify the solitary figure on the shore of the Sea of Galilee with the Lord; while Peter is the first to try to reach Him, casting himself into the lake in his eagerness to welcome Him. There followed the triple question to Peter touching his love for Jesus, with answers from the Apostle which show that he had now been purged of presumption, boasting, and rash self-confidence. Then he in his turn is entrusted with the weightiest and most honourable of all charges: he is commissioned and commanded to feed and tend the flock of Christ. Finally, and as if it were the natural sequel of the high trust just allotted him, he is told that he will end his days by martyrdom. Accepting this declaration without a shadow of doubt, he ventures to inquire as to the fate of his fellow-disciple John, but is forbidden to meddle with such questions, his task being to concentrate his energies on the fulfilment of the duties imposed on himself.

2. Subsequent to the Ascension.—If Peter was the foremost of the disciples before the Ascension, he was still more so, if possible, after that event. He is represented throughout the Acts as the leader of the Church; and this view is confirmed by the references that St. Paul (Gal 2⁷⁻⁹) makes to his position, which prove that his was the commanding personality in the Church. The suggestion that a successor to Judas should be appointed was made by him, and at once adopted by the body of believers (Ac 1^{15ff.}). The explanation of the descent of the tongues of flame at Pentecost is given by him (2^{14ff.}). He performs the first Christian miracle (3^{6ff.}). The defence of the new community when its leaders are arrested by the Sanhedrin falls on him (4^{5ff.}). The doom of Ananias and Sapphira is pronounced by his lips (5⁴⁻⁹). When the gospel is preached in Samaria, John and he are appointed commissioners to investigate the new situation (8¹⁴). He is the first to throw open the Church to the Gentiles on the condition of faith only (ch. 10). Herod Agrippa sentences him to death as the chief leader of the sect of the Nazarenes (ch. 12). He takes a foremost place in the deliberations of the Congress at Jerusalem which determined the relations that should thereafter exist between the Gentiles and the Jews, pronouncing that the Gentiles should be exempt from all Jewish ordinances (ch. 15). At this point the account in the Acts terminates, and the remainder of his career is obscure. That he travelled about preaching the gospel, accompanied by his wife (1 Co 9⁵), is certain, but the one place he is known to have visited is Antioch (Gal 2¹¹) in Syria, the second capital of Christianity. He may have gone to Greece (Euseb. HE II. xxv. 8); he may have preached in the provinces to which his first letter is addressed (1 P 1¹); it is possible that he spent some time in Babylon (1 P 5¹³). From the far East he turned to Rome, where he died as a martyr according to our Lord's prediction, but when and under what conditions cannot be ascertained (Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. v. 7).

PHARISEES.—I. ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT.
—1. Outline of history.—The Pharisees present the most characteristic manifestation of Palestinian Judaism in the time of Christ, and His work cannot be understood without a knowledge of them; for 'later Judaism is through and through Pharisaism and nothing but Pharisaism' (Bousset, Jesu Predigt, 1892, p. 32). The Pharisees were an outgrowth of the long conflict between the Jews and surrounding heathenism, from the Babylonian Captivity onward. That captivity impressed the following things upon Judaism: intense monotheism, the Synagogue service, the OT Scriptures and Scribal interpretations of them, the Sabbath strictly observed as a sign of God's covenant, and a Puritan hatred of heathenism, which put the stamp of separation for ever upon Pharisaic piety. The Reformers under Ezra and Nehemiah were forerunners of the Pharisees, as the priestly court party under Zerubbabel foreshadowed the Sadducees. In these international relations—Jews in Palestine and in the Dispersion—Judaism grew gradually into a Church, and as such had an inner circle of the pious in contrast with mere adherents—'children of the world.' This transition cannot be fully traced, but appears well marked under the Maccabees (B.C. 167–63). The Macedonian policy of Alexander made the East Greek; the Romans made the West Latin; Persia and Carthage were overthrown; then Rome absorbed the Hellenistic East; and a world-system for the first time appeared when Jesus was born under the first Emperor. The denationalizing process prepared by Greece and introduced by Rome affected even the Jews, and helped to produce the Synagogue church system. But Pharisaic Judaism reacted strongly against it at first, and under the Maccabees battled for religious independence. When, however, the Maccabean princes fought further for civil liberty, the Pharisaic party withdrew and formed a theocratic group, democratic in a measure, which soon gained the leadership of the majority of the nation. These Häsidim, or Puritans of the century before Christ, became the Pharisees of NT times. They received the name 'Pharisees' or separated, when they withdrew from the Sadducee court party of the Maccabean rulers under John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135–105). They were the men of ἀμύκτα (2 Mac 14²⁸) from everything heathen and impure. Their aim was in daily life to be as ceremonially pure as the priests were in the Temple.

2. Differences between Pharisees and Sadducees.—The chief differences were the following: (1) the Pharisees 'delivered to the people a great many observances by tradition which are not written in the law of Moses' (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6). These the Sadducees for the most part rejected. (2) The Pharisees had an elaborate doctrine of immortality, resurrection, angels, demons, heaven, hell, intermediate state, and Messianic Kingdom, about all of which the Sadducees were agnostic. (3) The Pharisees taught both predestination and free-will,—much as St. Paul did,—while the Sadducees held the Greek doctrine of absolute free-will. (4) The Pharisees had a high theory of the theocracy, which led them to oppose foreign interference from the time of the Syrian kings to the Roman emperors, and reject also the Maccabean rule as inconsistent with the high priesthood. The Psalms of Solomon are full of sharp utterances against the Sadducee rulers (e.g. 4¹ 3⁸ 9⁴). It was this theocratic spirit which developed national Judaism into a Church, with a world-consciousness equal to that of Rome and a spiritual unity not inferior to that of Greece. (5) The Pharisees were also missionary, and made many converts (Ant. xx. ii.-iv.; BJ ii. xix. 2; Mt 23¹⁵). Hillel said: 'Love men and lead them to the Law' (Aboth i. 2); and the international Synagogue, inspired from Jerusalem, compassed sea and land in making proselytes. The Sadducees had no such interest. This Pharisaic propaganda, however, when it met the successful missions of the Christians, ceased making converts, condemned the translation of the LXX, and buried itself in the Talmud. (6) The Pharisees differed from the Sadducees by the wide distance between the Synagogue, the centre of the one party, and the Temple, the stronghold of the other. The Temple was waning in influence. Jesus refers little to it, and when it disappeared the religion of the Jews went on without a break. The Pharisees even prescribed rules for the priestly Sadducees in the Temple (Ant. xiii. x. 5), and had their prayers introduced alongside the sacrifices. In fact, the Temple services were regarded as meritorious because done in obedience to the legal teachings of the Pharisees (cf. Kohler, art. 'Pharisees' in JE). Some Pharisees seem in theory to have even abandoned the Temple worship (cf. Enoch 89⁸⁸, 73 90²⁸, Ps-Sol 10⁸ 17¹⁸). (7) The Pharisees formed a fraternity with peculiar vows, which separated them from the heathen, the common people, and the Sadducees. The great majority of Jews were Pharisees in belief, but only about 6000 or 7000 were members of the brotherhood. Edersheim compares them with the Jesuits in the Roman Church (Sketches of Jew. Soc. Life, ch. xiv.). They married, however, and their fellowship included the families of members. On entering the order, they took two vows in the presence of three witnesses, one to tithe everything eaten, bought, or sold; the other not to be guest of the 'am-hā'ārez, and to observe all ceremonial purification. They were the true Israel, 'the saints'; their opponents were 'the ungodly,' 'the profane' (cf. Lk 18⁹, Ps-Sol 14¹ 17¹⁶). (8) The Pharisees were the religious power in Palestine in the time of Christ. They represented the authority of the Scriptures in home, school, synagogue, courts of law, and daily life. John almost identifies them with 'the Jews' (1¹⁹ 2¹⁸). Though an outgrowth of the school of the Scribes, they eclipsed their teachers. They were in business, and their goods were legal tender everywhere. They were united, zealous, dogmatic, patriotic, stood for the people against rulers and hierarchs, preached the keeping of the Law and the coming world of blessedness as reward of obedience, and were everywhere active in moulding Jewish life according to their principles. In opposition to Sadducees and common men, the Pharisees developed a new conception of piety; it was something that could be learned, and they were its teachers. The wise men were the good, and took the place of both prophet and priest. Hillel said: 'The uneducated fears no sin'; but 'he who acquires knowledge has attained eternal life' (Aboth ii. 6, 8). All this made the Pharisees more and more proud, formal, and uncharitable. They despised the common people (Jn 7⁴⁹); they had reached the climax of their power in the time of Jesus; and, half-feared, half-hated, they were declining in spiritual influence.

3. Pharisaic environment of Jesus.—Pharisaic Judaism in the time of Christ included the best, as well as the worst, of the people. The Jewish saints in the NT, the parents of the Baptist and of our Lord, Simeon, Anna, and others, Hillel too, and Gamaliel and Jochanan ben Sakkai, were noble types of Pharisaic Jews. Galilee especially was the home of the more earnest Pharisaic piety, with its severe living and strong Messianic hope. Here the Zealots appeared, and the outbreaks against Rome had their seat; and here Jesus grew up and began His ministry in an atmosphere of Pharisaic devotion. He did not denounce all Pharisees, or the Pharisaic Judaism amid which He grew up; since it stood for the whole transmitted religion of Israel,—for that salvation which was of the Jews. He stood nearer the Synagogue than the Temple, and in some respects presented His teaching in the line of the Pharisees. The Rabbis taught their disciples to honour the Scriptures, to seek first after heaven and its righteousness (Ant. xvi. ii. 4, v. 4, vi. 8), to look past the present legal life to a future world of grace and glory, to make proselytes, to have baptisms and holy suppers in their brotherhood, to pray, to fast and give alms—these three were 'the chief pillars of the Jewish religion' (Bousset, Relig. Judenthums, p. 159). All these things Jesus favoured also, and they passed, with many others, from the Synagogue into the Church. But Jesus was not a Pharisee. He rebuked them for their anti-scriptural traditions, as He did the Sadducees for ignorance of the word of God (Mk 7⁹). Neither was He a heretic; the Pharisees did not put Him out of the synagogue, though He was called a Samaritan and possessed of a devil. He preached from the common ground of the Scriptures; and, just because the Pharisees held in theory so much that was true, He castigated the more their formalism and insincerity. But, while opposing Pharisaic superstition, He did not favour the agnosticism and rationalism of the Sadducees. From the heart of Divine revelation, illuminated by the Holy Spirit and in the full consciousness of Himself as Son of God, in and through and above all the Scriptures, He proclaimed the everlasting truth of the gospel, setting aside everything in Pharisaic teaching and life that was inconsistent with it.

II. THEOLOGY OF THE PHARISEES AND THE TEACHING OF JESUS.—Two views formerly held respecting the relation of Jesus and His teachings to the Pharisaic Judaism of His time may now be regarded as obsolete. One was that both He and the Jews drew so directly from the OT that their ideas of the Messiah and His work were essentially the same, the chief question at issue being whether or not Jesus was the looked-for Messiah (cf. Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. 1742; Bertholdt, Christ. Jud. 1811; Gfrörer, Jahr. d. Heils, 1838). The other was the theory that the gospel preached by Jesus was only a reformed Judaism (Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, 1867, iii. 217; Kohler, l.c.). But 'such a reconstruction of history belongs wholly to the past' (Lucius, Der Essenismus, 1881, p. 8);* and we can set forth the relation of Jesus to Pharisaic Judaism better by way of contrast than of comparison (cf. Bousset, Jesu Predigt, p. 7; Chamberlain, Grundlagen d. 19. Jahrh. 1900, i. 221). 'Jesus' appearance was really not a fulfilment, but a contradiction of the Jewish religion.' If there was anything the Pharisees lacked, it was religious originality. Chamberlain says, 'The fable that the Jews had especial qualifications for religion has been finally destroyed' (i. 29). Jesus did stand upon the soil of OT piety, and was in vital relation to current Judaism; but His unique Divine consciousness as Son of God led Him to speak with absolute authority respecting both. Whatever might have been said to men of old time must yield to His 'I say unto you': and no word of prophet or scribe or Pharisee had any authority for Him (Jn 7¹⁷). When He spoke, God spoke, and all must hearken and obey (7¹⁰).

The theology of the Pharisees was crude and un-

* Cf., however, J. Weiss, Wernle, Wrede, Weinel, etc., of the Religionsgeschichtliche school, who incline again towards the position of Renan, Grätz, Geiger.

scientific,—‘a terrible mass of conflicting statements and debasing superstitions’ (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 106), everywhere limited by national conditions. It was less reasonable than certain views of the Sadducees, and lacked the mystic freedom from sacerdotalism of the Essenes. It had no appreciation of that natural theology so dear to the Greeks, or of the immanence of God as Father which Jesus saw in every flower of the field. Art, philosophy, science, history, culture were avoided as secular and profane. The Pharisees ‘killed nature by legal prescriptions’ (Wellhausen, Phar. u. Sadd. p. 19). In their confused teachings drawn from the OT by traditional exegesis, three great groups of thought may be distinguished; they refer to God, His revelation in the Law, and the hope of a promised Messiah. The thirteen articles of the Jewish Confession of faith still show the same division (cf. Landau, Die alten Gebete d. H. 1843, p. 120) as appeared in Rabbinical preaching in the time of Christ. Honour God, keep His Law as far as possible, and through all failures hope for the mercy of God in the Messianic age—that is the prevalent course of thought in Pharisaic Judaism. NT writers follow it also. St. Paul teaches a just God, His holy Law, and peace through faith in the Messiah. St. Peter, when the Law convicted men of murder, preached to them repentance toward God and faith in the slain Messiah, Jesus (Ac 2³⁷⁻³⁸ 3^{19f.}). St. John sums up the contrast between Jew and Christian in the Law of God given by Moses, and grace and truth coming in the Messiah (1¹⁷). And when the Jews attacked early Christianity, their opposition lay along these lines (6¹¹). Stephen was stoned for blaspheming God, Moses, and the customs of the Pharisees, and doing so in the name of Jesus Christ. In like manner Jesus was accused of blasphemy against God, violating His Law, and claiming to fulfil the Messianic hope.

1. Doctrine of God.—(1) Pharisaic view of Divine transcendence.—The Pharisees had an abstract, transcendental view of God, which gave rise to the legalism that marks their teachings, and added colour to their Messianic hope (cf. Baldensperger, Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, p. 45). Opposition to heathenism, coupled with Rabbinical study of the OT, produced this conception. God was Creator in the beginning, and will be final Judge at the end; but meantime He is a far-off ruler of the Universe. His name, the mysterious τετραγράμματον, was no longer spoken; and all anthropomorphic and human-like features in God were set aside. The God who tabernacled in Israel was succeeded by ‘the God of heaven’ (1 Mac 3⁶⁰, Enoch 13⁴ 106¹¹, 2 Es 8²⁰, Ps-Sol 2³⁴, To 7¹⁸). ‘God’ and ‘heaven’ became interchangeable terms; and in place of words about the personal care of Jehovah, we meet cosmological and meteorological discussions of the stars and rain and snow, with suggestions of sun-worship (Enoch 72³⁵, Ps-Sol 2¹³⁻¹⁴ 4²¹). It was a deistic view of God that became prominent. Two important views grew out of this theology: one was the doctrine of middle beings between God and man—good and evil spirits, angels, especially the Memra or mediating Word of God, and the Holy Spirit; the other was a personal conception of God, which appeared in belief in individual immortality and personal resurrection as involved in responsibility to God and hope of entrance into the Messianic Kingdom. A further outgrowth of this theology was the teaching that keeping carefully the Law of God would hasten the coming of the Messianic Kingdom. Thus Divine transcendence, mediation, individual piety, legalism, and the Messianic hope were closely related elements in the Pharisaic teachings.

(2) Jesus’ doctrine of God as Father.—The theology of Jesus set out from the Fatherhood of God. It had been foreshadowed in the OT (Dt 32⁶, Ps 68⁸) and later Jewish literature (Wis 2¹⁶), but was first taught in its unique importance and fulness by Jesus. It was peculiar to Him because He was related as none other to the Father. None but God could know Him, as He alone knew the Father (Mt 11²⁷). To Him alone could God appear as Father without wrath against sin in Him. This doctrine of God as Father is what was fundamentally new in the message of Jesus (cf. Bousset, Jesu Predigt, p. 4; Hausrath, NT Times, ii. 146). Through it God appeared everywhere in His love, caring for flowers and sparrows, just and unjust; beholding sin and Satan in the world, but still declaring it the happy home of God’s children. He here ‘broke through, at the most decisive point, the transcendental ascetic spirit of Judaism’ (Bousset, Relig. Jud. p. 65; Baldensperger, 225; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. ch. 2). This new doctrine of God led to a new doctrine of man’s relation to Him. If God is Father, then men who come to Him enter into all the liberty of children, but at the same time are lovingly bound to be holy and perfect like God. The confused view of the Pharisees, that the Jew was partly in national relations to God and partly member of a holy congregation, disappears. His blurred hope of partly keeping the Law, partly being resigned to Divine chastisement, and partly redeemed in a world to come—all resting on merit—is supplanted by a joyful gospel of present peace. Instead of the otherworldliness of Pharisaic piety,—an attempt to imitate the transcendent God,—Jesus taught a present joy in a present Father for all men, ‘am-hā-ārez’ as well as scribe and Pharisee. Here love to God and love to man first met in reality. As the Father in heaven forgives, so men are to forgive; the latter is the proof of the former. Religion and ethics were in perfect harmony. Jesus did teach a certain separation from the world, a selling all to follow Him, a bearing the cross; but it was not separation on ceremonial or external grounds; it was a question of values, a putting the Kingdom of God first that all other things might be added thereto. So sunny and natural was His relation to the world and common life, that He was at once denounced as a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. Next to the fundamental doctrine that God is our Father, came this second dominating teaching of man’s social relation to the world about him. Here is the great point of departure from Judaism and the Ghetto, already erected by the Pharisees in Jerusalem, towards Christianity and the gospel of humanity.

2. The Law.—(1) Written and oral.—This was central for Judaism in the days of Jesus. It was regarded in both written and oral form as coming from God through Moses (Aboth i. 1). It took the place of the God of heaven. Every word was inspired, and he who ‘gains the Law gains the life of the world to come’ (Hillel). Obedience to God’s Law under the awful Categorical Imperative of Sinai, as applied by scribes and Pharisees, was the dominant principle, the yoke upon the neck of the Jews, when Christ appeared (Ac 15¹⁰, Gal 5¹). The Oral Law of tradition arose because prophecy ceased; cases arose not provided for in the OT, and Rabbinical exegesis of the Scriptures sought the cover of ancient names.

(2) Law as civil code.—Here especially the OT exegesis and tradition were necessary in using the Bible as the source of civil law, when Israel changed from a small pastoral people to become a world-wide commercial race. The chequered history of centuries under heathen rule broke up many customs, as those of tithes, offerings, Sabbath, Temple service, contact with Gentiles, etc. Hence from Hillel onwards the Pharisees elaborated a civil code by means of tradition and exegesis from the Scriptures. The great loss to religion in such a process was in making it largely negative. The Rabbis counted 248 classes of things to be done, and 365 of things forbidden.

(3) Ceremonial law.—This the Pharisees made to touch every detail of human life. They regarded nature and spirit as so related that impurity could pass from one to the other. A bad man's body was impure, and to touch it would bring uncleanness to another man's soul. Adam's sin extended evil to unclean beasts, and foods, and the dishes holding them. There was no end to this defilement and the consequent necessary purification by various kinds of water or by breaking ceremonially the unclean vessels. Twelve treatises of the Mishna deal with this subject. It is said: 'He who lightly esteems hand-washing will perish from the earth' (Sota, 4). Jesus felt the utter superficiality of all this washing of the body while the inner life was unclean. Delitzsch says (Jesus und Hillel, 1879, p. 23) there is no historical point of departure in the time and land of Jesus for His method of contrasting the moral with the ceremonial. He here 'turned His back upon the highway of Rabbinical traditions, and opened a path which until then had never occurred to any human heart.'

(4) Rule of faith and practice.—The Pharisees bound spiritual and moral living also under law. But law cannot produce affection, or win the heart, or find place for the Holy Spirit, or be a vessel of grace. The idea of religion as a supreme impulse from the depths of man's nature, as Jesus taught it, independent of both superstition and ethics, was peculiarly foreign to the Pharisaic Jew (cf. Chamberlain, ii. 29). He said: 'To do right and wrong is in the work of our hands, and in Thy righteousness Thou chastisest the children of men. He who works righteousness obtains life from the Lord' (Ps-Sol 9⁷⁻⁹). Do the best you can, and submit to God's punishment for your defects, was the substance of such legalism. One sad result of this national legal religion was that it had one standard for the Jew and another for the Gentile. Adultery with a Gentile was trivial compared with such offence against a Jew. Pharisaic ethics taught to hate Gentiles as enemies; their morality had no unifying principle of application to man as man—while Jesus taught love even to enemies and Gentiles.

(5) Jesus and the Law.—Even the best legal maxims of the Pharisees fall far short of the teachings of Jesus. Hillel's golden rule was negative, while that of Jesus was positive, showing all the difference between justice and love. The greater principle of love to God and one's neighbour, which the scribe (Mk 12²⁹), and Jesus, and St. Paul, and Akiba all regard as fundamental (Gal 5¹⁴; Bacher, Die Agada d. Tannaiten, 1884, i. 7, 285), became a new thing in the application of Jesus. He made love to man a test of love to God; He united organically the two OT texts, Dt 6⁵ and Lv 19¹⁸; He put love to man on the same level with love to God; He widened the conception of neighbour from haber to 'am-hā'arez, from 'am-hā'arez to Samaritan (Lk 10³⁶), and to all men—thus moving in direct opposition to that separation which underlay all Pharisaic holiness. Jesus dropped the whole Law as a way of salvation,—a way the Pharisees themselves could not keep (Ro 7⁸), as appeared in their numerous evasions of it, such as 'blending of courts,' and their ostentatious putting of appearance in place of reality. He threw aside the endless civil, ceremonial, and ethical rules of the Pharisees, and went back to the spiritual religion of the OT as fulfilled in Him and transformed in the gospel. The Law was, at its best, but a παύλαργός to the gospel. Salvation by way of the Pharisees was impossible, hence Jesus declared they were either blind or hypocrites in claiming to please God in that way. The best Jews admitted this (Ps-Sol 9⁸⁻¹⁵ 13⁹ 14¹⁻⁶). Jesus led men to God as Father through a new birth by the Holy Ghost, into a family of loving children, by way of repentance, faith, and union with Himself (Mk 1¹⁴⁻¹⁵, Jn 3^{5f.}). This gospel of the loving father and the prodigal son, of the penitent publican and the proud Pharisee, was as a honeymoon compared with the funereal legalism of the Pharisees (Mk 2¹⁹). Gamaliel said: 'Get thyself a teacher that thou mayest be free from doubt' (Aboth i. 16); but Jesus showed Nicodemus that all Pharisaic learning could not give the new life of the Spirit of God and the Son of God. He brought a new cup of blessing full of the wine of the Kingdom, a sweet blending of religion and ethics as inseparable in thought as the inside and outside of the holy cup itself. Here was 'the appearance of a new kind of humanity,' springing from contact with Jesus, 'for through Him for the first time humanity received a moral culture' (Chamberlain, i. 204, 207). It was because the gospel was utterly incompatible with Pharisaic Judaism that Jesus gathered disciples, taught them, gave them His Spirit (Jn 20²²), and sent them out to evangelize the world (Mt 28^{19, 20}).

3. Religious hopes of the Pharisees.—(1) Their views of the Messiah and His Kingdom.—The void between God and man was partly filled from Daniel onwards by Apocalypses of the Messianic Kingdom. This hope roused the godly in Israel to greater obedience, that the coming of the Son of David might be hastened. Law and Messiah were two centres of Jewish thought when Christ appeared. The burden of the one led to greater expectation of the appearance of the other. In this expectation, the nature of the Messiah also took a more universal, and at the same time more personal character, corresponding somewhat to the growing sense of personal responsibility in religion among the Jews. The Messiah, as Son of Man, appeared sharing the majesty, glory, and heavenly nature of Jehovah (Enoch 47³ and often). 'The identification of Divine hypostases with the Messiah had already taken place in pre-Christian Judaism.' It was not related at all to Philo and his Λόγος doctrine (cf. Baldensperger, p. 88). But there was also the human Messiah, the Son of David; and two confused accounts arose among the Pharisaic theologians respecting these two views of the Messiah and His Kingdom (cf. Stanton, The Jewish and Christian Messiah, 1886, p. 135 f.). The one was more earthly, national, material; the other more spiritual and universal. The material was usually regarded as leading up to the spiritual, and the millennium appeared as a transition from one to the other. A full account of the ordinary expectation is given in Ps-Sol 17²³⁻⁵⁰. The Pharisees had no idea that the Messiah would be a Saviour of all men. Even the Baptist thought He would come only to separate by judgment the evil and the good in Israel, and establish the latter in the Kingdom of God. That He would bring a new revelation, and by temptation and suffering attain victory, as Jesus did, was utterly foreign to them. Especially foreign was the conception of a suffering and dying Messiah, as Dalman has shown (Der leid. u. sterb. Mess. 1888, pp. iii, 22 f.). Even the Apostles did not know it (Mk 8³¹ 9¹²⁻³¹ 10³³). The usual explanation of two Messiahs did not arise till two centuries after Christ (Dalman, l.c.).

(2) Messianic teachings of Jesus.—The teachings of Jesus differed from those of the Pharisees on salvation, first, by showing it was not by law; and, second, by presenting the Messiah as a sin-bearer. By repentance and faith in Him men would be saved. From the time of His baptism He looked toward the cross; for He was to give men rest by becoming a ransom for their sin (Mt 11²⁸ 20²⁸). He did not infer He must die from the fate of the prophets—a prophet need not be crucified,—or borrow the idea from the scribes—they never had it, and they thought that to kill Him would end His Messianic claims,—nor did His disciples invent it; they fought against it, and nearly forsook Him when He taught it. Out of His Messianic consciousness Jesus went forth to die as the great Shepherd for His sheep (Mk 8³¹⁻³⁸ 9^{9f.} 10³²). Messiah and sufferer were inseparable thoughts; and as soon as He was confessed as Messiah and Son of God, He declared He must suffer, be rejected, be killed, and rise again (Mk 8^{29f.}, Mt 16¹⁶). His preaching of the Kingdom, also, was very different from that of the Pharisees. He proclaimed it as present, not in the future; a certainty, a reality, not a hope; both within men, and yet to be fully realized in the future. Much that the Jews expected He grouped under a new doctrine, that of the second advent of the Messiah. He appropriated to Himself the lofty Messianic conception of the Pharisees; He was 'Son of God' (Enoch 105^{2f.}, Jn 19⁷); 'Son of Man' (Dn 7^{13f.}, Mt 17¹²); 'son of woman' (Enoch 62); and Kúrios (Ps-Sol 17²³). He adopted their view that He was pre-existent with God (cf. Baldensperger, p. 87); and on the ground of such consciousness forgave sins, wrought miracles, and answered prayers. It is little wonder that such words on the lips of Jesus amazed the Pharisees; in fact, nearly all He said contradicted their teachings. He had no dread of God, His law, sin, or death; and invited all men to share His rest and peace. He set aside the Law, and turned Jewish eschatology into soteriology. He and the Kingdom were one; to have Him was to share everlasting life. Jewish teachers, leading away from Him, He called thieves and robbers, and the Pharisaic conception of the Messianic Kingdom was earthly and devilish (Mt 4⁸, Lk 4^{5f.}). The new heavens bent already above Him; the new earth was beneath His feet; and here He gathered citizens of the Kingdom, men of the Beatitudes. In all this lies the greatest possible contrast to Pharisaic teachings; and the gospel of Jesus can by no possibility be understood in the framework of later Judaism (cf. Bousset, Jesu Predigt, p. 65).

III. OPPOSITION OF THE PHARISEES TO CHRIST, AND HIS CRITICISM OF THEM.—1. Pharisaic opposition to Jesus.—The Pharisees quickly saw the dangerous tendency of Jesus' teachings, and took steps to crush His work. Messianic ideas were abroad, zealots were appearing, and a false Messiah could work ruin. Jesus arose as a prophetic man in Galilee, independent of them. From boyhood He had learned nothing from the scribes (Mk 1²² 6², Jn 7¹⁵), and everybody felt the authority of His words. They questioned the Baptist (Jn 1¹⁹. 26), who added to their anxiety by declaring the Messiah was at hand with a baptism of the Holy Ghost and of fire. As soon, therefore, as Jesus began to preach, a delegation of the Pharisees and scribes went to Galilee to oppose Him (Mk 2⁶ 7¹). They roused the Nazarenes to cast Him out (Lk 4^{16f.}); they called forth a reaction against Him in Bethsaida and Capernaum (Mt 11²¹); induced His own family to think Him insane (Mk 3²¹. 31) and in danger; and formed an alliance with the Pharisees of Galilee to oppose Him. His first public appearances, cleansing the Temple and preaching in Nazareth, called for decisive action. He attacked money-changers for disturbing the worship of Gentiles in the outer court, and pointed out that the prophets helped a Gentile widow and healed Naaman the Syrian, while the people of Israel were passed by.

He talked with a woman of Samaria, and healed the child of a Roman. He helped all in need,—publicans, sinners, harlots, lepers, demoniacs,—and told the multitudes that a sincere heathen was better than a formal Pharisee. No wonder the Pharisees opposed Him. They attacked especially (1) His violation of the Law, and (2) His relation to God.

(1) He was assailed because He paid no attention to the separation principle of the Pharisees, and came in contact with the 'am-hā'arez, Gentiles, and the diseased in a way that horrified them (Mt 9²³, Mk 3¹⁰). It is very likely these 'lost sheep,' this ripe harvest field, these 'poor' that Jesus refers to as 'babes and sucklings' (Mt 11²⁵ 21¹⁶), perhaps also as 'little ones' (Mt 10⁴² 18⁶). The Pharisees were 'the wise and prudent.' Jesus also violated the Sabbath law, this second bulwark of the Pharisees, and did so with such miraculous power as led the people to hail Him as Son of David, and the Evangelist to recall the prophecy that He would save both Jews and Gentiles. He spoke disparagingly also of tithing rules (Lk 11⁴²). A crisis had come, for the people felt Jesus could not be a sinner and do such mighty works. This led to the inquiry by what power He did these things.

(2) Isolation of Jesus to Jehovah.—Jesus taught that He wrought Sabbath miracles and all miracles by the Holy Spirit and as Son of God (Jn 19⁷). The Pharisees replied that He did wonders by Beelzebub. It was the devil incarnate that went about doing good in Jesus. His forerunner, the Baptist, was also possessed by Satan (Mt 11¹⁸). No wonder Jesus 'looked round upon them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts' (Mk 3⁵). It was worse; Jesus called it blasphemy against the Holy Ghost (v. 28^{f.}). They expected the Holy Spirit to come with the Messiah; but when both came, neither was accepted (Ac 7⁵¹⁻⁵²). It was an age 'in the highest degree religiously excited, but it did not possess the Spirit' (Gunkel, Die Wirkungen d. H. G. 1888, p. 57). Jesus claimed authority over all human affairs—to regulate the Sabbath, forgive sins, and adjudge future rewards and punishments. The claim to pardon sins especially provoked Pharisee attacks (Mk 2⁷), for it made Jesus equal with God (Jn 5¹⁸). He had called them blasphemers of the Spirit; they now called Him a blasphemer of God. The contrast was complete. Jesus' teachings and miracles prevented the Pharisees from attacking Him openly; so they tried now to catch Him by questions on purification, worship, the commandments, and tribute to Cæsar. He told them they were so wicked they could not see a sign from heaven, silenced them, and declared them hypocrites. Then came His last visit to Jerusalem, and the secret plotting of the Pharisees against Him. He appeared now openly as the Messiah (Mk 11¹⁰). When Caiaphas asked Him, 'Art thou the Christ, Son of the Blessed?' He answered, 'I am' (Mk 14⁶¹. 62). The Pharisees asked Him to rebuke the crowd for calling Him Son of David; they sent spies to profess to be disciples and betray Him to the Romans (Lk 20²⁰); they cast the blind man healed out of the synagogue; and led Jesus to ask, 'Why go ye about to kill me?' (Jn 7¹⁹). They said He had a devil, mocked Him, and took up stones to kill Him as a blasphemer in the Temple (Jn 8²². 59). The Pharisees supported the Sadducee leaders in the last assault upon Jesus. 'Chief priests and Pharisees' (Mt 27⁶², Jn 18³) plotted to kill Him (Mk 14². 43), sent men to seize Him and went with them, judged Him in the high priest's palace, sought false witnesses against Him, heard Him say He was the Son of God and declared it blasphemy, spat in His face, smote Him, put Him on a mimic throne and said, 'In this way let us honour the Son of God' (so Justin M., 1 Apol. 35, and Evang. Petri), mocked His prophecies, and led the multitude to cry 'Crucify Him.' They charged Him with being a false prophet, deceiver of the people, a false Messiah claiming to be the Son of God (Lk 22⁶⁷, Jn 19⁷), the enemy of Caesar, forbidding to pay tribute to him, and claiming to be King of the Jews, able to save others but unable to save Himself, and a destroyer of the holy nation. 'Chief priests and Pharisees' made His sepulchre sure, sealing the stone and setting a watch over 'that deceiver' (Mt 27⁶³⁻⁶⁶).

2. Jesus' criticism of the Pharisees.—Jesus' criticism followed the line of Pharisaic attack, and showed (1) the legalistic perversion of religion in Judaism. He showed (a) that they were utterly wrong in limiting the grace of God to the Jew under the yoke of the Law. The man who was offended at Him for helping the poor and outcast was not among the blessed. The righteousness of the Pharisees centring in themselves would never admit to heaven. The Roman centurion had more faith than the best Pharisees (Mt 8¹⁰), and Gentiles would enter heaven while they went into outer darkness (vv. 11-12). (b) Jesus told them their ceremonial usages were worse than useless, for they led to transgression of God's commandments (15³). They not only killed obedience by legalism, but made it impossible by putting small and great commandments on the same level. He told them they were doomed unless they abandoned their theology and mode of life. (c) He especially upbraided them respecting the Sabbath. In healing on that day He imitated David, the priests, the prophets, the Giver of the Sabbath and the Lord of the Sabbath, all of whom they ignorantly opposed when they taught that a man could not do good on that day. Their Sabbath theory sprang from hardness of heart, which had no mercy for the withered hand, the hungry disciples, the sick folk, the demoniac. They were blind, and with their followers perishing for lack of the knowledge He offered them. He then exhausted language in describing their wickedness. He anticipated St. Paul's description of heathenism and applied it to the Pharisees (Mt 23, etc., Ro 1²⁸⁻³² 2¹⁴).

(2) Jesus upbraided them further for rejection of God and His Christ. He told Nicodemus he must be born again of the Spirit and Son of God. The Pharisees who opposed Him followed the old Serpent who deceived Adam, and did his deeds. They were liars and murderers, and could not believe Jesus, who was of the truth (Jn 8^{44, 45}). They could not see the holy proofs that He came from God, because they were wicked and adulterers. The darkness could not comprehend the light. They were bewitched, under demoniacal influence, and their persecution of Jesus was a matter of course. Having no word of God, or love or life of God in them, they could not follow Jesus (Jn 5^{38f.}). Their rejection of Him was proof that they had already forsaken God. Jesus had shown He did not break the Sabbath law. He then went on to tell the Pharisees they had no authority to criticise Him, for His works were the works of God (5¹⁷). But they did not know the works of God when they saw them; they did not even understand Moses (5⁴⁶), or David, or the prophets, for they were utterly out of touch with Divine revelation; and the Law they thought they were defending would condemn them at the last day (6^{45f.}). They stumbled especially at Jesus' forgiving sin as Son of God, and His calling men to Him as the way to God; but He told them that, unless they accepted Him as Saviour, they would die in their sins (8²⁴). He mixed appeals and warnings in His last dealings with them; but all in vain. Many of the common people accepted Him, but none of the Pharisees (7⁴⁹). His last words to them were a series of 'Woes,' which He closed with the terrible sentence, 'Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how shall ye escape the judgment of hell?' (Mt 23³⁵).

HUGH M. SCOTT.

PHILANTHROPY.—Philanthropy (φιλανθρωπία) is the love of man as man. It is love unconditioned by self, or by partly selfish relations of family and nation. It is love unto the uttermost. The Greek word occurs twice in the NT. St. Paul uses it of the universal compassion of God for mankind (Tit 3⁴), and St. Luke uses it to describe the kindness of the 'barbarians' of Melita towards the aliens shipwrecked on their coasts (Ac 28⁵). In both cases the word is correctly used to describe the compassion which recognizes no limitation. It is the element of universality that transforms humanitarian feeling into philanthropy. We shall not therefore consider here the kindness that belongs in some measure to all human intercourse, nor even that special manifestation of it which is seen in the charity of the early Christian Church. We shall confine our attention to showing how Christ infused into the common human sentiment that which completely transformed it, giving to it a finer motive, a larger range of activity, an absolute sanction, until St. John could venture to use his striking paradox, and say that the old law which they had had from the beginning was now 'a new commandment' (1 Jn 2⁷⁻⁸).

Human pitifulness for human suffering belongs to the nature of man. It has always made the tender grace in human intercourse, and not infrequently it has risen to such heights as to command the instinctive admiration of the world for all that is heroic. But at best it has been spasmodic in its manifestation, it has been uncertain in its degree of intensity, and it has been strictly limited in its range. Christ took the rudimentary instinct and made it into a universal law. It is limited now neither in the sphere of its operation, nor in the time of its application: it is valid over all the earth, and applies to all generations. It dominates all mankind, and lifts man up to those levels of life in which sacrifice is consummate and eternal. It is the germ out of which has sprung all the highest good in social intercourse; out of it have come not only the occasional amenities of life, but even the moral usages of men. It is the secret of civilization, and its hold upon the imagination and conscience has become so great that it is now woven into the moral consciousness of men. It is a commandment as definite and as binding as any in the Decalogue; it comprehends them all, and where it is not honoured its neglect is visited with the contempt and censure of the world, while he who fails to obey it realizes in himself the degeneration which is the natural outworking of all Divine law abused by men. The Gospel story reveals the process by which this transformation has been made good. The evolution by which compassion has been changed into philanthropy is so subtly described that it may easily escape the notice of the superficial reader, but to those who possess the necessary spiritual insight and enlightenment the story has all the charm of a natural development. It establishes the origin of the law: reveals Christ as its Author. Philanthropy is the immediate product of the Incarnation.

1. Jesus could scarcely have been born into a less promising sphere for the promulgation of such a law. He could scarcely have found a less likely milieu than Judaism afforded for the cultivation of such a principle of life; nor could He have made His attempt at a time when common human pitifulness seemed at a lower ebb, than in the days that marked the decadence of the Empire of Rome. The contempt of the Roman for the conquered, and of the Greek for the barbarian, has always been recognized. Plato speaks with commendation of 'the pure and innate hatred of the foreign nature,' and Aristotle condones the slavery of his age, and complacently regards the slave as 'a kind of animate machine.' It is not until we come to the Stoicism of the Christian era that we meet with any teaching that approaches philanthropy, though even here we have Seneca laying down, as motive for the high type of benevolence he inculcated, the 'consciousness of having a noble nature' (de Benef. iv. 12). Blood relationships have always and universally laid down marked boundaries in the empire of love, and these have found a complete and historic embodiment in caste as it may be studied in India to-day. But it may well be considered whether even this system is not left far behind by the Jew, who held that the Gentiles without the Law were accursed, thus excluding all foreigners not only from the regard of man but even from that of God. Yet the fact remains that Christ, born into such a system, created the philanthropy that ignores all frontiers, and does not hesitate to lay down life itself for those whose one claim is that they share in the common humanity.

There are not wanting in the Gospel narrative incidents which seem to show that Christ inherited this feeling of His countrymen and of His age, at least to some extent. He limits the ministry of His disciples to the villages of Judæa, bidding them avoid the villages of the Samaritans (Mt 10⁵); and in His interview with the Syrophenician woman (Mk 7²⁶) He not only repeats the limitation given to His disciples as binding also upon Himself, declaring that He was not sent save to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, but speaks of the woman as a dog, and claims for the Jews that they are the children of the household. Contempt could no further go, and the words fall strangely from the Saviour's lips. But without for the moment setting against these passages others in which the sympathy of Jesus is seen to be as catholic as it was tender, it may very well be argued that these two incidents do not establish exclusiveness in Christ, and in any case the exclusiveness broke down and gave way to the very opposite feeling in Him. But, apart from that, it may be shown that the limitation in the injunction given to the disciples was due not to any narrowness in the Saviour's sympathy, but rather to His recognition of the limitations of His emissaries. The Apostles, with their prejudices strong within them, had scarcely the tact and the culture necessary for those who would open the door of faith to the Gentiles, and subsequent events show how after many a lesson the leader of the band, St. Peter himself, was unable fully to recognize the truth so clearly seen and strongly enforced by St. Paul. At any rate it is most significant that when the lessons of Christ's life were drawing to a close the prohibition was taken away, and the Apostles were instructed to 'go into all the world, and make disciples of all the nations' (Mt 28¹⁹). A far greater difficulty is seen in the story of the Syrophenician woman. Here the Saviour's words are so entirely at variance not only with His own act on that occasion, but with the tenderness and courtesy with which at all other times He dealt with women, that attempts have been made from the earliest times to reconcile the contrast between the Spirit of Jesus and His harsh and contemptuous words on the occasion. The words can scarcely be justified even on the supposition that it was a harsh discipline intended to bring out the triumphant faith of the woman. We hold that Christ used the words in irony, and that, feeling the utter falseness of the leaders and teachers of the Jews, driven in utter weariness from them into Gentile territory, He assumes for the time being the narrow spirit which belonged to them, that His disciples might see how Pharisaic doctrine looked when reduced to act in dealing with the sorrow and need of the world. He throws into contrast with that doctrine the quick intuition of the woman, as well as the humility of her trust as she declares that even the Gentiles have a place in the family of God. There could be no finer method of revealing to the disciples the contrast between that exclusiveness of spirit which He had come to destroy, and the larger trust in the all-comprehending love of God which He came to fulfil.

Christ gave, then, to the human feeling of pitiful concern for another the universality which it lacked. And He did this first by His full and generous recognition of good in the alien, whether He found him in the actual commerce of life or in the imaginary scenes which He made to live in parabolic teaching. He had not found in Israel such faith as He found in the centurion (Mt 8^{10, 11}), and He closed His tribute to that faith by saying that many should come from the east and the west and sit down with Abraham in the Kingdom of God, while the favoured people themselves should be cast out. When He was asked for a definition of a neighbour, He pointed to a Samaritan, and described him as possessing qualities lacking in priest and Levite (Lk 10^{27ff.}). He had spoken of His own people with a great tenderness as 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 10⁶ 15²⁴), but He extends that tenderness to the Gentile world when He speaks of 'other sheep not of this fold.' He says that they too are His, and them also He must bring (Jn 10¹⁶). Whether He spoke the words to Nicodemus or not, it is clear that John learnt from Him that the love of God was not the exclusive privilege of the Jew, but that God loved 'the world,' and that His salvation was within the reach of whosoever should believe (Jn 3¹⁶). In 'the Gospel to the Greeks' He speaks of 'all men' as coming within the attractive power of Himself crucified and ascended (Jn 12³²). And when He gave to His followers His final commission, there was no limit to the sphere of their evangelic labours: they were to 'go into all the world,' 'to make disciples of all the nations' (Mk 16¹⁵, Mt 28¹⁹). Christ not only widened the domain of this law of love, pushing back the boundaries marked out by social custom or selfish expediency or fear, but He also enriched the law by giving it a deeper note, an intenser spirit. The poor man for neglect of whom Dives found himself at last in torment, was 'full of sores,' he was licked by the dog, the common scavenger of offal. Such was the claimant upon the rich man's kindness (Lk 16^{20ff.}). Lowly service touched its lowliest when the Master stooped to the feet of the disciple (Jn 12⁵). Throughout the East the touch of the foot brings defilement and degradation. And when the service had been rendered to His followers, He spoke to them of 'a new commandment' which He had therein given them (Jn 13^{35, 34}). He called upon those who would follow Him to be ready to sell all and follow Him (Mt 19²¹). The gift that won the approval of Heaven was not that which came out of the superfluity of the rich, but the widow's mite, for that was 'all that she had' (Mk 12⁴³). Last of all, He declared that He Himself would give unto the uttermost, for as Good Shepherd He was ready to lay down His life for His sheep (Jn 10¹¹). There was thus added to the length and breadth of universal love the height and depth of sacrifice, and these two elements wrought powerfully in the instinctive love of man until the neediness of each became the common burden of all, and philanthropy became a part of the spiritual equipment of men.

2. The expression of that spiritual equipment will develop from age to age. The forms of its expression in the early days of the Christian era are well known. Christ instructed His disciples to heal the sick, and generally to minister to the physically distressed. The relief of the poor seems to have been another marked form of Christian philanthropy from the first, and they were in addition to minister in spiritual things, and to seek to admit men into the Kingdom of God. It may at first sight appear as if this was a strictly limited form of philanthropy, but it is obvious that the form of expression was accommodated to the capacities of the agents chosen and to the simplicity of the life which they were accustomed to live. Such forms of sympathetic relief, we may be assured, existed long before Christ sent forth His disciples; that which He added was the twofold vitalizing principle which made the charity of the age a living reality. It became real (ἀληθές, 1 Jn 2⁸) in them, as it was already in Him. The universality and the intensity which were His contribution to the common love, the old commandment of mankind, were also notes of life. Love without limit in range or in intensity,—such was the new commandment illustrated in the washing of the disciples' feet. It was now ἀγάπη εἰς τέλος, it was love unto the uttermost (Jn 13¹). And having dropped into the human instinct the vitalizing germ of a new principle, Christ was content to leave the new law to find wider and fuller expression as the years moved on. With the developing powers of man, that vitalized law would be certain to find a far more extended application than lay within the compass of His earliest followers. In that age the manumission of the slave, the education of the poor, the enforcement of laws of sanitation—such things as are the commonplaces of philanthropic measures in our time—were not within the power of the disciples of Christ. But we can see that that which gives them the sanction of law, that which comes into every social reform that has any promise of permanence or of helpfulness, is just that with which Christ filled the hearts of His followers as He sent them forth on their simpler mission:—all endowment is but a trust; 'freely ye have received, freely give' (Mt 10⁸); there is no limit in love; the neediness of each is the common burden of all. All social reform, happily increasingly recognized, advocated, accepted, in our age, is but the working out in the larger life of to-day of the vital principle contributed by Christ when He made love's range co-terminous with the universe of God, and at the same moment made it instinct with His own passion and sacrifice.

But philanthropy as Christ has taught it in the Gospel story goes further than this. It not only is the spring of all true social reform, but it possesses the power to enforce observance. It gives the sanction of duty to all such observance. It becomes not merely an added quality in human intercourse, but a positive compelling force. It is a new commandment. Neglect to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the prisoner and the sick, or to translate these special terms into the general terms for which they stand,—to meet all human need as it arises,—such neglect is not in the eyes of Christ a venial offence, a trifle of indifference; it is clear He took a far more serious view of it: He taught His disciples that it meant rejection in the judgment of God; it excludes him who so neglects from the Kingdom. Philanthropy was thus invested with the august powers of a moral law. If we consider philanthropy to be the common human instinct endowed with the range given to it by Christ, the εἰς τέλος of His own showing, we can see how this binding quality, this sanction, is imparted. For such a quality in love strikes at the root of that which is destructive of all morality, and that is briefly the calculating spirit. The immoral compromises which we so often make with ourselves become impossible when love unto the uttermost is the rule of our regard for our fellow-men. It opposes every tendency to evade law where possible. It adds strength and loyalty to obedience, and imparts to scrupulous observance the gladness of enthusiasm. This operation so refines and enlarges duty, that by the side of it all other duty seems the merest travesty of duty, and to fail to reach this height of moral observance becomes a positive failure, a moral offence, a breach of law. Christ accomplished this by striking clear and strong that personal note which is the key to all His influence. He attached men to Himself, and then exhibited in Himself the very law which He promulgated, until in after days the appeal might be made to the Christian Church that its members should bear one another's burdens, since only thus could they fulfil that LAW which Christ was (οὕτως ἀναπληρώσατε τὸν νόμον τοῦ Χριστοῦ, Gal 6²). This love unto the uttermost was lived; and lived by Him who by His own loveliness has drawn all men to Himself. It is for this reason that words which might easily have become the rules of another futile Utopia, or the striking maxims of an original teacher, have become instinct with the spiritual; and with the new law of love the power to realize it was given. When to His setting forth of the new philanthropy Christ added the words, 'Ye have done it unto me' (Mt 25⁴⁰), He endowed His words with spirit and life.

This spirit the Christian Church has sought to realize in what are called Missions. No distinction need ever be made between 'Home' and 'Foreign' Missions. Least of all should any be made when we consider, as we do here, the spirit which belongs to both. The resource and ingenuity of love will appear in all such enterprise. There is no power of modern life but will be pressed into service by the love which recognizes no limit to its operation, no limitation to its spirit. Legislative powers will be used for what they are worth. Social organization, all that art or science can teach,—in a word, all the fulness of life,—will be permeated and freely used by this great law of love. That law will find its fullest application in the service of the alien and the foreigner. Here, if anywhere, the universality of love will be seen; when the missionary breaks every tie that makes the sweetness of his life, to carry the burdens of he reveals the intensest manifestation of that love whose Divine note is sacrifice. It is no wonder that the story of the triumphs of the gospel, or of the devotion of the missionary in strange and remote regions or in circumstances of peculiar physical peril and distress, has so often come back to the Christian Church with a breath as of the ocean, a breath that infuses new life into the stale observance and gives new stimulus to the jaded servant, a breath that whispers of broad spaces, of elemental forces, of the fulness of the Infinite, the 'Deep where all our thoughts are drowned.'

Missionary service must always be the perfection of philanthropy. And philanthropy is love without limit, and love is of God, for God is LOVE.

PHILIP (Φίλιππος, 'lover of horses').—1. Philip the Apostle.—For the little that we know regarding him, beyond the mere mention of his name in the lists of the Twelve (Mt 10³, Mk 3¹⁸, Lk 6¹⁴), we are wholly dependent upon a few scattered notices in the Fourth Gospel.

(1) The first of these tells the story of his call, which took place on the day after the call of Andrew and John with their respective brothers (Jn 1^{48ff.}). And the fact that it is expressly mentioned that Philip, like these men, belonged to Bethsaida, would seem to point to a certain amount of friendship as having already existed between them, while his Greek name (a peculiarity which among the Apostles he shared with Andrew) makes it at least possible that he himself was originally of Greek descent. This accords entirely with what we know of the mixed Gentile population of Bethsaida. Whether, however, this was so or not, Philip would seem to have belonged to the growing class of devout souls throughout the land who were 'waiting for the consolation of Israel,' even if he had not, along with the previously named disciples, been an open follower of John the Baptist. For when Jesus 'finds' him—evidently not by accident but as the result of a deliberate search—and addresses to him the first direct call which, so far as we know, He addressed to any man, 'Follow me,' Philip immediately responds, and once and for all throws in his lot with his new Master. So complete indeed is his surrender, that though as yet his knowledge of Jesus is very imperfect (cf. v. 45 'the son of Joseph'), he shows himself endowed with the genuine missionary spirit in proceeding in his turn to 'find' Nathanael, that together they may rejoice in the discovery of the promised Messiah. The very precision and minuteness of the terms, moreover, in which Philip announces that discovery, bring before us another aspect of his character, for they show him to have been a man of an anxious and careful turn of mind, asking for no conviction on the part of others until he has been first convinced himself, and ever ready to submit all doubts and prejudices to the test of actual experience (v. 46 'Come and see').

(2) Of this latter trait of the Apostle's character we have further confirmation, from a somewhat different point of view, in the next incident in which he is specially mentioned. For at the feeding of the Five Thousand in the wilderness it was to Philip that Jesus addressed the question, 'Whence are we to buy bread, that these may eat?' (Jn 6⁵). Some have thought that the reason of this was that Philip had charge of the commissariat of the Apostolic band, just as Judas acted as their treasurer; but of this there is no proof, and St. John expressly adds that Jesus said this to 'prove' him. The Master knew His disciple's cautious and deliberate disposition, and how little he had yet shown himself able to make any of the bolder efforts of faith. And He evidently hoped that on this occasion Philip would rise from the manifest inadequacy of the existing material resources to the thought of the unseen powers which He (the Christ) had at His command. But the hope was to be disappointed. Philip was so occupied with his own careful calculations as to what the actual feeding of the multitude meant, that he could think of nothing else. And even the matter-of-fact Andrew showed more imagination when, after the mention of the lad's little store, he at least hazarded the suggestion, 'But what are they amongst so many?'

(3) The case is similar when we turn to another occasion when we find the two Apostles together. It is in entire accord not only with Philip's (possible) Greek origin, but with his sympathetic, inquiring disposition, that the Greek visitors to the Temple should select him as their ambassador to Jesus (Jn 12^{20ff.}). But it is equally characteristic that, as he realized the greatness and significance of the request, coming as it did from pure Gentiles, he should hesitate to act upon it on his own responsibility. He would do nothing until he had consulted Andrew. And even when Andrew had approved, it was only in conjunction with him, and leaving him to occupy the foremost place ('Andrew and Philip'), that Philip went to tell Jesus.

(4) This 'faith without confidence' is even more marked in the last glimpse which St. John gives us of his brother Apostle. When, in His farewell discourse to the Twelve, Jesus announced that He was going to the 'Father,' and that no one could come to the 'Father' except by Him, it was left to Philip to say, 'Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us' (Jn 14⁸). With him 'seeing' was 'believing.' He could not believe that any real knowledge of the Father was possible except such as resulted from an actual theophany; and so proved how blinded he had been to that higher manifestation of which he had for so long been witness in the words and the acts of the Son.

(5) With the pathetic personal appeal to him which this dulness of spiritual vision called forth (Jn 14⁹), Philip disappears from the Gospel story. And we hear nothing more of him in the NT except for the mention of his name amongst the Apostles who assembled in the upper room at Jerusalem after their Lord's Ascension (Ac 1¹³). Various traditions have, however, gathered round his memory.

The most interesting of these is the account preserved by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 4, § 25), which identifies him with the unknown disciple who, when the Lord's call came to him, asked that he might first go and bury his father—an identification at least in keeping with what we have seen of Philip's character. The apocryphal Journeyings of Philip the Apostle (3rd cent.) represent him as travelling through Lydia and Asia, and finally settling in Hierapolis. And it was there, according to Polycrates (Bishop of Ephesus c. 190 A. D.), that he was 'buried' 'along with his two aged virgin daughters' (Eus. HE iii. 31; cf. Lightfoot, Colossians 2, p. 45 ff.). The same authority adds that another daughter who 'lived in fellowship with the Holy Spirit' was buried at Ephesus—a circumstance that may perhaps point to Philip's own residence there for a time, and consequently to a renewed intercourse with his old friend the Apostle John. If so, we have an additional reason why St. John should have introduced Philip's name so freely in the 'memoirs' on which at the time he was engaged. Of the later connexion with Hierapolis already alluded to we have now interesting confirmation in the discovery of an inscription showing that the church there was dedicated to the memory 'of the holy and glorious Apostle and theologian Philip' (τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ ἰσοῦστούτου καὶ θεολόγου Φιλίππου: see Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i. p. 552 f.).

In the West, St. Philip's Day is observed along with that of St. James the Less on May 1st. In the East, St. Philip's Day is Nov. 14th, St. James', Oct. 23rd.

PHYLACTERIES (OT 'frontlets').—The observance of phylacteries is based on Ex 13⁹⁻¹⁰ and Dt 6⁸⁻¹¹¹⁸. For the Heb. and Greek terms see Hastings' DB, s.v. It is disputed whether the passages in the Pentateuch are to be understood literally (so most of the Rabbinic writers, and Ginsburg in Kitto's Cyclop.) or metaphorically (so Ibn Ezra, Rashbam, the Karaites, Jerome, Lyra, Calvin, Hengstenberg, Knobel, Keil, and Kennedy in Hastings' DB); some assign a metaphorical meaning to the passages in Ex. and a literal to those in Deuteronomy. Under the more legal and formal interpretation and observance of the OT which flourished after the Return, the literal interpretation became dominant. The exact date of the introduction of the literal observance of the precept cannot be given. No indisputable reference is found in the OT; passages like Pr 1⁹ being indecisive. From the relatively large number of regulations referring to phylacteries—some of them connected with the Tannaim—it follows that they were used as early as the time of the Sopherim, the 4th or at least the 3rd cent. B.C. (see JE x. 26). The first explicit reference, and that to the hand phylactery, is in the letter of the pseudo-Aristeas, the date of which is variously assigned between 200 and 100 B.C., where they are regarded as an established custom. They are also mentioned in connexion with Simeon ben Shetach, brother-in-law of Alexander Jannæus (B.C. 105-78). Josephus (Ant. IV. viii. 13) speaks of them as an established and recognized custom. We may, therefore, regard them as having preceded by about two centuries the birth of Jesus Christ. For our knowledge of the customs associated with them we are indebted chiefly to the references in the Mishna (for which see Schürer, HJP II. ii. 113). Though the collection of these traditions took place in the 2nd Christian cent., they may be regarded, for the most part, as representing an earlier state of things.

In the later Jewish writers, phylacteries play a great part; their manufacture and use are elaborately described, and their significance and importance dwelt upon at length. 'There are more laws—scribed to delivery by God to Moses—clustering about phylacteries than about any other institution of Judaism. Maimonides (Yad Tef.) mentions 10; Rodkinsohn (Tef. le Moshel) mentions 18' (JE). According to the Kabbala, they were significant of the wisdom, reason, and greatness of God. Phylacteries were more holy than the gold plate worn by the high priest, since that contained the Divine Name once, the phylacteries twenty-three times. The Mishna taught that 'he who has Tephillin on his head and his arm, Tsitsith on his garment, and Mezuzah on his door, has every possible guarantee that he will not sin.' The wearing of them distinguished the cultured and pious from the common mass, the am-hā'arez, the 'people who knew not the law' (Jn 7⁴⁹). Though worn probably at first all day, they became limited to the time of morning prayer. Careful directions are given as to the person (women, the unclear), the times (Sabbaths and festivals), and the places (cemeteries, etc.) where their use was prohibited.

Phylacteries are of two kinds, those for the hand and those for the head. In the case of the former, a box or house (בֵּית) was made of the skin of a clean animal, which had been softened in water and shaped and stiffened on a mould. In this was inserted a parchment on which the Scripture passages, Ex 13¹⁻¹⁰ and 11-16, Dt 6⁴⁻⁹ and 11¹³⁻²¹, had been written in four columns; the parchment was rolled and tied with white, washed hairs from a cow or calf, usually from the tail. This box was then sewn on to a leather base, furnished with a loop through which a leather strap passed. In the case of the head phylactery a similar box was prepared, but with four divisions, in which were placed in order, beginning from the left side, the four above named passages of the Pentateuch. On the right hand side of the box of this phylactery was impressed a three-pronged Shin (שׁ), and on the left hand one with four prongs (שׂ). This, too, was sewn on a base and provided with a leather strap (see Illustration in Hastings' DB iii. 870).

In 'laying'—to use the technical term—the phylacteries, that for the hand was adjusted first. The box part was placed above the elbow on the inside of the left arm where it would press against the heart, a fact to which significance was given (Dt 6⁸). A knot in the shape of the letter Yōdh (י) was made, the strap was wound about the arm four times and three times, and three times round the middle finger of the hand. The box of the other was placed on the forehead, where the hair ceases to grow, the band taken round the head and fastened with a knot like the letter Dāleth (ד), while the two ends were made to hang down in front over the shoulders. The Shin on the box, the Dāleth knot on the head phylactery, and the Yōdh knot on the hand phylactery, made the letters of one of the Divine Names—יְשׁוּבָה Shaddāi, 'Almighty.'

The following benedictions are said. At the laying of the hand phylactery—'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe, who hast sanctified us by Thy commandments, and has commanded us to lay the Tephillin.' An almost identical one is uttered during the placing of that for the head, and when it is finished—'Blessed be His name, whose glorious kingdom is for ever and ever.' At the adjusting of the strap round the middle finger, which is left till the last, 'And I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercy. I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness: and thou shalt know the Lord' (Hos 2¹⁹). In removing, the fastening of the hand is first undone, the head phylactery removed, then that on the arm; they are kissed and placed in a bag, as to the place and use of which careful directions are given.

It cannot be doubted that the Pharisees and scribes in the time of our Lord used phylacteries; but how far the custom was followed by the people generally is uncertain. In order to emphasize their profession of religion, these people 'made broad' (πλατύνουσι, Mt 23⁵) these mementoes of their Judaism, whether by enlarging the whole, the boxes and the straps, or, as the Sinaitic and Curetonian Syriac suggest, the straps only. It was the vain extension of the outward sign of an unreal religion that our Lord rebuked; it marked the externality and hollowness of contemporary Pharisaism. While this is the only NT reference to phylacteries, their use by a certain class should continually be borne in mind by the reader, as it may add to the vividness of the picture suggested by many incidents. Thus in Mt 23³⁴ || it may be considered as certain that the group of Pharisees with whom our Lord held His controversy wore their broadened phylacteries, and that the passage He quoted, the Shema, the foundation of Hebrew religion, would be found in the phylacteries they carried on their heads and arms.

PHYSICAL (φυσικός, 'natural,' 'inborn').—To this word a distinctive and conspicuous place has been given in the terminology of modern science, and that very appropriately; for the object of science in every one of its branches is to acquire such a knowledge of the Universe as shall correspond exactly to the constituted and established nature of things. Neither the word 'physical' nor the word 'nature' (φύσις) occurs in any of the four Gospels. But nevertheless many things which fall under the description of both terms, as scientifically used, occupy a large place in all the Gospels; and there high importance is necessarily and designedly attached to them. It is true that one has only to run one's eye reflectively over the pages of the Gospels to discover that in them the moral order of things is the matter of supreme and controlling interest. But while that is so, it becomes also apparent that this moral interest is not only involved in the physical order of things, but is inevitably and to a vast extent dependent upon it. Thus, e.g., it is everywhere manifest in these narratives of our Lord's earthly life and work that He appeared among men as an individual Being. This implies that the physical order of existence was epitomized in Him in the same way and to the same extent as it is in every individual human being. It implies that His body was the organ of the moral order of the world as the latter existed in the spiritual constitution of His being, and as it came to manifestation in the moral or spiritual activities of His life within the sphere of His moral relations to God and to men. It implies, also, that His bodily constitution and life placed Him in direct relations with, and in constant dependence upon, the whole order of the physical environment in which He lived and moved and had His being as 'God manifest in the flesh' (1 Ti 3¹⁶). And so it becomes obvious that if He had not entered into these incarnate relations with the physical order of things, He never could have become the Son of Man, and if He had never become the Son of Man He never could have revealed Himself to humanity as the Son of God (Jn 1, 2 Co 4⁶). For these reasons, then, and others that sprang out of them or were otherwise related to them, our Lord was necessitated to make the physical order of the world a subject of reflexion, and to embody in His teaching such ideas of it as He considered to be fit for communication as a part of His general message to mankind. That He did make it a subject of extensive and profound, careful and sympathetic study, is as evident as any other fact in the Gospels. It is equally evident, too, that as the result of this study He formed some very definite and highly important conceptions regarding the order of things in question, more than one of which were entirely original. It may be affirmed, moreover, that none of the ideas of this order, to which as a Teacher of humanity He attached momentous importance and value, can ever be superseded by the teaching of either Science or Philosophy. What, then, were the leading constructions that He as a religious Teacher put upon the physical order of the world?

1. For one thing, this order of things presented itself to His mind as a medium of Divine revelation (e.g. Mt 5⁴⁴⁻⁴⁸ 6²⁵⁻³⁰). The question as to the order of things physical, and its significance, must have shaped itself in His mind at an early stage in His life of observation and reflexion. What the result of His inquiry was appears in His teaching. The most general and important item in that result was the discovery of the presence and activity of God in the established order of organic and inorganic existence. To His mind God was immanent and operative in nature; and it is in the same view of the relation of God to the physical order of the Universe that modern Theism and Philosophy have begun to rest. That such was indeed His view appears from His own utterances on the relation of God to the order of things physical; which show that nothing was further from His mind than the reckless idea in which God is conceived as existing only in a relation of externality to this order and as acting upon it from without. When, for instance, He saw the sun rise and rain fall, and pondered on the extensive and complicated orderly system of physical means and ends to which sunrise and rainfall belong, He perceived in these occurrences manifestations of the immediate activity of God (Mt 5⁴⁵), and He was too unerring a thinker not to know that God's will and therefore God Himself must be immanent in the established system of things in which He conceived the Divine activity as displayed. Nor is there any real collision here between Christ and modern science in regard to the system of activity to which sunrise and rainfall are due. When He said, 'Your Father which is in heaven maketh his sun to rise . . . and sendeth rain,' He used words which are absolutely consistent with the strictest scientific ideas of the natural forces and laws by which the same events in the physical order of things are now explained. For if the scientist is able to explain, and right, from his own point of view, in explaining these events by the action of physical forces and the laws of their operation, this explanation does not account for the existence of these forces themselves, for their persistence, for the perfectly and constantly regulated mode in which their respective forms of activity are manifested, or for the originating cause of the complicated and exquisite adjustment of these forces and their activities to the ends they serve. For these things there is only one satisfactory explanation, and that is the immanent and immediate activity of God. And Science and Philosophy have been rapidly becoming aware that no better explanation is likely ever to be found.

But, further, for Christ the revelation of God and His activity in the physical order of the world possessed a moral significance. God as a Moral Being—and because as such He is perfect—can never act unless morally, even in the system of things physical. This truth regulated the whole of our Lord's conception of God's relation to this order, and of His ways of administering its provisions. And therefore it is that He saw in such physical events as sunrise and rainfall manifestations of God's beneficence and magnanimity. He 'maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust'! These words are a striking revelation of the perfectly fresh, intelligent, discerning eyes with which Christ looked upon the physical order of things, and contemplated God and His activity as therein manifested. This appears when three things are noted.—(1) There is only one established physical order of things. (2) This order is constituted throughout on one and the same homogeneous plan, and it is necessarily regulated accordingly. (3) Therefore it is impossible for this order to be so administered as to make distinctions of any kind in the distribution of its provisions among men. Here distinctions cannot be made even between the evil and the good, between the just and the unjust. Therefore as the Author and the Administrator of this system of things God makes no such distinctions. Within this sphere of the relations between God and men, the good and the evil, the just and the unjust, are the same to Him. His impartiality to both sorts of men is as absolute and universal as the rising of the sun and the falling of rain. And God Himself has so ordered the physical universe that it should be so, and that it cannot be otherwise. And, so far as any one can say, Christ was the first to notice and fully to appreciate the true meaning of these obvious but vastly important facts. In sunrise and rainfall He saw nothing but instances of the manifestation of the loving-kindness of God to all men, good and evil alike, and of His magnanimity towards evil and unjust men. For it was one of Christ's governing ideas as a Teacher that God did not need to punish evil and unjust men for their sin by withholding from them any of the beneficent provisions of the physical order of things. He knew and taught in effect that it is with the moral order of things and God's unerring and all-sufficient administration of it, as the moral Governor of the world, that evil and unjust men have to reckon; and therefore, in the exercise of the magnanimity alike of His love and of His justice, God dispenses to them, in common with good and just men, a full and free share of His sunshine and rain. So Christ understood this matter (cf. Mt 5²¹⁻³⁰ 11^{25, 26}, Jn 9³⁹⁻⁴¹ with Mt 5⁴⁵).

2. But, further, these views that Christ held as to the physical order of the world suggest the inference that He must have looked upon this system as an order of law. That He did so regard it is evident from His teaching, when the latter is carefully and fairly examined from this point of view. The term 'law,' as defined by science, is of modern origin, and therefore it is never employed in this sense in the Gospels. But the Gospels are rich in recognitions of a large variety of those facts for which the term 'law,' as scientifically understood, stands; and recognition of these facts was made by Christ Himself. The modern conception of the order of things physical, which the term 'law' is employed to denote, is, that it is an order in which perfect constancy and regularity reign universally and persistently, and that even in the case of its minutest phenomena and its subtlest processes. Did Christ, then, perceive and acknowledge the great features of the physical order on which this conception is founded? He did. In all its essential forces and laws the physical order was the same in His time as it is to-day. Science has not created any of the forces or laws in question; it has only discovered and formulated them. Moreover, it is evident that Christ's observations and His reflexions on nature were prompted and controlled rather by religious than by scientific motives or reasons. It is to be admitted, again, that He never made the physical order of things a direct subject of teaching, but always made it subservient to the religious or moral ends He had in view. Still He was deeply convinced of the constancy and regularity of the physical system of existence in the midst of which He lived and taught, and on which He depended (e.g. Mt 7¹⁶⁻²⁰, Mk 4³⁻³²). That it was so is evinced by the following facts:—(1) A large proportion of His teaching was based on the principle of comparison. (2) The most of His comparisons were indications of resemblances between the things of the physical order of the world and the things of the Kingdom of God, which are in reality the things of the moral order of the world, considered as an order in which the will and purpose of God are coming to realization in the moral relations of God to men and of men to Him and to one another in Christ. (3) In His comparisons it was His custom to lay conspicuous emphasis on those phenomena of the physical order of things in which the constancy and regularity of this order are prominent. (4) His manifest reasons for doing so were such as these—His whole conception of the Kingdom of God implies that He regarded it as an order of perfect moral constancy and regularity, i.e. as an order of moral law. But few, if indeed any, of His hearers had any idea of the Kingdom of God as being such an order. On the other hand, however, they were familiar with many of the phenomena of constancy and regularity in the physical order of things. Therefore His object in calling the attention of His hearers to these phenomena was to lead their minds up from the things of sense to the things of faith, and thereby to convey to them the conception, and to awaken in them the conviction, that the things of the moral order of the world, like the order of things revealed to their sense-perception, were things that had real existence, things that were indeed founded in moral principles of absolute constancy and regularity, and things therefore to be relied upon with the utmost confidence. (5) These considerations, then, all imply that the physical order of things from which our Lord drew His comparisons must have been regarded by Him as a system of order, a system in which constancy, regularity, law reigns. The whole principle of comparison as thus explained is applied, e.g., in Mt 7¹⁵⁻²⁰.

3. But the physical order of the world was regarded by our Lord as also a sphere of Providential administration (e.g. Mt 5⁴⁴⁻⁴⁸ 6²⁵⁻³⁴, Lk 12⁴⁻⁷). It is important to note the fact that all His allusions to this branch of the subject here considered, imply that He conceived of the Divine providence as exercised within the boundaries of the physical system of things. This system is, so to speak, the machinery employed by God in all the various manifestations of His providential care. But if this system is an order of physical constancy or law, all the exercises of the Divine providence must be regulated by this fact. So Christ's teaching represents it as being. He never spoke of providence as in effect a system of Divine activities in which God, interposing in the interests of the objects of His care, either ignored the established order of physical existence or made breaches in its established arrangements. All the ways in which He saw the providential activities of God manifested in care for His creatures were ways in which the established orderliness of the physical world came into effect, as in the case of the rising of the sun and the falling of rain. That is to say, in Christ's view the physical order of the world is constituted on a providential plan, in which a perfectly arranged and regulated system of means is adjusted to serve the beneficent ends contemplated by God.

What Christ's ideas were of the leading features of the administration of this system is suggested by those passages of His teaching to which attention has been called. He believed the providential activities of God to be at once universal and particular, and this belief is in accordance with the nature of things. He believed also that God's providential activities are not only immanent and immediate, but persistent. They are as unslumbering and restless as the physical energies or forces in the activities and effects of which they are manifested. He believed, moreover, that God's providential interest and care extended even to birds and flowers as well as to human beings; and this belief, also, is justified by the necessities and arrangements of the physical order of things to which they as living beings in common with men belong. For they, as living beings, have each physical needs according to their own respective natures and places and destinies in nature; and therefore it was not unworthy of Christ to form and take delight in the conviction that their Creator was providentially faithful to them.

But withal, it remains to be added here, that Christ believed that human beings have a higher value for God as the God of providence than the birds of the air. And this is why. The birds of the air have no place, or task, or destiny in the moral order of the Universe. But it is otherwise with men. They are endowed with a moral nature; their life is a moral vocation; they have a moral destiny to shape in co-operation with God. And this explains and manifests the perfect wisdom of Christ as a teacher, in including all men within, and in excluding all other living creatures on the earth from, the moral government of God and its system of administration. He constantly paid truthful and perfectly wise respect to these two great facts in His teaching:—(1) The fact that God is ever and always providentially and actively related to men as physical beings, having physical necessities and requirements in their life; and (2) the fact that He is ever and always governmentally and actively related to them as moral beings, having moral necessities and requirements and responsibilities in their life (e.g. Mt 11²⁵). This distinction between the providential and the governmental activities of God, in His relation to men and in His ways with them, has a determinative place in the truth taught in the Gospels.

4. Finally, all Christ's allusions to the physical order of the world present a deep religious complexion. He saw in this order, and in the relations between God and men as therein revealed, conditions and opportunities provided for the manifestation of pure and high forms of religious life. Men are dependent on the beneficent ministrations of the Divine providence. As moral beings it is their duty to recognize this fact, to pay due respect to it, and to cherish and manifest gratitude to God for all the various forms of His providential loving-kindness and faithfulness. Within the domain of Providence, moreover, reasons constantly exist and occasions are ever arising for men to exercise trust in God. Here also as well as in their own hearts men may find the presence of God in their life. And here they are summoned to imitate the ways of God's providential beneficence. In all these various ways Christ related His religion to the physical order of the world and its providential administration. His Sermon on the Mount shows that He wished and intended them all to have an essential place in the life of every one of His disciples. And in His own life they were all fully observed and manifested. See, further, NATURE, PROVIDENCE.

W. D. THOMSON.

PHYSICIAN.—1. Luke, the physician.—It is a fact of special importance, in reference to Christ's miracles of healing, that one of the four Evangelists was himself a physician (Col 4¹⁴). Traces of this fact appear in his Gospel (ct. 8⁴³ || Mk 5²⁶), and still more in Acts (cf. Hobart, Medical Lang. of St. Luke). His training would probably be Gentile (Col 4^{11, 14}, cf. Eus. HE iii. 4), and his medicines, like Gentile food, would be unclean in Jewish eyes. See, further, art. LUKE.

2. Jewish physicians.—Priests were inspectors of leprosy (Mt 8⁴, Lk 17¹⁴), but they were not the regular physicians. (a) The physicians whom a sufferer had consulted before she was healed by Christ are alluded to in one case (Mk 5²⁶ || Lk 8⁴³). Elsewhere physicians are mentioned in proverbial sayings only (Mt 9¹² || Mk 2¹⁷, Lk 5³¹ 4²³): there is no censure of them in Christ's words, on the contrary He implies that the sick should resort to the physician; but Mk 5²⁶ probably gives a fair impression of their general value. (b) References to remedies are few: e.g. a lotion (Lk 10³⁴), an anodyne (Mk 15²⁸), both, we may assume, customary amongst Jews, but in neither of these cases administered by them; operations (circumcision, Lk 1⁵⁹ etc.; castration, Mt 19¹²). The language of Mt 18³² || speaks of mutilation rather than of surgical amputation. Superstitious cures were much sought; cf. the addition to Jn 5², which Westcott (ad loc.) describes as 'a very early note added while the Jewish tradition was still fresh.' (c) A special defect of Jewish medical science was the want of anatomy, necessarily involved in the ceremonial uncleanness of contact with the dead (cf. Mt 23²⁷), i.e. (as explained in Jewish Encyc. art. 'Medicine') contact with a complete corpse, or an 'anatomical unit' (a bone covered with its soft parts, or a collection of bones equal in bulk or number to more than half a skeleton. An illustration of this want may be seen in the fact that a young criminal's corpse was dissipated by long boiling, in order that the bones of the skeleton might be counted (ib.). The inspection of the bodies of animals slaughtered for sacrifice or food could be no real compensation for this want.

3. Christ, the great Physician.—Such a title is not found in the Gospels, but is at least suggested by Lk 4²³ 5³¹ || 13³². [The word ἰατροῦ is used (literally) 20 times in NT, and always, except in Ac 28⁸, directly of Christ]. Indeed, the word 'Saviour' implies it (Mt 9^{21c}). The following points are observable in Christ's healings:—(a) Variety: blindness (Mt 9^{27ff.} 20^{29ff.} || Mk 8^{22ff.}, Jn 9), deafness (Mk 7^{31ff.}), palsy (Mt 9^{1ff.} ||), withered hand (12^{9ff.} ||), issue (9²⁰ ||), dropsy (Lk 14^{1ff.}), fever (Mt 8^{14ff.} ||), leprosy (8^{1ff.} || Lk 17^{11ff.}), wound (22^{49ff.}), possession (Mt 8^{28ff.} ||, Mk 1^{23ff.} || etc.); (b) purpose: not merely works of mercy (Mk 3⁴, Jn 10⁵²), but also 'signs' (Jn 4⁵⁴ etc.), parables of a spiritual healing (Lk 5²⁴ 31^t, Jn 9²⁵ 39); (c) universality: without price (Mt 10⁸, ct. Mk 5²⁶), without exception (Mt 11⁵, Mk 12⁷ 37, Jn 9³²), without fail (ct. Mk 5²⁶ 9¹⁸); (d) conditions: (i.) on Christ's part,—the (Divine) will (Mt 8³); in some cases is added the (human) prayer (Mk 9²⁹, Jn 11⁴¹); (ii.) on the sick one's or the petitioner's part,—faith (Mt 8¹³ 9²² 22²⁸ 15²⁸ etc.) and (though seldom requiring mention) desire or will (Jn 5⁶; Lk 22^{50ff.} is altogether exceptional); (e) preliminaries: (i.) ordinarily an application, either personal (Lk 5¹² 17¹³ 18³⁸) or intercessory—with (Mk 23⁷ 32 9¹⁷) or without (Mt 8⁶, Mk 7^{29ff.}, Jn 4^{47ff.}) the presence of the sufferer; (ii.) often no application preceded (Mk 5²⁸, Lk 13¹² 22⁵¹—and so always in Jn., e.g. 5⁹ 9^{2ff.} [11¹¹]); (f) performance: usually immediate (Mt 8^{3ff.}, Mk 5²⁹), sometimes delayed (7^{27ff.} 9^{21ff.}), rarely a gradual process (8^{23ff.}); (g) accompaniments: a word (Mt 8⁸ 13 12¹³), never otherwise in the case of possession (8¹⁶ 31), a touch (8⁹ 9¹⁸ 25. 29, Mk 5²⁸ 6⁵⁶), a symbolic action (Mk 7³³, Jn 9^{6ff.}); (h) sequel: an assurance (Mk 5³⁴, Lk 17¹⁹ 18⁴²), a command (Mt 8⁴ 9⁶, Mk 5¹⁹ 43), a warning (Jn 5¹⁴). PILATE.—Pilate's first name, that by which he would be known in his own household, has not been recorded; we know only his second name 'Pontius,' and his third 'Pilatus.' Pontius may be derived from pons ('bridge'), or be cognate with πέντε ('five'); and Pilatus meant, no doubt, originally, 'armed with the pike' (of the Roman legionary); but we are no nearer his origin. We know nothing of his parents, his birthplace, or the date of his birth. He was a Roman citizen, and was born probably in Italy. From the position which he afterwards occupied, it is certain that he belonged in manhood to the middle or equestrian class in the community; but whether by favour of the Emperor or by birth is unknown. Admission to this class could be obtained only by those who possessed 400,000 sesterces (equivalent to about £3000 of our money, but with much greater purchasing power). The question whether he inherited this property qualification or not cannot be answered.

In order to reach the position of procurator of the Roman province of Judæa, he must have passed through a course of earlier appointments open to his order. He must have had considerable military experience, and have held one or more of the following appointments: prefecture (or tribunate) of an auxiliary cohort, or a legionary tribunate of the second class (those of the first being open only to the senatorial order), or the prefecture of a wing (ala) of cavalry (Cagnat, Cours d'Épig. Lat. 3 p. 109 ff.). The earliest age at which one could become a procurator was between twenty-seven and thirty years. These procuratorships differed in standing (see PROCURATOR), and that of a province like Judæa was not the highest. Further promotion was open to one who did well in that position. The date of the birth of Pilate cannot have been later than about B.C. 4-1. In Mt 27¹⁹ he appears as married, but whether he left any descendants or not is uncertain.

In A.D. 26, Pilate was appointed by the Emperor Tiberius procurator of the province of Judæa. This province comprised the former kingdom of Archelais, — roughly Samaria and the territory south of it to Gaza and the Dead Sea, — and the procurator's duties were both administrative and military. He was in a position of subordination to the governor of the province of Syria, but the exact nature of the subordination is not known. For all practical purposes his rule over all in the province, except Roman citizens, was absolute. At the same time, it must be remembered that in this, as in other provinces, certain communities were permitted a large measure of self-government — one of the secrets of Rome's success as a world-power. Thus in Jerusalem the Sanhedrin retained many judicial functions; death sentences, however, had to be confirmed by the governor, and were carried out under his supervision (Jn 18³¹; Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 1, BJ II. viii. 1). The religious and political zeal of the various sections of the population made the task of governing the province one of extreme difficulty, requiring statesmanlike gifts of no ordinary quality.

We derive most of our knowledge of Pilate's rule from Josephus, from whom the following incident is repeated, to illustrate the statement above made. The Jewish prejudice against images of gods was incomprehensible to the other ancient peoples; but their attitude was officially respected by the Romans, whose practice it was to refrain from introducing such into the Jews' country. They carried their conciliatory policy so far as to remove the figures of the god-emperor from those military standards which bore them. In contravention of this custom, Pilate caused the standards with their usual decoration to be carried by night into Jerusalem. The people pleaded with him to remove the objectionable images, but he remained obdurate, and eventually ordered his soldiers to surround the crowd and put them to death if they persisted. This threat had no terror for men whose religious frenzy was worked up to the highest pitch, and Pilate had to yield, for it was impossible to massacre so many. His action in this matter showed want of tact, hot temper, and weakness; and as the occurrence took place early in his period of government, it was an evil augury for his rule (Ant. xviii. iii. 1). On another occasion he used money from the Temple-treasury for the building of an aqueduct, and broke up the riot which threatened by introducing disguised soldiers into the crowd (Ant. xvi. i. iii. 2). Lk 13¹ is the only authority for the mention of the Galileans whose blood Pilate 'mixed with their sacrifices.' The cause of his action was doubtless some riot. Pilate is represented in the worst possible light by a passage in Philo, which is put into the mouth of Agrippa (Legatio ad Gaium, 38).—

[The Jews' threat to communicate with Tiberius] 'exasperated Pilate to the greatest possible degree, as he feared lest they might go on an embassy to the Emperor, and might impeach him with respect to other particulars of his government—his corruptions, his acts of insolence, his rapine, and his habit of insulting people, his cruelty, and his continual murders of people untried and uncondemned, and his never-ending, gratuitous, and most grievous inhumanity.'

We do not need to go beyond the Gospel narratives, and the fact that he was retained in his position for ten years by Tiberius, to realize that this picture is grossly overdrawn.

For our knowledge of the part Pilate played in the trial of Jesus we are dependent on all four canonical Gospels. As it may be assumed that Mark's narrative is the oldest, we shall take it first, then proceed to Matthew's and Luke's, which are probably almost contemporaneous with one another, and, lastly, we shall draw on the Fourth Gospel.

(1) According to Mark (14⁵³), the chief priests and scribes and elders, after Jesus had been brought from Gethsemane, led Him away to the high priest, in whose residence they all assembled. This was an extraordinary meeting of the Sanhedrin. The Court sought evidence which would lead to the death of Jesus, but failed to find any that was reliable. Such evidence as they had was false and conflicting. Jesus' statement about the Temple was repeated and misconstrued. Then the high priest elicited from Him a declaration that He was the Messiah. This statement was decided to be blasphemy, and as a result He was judged worthy of death (Lv 24¹⁶). After the verdict He was subjected to every insult. The death sentence had by law to be confirmed by Pilate before it could be carried out. In their eagerness they lost no time in bringing Him before Pilate's tribunal (15¹). The question was put by Pilate, 'Art thou the king of the Jews?'; to which Jesus answered, 'Thou sayest' (v. 2). The chief priests, being permitted by Pilate to make their charges, brought many against Him; the accused, on being asked by Pilate if He had anything to say, was silent, and caused His judge to wonder. It happened that the feast of the Passover was at hand, and on such an occasion it was the custom to release a prisoner. The crowd which stood around called for the release of a certain Barabbas, a robber and murderer. Pilate proposed instead to release Jesus, knowing that hatred had been the motive of the high priests in handing Him over. The chief priests instigated the crowd to beg for Barabbas. Pilate then asked what they wished to be done with 'the king of the Jews,' and they said, 'Crucify him.' On being asked by Pilate what evil He had done, their only answer was to repeat the cry. Pilate, being anxious to please the crowd, gratified both their requests. Such is Mark's narrative of the trial, baldly stated. It is so very brief that it is not surprising that the other Evangelists have been able to add to it. Mark has nothing further to say about Pilate except to tell that Joseph of Arimathea begged and obtained from him the body of Jesus (15⁴³).

(2) Matthew makes only two additions of any importance to this narrative. One is the warning message sent to Pilate, when seated on the tribunal, by his wife (27¹⁹). The character of the incident stamps it as a reliable tradition. The second is Pilate's washing of his hands after he had acquiesced in the decision of the Jews and the wishes of the mob, and his proclamation of his innocence, followed by the Jews' invocation of the curse upon themselves and their children. At a later stage in the narrative, Matthew alone (27^{62ff.}) gives the incident of the deputation to Pilate with the request for permission to seal the tomb, and the granting of that permission.

(3) Luke, at the beginning of the accusation before Pilate, mentions the charge (23²): 'We found this man perverting our nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, and saying that he himself was an anointed king.' The first part of this charge is directly contrary to the truth (Mk 12¹⁷ = Mt 22²¹ = Lk 20²⁵). It is Lk. also who mentions (23⁴⁻¹²) that when Pilate learned that Jesus was a Galileean he sent Him to Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, to whose jurisdiction He belonged. Herod could elicit no answer from Jesus, and sent Him back to Pilate. This exchange of courtesy led to a renewal of the friendship between Pilate and Herod, which had been interrupted for some reason or other. On the return of Jesus, Pilate is represented as proclaiming His innocence and confirming it by the decision of Herod.

(4) The Fourth Gospel makes the following contributions to the story. The informal questioning by Annas (18¹⁹⁻²⁴) is special to Jn., which gives also (18³³⁻³⁸) a much longer conversation between Jesus and Pilate than the others, in which Jesus explains the nature of His Kingdom. It is quite certain that Pilate realized that Jesus' Kingdom was not an ordinary kingdom, else his conduct of the case would have been entirely different. The section 19⁴⁻¹⁵ contains a further examination of Jesus, and the terrorizing of Pilate by the Jews. The Johannean account, as it is the fullest, is also the best. It explains what is obscure in the others, and brings the whole situation before us with startling vividness. John makes Pilate the author of the inscription on the cross, and mentions his repudiation of the Jewish criticism of its wording.

The situation was for Pilate an extremely difficult one. The Jews in authority were determined that Jesus should die. Assassination was impossible, because of the people. They were therefore compelled to resort to the governor's power. In order to get him to sign the warrant, they had to show that Jesus had committed a crime worthy of death. They had to select a charge which in their opinion would leave Pilate no option. They seized upon that of treason, a charge which brought death upon some of the most influential Roman citizens during that period, as the early books of Tacitus' Annals show. Pilate examined Jesus on this charge, and soon found that this was no case of treason. A strong man might have defied the provincials, and set Jesus at liberty. In doing so, he would have risked all his future prospects, perhaps his own life. The procurator was in reality only an upper servant of the Emperor, and as such could be dismissed and ruined without appeal. The Jews, when they saw that Roman justice might win and Jesus be released, held over Pilate the threat of a report to the Emperor on his conduct. Pilate, as we have seen, was not a strong man. He yielded, though he knew the accused was innocent. It must be remembered that Jesus was not a Roman citizen, was, in fact, in the eyes of a Roman officer, merely a subject, a slave, a chattel. The life of a Roman citizen was precious, that of a mere subject worthless. That Pilate had a tender enough conscience or a sound enough idea of justice to try to save this 'slave,' should be remembered to his credit. He was not of the stuff of which heroes are made, though doubtless in many respects a competent governor.

Little is known of Pilate's later history. He used armed force to suppress a fanatical movement in Samaria, which does not appear to have endangered the Roman supremacy in the slightest (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 1). So many were put to death that the Samaritans appealed to Vitellius, the then governor of the province of Syria. The governor ordered Pilate to Rome, to appear before the Emperor's council. Before he reached Rome, Tiberius had died. The result of this no doubt was that he escaped trial. Of his further career nothing is certainly known, but legend has naturally not neglected one of the most interesting figures of NT history. In the Gospel of Peter, which belongs probably to the middle of the 2nd cent., he is represented in a very favourable light; the author shows also anti-Jewish tendencies. As the fragment of this Gospel is put together almost entirely from the canonical Gospels, it yields in interest to another apocryphal work—the Acts of Pilate. In the 2nd cent. the Church began to busy itself with its own history, and to build up a defence of its faith and practice on a historical foundation. The person of Pilate was a subject of special interest, and was pressed into the service of the Church as a valuable witness to the truth of Christianity. In the Acts of Pilate he is acquitted of all blame, and represented as in the end confessing Jesus to be the Son of God (ch. 46). It was widely believed in ancient times that an official account of the trial of Jesus was sent by Pilate to the Emperor Tiberius and preserved in the archives at Rome. It is not impossible that such a report was sent; but this at least we can say with certainty, there is no real evidence of its existence or its use to be found in any apocryphal writing. Justin in his (first) Apology (chs. 35. 48) refers more than once to the Acts under Pontius Pilate. The Acts of Pilate (Gospel of Nicodemus) which we possess, however, with kindred pieces, is not of earlier date than the 4th or 5th century. Tertullian in his Apology (ch. 21) speaks of the report of Pilate to Tiberius as containing an account of the miracles, condemnation, crucifixion, and resurrection of Jesus, with the story of the guard at the grave. There still exists in various ancient works (e.g. Acts of Peter and Paul) a so-called Letter of Pilate to Claudius (or Tiberius), which, though possibly interpolated at a later date, gives an impression of real antiquity, and is no doubt the document referred to by Tertullian. As to the date of it nothing can be said, except that it is older than 197 A.D., the date of the Apology of Tertullian: it was probably written in Greek originally, though it is extant also in Latin. Tertullian says (Apol. 5) that Tiberius, as the result of a communication from Palestine, proposed to the Roman Senate that Jesus should be recognized as a god, but that the Senate rejected the motion. He further states that the Emperor held by his intention, and punished those who accused the Christians. All this must be regarded as pure legend.

Tradition has it that Pilate fell on evil days after the death of Tiberius, and ultimately committed suicide (Euseb. HE ii. 7, and also in his Chronicle). Another account has it that he was beheaded by Tiberius' order, but that he repented before his death. His wife is commonly reported to have become a Christian, on the strength, no doubt, of the warning which St. Matthew records that she gave to her husband. It is told that Pilate appeared before the Emperor to stand his trial, wearing the tunic of Jesus, and that this tunic acted as a charm to protect him from the anger of his Imperial master. His body is said to have been first thrown into the Tiber, but the evil spirits so haunted the spot as to terrorize the populous neighbourhood, and it was conveyed to Vienne in the South of France and sunk in the Rhone. Here also the evil spirits proved troublesome, and the body was removed to the territory of Lausanne in Switzerland, where it was sunk and walled up in a deep pit surrounded by mountains. The best known legend connects itself with that country, and the mountain still known as Pilatus. The corpse is said to rest in a lake on the mountain side, whence it comes forth periodically and goes through the act of washing its hands. The Coptic Church reveres Pilate as a saint and martyr (June 25th).

PILGRIM.—1. Although the word is not found in the Gospels, they constantly indicate the place of the annual pilgrimages in the life and thought of the people. There is always an air of movement over the scenes, and a frequent change of setting in the lives of the men and women; they are constantly moving to and fro as the festivals come round. The parents of Jesus kept this custom, and at the age of twelve Jesus made with them His first (?) pilgrimage (Lk 2⁴¹⁻⁴⁹). In the Fourth Gospel there are many references to other visits to the feasts (Jn 2¹³ 5¹ 7¹⁴ 10²² 11^{55, 56}). No mention is made of them in the Synoptic Gospels; but, it may safely be assumed that Jesus had often made the journey to Jerusalem with the caravans of pilgrims (cf. Mt 23³⁷). The custom explains the rapidity with which news spread; the name of Jesus had become a familiar word in such places as Jericho on the main route (Lk 18^{37, 38}). The last journey to Jerusalem was made among pilgrims. There is an implied contrast where it is said that Jesus went in silence before His disciples; pilgrims marched with song and rejoicing (Ps 42⁴), but silence and fear marked the disciples (Mk 10³²). The multitudes who hailed Jesus as He entered Jerusalem included many Galilean pilgrims, not without a certain local pride (Mt 21⁹, Jn 12¹²). The rejection of Jesus by the Samaritan village (Lk 17^{11, 12}) was due to their knowledge that Jesus and His band, though taking the less familiar route, were pilgrims to the hated Jerusalem (Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah [abridged ed. of LT], p. 297). In estimating the rapid progress of the Christian faith, especially amongst the Dispersion, it must be remembered that many strangers, such as Simon of Cyrene (Lk 23²⁶), would be at the feast, and would carry away some knowledge to prepare their minds for the Apostolic message.

2. These pilgrim experiences illustrate some of the words of Jesus. The disciple must travel through the world with heart detached and his treasure laid up in heaven (Lk 12³³, Mt 6¹⁹). His must be the straitened way, not the broad path (Mt 7¹³); to follow in the way he must give up all (Mk 10²⁹, Mt 19²⁹). In their missionary journeys the disciples have the equipment and the mobility of pilgrims (Mt 10⁹ etc.). The would-be disciple must expect to be homeless (8²⁰). The disciples are to be sojourners who guard against the dangers of an alien world from which they must be detached

(cf. He 1¹³, 1 P 2¹¹, where the word 'pilgrim' [παραπίδημος] is used). In the Fourth Gospel Jesus denies (Jn 4²¹) that the annual pilgrimage will be an abiding necessity. Everywhere He speaks of Himself as sojourning in the world for a Divine purpose (8¹⁴ 16²⁸ 13³⁷); the disciples must so look upon their life (12³⁵ 17¹⁶). They are in the world, but not of it (17¹⁵⁻¹⁸ 15¹⁹); their true home would be in God. But even in their earthly life they would be in one of the mansions (μοναί) of the Father's house (14²). At intervals along the road stood the caravanserais where travellers lodged. The disciples were like travellers, and His companionship had hitherto cheered them. Now He must leave them that He might go forward; but when they arrived He would be waiting for them. (See D. Smith, The Days of His Flesh, p. 449). To complete the thought of life as a pilgrimage, it is to be remembered that the journey is through the outlying parts of the Father's Kingdom to the centre. See, further, art. FEASTS.

PILLOW.—Mk 4³⁸ ἐπὶ τὸ προσκεφάλαιον καθέδων, RV 'the cushion.' The Gr. word occurs in LXX, Ezk 13^{18, 20} (probably 'fillets' used as amulets, A. B. Davidson, Ezekiel, 89), 1 Es 3⁸ (pillow of Darius). Originally it meant a pillow for the head, but it came to be used for any cushion (cf. the English use of 'kerchief,' originally a covering for the head, as found in 'neckerchief,' 'handkerchief'). Pollux (Onomast. x. 40) says that the poet Cratinus, in his Horæ, used it of the sailor's cushion (τὸ ναυτικὸν ὑπηρέσιον); and Hesychius, s.v. πορικρανον, further defines it as 'the leathern cushion (τὸ δερμάτινον ὑπηρέσιον) on which the rowers sit.'

'To mitigate the roughness of the beams or other seats, every rower was provided with a cushion, which he carried about with him from ship to ship' (Cecil Torr, Ancient Ships, 47). The following passage in the Stratiotai (v.) of the poet Her-mippus illustrates this: 'Tis time now to come along with me, taking the rowlocks and a cushion, that leaping on board thou mayest ply the dashing oar.'

Little is known about fishing-boats in the time of our Lord (Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 367^b; Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4481; Smith's DB iii. 1285). The fishermen's belongings mentioned in the Gospels are the boat itself (Lk 5³, Jn 21³), with the accompanying small boat (Jn 21⁸), the two kinds of nets (Mt 4¹⁸ 13⁴⁷), the hook (17³⁷), the baskets (13⁴⁸), the fisher's coat (Jn 21⁷), and the cushion. It is clear that the condition of the fishermen of the Lake of Gennesaret was considerably removed from one of absolute poverty; we have other evidences of this in Mk 1²⁰ ('the hired servants'), Lk 8³, Mk 15⁴⁰ (Salome, one of those who 'ministered of their substance'), Jn 19²⁷ (cf. Speaker's Com. i. 203, ii. 276); Jos. Vita, 33, BJ III. x. 1.

The τὸ before προσκεφάλαιον seems to imply that the cushion was one of the ordinary articles of the boat's furniture, while its position 'in the stern' suggests that the disciples were in the habit of resting on it by turns during the night fishing (Lk 5⁵, Jn 21³). It is, therefore, not probable that it had been placed there specially for our Lord's accommodation. On starting to cross the lake, He seated Himself on 'the cushion in the stern'; and there, being wearied with prolonged teaching, He soon fell into a sleep so profound that not even the tumult of the elements was sufficient to disturb it. 'Sleep is attributed to our Lord in this context only; but it is probably implied in Mk 13³⁵, and in passages which describe His vigils as if they were exceptional' (Swete, St. Mark, 85). Bushnell compares in a striking way the sleep of Adam in Paradise with that of Jesus in the storm (Christ and His Salvation, 127). See also art. CUSHION.

JAMES DONALD.

PINNACLE occurs only in Mt 4⁵ || Lk 4⁹. The word (περίγειον) so rendered means 'a little wing,' and refers to some lofty point about the Temple, from which Jesus is said to have been invited by the tempter to cast Himself down. The word used for 'temple' in both passages (τερόν) denotes the whole enclosure, and not merely the Temple building proper (ναός). The 'pinnacle' may therefore be sought for anywhere within the Temple precincts. It is evident, from the use of the phrase 'the pinnacle of the temple,' that there was a definite point well known by this name when the Evangelists wrote; and now we are in some uncertainty as to where it was situated. Some understand the apex of the roof of the Temple building to be meant. Others suggest the roof of Solomon's Porch, on the east side of the Temple area. But if 'the pinnacle' was not the summit of the Temple proper, the most likely position for it is the battlement of the Royal Portico, which ran from east to west across the south end of the enclosure, on the precipitous edge of a deep valley. Josephus (Ant. xv. xi. 5) says of this portico: 'While the valley was very deep, and its bottom could not be seen if you looked from above into the depth, this further vastly high elevation of the cloister stood upon that height, insomuch that if any one looked down from the top of the battlements, or down both these altitudes, he would be giddy, while his sight could not reach to such an immense depth.' By 'both these altitudes,' it need hardly be said, Josephus means the height of the precipice plus the height of the portico which crowned it. As the top of the portico, according to Josephus, was 100 feet above the pavement, the drop from this elevation to the bottom of the Kidron Valley would be about 300 feet; and if 'the pinnacle,' as some suppose, was a turret or spire at the eastern end, marking the south-east corner of the enclosure, then its height would have to be added to this vertical distance.

The Church historian Hegesippus (A.D. 160), as quoted by Eusebius (HE ii. 23), gives an account of the death of James the Lord's brother, who, he says, was cast down by the Jews from the pinnacle of the Temple (ναός—the Temple proper). If this statement were reliable, it would be decisive in favour of the first supposition mentioned above; but the accuracy of the whole story is doubtful, and it may be questioned whether Hegesippus, writing nearly a century after the destruction of the Temple, knew any better than we do where 'the pinnacle' really was. There is still, therefore, a choice of views. On the one hand, the apex of the Temple proper would undoubtedly be the loftiest point of the whole group of buildings. On the other hand, the battlement of the Royal Portico would afford the deepest and sheerest fall, and, on the whole, it is most probable that 'the pinnacle' was situated here. JAMES PATRICK.

PIPE (αὐλή).—The verb is found only in the Gospels (Mt 11¹⁷ || Lk 7³²), where the only say: 'We have piped unto you and ye have not danced.' The noun αὐλός is found in 1 Co 14⁷. The pipe was a wind instrument. It was perforated with two, three, or four holes, and was either single or double. The single form was played vertically or horizontally; in the latter case the word 'flute' would be a better rendering. The single instrument was played with two hands, the double with one hand for each pipe. Its range was naturally limited, its music monotonous. The word ἄγαβ, also tr. by RV 'pipe,' in the Targums was an instrument of similar structure, and has been translated by the Vulg. organum and AV 'organ' (Gn 4²¹, Job 21¹² 30²¹, Ps 150⁴). HENRY E. DOSKER.

PIT (βόθυνος, φρέαρ).—In the Gospels βόθυνος is used only of a place into which animals or men might stumble by accident (Mt 12¹¹), or in consequence of blindness (Mt 15⁴, Lk 6³⁹, AV 'ditch,' but RV 'pit'). This might mean any opening or hollow dug in the ground. In Lk 14⁵ || Mt 12¹¹, however, φρέαρ is used, so that here we should, perhaps, understand 'pit' as an empty cistern, or artificial well. These are seldom covered in the East or guarded in any way. In the neighbourhood of towns and villages, especially those that have fallen on decay, they are often the cause of serious accidents to unwary pedestrians. In the Apocalypse φρέαρ appears as the bottomless abode of 'the beast' and his unholy hosts (Rev 9¹ 17⁸ etc.). W. EWING.

PITCHER (κεράμιον).—An earthenware jar with one or two handles, used chiefly by women for carrying water (Gn 24¹⁵, Jg 7¹⁶, 7²; RV and AV 'pitcher'). The only occurrence of the word in the Gospels is in Mk 14¹³ || Lk 22¹⁰, in the directions given by our Lord for securing a room for the Paschal meal. It has been alleged (Speak. Com. Lk 22¹⁰ note) that the sign of the pitcher was not so accidental as it appears. 'According to Jewish usage, on the evening of the 13th [of the month Nisan], before the stars appeared in heaven, every father of a family was to go to the well to draw pure water, with which the unleavened bread was kneaded. It was a real rite which they performed. . . . But apart altogether from the chronological inaccuracy,—the disciples must have entered Jerusalem early in the day (Mk 14¹⁷, Mt 26²⁰),—this statement is not confirmed by Mk 14⁴ and Lk 22¹¹, from which it may be inferred that the head of the house, who has been identified in turn with John Mark, Joseph of Arimathea, and Nicodemus, is not the bearer of the pitcher.

There is, however, presumptive evidence that the pitcher was being used in the preparation of the unleavened bread, the making of which, together with the putting away of leaven from the houses, was part of the work in which many hundreds in Jerusalem (Jos. BJ vi. ix. 3) must have been employed on that day; but the demand for water for ordinary purposes alone will suggest the inference that in a city whose population was so enormously increased, the pitcher borne by this slave could not be distinctive.

Whatever the probability of recognizing or of not recognizing the sign, the most important feature of the whole incident remains unaffected. For all time the pitcher will be a sign not of the need for secrecy and sealed orders, nor even of the prescience of Christ, though that is abundantly proved, but rather of the faith of the two disciples. Here also is presented a beautiful illustration of the co-operation of the human will with the Divine, the overruling of common events for Divine ends, a demonstration of the power that is laid under service to faith. Blessing in the ordinary affairs of life, as in the greatest crises of the soul, is attainable only by implicit and unquestioning confidence in the Master mind.

PITY.—This word occurs once in the Gospels (Mt 18³³ AV) as tr. of ἐλεέω; apparently in accordance with the practice of the translators 'that we have not tied ourselves to an uniformity of phrasing or to an identity of words,' since the same word ἐλεέω is rendered by 'have compassion' in the verse immediately before, as elsewhere.

1. In the Synoptic Gospels four different words occur which carry with them the notion of 'pity' or 'compassion': σπλαγχνίζομαι (σπλάγχνα), ελεέω (ἔλεος and ἐλεῆμων), συλλυπέομαι, and οικτίρωμαι.

Of these, the first three are used with reference to Jesus: (1) σπλαγχνίζομαι, 'moved with compassion,' found in Mt 9³⁶ 14¹⁴ 15³² 18²⁷, Mk 1⁴¹ 6³⁴ 8², Lk 7¹³; (2) ελεέω, used in Mk 5¹⁹ by our Lord Himself to describe His own work in the cure of the demoniac, 'and hath had compassion on thee,' καὶ ἤλυσεν σε; (3) συλλυπέομαι, Mk 3⁹, tr. 'being grieved (for the hardness of their hearts).' The word occurs nowhere else in NT, but is used by Herodotus and elsewhere with the significance of having pity or compassion (see Liddell and Scott).

By their usage in these passages the Synoptics plainly declare that in His manifestation of human nature our Saviour was drawn towards suffering humanity by that Divine gift of pity which has ever been regarded as one of the higher feelings: sickness, sorrow, being like tired sheep, even bodily hunger, filled Him with compassion for the suffering ones,—while in the solitary use of συλλυπέομαι alluded to above to describe His feeling at the unwillingness of men to receive truth, we can hardly hesitate to give to the word its classical meaning of 'pity,' when we remember the outburst of weeping which accompanied His wail over Jerusalem (Lk 19⁴¹). And while Himself manifesting forth pity towards men and inculcating the same feeling on His disciples, He also most clearly taught them to think of His Father in heaven as One moved with compassion for His earthly family. The 'tender mercy of our God' in the Benedictus (Lk 1⁷⁸) is the thought illustrated in the parable of the Good Samaritan, who was 'moved with compassion' (ἐσπλαγχνίσθη) at the sight of the wounded man (Lk 10³³); as in that of the king who forgave the debtor, being 'moved with compassion' (σπλαγχνισθεὶς, Mt 18²⁷); and even more strikingly so in the description of the father of the Prodigal, who, when he saw his son returning, ἐσπλαγχνίσθη καὶ δραμὼν ἐπέπεσεν ἐπὶ τὸν τράχηλον αὐτοῦ (Lk 15²⁰). So also the solitary use of οικτίρωμαι in the Gospels (used again only in Ja 5¹¹) is found in our Saviour's exhortation, 'Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful'; γίνεσθε οἰκτίρμονες καθὼς ὁ πατήρ ὑμῶν οἰκτίρμων ἐστὶ (Lk 6³⁶).

It is true that in speaking of God as the 'Merciful One' our Saviour was repeating what is a familiar thought in the OT. רַחוּם, 'compassionate,' is there used exclusively as an epithet of God (Dt 4³¹), while in Sir 50¹⁹ we already find the simple רַחֵם as a name of God (see Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 204); but in our Saviour's teaching we recognize a new fullness and meaning in the thought that would have been impossible for men to grasp before He came who could say, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (Jn 14⁹).

2. The teaching of St. John's Gospel.—It is striking that in St. John's Gospel we never find any word used which conveys the meaning of 'pity' or 'compassion'; Christ is never described as 'merciful' or as 'showing mercy,' nor does He so speak of the Father; while even the exhortation to mercy as a duty of man to man is not found there.

Can we give a reason for this? or is the omission purely accidental? We believe the reason is found in the fact that in St. John's mind the thought of 'pity' is absorbed in that of 'love.'

To St. John was given the task of presenting the life of Christ upon earth in all its eternal meaning. The human idea of pity, as a feeling called forth by man's needs, is but one manifestation of love. St. John does not stop to show that Jesus Christ both pitied and also loved men, but in passing at once to the thought of love as the bond of union between God and man manifested forth in the Saviour's life upon earth, he naturally ascribes to it those actions that the Saviour's contemporaries had felt as acts of mercy. As an illustration of this, we may take the story of the raising of Lazarus. Here is a miracle performed for those who knew more of Christ than merely that 'He pitied them.' The familiar cry for help, found so often in the first three Gospels (ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς), is not the message sent by the sisters, but instead, it is a direct appeal to love—'He whom thou lovest is sick' (Jn 11³). The delay in giving the prompt relief which pity would ask for is explained by 'Now Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus' (11⁵). At the sight of the sorrow of those about Him we are told 'Jesus wept'; but the Evangelist apparently hastened to add the remark of the Jews, 'Behold how he loved him,' that the thought of His love should even here swallow up that of mere pity. And this fuller presentation of Christ's feelings for men, he shows, had also been accompanied by a teaching of Christ, both as regards man's duty to his fellow and also God's attitude towards the world, which went far beyond what had been already recorded in the Synoptic Gospels. St. Luke had preserved the saying, 'Be ye therefore merciful,' but St. John was the first to record how his Master had taught, 'A new commandment give I unto you, That ye love one another as I have loved you' (13³⁴).

Christians had already in their hands the teaching of Christ which spoke of God as the 'Merciful One,' but now St. John records words which tell them not of a merciful God, but of a loving Father (Jn 3¹⁶ 14²³ etc.). It is true that even this conception of God is found in the OT, but a perusal of the passages in which 'the love of God,' or God as 'loving,' are spoken of, will show that such are always equivalent to the 'pity' of God, or God as 'pitiful,'—that is, in direct relationship to man as a needy creature. In the Fourth Gospel, however, the thought is altogether different: the Father loves men with the same love with which He loves the Son (17²⁶); that same feeling of real affection with which Christ had let them feel He regarded them, He taught them was also the feeling of His Father towards them (14²¹⁻²³ 16^{26A}). The common bond of fellowship between Christ and the Father and between man and God through the Son was the power of the Divine love (17²⁶). But whatever doubt may exist as to the meaning of the omission of the thought of pity in this Gospel, its very omission leads us to see how St. John supplies what might be felt as a want, in the first three Gospels, in another particular.

How are men to think of that pitiful, gracious Saviour who in His own life was so sorely tried and afflicted? Now nowhere in the Gospels—nor indeed in any passage of the NT—is Christ presented to men as an object of pity. The thought that seems to underlie the words of some well-known hymns, and even Is 53, is not found in the NT. Pity is the demand for help, and as an object of our help Christ never appealed to men. On the contrary, He said to the women, 'Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me' (Lk 23²⁸); and to the disciple Peter, 'Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?' (Mt 26⁵³). To the Father alone He cries, 'If it be possible, let this cup pass from me' (Mt 26³⁹). But if we are not allowed to pity the suffering Saviour, are we to view His passion with indifference? St. John clearly and abundantly answers this question. While the mystery of pain is not revealed, the message of the Saviour's agony is declared to be the proof to mankind of His and His Father's love. 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends' (15¹³). That love manifested in dying is the same love spoken of in 3¹⁶ 16²⁷ 17²⁶.

It may well be doubted if any presentation of the Passion which moves our pity is in accordance with the Gospel (see, for a strong indictment against such, Ruskin's Lectures on Art, ii. §§ 56, 57); but even if we hesitate to accept this, we must confess that unless we are led through pity to understand love, the message of pity has failed. 'We must look through the suffering to the triumph. . . . The crucifix with the dead Christ obscures our faith. Our thoughts rest not upon a dead, but upon a living Christ. The closed eye and the bowed head are not the true marks of Him who reigns from the Cross, who teaches us to see through every sign of weakness the fulfilment of His own words, I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself' (Westcott, The Victory of the Cross, vi., which see throughout).

PLACE OF TOLL.—See RECEIPT OF CUSTOM.

PLAGUE.—The word 'plague' is used in the Gospels to render the Greek word μάστιξ, which means a whip or scourge (cf. Ac 22²⁴, He 11³⁶). In the Apocalypse the word πληγή, from which the English word is formed, is exclusively used. In the Gospels the word occurs only four times (Mk 3¹⁰ 5²⁹, 34 and Lk 7²¹). In each of these passages it is used of distressing bodily disease, and carries the implication that such afflictions are Divine chastisements. The word is therefore used in a figurative sense, and there is no reference to the bubonic disease which is the scourge of India to-day. See art. DISEASE.

PLAN.—1. Did Jesus enter on His ministry with a deliberate plan?—If so, what was its nature, and how far was it subsequently modified by the pressure of events? These questions, of the first importance for a right understanding of the Gospel story, are doubly complicated by the insufficiency of our records and by the mystery in which our Lord's self-consciousness is shrouded.

The Fourth Evangelist, looking back on the Saviour's life when it had now receded into the distance, sees in it, from first to last, the unfolding of a vast design. He represents Jesus as bending outward circumstances to His will, and moving forward, without haste and without rest, towards the set 'hour' in which His purpose would fulfil itself. He assumes, in like manner, that the future development of the Church was foreseen and directed by Jesus Himself. All had happened in accordance with a Divine plan, already determined on before the Word became flesh. This Johannine view is largely the result of theological reflexion, but it also arises in part from a feeling which still impresses itself on every reader of the Gospel narrative. There is a harmony and completeness in this Life by which it is distinguished from all others. The events appear to follow each other in inevitable sequence, as if they had all been ordered beforehand in a conscious plan.

It cannot be assumed, however, that this inward necessity which we now discern in the life of Jesus was clearly present to His own mind. Such an assumption seems to be precluded by the prayer in Gethsemane, which appears to imply that our Lord was uncertain, almost to the very end, of the Father's will concerning Him. The absolute faith in God which finds its highest expression in that prayer was at all times the chief motive in the life of Jesus. In the face of a great darkness He surrendered Himself utterly to the will of God, assured that it would lead Him wisely. Whatever may have been the programme which He had set before Him, He was prepared at any moment to change or abandon it, if God should so direct Him. This must always be borne in mind in any attempt to discover His inward purposes. The dogmatic conception that Jesus knew the end from the beginning, and gave mechanical fulfilment to a prearranged plan, is not only untrue to facts, but destroys the whole moral worth and significance of the Divine life.

At the same time it is at least equally unwarrantable to construe the life as nothing but the unforeseen result of fortuitous circumstances. It has been argued from the notices which describe the beginning of the ministry (and more particularly from Mt 4¹⁷), that Jesus at the outset had no distinctive plan. As a disciple of John, He took up the Baptist's work after he had been cast into prison, and awoke gradually to a new conception of the Kingdom of God and to a sense of His own special calling. According to this view, His Messianic work was in a manner thrust upon Him, and was never followed out deliberately except perhaps for a brief season at the very close. Granting, however, that the appearance of John may have given the immediate impulse to the ministry of Jesus, we have no ground for supposing that it, in any sense, produced it. The connexion between John and Jesus appears to have been at most a casual one. There is no indication that the two teachers ever met before the Baptism, and John's imprisonment must have followed almost immediately afterwards. From the beginning, moreover, the contrast between the work of Jesus and that of John was the subject of common remark. It was recognized that the new Teacher was not merely continuing the movement of His predecessor, but had begun another movement, different in its aim and character. The facts of the narrative all bear out the only conjecture which is psychologically probable, that Jesus in His years of retirement had already planned out an independent mission. What He owed to the Baptist was merely the occasion of declaring Himself and carrying His purpose into action.

2. We assume, then, that Jesus took up His ministry deliberately, with a programme, more or less definite, already formed in His mind. Was the Messianic claim an original part of this programme? We have here the crucial issue on which the whole question of the plan of Jesus may be said to hinge.

That Jesus declared Himself the Messiah is established beyond all doubt by the fact of His trial and crucifixion. The process against Him can admit of no other explanation than that He had laid open claim to the Messianic office. It has been maintained, however, by several modern writers (e.g. A. Réville) that this claim was an after-thought. The first intention of Jesus was, they say, simply to proclaim the Kingdom of God; and the assumption of Messiahship was forced upon Him by the failure of His original message. In order to retrieve His declining cause, He consented, though against His will, to bring it into line with the national hope, and appeared in Jerusalem as the declared Messiah.

It may indeed be accepted as one of the most certain results of the modern study of the Gospels, that in the earlier part of His ministry Jesus was silent regarding His Messianic claim. But the evidence is almost conclusive that He only held it in reserve, and intended from the first to make it. (1) The Messianic hope was inseparably bound up with the idea of the Kingdom of God. From the moment that He knew Himself called by God to inaugurate the Kingdom, Jesus must have recognized His title to the office of Messiah. No other form was possible, under Jewish modes of thought, by which He might express to Himself His own relation to the Kingdom. (2) The accounts of His earliest teaching all lay stress on the authority with which He spoke, reflecting in His manner of utterance the consciousness of a unique personal dignity (Mt 7²⁹, Mk 12²⁷). This sense of authority is especially marked in the Sermon on the Mount, with its repeated 'I say unto you.' It seems evident that even while confining Himself to the rôle of teacher, Jesus was fully aware that He was much more. As yet He made no open claim to the place of Messiah, but the knowledge that it belonged to Him coloured His whole action and thought. (3) At Cæsarea Philippi, when He at last broke the silence, He elicited a spontaneous confession from His disciples. If the incident has been rightly reported (and few passages in the Gospels bear stronger marks of authenticity), we are compelled to infer that, while concealing His claim, He had only been waiting till the disciples should recognize it of themselves. In His previous intercourse with them He had been leading them, step by step, to this final recognition. His choice of the title 'Son of Man' may have been determined by a like motive. The title was ambiguous, and did not necessarily involve the more explicit title; but it served to awaken reflexion, and to prepare the way for the definite claim to Messiahship.

We are justified, therefore, in concluding that Jesus intended from the first to declare Himself, and that His silence was part of His deliberate plan. The two chief motives that weighed with Him can be gathered, almost with certainty, from the whole tenor of the Gospel narrative. (1) He had resolved on a method of working which would have been impossible if the people had immediately known Him as the Messiah. The Kingdom, as He conceived it, was a spiritual magnitude, and He could fulfil it only by effecting an inward change in the hearts and minds of men. As Messiah, He would have been committed at once to action of a conspicuous nature, and could never have pursued His work of teaching, healing, comforting. The story of the Temptation, which probably rests on some authentic communication of Jesus to His disciples, represents Him as choosing between the two methods of activity which were open to Him at the outset. He decided to trust Himself to the purely spiritual forces, and His silence was the necessary consequence of this decision. (2) He desired to rid the Messianic idea of the national and political character with which the popular imagination had invested it. By assuming the title prematurely He would have awakened false hopes and exposed His mission to a fatal misapprehension. It was necessary, first of all, to create a new ideal in the mind of the people by the revelation of His own character and life. When they had learned to replace their worldly conception of the Messiah by a truer and more spiritual one, He would be able to declare Himself. It was this that happened at last in the case of His immediate followers. Through their intercourse with Jesus they had attained to a higher knowledge of the Divine purposes, and recognized in Him the true Messiah. But 'he charged them that they should tell no man of him' (Mk 8³⁰). The nation as a whole was engrossed with its hope of a political deliverer, and was still incapable of receiving His secret.

Thus far we can regard our Lord as acting consistently on a plan, formed, most probably, before He commenced His public ministry. He knew Himself to be the Messiah, but had determined to conceal His claim until His teaching and His personal influence should produce a change in the minds of His countrymen. It is difficult, however, to avoid the conclusion that from Cæsarea Philippi onward His original plan was set aside. Instead of continuing His chosen work until the whole people should spontaneously confess Him as His own disciples had done, He resolved to go up to Jerusalem and proclaim Himself openly at the Passover feast. That this was the express purpose of His journey to Jerusalem is indicated in the two symbolic acts by which He marked His arrival—the solemn entrance in fulfilment of an unmistakable prophecy (Zec 9⁹), and the cleansing of the Temple by right of His Messianic prerogative. The abrupt transition from a consistent reserve to a studied publicity can be accounted for only on the ground that He had entirely changed His plan. It had become evident to Him that the expectation with which He started had missed its fulfilment. The people, so far from responding to His message, had settled into a mood of apathy or even of declared hostility. There was no longer any purpose in maintaining silence, and He determined to assert Himself at the great gathering of the nation, and bring His Messianic work to a final issue.

3. A question rises here of the profoundest interest and importance. When our Lord decided on this second plan, did He fully realize that it would involve His sacrificial death? To this question we can offer no definite answer. That He contemplated the possibility of His death at Jerusalem appears certain. Apart from the actual statement that He foretold the end to His disciples (Mk 8³¹ 9³¹ 10^{32ff.}),—a statement which may be influenced by later reflexion,—we cannot doubt that He knew the temper of the national authorities, and consciously hazarded His life. His teaching also in that closing period assumes a new character. He no longer speaks of the Kingdom as immediately at hand, but prepares His disciples for an indefinite delay. He dwells much on the thought that whatever may befall Himself, the triumph of His work is certain. But while He surmised, with an ever clearer conviction, that the assertion of His Messiahship would involve His death, it does not appear that He chose death deliberately as necessary to His plan. We may rather infer, from the prayer in Gethsemane, that up to the very end He entertained the possibility of a different fulfilment. This only can be affirmed with entire certainty: that He was resolved to pursue His vocation to the very uttermost, leaving the manner of its final accomplishment in the hands of God.

4. We have dealt hitherto with our Lord's plan as it concerned His personal life and calling; but there is a further problem which cannot well be separated from this one. How did He intend that His work should be completed? How far did He contemplate the world-wide extension of the Christian community after His death? The answer must largely depend on the interpretation of His idea of the Kingdom of God, which is still in many points obscure. If He believed (as is maintained by Bousset, J. Weiss, and other recent writers) that the Kingdom would come almost immediately by a sudden act of God, there could be no anticipation in His mind of the gradual development of a Christian Church. If (as appears more probable) He allowed room for an interval, more or less protracted, before the dawning of the Kingdom, we have still to question whether He planned a development on the lines which were actually followed. The direct allusions to the Church (Mt 16¹⁸ 18¹⁷) bear evident traces of later modification, and it would be hazardous to employ them as the basis of any theory. More consideration is due to the sayings (Mt 8^{11, 12} 21⁴³) which foretell the rejection of Israel and the opening of the Kingdom to those of every nation who were worthy of it. Such thoughts may well have been present to the mind of Jesus, especially in the later days, when the hostility of His own countrymen became more and more decided. It seems clear, however, from numerous indications in the Gospels, that His original plan was confined to a mission to Israel. He chose twelve disciples, with obvious reference to the number of the tribes (cf. Mt 19²⁸ = Lk 22³⁰). He hesitated to exercise His healing power in the Gentile province, lest He might exceed the limits of His mission (Mk 7³⁷). He charged His disciples to avoid the Gentile and Samaritan cities and confine themselves to the 'lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 10^{5, 6}). These indications are all sufficiently explicit; and they are confirmed by the actual history of the primitive Church. Peter and his fellow-Apostles, on the day of Pentecost and long afterwards, were still unaware that their Master desired them to proclaim His message to the wider Gentile world. The mission of Paul was a grave departure from the accepted programme, and was sanctioned only after long and anxious deliberation, and under strict conditions. It could hardly have been so regarded if the disciples had known that such a mission had been contemplated from the first, in the plan of Jesus Himself.

We can only conclude that our Lord made no definite provision for the establishment of an outward Church and its world-wide extension. He delivered His message to His own people, and formed no clear design of a work that should embrace all men. None the less He had entirely broken with Jewish particularism. Even the Messianic title, as claimed by Him, assumed a new meaning in which the traditional patriotic idea was wholly lost. His message was in its spirit universal, and made appeal to that which is permanent and central in our common nature. Whether He consciously planned the future expansion of His Church is not, therefore, a matter of the first importance. He gave the impulse which could not but result after His departure in the work of St. Paul, and in a missionary enterprise which can never know pause or limit. The inward purpose of Jesus, if not His express commandment, is rightly summed up in the closing words of St. Matthew's Gospel: 'Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations.'

PLATTER (παρῳσις, Mt 23²⁵, πίναξ, Lk 11³⁰).—1. The dish.—The words thus translated in the above parallel passages referred probably to the same kind of tray or flat dish. The latter word (pinax) is also translated 'charger' in Mt 14⁸⁻¹¹, Mk 6^{25, 28}. Originally a circular mat about three feet in diameter made of closely woven wheat straw in the natural colour or of variegated pattern, it became a flat, low-rimmed tray of brass or copper, which was laid on the stool or low table around which the family gathered at meals. Similar to this, only with the rim somewhat deepened, are the smaller flat dishes, resembling saucupans, made of glazed earthenware and tinned copper, now used in Palestine for the serving of cooked food. The reference in the texts above quoted was probably to a dish of this sort. It is placed on the large tray, and into it each one at the table dips with a small scoop of thin bread torn from one of the loaves at his side, and thus lifts out the required mouthful of food.

2. Ceremonial reference.—Christ rebuked the artificial scrupulosity that paid more attention to contingencies of ceremonial pollution than to actual and necessary cleanliness. A dish might be soiled with dust and stains, and yet be technically free of impurity, unless it were laid on a table on which, for example, a few drops of milk had previously fallen. The table itself also (Mk 7⁴) had to be washed, not out of regard for simple and wholesome cleanliness, but to avoid the danger of such law-breaking contamination. At the present day, in a house or institution conducted on strictly Rabbinical lines, the utensils for the cooking of meat, and those used in the preparation of milk dishes, must be kept in different parts of the kitchen. This is done not in deference to delicate sensibilities with regard to taste and smell, but because the juxtaposition of such vessels might create a situation in which it would be possible to commit a conjectural infringement of the prohibition against seething a kid in its mother's milk (Dt 14²¹).

Rabbinical legislation with regard to food and dishes, and the relationship of Christ's disciples to such ceremonial pollution, formed one of the first difficulties encountered by the gospel. The concession on the Jewish side was a great testimony to the power of the new life in Christ, for such regulations were taught to Jewish children from infancy, and were commended by the venerated names of teachers who had ingeniously elaborated them. So great was the influence of such teaching, that St. Paul on one occasion remonstrated with his fellow-Apostle Peter for complying with it to the detriment of the gospel, and added, in language of personal compliment while condemning the dissimulation, that even Barnabas was carried away with it (Gal 2¹³ RV). PLAY.—See BOYHOOD, vol. i. p. 222, and GAMES.

PLEASURE.—Not passing pleasure but true happiness is to be sought by the disciple of Christ. Pleasure as such is transitory, but Christian joy and peace are continual and eternal. This life is a preparation for the fruition of eternal happiness, and not merely a series of opportunities for gratification to self and others (Lk 12³⁷). In itself pleasure is not evil, for all things were made by God through His Son (Jn 1³). He sanctioned and sanctified social festivity in due season (Jn 2¹⁻¹¹), and said of Himself, in contrast with the ascetic John the Baptist, 'The Son of Man came eating and drinking' (Mt 11¹⁹). But pleasures are not always expedient, and may work eternal mischief (Lk 8¹⁴). The days of Noah and Lot were days of pleasure and self-indulgence, when God's visitation fell suddenly on the devotees of eating and drinking and marrying (Lk 17^{27, 28}). Such sensual pleasure absorbs too much of man's limited effort to be truly profitable (Jn 6²⁷). The sons of this world lead effortless lives (Lk 20³⁴), but Christ's Kingdom is not of this world (Jn 18³⁶). The citizens of Christ the King must beware of careless indulgence in pleasure, being ready for His sudden presence (Lk 21^{34, 36}). Yet, far more than all this, the pursuit of pleasures is disloyalty, because it is the following after will-o'-the-wisps (as it were) instead of the steadfast regard to the Light of the world (Jn 8^{12, 9}). It is really a folly to accumulate the means of pleasure (Lk 12^{15, 19}); but for the Christian it is treason to pursue pleasure instead of leaving all and following Him (Lk 5¹¹). In return, the Lord has unfulfilling promises of blessedness here and hereafter (Lk 18^{25, 30}, Mk 10^{29, 30}); but the true disciple must renounce everything this world offers, to be counted worthy of the eternal joy (Mt 16²⁴, Mk 8³⁴, Lk 9²³). The sensuous or sensual life of the soul (ψυχῆς) must not be striven after (Mt 16²⁵ 10³⁹, Mk 8³⁵, Lk 9³⁴ 17³³, Jn 12²⁵). All the pleasure the world can afford will never compensate for what is lost in such a pursuit (Mt 16²⁶, Mk 8³⁶, Lk 9²⁵). In this comprehensive statement even intellectual and æsthetic forms of pleasure are included. The habit of daily self-denial is to be adopted (Lk 9²³). No delight in business, however laudable in itself, must rival the call of Christ (Lk 14¹⁸). A dreadful reversal awaits the Dives who clings to the pleasures of this age (Lk 16²⁵). Thus the rich are terribly handicapped in their heavenly course (Mt 19²⁴). The pleasures of this world may secure the horrors of hell (Lk 6²⁵). No, the disciple must be as his Master (Mt 10²⁵). The Master's prayer was always, 'Not what I will, but what thou wilt' (Mk 14³⁶). The pleasures of popularity (Jn 12⁴³) and of ostentation (Mt 6¹⁻¹⁸, Lk 20⁴⁶) are to be avoided. Hand or eye may well be sacrificed for the sake of faithfulness to Christ in the hope of eternal salvation (Mt 5^{29, 30}, Mk 9^{43, 47}). The blessed are those who 'hunger and thirst after righteousness,' not after pleasure (Mt 5⁶). The faithful disciple shall find tribulation rather than pleasure (Jn 16³³), inward peace but an outward sword (Mt 10³⁴), joy rather than enjoyment (Jn 15¹¹ 16²⁰⁻²² 17¹³).

PLOUGH (ἀροτρον).—The plough is mentioned but once in NT (Lk 9⁶²), and the act of ploughing twice (Lk 17⁷, 1 Co 9¹⁰). The Eastern plough appears to have changed but little since ancient times, the oldest representations closely resembling the implement now in use. It is almost entirely of wood, and is of slight construction, the furrow drawn being only 4 or 5 inches deep in light soil. It consists of a pole about 8 ft. long, in two pieces, with a joint in the middle. Through the butt-end is passed downward and made fast a piece of wood about 5 ft. long, the upper end sloping backward to form the handle. The under end is sharpened, and armed with a piece of iron. This serves as both coulter and share. The handle is grasped with the left hand, the right holding the goad to drive and guide the oxen. To the thin end of the pole is attached a crossbar with yokes which drop upon the necks of the oxen, and are fastened by the yoke-bands. See also art. AGRICULTURE in vol. 1., and in Hastings' DB, i. 49^b (where the plough is figured). W. EWING.

POET.—It may seem unnecessary to protest at the outset against the idea of any essential incompatibility of poetry with truth, as if, because a saying is poetry, it lay under the suspicion of being untrue, or even less true than prose. Yet that delusion has done so much harm even in regard to secular writings, that it is necessary to refer to it in the association of poetry with the most sacred writings in the world. The fact is, of course, that poetry is often the only medium of expression for a more direct and larger truth. Many truths are too subtle and too far-reaching to be expressed otherwise; and it was inevitable that God should have chosen to make use of poetry in His supreme revelation. Greek poets were prophets, and Hebrew prophets were poets. In every age and nation the connexion between religion and poetry has been so close that it excites no wonder when Lecky (Hist. of Rationalism, ii. 232, 253, 260) tells us that, in the past, religious dogma has been transformed into poetry, or Matthew Arnold (Essays in Criticism), that in the future this transformation will be complete. It excites no wonder, for these writers were so impressed with the interest and significance of the connexion, that they did less than justice to the equally clear phenomenon of the element of indisputable facts that are permanently claimed by history and by science in the Christian religion.

No definition of poetry is here offered. Matthew Arnold's definition of it as 'a criticism of life' is true, but inadequately true. It is one kind of criticism of life—one which utilizes emotion and imagination in a peculiar way, and often affects the style of utterance in the direction of music, through rhymed or rhythmical utterance more or less deliberate and formal. The result is that subtle and yet unmistakable quality which differentiates poetry from prose, the use of which is an art akin to the graphic arts, yet often unconscious, and generally instinctive rather than deliberate.

That Jesus was in this sense an artist is abundantly manifest. We shall see how in Him the poetic and the graphic qualities blended, and nothing about Him is more evident than the delicate and indeed exquisite sensitiveness, both of body and of mind, which accompanies these qualities. Even in His unusually speedy death (Mk 15⁴⁴) we see the result of an extremely sensitive frame. It was this that led to the constant perversion of His words by coarse-grained and vulgar persons (Jn 2¹⁹), and often led Him to keep silence (Mt 27¹²) when the uncomprehending demanded speech; He knew that whatever He might say, He could not have made them understand Him.

At the beginning of the Gospels we find the story of His life set deep in poetry. The stories of John the Baptist's preaching are full of the poetry of the desert, with its intense visual images of the vipers, the axe, the stones, the fires, and the fan of the wilderness (Mt 3⁹ etc.). The infancy of Jesus is cradled among songs of women and of men, in which the narrative breaks forth into the music of the earliest Christian hymns.

His biographers are poets. The Gospel which gives us by far the most intimate glimpses into His inner life is written by a man who was a poet to the very heart of him. Matthew, himself less poetical, interpolates his narrative with long swinging quotations from the poets of his native land, such as those recorded in 4¹²⁻¹⁶, or that tender and appropriate fragment from Isaiah concerning the bruised reed, introduced with so great a pathos in 12²⁰. Even Mark, the most prosaic and almost curiously practical of them, is turned into a poet when he is writing the life of Jesus. The simple pathos of such a word as 'When he thought thereon he wept' (14⁷²), or the sudden reminder that Jesus in the wilderness of His temptation had for His companions the wild beasts and the angels (1¹³), are inimitable.

It has been wisely said that all children are poets, and indeed there is no poetry so pure as that of the naïveté of the little child. Of the childhood of Jesus we know practically nothing but what He retained of its spirit through later years. In a very true sense the childhood of Jesus lasted to the end, and He retained a child's heart through all His years. Children knew this when He was near them, and seem to have come to Him without hesitation (Mt 18²) as to one of themselves. No doubt one bond between them and Him was that directness of vision and of thought and speech which characterized both. But the poetry of their minds and hearts must also be remembered.

Thus it came to pass that the Kingdom of God which He established was proclaimed as the Kingdom of the child (Mt 19¹⁴); He quoted a prophetic verse in confirmation of His saying that the praise of God was made perfect by passing through infant lips (Ps 8², Mt 21¹⁶); He thanked His Father specially for revealing to the instinctive minds of babes, truths which were unattainable by the wise and prudent (Lk 10²¹); and, in the finest reference of all, He told how the angels of the children dwell in heaven, always beholding the face of the Father (Mt 18¹⁰). When to these utterances we add the fact that He was interested in the very human children who played and quarrelled in the marketplace at their games of marriages and funerals (Mt 11¹⁶), we have said enough to show very plainly His sympathy with the poetry of childhood.

Arrived at manhood, and having thoughts within Him that had long been struggling for utterance, and had now come to their hour, Jesus deliberately chose poetic forms of language as the medium of His speech. The characteristic mould in which Hebrew poetry was cast, was not rhythm as in the Greek and Roman poems, nor rhyme in the later Western fashion. It was a kind of measured antithesis, in which, in each saying, there was a fall balancing the rise. This antithetic balancing is seen in most of Jesus' sayings. Each of the Beatitudes in Mt 5 illustrates this mode, while v. 12 of the same chapter adopts the more complex form of the balanced triplet instead of couplet.*

It is true that poetry, and art in general, are very far indeed from being wholly matters of expression. There is to-day a renewal of the thoroughly unreasonable fashion of exaggerating the importance of manner in art, until the matter has come to be considered a negligible quantity. While both elements must be recognized, it will eventually be found that Johnson was far nearer the truth when he said that it was impossible for a man to be 'the good poet without first being the good man,' than those for whom style is everything and matter wholly unimportant. You do not make poetry out of prose by dividing it into antithetic or other kinds of couplets. There is, besides the form, the subtle spirit, and much more, that really determines the classification. Yet, when all this is admitted, it remains true that form has much effect on matter, and there is an inevitable and strong reaction of the style upon the thought expressed. Thus when Jesus chose the poetic forms of His day and nation for the utterance of His speech, He drew it more and more completely within the line of poetry.

If it be true that it is not the form alone that distinguishes poetic literature from prosaic, it is equally true that it is not the matter alone. Apart from what is said, and from the literary medium through which it is expressed, there is what we have called a 'subtle spirit' which emanates from the temperament of a writer and gives the poetic quality of the writing. It is an elusive spirit to those who would define it in scientific terms, and it can only be appreciated in concrete example by those who are themselves in sympathy with it. All poets write for poets and for poets only; they count upon the poetic intelligence of their readers, and shrink back into silence when in the society of those in whom that sense is deficient. Yet there are two elements which certainly are never absent from the spirit in question, and which may be taken as essential to the building up of poetic work. These are a certain kind of emotion and of imagination, not (as we have said) definable, but unmistakable by all who are in sympathy with the poetic mood of mind.

The mention of emotion in this connexion recalls inevitably the famous definition of religion as 'morality touched with emotion' (M. Arnold, Lit. and Dogma, ch. ii.). It is indeed a meagre and inadequate conception of religion. Yet there is a large element of truth in it, and the emotional element in all true religion allies it with poetry.

That the temperament of Jesus was in the highest way emotional, is so familiar a fact that it needs little dwelling on. Christ as man of feeling is almost too well known. Perhaps we should rather say misknown, for anything of that sentimentality which vulgar minds are accustomed to associate with Him is entirely absent from Him. His emotion is always reticent and controlled, and when it finds expression, it is always utterly real and virile, without a touch of either the fantastic or the effeminate. A splendid example of the sensitive response to emotion which produces literary effect of the most delicate though unconscious poetic quality, is to be found in the story of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15). From the beginning to verse 24 no one can fail to feel the rising exhilaration, an effect manifestly produced by the corresponding crescendo in the narrator's feeling. Suddenly, on the entrance of the elder brother, all is damped down, and the story drags itself to the close like a stricken thing.

* This subject is discussed and illustrated in Griffenhoofe's Unwritten Sayings of Jesus; and in Briggs' articles in the Expository Times, viii. [1897] 393, 452, 492, ix. 69, which, however, carry the matter further than all readers will be prepared to follow the author.

There are many signs of the ebb and flow of feeling in connexion with the events of Jesus' own experience. At the critical moments of His life this is naturally most noticeable. There is the outburst on the occasion of His first appearance in the synagogue of Nazareth, with the memories of thirty years behind the exhilaration. One can feel yet the thrill of the opening quotation, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me,' etc. (Lk 4¹⁸ quoted from Is 61¹). Correspondingly deep is the depression manifest in His first intimation to His disciples of the inevitable cross whose shadow had begun to lie upon His path. In the words, 'Likewise shall also the Son of Man suffer of them' (Mt 17¹²), there is an almost intolerable pathos. But the cross, as it came nearer, changed its aspect for Him, and as He entered on its terrific pathway at the end, one hears a shout of exultation, almost of laughter, in the words recorded in Jn 12²³⁻³¹, when we are told that He 'rejoiced in spirit.' Yet unmistakable though these instances are, there is even a more poignant emotion in such little casual touches as the contrast between the homelessness He felt and the homes of foxes and of birds (Mt 8²⁰); or in such a wayside incident as that in which He defended the woman who 'hath wrought a fine work upon me' (26¹⁰), and whose gracious deed affected Him as with the breath of burial spices.

Countless instances, and those of many kinds, might be gathered from His speech to others. The gardener's pity for the fig-tree (Lk 13⁸) is a real touch of nature. When He addresses the dead damsel in the homely Aramaic tongue (Mk 5⁴¹), we have the same tone in which a northern peasant of our own land might say 'Lassie!' Nor can we omit those words which must have seemed to the disciple to whom they were spoken to gather up together all the tenderness of boyish memories with that of grown man's patient suffering, 'When thou wast young, thou girdest thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldst; but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not' (Jn 21¹⁸).

Perhaps the point at which the emotion of Jesus reaches its deepest fulness and tenderness of suggestion is in regard to the men and women of His nation. The metaphor of the hen and her brood (Lk 13³⁴) was spoken with sobs. But the figure round which His emotion unquestionably gathered most of all was the favourite Israelite figure of the shepherd and the sheep. The OT image repeated by later prophets from 1 K 22¹⁷ ('I saw all Israel scattered upon the hills as sheep that have no shepherd') had evidently touched His heart most deeply. Carlyle points out in his Essay on Burns how the shepherd instinct of the poet puts him in the place of the suffering sheep; and it was the same instinct which drew from Ps 23, and from the passage above quoted, so rich and wonderful a shepherd poetry as the sayings of Jesus afford. He knows the ways and the folding of the flock (Jn 10^{4, 16}). He is touched with compassion for those lost ones of the House of Israel who are as sheep without a shepherd (Mt 9³⁶ 15²⁴). His Good Shepherd is seen in such detail as only the pitiful heart could have suggested, 'leaving the ninety and nine in the wilderness' (Lk 15⁴, Mt 18¹²), and 'going into the mountains' in search of the wanderer. When the Shepherd is smitten, the sheep will be scattered abroad (Mt 26³¹), nevertheless He will 'go before them into Galilee' (Mk 16⁷), bringing the scattered flock home.

These proofs of Christ's emotion are very familiar, but His imagination has received less attention, and to it we shall devote a somewhat more minute study. That it was strongly in evidence is sufficiently proved by the fact that some of the Jews on one occasion took Him to be a devil-possessed Samaritan (Jn 8⁴⁸). Nothing could be a surer tribute to imagination than this judgment of the unimaginative. His actual experiences, His memories of past events, and His thoughts about even abstract truth, alike presented themselves in images to His mind. Generally the images were visual, and sometimes they were extremely vivid in outline. He thought in pictures, which rose either from what He had actually seen, or spontaneously in His imagination.

Scenes from the life—plant and animal—of nature occur in all His parables, and in very many sayings, which show the exactness and sympathy of His observations. The whitening harvest fields of the fertile valley of Samaria (4³⁵), sparsely dotted with the few labourers whose brilliant garments shone like flowers among the corn, is one of the very few instances of landscape in His descriptions of nature. The mountain-lands of both the north and south attracted Him, and it is striking to find Him making straight for the highlands of Galilee when His task of life was over (Mt 23¹⁰⁻¹⁶). But more frequently it is a clear-cut piece of detail that He sees, sharp-edged and complete in itself. A spring of living water (Jn 4¹⁰), the trackless mystery of the night wind (3⁸), salt shining white upon the off-hill heap where it had been thrown out as savourless (Lk 14³⁴⁻³⁵), two sparrows sold for a farthing (Mt 10²⁹), are wayside pictures which He has engraved on the imagination of the world. His favourite image was characteristic of that land where there were few forests, but where the single tree was so precious, either for shadow or for fruit (cf. W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites). His images of single trees,—the vine, the fig, and the olive,—with their roots, branches, leaves, all seen as it were in detail, will occur to every reader (Mt 12³³ etc., Jn 15¹ etc., Mt 21¹⁹, Mk 13²⁸, Lk 13⁹). One of the finest and tenderest of all His imaginative descriptions is that mere touch of artistry which gives us in a flash the life of the reeds bending before desert winds (Mt 11⁷).

The picturesqueness of His metaphors is very great. From the peaceful joy of the children of the bridechamber (9¹⁵) to the storming of the Kingdom by the violent (11¹²), we pass through a wonderful gallery of vivid scenes. Who can tell what great tableaux were before His mind's eyes as He said such words as these—'the Son of Man is come to give his life a ransom for many' (20²⁸); 'for crisis have I come into the world' (Jn 9³⁹); 'I have overcome the world' (16³³). One figure has become so familiar through His use of it that we have almost forgotten that it is a metaphor—the figure of the cup (Mt 20²², Lk 22^{20, 42}, Jn 18¹¹). Three times He saw His appointed destiny in life under the image of a cup held to His hands or lips by the Father's hand; and Christendom, and indeed the world, has taken over the beautiful and great symbol.

No finer instances of His visual intensity of imagination could be quoted than those which refer to the play of light and darkness. Such references recur like a sort of chorus from beginning to end of His work; and it is not without significance that the stories of the healing of the blind are told in such detail. This imagination blazes out in full splendour in the magnificent sentence, 'I am the light of the world' (Jn 8¹²), and the figure is sustained and strengthened by the assurance that those who believe in the light become 'children of light' (12³⁶)—i.e. themselves radiant, their upturned faces having caught and reflected the light to which they were turned. This is rendered all the more brilliant by the intense consciousness of darkness to which it is in opposition. John, in his description of the departure of Judas from the upper room (13³⁰), significantly adds, 'and it was night.' In the same way Jesus utilizes the sudden contrast between the flashing lamps of the banquet-room, reflected from the vessels and from the white garments of the guests, with the 'outer darkness' of the unlit street (Mt 25³⁰). To realize the full brilliance of this contrast we must remember that the rooms had windows only into the courtyard, and the street walls were of blank unpierced masonry. The thought of darkness always moved Christ to a kind of horror. No condition was described by Him with such frequency or with such depth of feeling as that of those who 'had no light in them' (Jn 11¹⁰), or who deliberately loved and chose darkness in preference to light (Jn 3¹⁹). 'How great is that darkness!' (Mt 6²³) He exclaims with a shuddering pause. He hastened men's work by the reminder of the night coming 'when no man can work' (Jn 9⁴), and as we read we feel the helplessness of hands folded in the dark. When His captors and their traitor guide had come upon Him, looking through the torchlight upon their faces, He said that this was 'the power of darkness' (Lk 22⁵³).

His words abound in bright little sketch-pictures of the life and labours of men—etched, one might almost say, upon the margins of the Gospels. 'Fishers of men' (Mk 1¹⁷), one with his hand upon the plough-handles but his head turned back (Lk 9⁶²), some with loins girt and lamps burning, waiting for the sound of their master's returning footsteps (12^{35, 36}), another 'strong and fully armed' (11²¹)—these are among the countless images which will recur to every reader. The hair upon men's heads is not vaguely referred to—it is seen as black or white (Mt 5³⁶); the water in the cups they carry is cold water (10⁴²). The pictures He draws, as in a flash, of the unconscious busy life of men and women before the most terrific catastrophes, show an extraordinary vivacity (Lk 17^{27, 28}); and there is a wonderful perfectness about the description of the farmer's life, 'as if a man should cast seed into the ground; and should sleep and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how' (Mk 4²⁷). There is little colour in His pictures, and the rich man 'in purple and fine linen' (Lk 16¹⁹) is exceptional; but nothing could surpass the brightness of the scene where the King pauses as he comes to see the feast, his looks arrested by the dullness of the everyday garment in the midst of the shining raiment of his wedding guests (Mt 22¹¹). Not less remarkable, though of a very different kind, are such realistic pictures as that of the blind leading the blind into the ditch (Lk 6³⁹).

These are simple pictures, but sometimes His poetry is more elaborate. In the old Welsh songs there was a curious device by which, for mnemonic purposes perhaps, the lines of story or sentiment were interlined with references to nature, concerning the reeds in the water or the wind in the trees. Was it perhaps with the same instinct that Jesus interwove the three denials of St. Peter with the two crowings of the cock (Mk 14³⁰)? But some of the images are themselves complex. How subtle, for example, is the imaginative insight that first described 'the branch abiding in the vine' (Jn 15¹)! Again, who but the rarest of poets would have imagined the birds sowing, reaping, and gathering into barns (Mt 6²⁶), or have separated in thought the idea of the lily and its robes, the flower 'clothing itself according to its nature,' or rather 'God clothing the grass of the field (6³⁰)'? In reference to this nature-work, Dr. Sanday contrasts Tennyson's 'Flower in the crannied wall' with the passage about the lily just quoted. 'The one,' he says, 'gives utterance to a far-off, unattainable dream or wish—the other is the expression of perfect insight and knowledge; it is not an aspiration after a glimpse of God's working in nature, but a clear unbounded vision of that working.' Thus is the Divinity of Jesus seen most plainly in His exquisite naïveté, the simpleness rather than the grandeur of His poetic vision; and we learn of Him 'not by a planet's rush but a rose's birth.'

Occasionally the images are elaborated into a pageantry, but this is generally held in check. The triumphal entry into Jerusalem was the one actual pageant which He sanctioned; and that was only after the days of His life were numbered, that the memory of the spectacle might impress men, and when it could lead to no revolutionary consequences among enthusiastic crowds (Mt 21¹ etc.). His disciples wanted the spectacular, and perhaps even missed it in His fellowship. The request of two of them for places on His right hand and on His left (Mk 10³⁷) hints at gorgeous dreams on their part. Its appeal to Himself is portrayed in the temptation of the pinnacle of the Temple (Mt 4⁵), whose meaning undoubtedly was a magical display before the eyes of wondering crowds. Occasionally, as we said, He permitted His images this elaboration into pageantry. Now and then the canvas is crowded with angels. 'Twelve legions of angels' wait upon His prayer to the Father (26⁵³); and by those who look with opened eyes, angels may be seen daily 'ascending and descending upon the Son of Man' (Jn 1⁵¹). The twelve Apostles are seen seated on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19²⁸), and for them and for all believers there are 'many mansions' in the Father's house (Jn 14²). As to the connexion between the earthly and the heavenly life, whatsoever they bind or loose on earth shall be bound or loosed in heaven (Mt 16¹⁹). The accounts (Mt 24) of His Second Coming are among the most difficult parts of the New Testament. But, however their details may be interpreted, they are brilliantly poetic flame-pictures which gather up into themselves much of the wild beauty and wonder of the apocalyptic imagination then so universal. A favourite scene is that of the Son of Man sitting on the clouds of heaven (26⁶⁴); but a sublimer picture is that which the same Son of Man draws of Himself standing ashamed among His angels because of the pusillanimous spirit of some of His followers (Mk 8³⁸). Nor could anything surpass the brilliance of the scene where 'the righteous shine forth as the sun' (Mt 13⁴³), and we seem to see great shafts of light as the cloud rack of Judgment Day passes, and past its flaming edge are seen the seats of the glorified spirits in heaven.

It need not surprise us when we find the imagination of Jesus reaching its climax of realistic vividness in the field of the weird and the ghastly. It is a tragic world, and he who, with his imagination in free play, dares to confront its facts impartially, will certainly see and tell gruesome things. There is, accordingly, frequent reference to loathsome things, whose loathsomeness had evidently affected Him. A serpent or a scorpion among food (Mt 7¹⁰, Lk 11¹²), a foul cup or platter whose exterior gave promise of cleanliness (Mt 23²⁵), the corruption of moth and rust among treasures of garments or metal (6¹⁹), are among His casual notes of observation. More deliberate and (as it were) classical are such sayings as that about the carcase and the vultures (24²⁸), and the vipers crawling towards the flames (23³³). The bitterness of the spiritual life is driven in almost upon our senses as we read that every sacrifice must be 'salted with fire' (Mk 9⁴⁹), that He is come to bring not peace, but a sword (Mt 10³⁴), and that only those who eat His flesh and drink His blood can claim to have life in them (Jn 6⁵³). The same rises to its height in the wild picture presented in the words, 'I am come to cast fire on the earth; and what will I, if it be already kindled?' (Lk 12⁴⁹); while the whole of His reference to Mammon (Mt 16⁹ etc.) is so realistic that it used to be imagined that this was the name of some Syrian god, such as G. F. Watts has painted, with bloody feet and hands pashing out the life of humanity.

Among the most conspicuous of His images of the ghastly, are two that are drawn from human life. The first is that of the cross-bearers (Mt 10³⁸). It is but too easy to ascertain whence this suggestion must have come, for men bearing crosses to the public places of execution were common enough in Palestine under the Romans. So we have from Jesus the weirdest of all allegorical pictures of the noble life. It is a procession of men bearing crosses, and Himself at its head. The procession is not staggering in weakness along the Via Dolorosa to Calvary. It is winding its way through the sunshine, by the waters of Galilee, in and out of villages where men are working, and women standing by wells, and children playing in the streets. The other figure is that of a spectral funeral procession, in which the dead are burying the dead (8²²). The phrase has become proverbial, but the imaginary scene in which it originated is surely one of the ghastliest. The corpse of a dead man is being carried to its tomb, but in place of the many-coloured robes of an Eastern funeral there are but shrouds like his own in the cortege; and the march of limbs bloodless and stark, and the sunlight falling upon closed eyes, are images which we may well believe never ceased to haunt the minds of those who first shuddered at them. We are not here concerned with the lessons which these images conveyed. They are among the most important of all His teachings, and the point to note is that He drove them deep into the imagination of His hearers by the most daring and unrelieved use of the ghastly.

Nature, too, lent her sinister suggestion. The sea was always an object of fear and hatred to the Jews. It was strange to them, as to all inland nations, and for many centuries they were never permitted to become familiar with it on account of the Philistine and Phœnician Gentiles, who held its harbours and its coast. In later days it was significant to them chiefly as the path of the invaders, whose maritime base for Syria was conspicuous from many mountains of Israel at Cæsarea. Only on a very few occasions does Jesus refer to it, and always in ominous suggestion. He speaks of some who compass sea and land to obtain proselytes, only that they may make them children of hell (Mt 23¹⁵). Again, He speaks of a scyamine-tree or a mountain being removed by faith and cast into the sea, as a thing stupendous and silencing (Lk 17⁶). The most appalling doom that can be set against the sin of injuring His little ones, and which were still better for the injurer than what actually awaits him, is to be cast into the sea with a millstone about his neck to hold him among the wreckage and slime of decaying things in its bottom ooze (Mt 18⁶). Amid the terrors of the latter Day of Judgment we hear the booming of the breakers as a terrifying undertone—'the sea and the waves roaring' (Lk 21²⁵).

Nothing in nature strikes so cold a fear into the imagination as that strange and sinister combination which has been called 'the beauty and the terror of the world.' In the sweetest sunshine and under the purest light of stars, lurk ever the savage cruelties and the obscene putrefactions of earth. This also Jesus noted when He spoke of 'the whited sepulchres' (Mt 23²⁷)—the brightest spots, on many a sunny landscape of the East, yet suggesting a condition of physical horror within, which it needs experience to realize. But the utmost extreme of poetic power of this sort is felt in the sudden introduction of the picture of a fig-tree, blossoming peacefully in the full beauty of its leafage, into the midst of the magnificent horrors of the picture of the Day of Judgment (24³²).

The person of the devil is very frequently present to the mind of Jesus, and generally he is addressed or spoken of without imagery. At other times, however, he is portrayed as a princely figure—'prince of this world'—who vainly comes to find his own in Him (Jn 14³⁰), and who is, by the Cross, cast out from his dominion (12³¹). There is one picture, from which Bunyan probably drew some of the imagery of his Holy War, of an attack by the Lords of Hell upon the fortress of the Church (Mt 16¹⁸). And once, in an hour of triumph, Jesus 'saw Satan fall as lightning from heaven' (Lk 10¹⁸).

Yet no victory of Good over Evil is ever complete on earth, and a deep horror remains, haunting the mind as it thinks of those who persistently refuse the Good and choose the Evil. Nowhere has this horror been more manifest than in the speech of Christ, who tells men to 'fear him that hath power to destroy both soul and body in hell, yea, fear him!' (12⁵). He uses several figures to express this horror, all of them borrowed from the OT and its conceptions. Now it is 'the outer darkness' (Mt 8¹²) of the unlit street which serves for an image of it; again, it is the offal-heaps of the valley of Jehoshaphat, and the fires which were always consuming them (Mk 9⁴⁴ etc.). But, for the most part, His imagination pictures the abyss of Sheol, with the 'great gulf fixed' (Lk 16²⁶) between it and the home of Abraham. It is an image closely connected with that of the 'nether deep,' into whose dreary vastness the demons pray that they may not be sent (8³¹). It is suggestive of the homeless, empty spaces beyond the ramparts of the world, where in the thick darkness there is the sound of 'weeping and gnashing of teeth' (Mt 8¹² etc.). The words are repeated again and again until we seem to hear the low sound of that wailing which Dante heard within the gates of the Inferno. It is the undertone of horror which, even among merely human poets, is ever heard beneath the laughter and the voices of the world. But none has heard it and told the sound with the mingled pity and horror of the words of Jesus.

Hitherto we have noticed only the clear-cut character of the imaginative work of Jesus. But there is another side to this—a vagueness and a sense of transcending all limits and definitions—which is, as it were, the poetic obverse of the clear edge. This also enters into the true conception of the mind of Christ.

Both in regard to space and time His delight in room, and the spaciousness of His thought are evident. The most familiar example in regard to time is the much disputed word aiónios (Mt 19²⁹ 25⁴⁶ etc.). The whole point of that phrase is taken from it when it becomes a pawn in the game of theological disputation. It neither fixes the furthest limit at eternity, nor denies that the stretch is eternal. In it the mind simply flings itself out into the future, and is aware of the flowing river of the ages. It is the poetic and didactic, but not the dogmatic, purpose that is aimed at and that is accomplished. The sense of enormous duration is given with almost aching realization. The hope or the denial of a terminus ad quem is not given.

His allusions to vague and immense spaces are so numerous as to reveal a strongly marked and favourite habit of imagination. He seems to delight in the width of the world for the mere feeling of its roominess. The sound of a trumpet (Mt 24³¹) is heard, and a flash of lightning seen (Lk 17²⁴) from one end of heaven to the other. Even in His reference to the birds and the lilies, already quoted (Mt 6²⁸), He is not satisfied till He has added 'of the air' and 'of the field' (8²⁰). In these mere touches the whole expanse of sky and earth opens and broadens to the horizon as we read. They are the subtle touches which only a poet's mind would give. Again, one feature of the Kingdom to which He frequently alludes is the journeying of ancient people and of those of later days across huge distances of the world (8¹¹). 'They shall come from the east and from the west,' to sit down at the table of Abraham, and the elect shall be gathered from the four winds of heaven (24³¹). His memories of the OT recall remote nooks and crannies of the world—the far-off home of the Queen of the South (12⁴⁵), Sodom and Gomorrah, Tyre and Sidon (Lk 10^{12, 13}), and Nineveh (Mt 12⁴¹). Many of the people of His parables are travellers who go long distances and return (Mk 13³⁴ etc.), and He speaks of Himself, in one of the most wistful of all His utterances, as 'a man going a journey into a far country' (Mt 25¹⁴). These allusions are not of so much significance in themselves as in their revelation of the stretch and travel instinct in the mind of Jesus. They become splendidly significant when we remember them in connexion with such other sayings as that about the Father who 'maketh his sun to rise on the evilmind and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust' (6⁴⁵); and that also about the other sheep which the Good Shepherd has which 'are not of this fold,' which also He must bring, that there may be one flock and one shepherd (Jn 10¹⁶). In that promise there is the whole breadth of His heart, who looks across the world and counts it all His pasture ground. This whole habit of His mind throws out into strong relief the spirituality of Jesus, to which it offers a sort of parallel in the region of the physical as against the literalism and preciseness of the Pharisees. While He was out among 'the ages,' they were wrangling as to the number of stars visible which marked the hour of evening; while they were settling the inches permissible for a Sabbath-day's journey, His heart was gathering disciples from the ends of the earth.

Spirituality and poetry are connected in the most intimate way, and the remembrance that Jesus was a poet may lead us past many futile controversies and into many illuminative interpretations. Two results may be selected as of very special value to the understanding of the mind of Christ.

1. His use of hyperbole.—Both His laws and His gospel have suffered many things at the hands of prosaic literalists. There are few things, for instance, which have been more confusing and harmful of late years than the perversions of Christianity which literalists have extracted from the Sermon on the Mount. Even to those who are willing to accept the doctrine thus presented in its naked literalness, it becomes but a counsel of perfection, and life in every act of Christian service leads down a blind alley, until the discouragement of constant and inevitable failure becomes altogether intolerable. But on those who are repelled by the doctrine, the effect is even more serious. To them Christ appears a doctrinaire teacher, whose precepts have created an impossible situation; and they turn, not from the doctrines only, but from Him.

The fact is that the poet's exaggeration is the only way in which many truths can be expressed at all. Life is far too complex for any words that men have found in which to describe it. Spiritual things have no adequate language which corresponds to them; and the only way in which such truths can be communicated is by stating one side of them with such startling strength and vividness that that phase of truth at least shall never be forgotten. Of this fact Christ took the most fearless and unquestioning advantage, trusting wholly to the sympathetic intelligence of His hearers. Even in trifles He acted thus. The seed of the mustard plant is not the smallest of all seeds (Mt 13³²), and there is no necessity for the zeal of commentators who would search for some unheard-of variety of mustard whose seeds are smaller than the spore of ferns. No one would have been more amazed at such defence of His veracity than He who spoke the words. In the same way is to be understood the saying, 'This is my body' (Lk 22¹⁹ etc.); and if Luther had allowed himself to perceive this most obvious of truths, what a world of unnecessary controversy would have been spared to the Church! Such licence is demanded, not for poetry only, but for the very continuance of human intercourse, which otherwise would at once become a mere interchange of pedantries. In the same way are to be interpreted such passages as that about the hatred of father and mother (14²⁶), and many of those commands about property, non-resistance (Mt 5³⁸ etc.), etc., which have been so grievous and so unwarrantable a stumbling-block to faith in modern times.

2. These considerations reach their highest value when we remember that in the teaching of Jesus there is the spiritual idealism of the poet. The incident of His praise of Mary rather than of Martha (Lk 10⁴²) has not unjustly claimed His sympathies for the dreamers and the mystics whose world is that of the ideal truth. At times this spiritual exaltation showed itself in physical effects which were recognized by onlookers. As He walked, they were amazed and afraid (Mk 10³²). It explains many of His wonderful sayings. Without it, that strange journey of the disciples would be wholly unintelligible, when they were to provide neither scrip, nor money, nor even shoes, nor any possessions but their peace (Mt 10⁹⁻¹⁰). Similarly must be regarded the command to take no thought for the morrow, neither for food nor for clothes (6³⁴). These are ideal descriptions, not meant for the ears of literalists, but describing that world of spiritual conceptions in which His spirit dwelt. With these may be compared the exacting spirituality of His doctrine of marriage (19⁴⁷), which He Himself supplemented by the further statement that in the next world the life of the angels supersedes marriage altogether (Lk 20³⁶), and which leads on to St. Paul's association of the marriage bond with the union of Christ and His Church (Eph 5²² etc.). Such doctrine, He Himself declares, is for them that can receive it (Mt 19¹¹⁻¹²). And indeed the whole of Christianity introduces men into an ideal world which does not at all correspond to the actual world of public life, and towards which the individual Christian is but now feeling his way in isolated points of character. It is a life to lead with one's soul commanding and guiding the body. That is, if one has a soul; for Christ (in His poetic fashion) refuses to take it for granted that a man necessarily has a soul because he is a man, and reminds us that each man's soul has to be won (Lk 21¹⁹). But for those who have souls, and are willing to live lives corresponding to them rather than to the flesh, Christ constructs an ideal world in which all things have suffered a 'change into something rich and strange.' The heaven is God's throne, and the earth His footstool (Mt 5³⁴⁻³⁵). The body is a temple where the spirit dwells (Jn 2¹⁹). The life is sustained by spiritual food which even the closest friends know not of (4^{32, 34}). To live that life is to be citizens of the Kingdom which is within (Lk 17²¹) and of the other world (Jn 18³⁶), and which cometh not with observation (Lk 17²⁰)—the Kingdom of the truth (Jn 18³⁷). The worship of such souls is in spirit and in truth (4²⁴), and their work is to believe (6²⁹).

That ideal world—so far ahead of the most spiritual of us all, yet so persistently claiming us as its children and beckoning us to the courageous renewal of our broken attempts to reach it—is a world which could have been constructed for man only by God incarnate in One who was a poet.

POLICE.—The traditional and unsettled character of governmental relations in Palestine in the time of Christ, and the scarcity of definite information as to the organization of civil procedure in the provincial courts, make it difficult to ascertain exactly what were the ordinary provisions for the administration of justice. We cannot positively say, for instance, how far the earlier methods which obtained under Jewish custom were overshadowed, and at times overridden, by the interference of Roman and military law. One fact, however, seems to emerge, viz., that as a rule, and as a matter of policy on the part of the Romans, the Jewish courts were left free to administer justice in their own way, and were permitted to retain a sufficient force of subordinate officers to execute the ordinary penalties of the law. It would only be in times of considerable disturbance, or in cases of the extreme penalty, that the Imperial power would come into evidence, and that soldiers would supplant the usual civil officers. 'The ordinary administration of the law, both in criminal and civil matters, was left in the hands of the native and local courts' (Schürer, HJP i. ii. 57). Generally, it may be safely affirmed, the Mosaic law still formed for the Jew the basis on which all such administration was conducted; justice was a department of religion, and the officers employed in its execution were Temple officials or servants of the local Sanhedrin.

There were two considerable exceptions to this rule—one arising from the arbitrary way in which the Herods exercised their power, and the other due to the invasion of Hellenistic ideas. In a city like Tiberias, e.g., where the Greek element was very large, administration was on the Greek model. The city had a council (βουλή) of 600 members (Jos. BJ ii. xxi. 9), with such officers as archon, hyparchoi, agoranomos, etc. (see Schürer, HJP ii. i. 145). The Greek cities of the Decapolis, while their local authorities were always liable to be superseded by the Imperial power (G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 605), had 'communal freedom, their own councils, . . . the right of property and administration in the surrounding districts' (ib. p. 594). Even in purely Jewish towns, Greek influence was modifying the old usage. The large number of Greek and Latin words found in the Mishna (Schürer, HJP ii. i. 31-32) shows that after the 1st cent. A.D. the example of Hellenic institutions was producing a change in the methods of conducting civil government; and already in the Gospels we find traces of this, e.g., in the passage in which Jesus makes His most explicit reference to the processes of law (Mt 5^{25, 26} = Lk 12⁵⁸): whereas Mt. uses terms which indicate Jewish usage (κρίσις, ὑπηρέτης), Lk. employs as equivalents words which suggest the Roman procedure (ἀρχων, πρῶκτωρ); see below, and cf. Holtzmann, Hand-Com. in loco. In Mt 5²² ('Every one who is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council') Jesus is referring to the ordinary Jewish courts, the 'judgment' (κρίσις) being the 'provincial court of seven' (see EGT, in loc., and below), the 'council' the Sanhedrin.

In Jerusalem there appear to have been two stipendiary magistrates, who were precluded from engaging in other occupations, and whose special province it was to superintend the observance of the police regulations of the city (see Edersheim, LT ii. p. 287). The 'Unjust Judge' of Lk 18¹⁻⁸ is probably an instance of a provincial police magistrate; but, while his unprincipled character is only too typical of Oriental judges, past and present (cf. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Christ, p. 158), it is not to be inferred from this parable that Jesus intended to reflect on the administration of justice as a whole. The usual number of judges for each city was, in accordance with ancient custom, seven (Jos. Ant. iv. viii. 14). Josephus, when in Galilee, 'appointed seven judges in every city to hear the lesser quarrels; for, as to the greater causes and those wherein life and death were concerned, he enjoined they should be brought to him and the seventy elders' (BJ ii. xx. 5).

The Mishna assumes the existence throughout the country of local Sanhedrins which possess very considerable powers. It is to these local Sanhedrins that Jesus makes reference when He tells His disciples: 'Beware of men, for they will deliver you up to councils' (Mt 10¹⁷ = Mk 13⁹). The supreme court was the Great Sanhedrin of Jerusalem, before which Jesus was tried, and in this body the religious and hierarchical character of the Jewish courts of justice was naturally more clearly preserved than elsewhere. They had under their control a body of Temple police, who were Levites, and were under the command of στρατηγῶν, at whose head was an officer called στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ (Jos. Ant. xx. vi. 2; BJ vi. v. 3; Ac 4^{5, 24}; the plural is used in Lk 22^{4, 52}). The latter office was one which would be no sinecure, the numbers of people who thronged the Temple courts, even at ordinary times, being so great as to necessitate special provisions for keeping order. These Temple police were not armed or regularly trained; 'the greater part of them were unarmed and unskilled in the affairs of war' (Jos. BJ iv. iv. 6; cf. Edersheim, LT ii. p. 540). During the great feasts the Temple was guarded by a Roman cohort, which was stationed in the Tower of Antonia (BJ v. v. 8). The force which arrested Jesus in Gethsemane clearly consisted of two parts: (1) a detachment of the Roman garrison; (2) a body of Temple police (Jn 18³; Westcott, in loc.). As to the guard which watched the tomb (Mt 27^{65, 66} 28¹¹⁻¹⁵), there is room for doubt whether this was a small body of soldiers detached by Pilate at the request of the Sanhedrin, or a band of the Temple gendarmerie. Pilate's words, ἔχετε κουστῶδιαν (27⁶⁵), are capable equally of the interpretation, 'Take a guard' or 'Ye have a guard.' The fact that they report to the chief priests (Mt 28¹¹) suggests that they were the satellites of the Sanhedrin, and that Pilate scornfully permitted them to use their own measures; but v. 13 'If this come to the governor's ears,' is in favour of the other interpretation.

The usual name for the officers charged with the execution of the law and the maintenance of order is ὑπηρέτης (Mt 5²⁵, Jn 7^{32, 45, 46} 18^{3, 12}). It may be variously translated 'apparitor,' 'serjeant,' or 'warder.' They had the duty, among others, of inflicting the punishment of scourging (Mt 10¹⁷ = Mk 13⁹, Mt 23³⁴). Josephus says that each judge had two ὑπηρέται assigned to him (Ant. IV. viii. 14); but in this passage the word probably means 'clerks' rather than police constables. That the powers of the latter were extensive is evident from the drastic measures taken by Saul as the commissioner of the Sanhedrin in his persecution of the followers of Christ (Ac 8³ 26^{10, 11}; cf. 5¹⁸⁻²³). Another term, used apparently more particularly in reference to cases of fines and debts, but also having a general signification, is πράκτωρ (Lk 12²⁸) = 'bailiff.' The term σκευδατωρ (Mk 6²⁷), used of the executioner of John the Baptist, denotes an officer belonging to the police attached to the military rulers. The weight of opinion inclines to the view that the speculatores were soldiers (Schürer, HJP I. ii. 62); but it is probable that Herod had armed satellites about his court who did not rank as regular soldiers, but would be called upon to play many parts, from apparitor to executioner. The plain-clothes detective was employed by the Herods (Jos. Ant. XV. x. 4), and the despotic use which they made of their power, backed up as it was by the command of soldiery, took little cognizance of the established civil authorities. The centurion in Mt 8⁵⁻¹³ = Lk 7²⁻¹⁰ was probably the captain of the troop quartered at Capernaum and in the service of Herod Antipas (Holtzmann, Hand-Com. in loc.). These troops served the purpose of clearing the country of gangs of robbers (Jos. Ant. XV. x. 1).

POLITICAL CONDITIONS.—1. Reign of Herod the Great.—Christ was born nearly at the close of the reign of Herod (Mt 2¹), who died in the spring of B.C. 4. Herod's relation to Rome was that of an allied king (rex socius), whose title and authority alike were dependent upon the goodwill of the Emperor. He was expected to preserve order within his kingdom, and to bring it into a fit state for inclusion in the normal system of provincial government, and at the same time to protect the frontier of the Empire. With foreign policy he had nothing to do; and the right of coining was probably limited, the only known Herodian coins being of copper. A certain tribute was exacted, which Herod raised on the other parts of his kingdom than Judæa; and instructions from Rome had to be strictly and quickly followed, the Imperial consent being necessary also to any arrangement as to the succession to the royal property or domains. Within these limits his power was restrained only by the necessity of not provoking the people either to rebel or to appeal to Rome.

2. Tetrarchy of Philip.—Special permission had been given by Augustus to Herod to bequeath his kingdom as he liked (Jos. Ant. XVI. iv. 5), the will being subject, of course, to Imperial confirmation. Under the pressure of various palace intrigues, and with a view to separate elements between which at the time there was no possible cohesion, Herod left Judæa to Archelaus, Galilee and Peræa to Antipas, and the north-eastern districts beyond Jordan to Philip. This partition was eventually accepted at Rome, with a few slight modifications. To Philip, with the title of tetrarch, which originally implied the government of a fourth part of a tribe or kingdom, but gradually came to be used of any petty dependent prince, were assigned the comparatively poor districts lying to the east of the Sea of Galilee, and extending northwards as far as Mt. Hermon (Lk 3¹). Over these he reigned for thirty-seven years (B.C. 4–A.D. 34), when upon his death the territory was incorporated in the province of Syria, though without losing the privilege of the separate administration of its finances (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 6). Three years later it was given to Agrippa I., with the title of king. The population was predominantly Syrian and Greek, with Jewish settlements in the south-west; and though Philip's sympathies were entirely Roman, he respected the sentiments of the different classes of the people, and his long reign was disturbed by no outbreak of popular feeling, and no peremptory interference from Rome. Like most of the Herods, he had a passion for building; and to the quiet and well-governed city of Cæsarea Philippi, near the alleged source of the Jordan, Jesus withdrew (Mt 16¹³, Mk 8²⁷) when the multitudes were crowding upon Him and His enemies tempting Him (Mt 16¹); just as Bethsaida, another of Philip's cities, was His refuge when news reached Him of the Baptist's death (Lk 9¹⁰, cf. Mk 8²²).

3. Tetrarchy of Antipas.—The title of tetrarch was granted also to Antipas, whose dominions included the two districts of Galilee and Peræa, separated by the confederation of free Greek cities known as the Decapolis. Peræa, east of the Jordan and south-east of Galilee, bore a high reputation for the purity of its Judaism, but politically was of small importance. Its population was prevailingly Jewish; though Antipas found an opportunity for the indulgence of his passion for building in the erection of Julias on the site of the ancient Beth-haram (Jos 13²⁷), opposite Jericho. But the main part of the tetrarchy, as far as numbers and industry are concerned, lay to the north of Samaria, where the Jews formed the majority of a population estimated perhaps too highly (see art. POPULATION) at three millions, and comprising almost every possible admixture of Canaanitish and Greek elements. The administration of Antipas must have been successful on the whole, for it continued for more than forty years, though his father's diplomacy became in him craft and meanness (Lk 13²⁹; Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 5). His private friendship with Tiberius may be part of the explanation of the length of his reign; in A.D. 39 he was banished by Caligula to Lyons, and his territories were added to the kingdom of Herod Agrippa I. (Ac 12¹; Jos. Ant. XVIII. vii. 2).

4. Ethnarchy of Archelaus.—On the death of his father, Archelaus succeeded to the lordship of Judæa, with Samaria and Idumæa. His accession was opposed by some of his own family, and by the popular party at Jerusalem, who aimed at the restoration of the theocracy, but pleaded meanwhile for the investment of the high priest with supreme civil power, in subordination to the Emperor alone. Archelaus went in person to Rome (cf. Christ's allusion in Lk 19¹²), whither also journeyed an embassy from the people. Augustus substantially confirmed Herod's appointment; and Archelaus returned as ethnarch of the three districts. He was disappointed with the inferior title (which denotes literally the ruler of a nation living, with separate customs, in the midst of another race, and was possibly chosen, in contempt, to identify Archelaus with his unwilling subjects), and proceeded to make his administration (B.C. 3–A.D. 6) one of revenge. Twice, if not thrice, a change was made in the high priesthood by a ruler who was considered as of mixed blood—unclean in his birth and unclean in his practice. The tyrannical disregard of powerful sentiments was carried to such an extent that at length the Jews forgot their hatred of the Samaritans, and the Samaritans their kinship with the ethnarch, and a joint deputation proceeded to lay their complaints before Augustus. Archelaus was fined and exiled to Vienne, and his domains were made directly subject to Rome.

5. The Roman procurators.—The situation of Judæa, on the confines of Egypt and Arabia, was of such military importance that Rome could not wisely concede the repeated request of the people for the investiture of their high priest with all the functions of civil government. Instead, the country was made a kind of annex to the province of Syria, with a governor (procurator) of its own, of equestrian rank, who was charged particularly with the control of the army and the finances, and with the task of turning the district into a bulwark of the Empire. The legate of Syria was invested with only a general supervision; he was expected to interfere at his discretion in cases of need, but generally to remain in the background, as an unseen support of the Roman rule. The first procurator was Coponius (A.D. 6-9), a knight whose name is otherwise unknown. Accompanied by the legate Quirinius, he appeared at Jerusalem, took possession of the property of Archelaus, and turned his palace into the official abode of the procurator during the festivals, Cæsarea becoming the seat of government. Their next administrative act was to arrange for the taking of a census, with a view to control the incidence of taxation, and to establish Roman methods of government. The process was to compile schedules, enumerating the local communities, according either to houses or to families, for the purposes of a poll-tax, and providing information for the levying of taxes upon capital (originally, in Syria, one per cent., but afterwards probably increased) and upon trade. At the same time the produce of the field was valued, and made chargeable to the extent of one-tenth in the case of corn and two-tenths in that of fruit and vine. This was the enrolment referred to by Gamaliel (Ac 5³⁷); and on religious as well as patriotic grounds, as seeming to involve even a competition with Jehovah for the tithes, the result was dismay on the part of the leaders of the people, and an actual revolt, headed by Judas of Gamala, who thereby founded the fanatical party of the Zealots or Cananæans (Mt 10⁴). On the present occasion the revolt was suppressed after some furious fighting; but the agitation smouldered, and eventually broke out in the insurrection in the course of which Jerusalem was burnt. The census schedules, when completed, would be sent to Rome for approval; but in levying the taxes there would be no delay. Such as were destined for the Imperial treasury were collected under the supervision of the procurator, who made use of the Sanhedrin and various local courts. The customs were leased to collectors, individuals or syndicates, who paid a fixed annual sum, retaining any excess in the actual yield and making good any deficiency. The contracts were then divided, and sublet to subordinate officials in the different localities, and thus an entire class of publicans of various grades (Lk 19²) was constituted, whose average morality was probably low, but is not to be taken at the valuation of the popular hatred. Nothing more is known of the procuratorship of Coponius beyond a breach in the temporary alliance between the Jews and the Samaritans. The quarrel was brought to an issue by a successful attempt of the latter to defile the cloisters of the Temple on the eve of the Passover. Through Coponius no redress could be obtained, and the Jews had to content themselves with more stringent regulations for the exclusion of the Samaritans, and with a large extension of the police system of the Temple, the night-watchmen being increased in number to twenty-four, and an official made responsible for a periodic visitation of their rounds.

The successors of Coponius were Marcus Ambivius (? A.D. 9-12), Annus Rufus (? 12-15), Valerius Gratus (15-26), and Pontius Pilate (26-36). Of the first two the dates cannot at present be fixed with precision, and no known change of administration was introduced by them. Soon after his accession in A.D. 14 to the throne of the Empire, Tiberius adopted the policy of lengthening the term of service in these provincial appointments, in the hope of protecting the people from rapacity, by affording the governors a longer period over which to spread their exactions. The theory was not a compliment to this class of officials, and did not work well in Judæa. Of the administration of Valerius Gratus the least that can be said is that it was meddling. In eleven years he changed the high priest four times, and the changes would have been more frequent but for the temporizing character of the man (Joseph Caiaphas) upon whom his final choice lighted. The example of oppression in Rome, whence the Jews were expelled by Imperial edict, was imitated so closely in Judæa, that several deputations were sent to Tiberius to protest against the masterfulness and avarice of his representative, with little other result than that of additions to the army of occupation.

A similar policy of oppression was adopted by Pilate, who exceeded his predecessor in resentment, but whose violence was apt to collapse in the presence of a stubbornness greater than his own. His first act was characteristic alike of his contempt for precedents and of his docility when opposed. The new troops destined for the garrison of Jerusalem were ordered not, as before, to leave at Cæsarea the medallions of the Emperor that were attached to the military standards, but to proceed in full equipment to their quarters in the Castle of Antonia. To the Jews the sacrilege appeared of the worst kind, as involving them in the crime of idolatry (Ex 20⁴). From all parts of the country people flocked to Cæsarea, and, disdaining the threat of massacre, extorted from the procurator, by their superior resolution, an order for the removal of the medallions. This bad beginning was followed by an equally bitter quarrel over the restoration of an aqueduct that brought water to Jerusalem (cf. Lk 13⁴). The scheme was of the utmost value to the city, as the supply of water conveyed through an older aqueduct at a higher level was proving insufficient; but the offence was that Pilate proposed to throw the cost upon the Temple treasury, and actually seized some of the sacred funds. A riot was anticipated; but the soldiers, dressed as citizens, were distributed among the crowd, and at a given signal turned their weapons against the people. The scheme was proceeded with, and the popular hatred grew savage. So much did Pilate disregard Jewish sentiment, that certain Galileans were put to death in the Temple, and their blood mingled with that of the sacrifices (Lk 13¹). By taking a prominent part in an insurrection, Barabbas endeared himself to the people (Mk 15⁷, Lk 23¹⁹). On the death of Sejanus, in A.D. 31, Tiberius assumed a more friendly attitude towards the Jews; and, soon after Vitellius added the legateship of Syria to his other high commands (A.D. 35), he found it necessary to interfere. Pilate was ordered to proceed to Rome to answer for the wanton cruelty of his administration, and Marcellus was entrusted provisionally with the duties of the procuratorship.

6. Administration, military and civil.—In Syria, as in Egypt, were regularly stationed three or four legions, to which recourse could be had in any emergency; but the ordinary garrison of Palestine consisted of auxiliaries, raised partially amongst the non-Jewish inhabitants of the country. The Jews were generally exempted at the time from military service, on account of their temperament and religious usages. The garrison was distributed over the country in such a way as to make itself everywhere felt. At Cæsarea, the headquarters, was a force of three thousand men, of whom five-sixths were infantry. A cohort of five or six hundred infantry, with a detachment of cavalry and a body of spearmen or slingers (Ac 23²²), was quartered in the fortress of Antonia. Smaller garrisons occupied Jericho, Machærus, Samaria, and any other centre whence an important district could be commanded. There is no evidence of the existence of a police corps apart from the soldiery, though a secret-service system upon a large scale was maintained by Herod, and probably also by the procurators. The military were employed in keeping order, in the arrest of persons under suspicion (Jn 18¹²), in guarding prisoners (Mt 27²⁷), and in superintending the execution of a sentence (Jn 19²³). Use was sometimes made of the officers of the local courts and of the armed retinue of the native dignitaries (Mt 26⁷). The Temple police were under the command of a captain of high rank, who probably controlled also the officers of the Sanhedrin; and these functionaries were recognized and supported within limits by the military authorities. There are traces also of the existence of a body of paid spies or secret police under Jewish control (Lk 20²⁰, Mt 22¹⁶, Mk 12¹³). In the provincial towns and rural districts order was kept as in Jerusalem; the administration acted through the local courts and organizations, with soldiers at hand when needed. See also art. POLICE.

Taxation was of two kinds—Imperial and provincial. A poll-tax and a tax on landed property were collected by the procurator, and the produce remitted to Rome (Mt 22¹⁷). Custom duties and market tolls were collected by lessees, who paid for the privilege a fixed yearly sum, destined in the case of Judæa for the Imperial treasury, but in that of Galilee for the tetrarch. Besides these regular imposts, an arbitrary procurator might enrich himself by a variety of exactions, as the penalties of imagined offences or the condition of official support; but in Judæa the expenses of administration were met by authorized deduction from the revenue of the taxes and tolls. Economically the province was poor, though a few courtiers and ecclesiastical dignitaries were of great wealth. So heavy was the incidence of taxation, that in A.D. 17 a deputation was sent to Rome to plead for relief. Sixteen years later, the entire Empire was visited by a financial crisis so severe that bankruptcies multiplied beyond enumeration, and even some of the public treasuries suspended payments in cash. In this general distress Syria and Palestine shared, though the busy industrial centres in Galilee did not suffer so much as the crowded and unemployed population around Jerusalem.

7. Political parties (see the various articles under separate titles).—The Samaritans, though kindred in race with the Jews, were regarded by them as sectaries, and the bitterness on both sides was fatal to joint political action of any permanent kind. The Sadducees were a priestly nobility, tenacious of the prestige of their own order, but tolerant of any system of government that did not threaten their prosperity. Opposed to them were the Pharisees, whose national ideal was that of a theocracy, and whose endurance of an alien rule was reluctant or sullen. They were supported sometimes by the Herodians, who favoured the dynasty of Herod, but were not disposed to quarrel seriously with any established institution. An extreme party was gradually formed of irreconcilables, under the name of Zelots or Cananeans (Mt 10⁴, Mk 3¹⁸, Lk 6¹⁶), who were prepared to use the sword without delay for the restoration of a theocracy. In political theory the Essenes exaggerated the views of the Pharisees; but their comparatively small number in the early part of the 1st cent. and their segregation from ordinary life made them a force of little consequence except in times of excitement.

POOR.—See POVERTY and POVERTY OF SPIRIT.

POPULARITY.—The word does not occur in the NT, but the thing itself is not infrequently treated of. There is a true and there is a false popularity. The latter belongs to him who makes the praise of men his object, and seeks it by ostentatious piety and hypocritical charity (Mt 6^{2. 5. 16}); the former is the accompaniment of that behaviour whose ruling aim is to do the will of God regardless of all worldly ends (Mt 6^{3. 4. 7. 8. 17. 18. 20. 21}). True popularity is that love and admiration which unselfish devotion to the welfare of others, springing from the whole-hearted love of God, cannot fail to arouse in the breasts of all who have eyes to see and hearts to understand the good and pure. 'They shall see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven' (Mt 5¹⁶; cf. Jn 15⁸). The hypocrites who sound a trumpet before them when they do their alms, who pray at the corners of the streets for all to see, who disfigure their faces that they may appear to men to fast, are examples of those who seek and obtain the reward of false popularity. Fasting and prayer that flow from a desire to hold communion with God, charity that is the outcome of gratitude to the Heavenly Father for His wondrous mercy, are ever done in secret, so that there can be no suspicion of any unworthy motive; but the effect of these things is revealed in the man's whole life and character; it must win for him the praise and love of all good men, and for God the glory.

All this is in perfect harmony with the inwardness of Christ's life and teaching. His aim was to change the world from within outward—not to attach good fruit to a worthless tree, but to make the tree good, and to await the fruit which in due time it was bound to bear. In the same sense true popularity is inward; false, outward. The latter springs immediately from outside acts which may not be—probably are not—the revelation of the true man: the former is the effect produced upon the world by the outspoken of the whole man as he is in himself in his relation to God. At the very opening of His career Jesus rejected the outward, the false, popularity as a means of propagating the truth He came to teach. He perceived it to be the suggestion of the Evil One that He should obtain the dominion of the kingdoms of the world by the external method, by the force of His authority, by the admiration which He could so easily have produced. Even to employ His miraculous power to gain the ear of His own countrymen He put from Him as a temptation (Mt 4¹⁻¹⁰ || Lk 4¹⁻¹³); and when, aroused to enthusiasm by their miraculous feeding, the multitude would fain have taken Him by force to make Him their king, He fled from them (Jn 6¹⁵). He would have nought to do with any enthusiasm, however sincere, that was based upon a false conception of the nature of His Messiahship, that sprang from admiration of His power and the hope of sharing its blessings, and not from the clear perception of His holiness and the longing to share it (Jn 2²³⁻²⁵). The kind of impression which He wished to make was that which expressed itself in such phrases as—'Never man so spake' (Jn 7⁴⁶); 'He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes' (Mt 7²⁹); 'The common people heard him gladly' (Mk 12³⁷). It was neither to nor by flesh and blood that He desired to reveal Himself and to win a place in the hearts of men, but to the Divine germ within each soul, and by the revelation of the Heavenly Father (Mt 16¹⁷). See following article.

And as with the Master so must it be with the servants. As the world had hated Him, so would it hate them. He had come to send not peace on the earth, but a sword and fire (Mt 10³⁴ || Lk 12⁵¹), the sword which would part brother from brother and father from son—the fire which should try and reveal the essential nature of each heart. This hatred and persecution are therefore to be to the disciples a cause of rejoicing (Mt 5^{11, 12}), for these will be the signs that they are in truth the followers of Christ. ‘If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love its own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you’ (Jn 15^{18, 19}). But the more the world persecutes them, the more must they bear testimony to the cause of Christ by their loving fellowship one with another. ‘By this,’ He says, ‘shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another’ (Jn 13³⁵); and again—‘(I pray) that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me’ (Jn 17²¹). Among the disciples there must be no selfish striving for place or power. The truest popularity, the truest greatness, is to belong to the humble heart that ever preferreth other to itself, that rejoiceth to minister and to serve, to give itself freely to all even as Christ did (Mt 20²⁸ || Mk 10⁴⁵).

POPULARITY (of Jesus).—The general subject of popularity, as treated in the foregoing article, is strikingly illustrated by the course of our Lord’s public ministry; and in the present article we shall consider (1) the popularity of Jesus, (2) the grounds on which it rested, (3) the value He attached to it, and (4) the reasons of its decline.

1. The fact of His popularity.—Although the earthly life of Jesus began in a stable and ended on a cross, there was a period in His ministry when He was at once the most conspicuous and the most popular personage in Palestine. From Jn. we learn that His first definite appeal to the nation was made in Jerusalem (2¹²). There, however, the dominant influences were hostile to His acceptance (vv. 18^r, 3^{2, 12}). He soon felt that the nation was not yet ripe for a direct Messianic ministry, and so for a time He fell back in Judæa on a work of preparation similar to that which the Baptist was still carrying on (3^{22, 4²}). But when John was cast into prison, He knew that the time was come to make His own distinctive appeal to Israel, and having met with little favour in Jerusalem, He now chose Galilee as the scene of His labours (Mk 1⁴⁷, ||). The Synoptic Gospels show that an extraordinary popularity was the almost immediate result (Mk 1²⁸). Crowds flocked to Him from every quarter (1^{45, 2^{13, 4^{1, 5²¹}} and passim), and followed Him about wherever He went (3^{7, 6³³}). The people were astonished at His teaching (12²⁷), but also delighted with it (Lk 5^{1, 15}, cf. Mk 12³⁷); they saw His miracles with joy and amazement, and glorified God in Him (Mk 2¹² ||). The enthusiasm and excitement soon spread far beyond the borders of Galilee; and from Jerusalem and Idumæa, from beyond Jordan, and even from the region of Tyre and Sidon, multitudes came to see and hear the great Prophet of Nazareth (3³). All along, it is true, the scribes and Pharisees persistently opposed Him (2^{6^r, 16^l, 24^r, 3^{2^r}), coming from Jerusalem for}} this express purpose (3^{22, 7¹}). But with the great mass of His countrymen, during the earlier period of His Galilean ministry, Jesus had a popularity of the most unqualified kind.

2. To what was this popularity due?—(1) Much must be ascribed to His personal qualities, and among these (a) to His perfect accessibility and entire naturalness. In His attitude to the people there was nothing either of the supercilious contempt of the scribes and Pharisees (Jn 7^{48, 49}) or of the ascetic austerity of John the Baptist (Mt 3^{11¹⁸}). Any one might approach Him at any time, with the certainty of being readily and kindly received. It mattered not who came to Jesus,—rough fishers of the Galilean lake (Jn 1^{37^r}, Mk 1¹⁶ ||), anxious parents seeking a blessing for their children (Mk 5^{22^r, 7^{25^r}, 10^{13^r}), publicans whom everyone else despised (Mt 9^{10, 10^{3, 11¹⁹}, Lk 19^{2^r}), sinful women from the city streets (Lk 7^{37^r}, Mt 21³¹),—to all He presented Himself as a man and a brother. (b) No personal gift conduces more to popularity than the subtle, indefinable quality of charm, and Jesus appears to have possessed this in an exceptional measure. It may be that the χάρις or ‘grace,’ of which St. Luke tells us in his account of the sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth (4²²), refers wholly to Christ’s message, and not at all to the manner of His speech. But the way in which men and women and little children were drawn to the Saviour, as if by a kind of magnetism, testifies to a winsomeness of nature that must have gone far to secure the favour of every unprejudiced heart. (c) Still more the intense sympathy of Jesus must have appealed to the people. A man may make himself accessible for reasons of policy, and even the quality of charm sometimes proves to be a superficial gift of pleasing that is no guarantee for any expenditure of heart. But the Saviour’s profound sympathy for the sick, the sinful, the sorrowful, could not fail to make an impression on the popular mind. We can hardly realize, perhaps, what it meant for Him to be besieged day after day by a pressing crowd of men and women with loathsome diseases and festering sores—all demanding the touch of His hand as well as the pity of His heart (Lk 4⁴⁰ ||). The nervous tension must have been tremendous, the physical and spiritual expenditure a constant drain upon His strength (Mk 5³⁰, Lk 6¹⁹). But the crowd, which not only read in His face that compassion which was one of His most characteristic qualities (Mt 9^{36, 14^{14, 15³²}, Mk 1⁴¹, Lk 7¹³), but saw Him in the thick of His daily deeds of grace, must have dimly perceived something of that vicarious sacrifice which lay at the root of the Redeemer’s sympathy, as it lies at the root of all true sympathy, and which led an Evangelist to bethink himself of the prophet’s words, ‘Himself took our infirmities, and bare our diseases’ (Mt 8¹⁷, cf. Is 53⁴).}}}

(2) But the popularity of Jesus was due not only to His personal qualities, but to His methods as a Teacher and the gospel that He brought. (a) Much lay in His methods—in the simplicity and directness, the homeliness and picturesqueness of His language, and its entire freedom from all the professional pedantries of the Rabbis (Mk 1²², cf. 12³⁷). The undying power of His parables, simply as literature, enables us to form some idea of what it must have been to hear those wonderful stories as they first fell from His own lips. (b) But these things were only the outer swathings of His message—the husk, not the kernel. The form of His teaching might appeal to the imagination, but it was the substance—the joyful Galilean gospel of the Kingdom of God—that warmed and thrilled the listening multitudes. Christ’s words were ‘words of grace’—words about the Heavenly Father’s love and the blessings that lay within the reach of every one who was willing to be God's child; words of forgiveness for the sinful, and liberty for the captive, of comfort for the mourner, and rest for the weary and heavy-laden soul. 'The gospel of the kingdom'—in that Christ's message was all summed up (Mk 1⁴). And if the fore-runner shook the nation to its centre when he cried, 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand!' (Mt 3²), what must have been the effect of Christ's proclamation that the Kingdom of God was already come (Mt 5³⁻¹¹ 12²⁸)—that this was the acceptable year of the Lord (Lk 4^{19, 21}).

(3) But it is in the miracles of Jesus above all that we find the explanation of His popularity. His miracles of healing were evidently wrought upon a very wide scale—much wider than the enumeration of individual cases gives any idea of (cf. Mk 1³⁴ 3¹⁰ 6^{55, 56}). And though there were ungrateful recipients of His mercy (Lk 17^{17, 18}), we know that at other times both those whom He had cured and their friends and relatives were filled with a passion of gratitude and devotion to His Person (vv. 15, 16, Mk 5²⁰ 10⁵², Jn 11² 12³). But these gracious miracles stretched in their effects far beyond the wide circle of the actual beneficiaries. They created great expectations in the popular mind—expectations that were immensely heightened by yet more astonishing miracles, in which Christ's 'compassion for the multitude' led Him to make them in their thousands the direct partakers of His bounty (Mk 6^{34ff.} ||, 8^{1ff.} ||, Jn 6^{5ff.}). These great miracles were taken to be 'signs'—signs of wonderful events that might be about to happen in Israel. Jesus, it began to be surmised, was not merely a great prophet as His teaching showed, but much more than a prophet; not merely a marvellous healer of the sick, but the expected Deliverer of Israel. Unfortunately, however, in spite of all His teaching as to the nature of the Kingdom of God, the popular ideas on the subject were still utterly astray. And so His popularity, just when it seemed to be soaring to its highest, was made to rest upon the least worthy foundations. This brings us to the sharp dividing line (see preceding art.) between a popularity that is true and a popularity that is false, a popularity that Jesus could desire and welcome and one that He inevitably loathed and repelled. Jn.'s narrative shows that it was Christ's fame as a miracle-worker, and most of all His feeding of the Five Thousand in the wilderness, that raised His popularity to its point of culmination (Jn 6^{14, 15}). But it was just then that Jesus rejected most emphatically a kind of popularity He did not want. And it was also from that day that the tide of popular favour which had swelled so high began to ebb.

3. What value did Jesus attach to His popularity?—'He did not care,' it has been said, 'for the thing called popularity, but He loved human beings' (Bruce, Galilean Gospel, p. 10). And it is quite true that there was a kind of popularity that Jesus not only did not care for, but always despised and shunned. And yet, just because He loved human beings so much, He desired a popularity of the right sort. Was it not in search of it that He came into Galilee preaching the gospel of the Kingdom, after He had been coldly received by the ecclesiastical authorities in the capital? To be popular is just to be beloved of the people, and the highest kind of popularity is when a man is beloved of the people on grounds which God and his own conscience can approve. It is impossible for one who loves, not to wish to have his love returned; and Jesus, loving men and women as no other human being ever did, undoubtedly desired them to love Him, and trust Him, and follow Him. This is the meaning of His invitations to them to come to Him, and of His words of sorrow and reproach when they refused. His soul, accordingly, must have filled with gladness and thankfulness when He saw the multitude pressing upon Him to hear His word, and listening to it with evident joy, or when He received the assurance of heartfelt gratitude from those whom He had healed or enlightened or lifted from the depths of self-despair. But, on the other hand, when men came after Him in search of signs and wonders (Mt 12³⁸ 16¹ ||, Jn 4⁴⁸)—something to confirm them in their false ideals of the Kingdom of God, if not merely to gratify their gaping curiosity; worse still, when the multitude began to follow Him in the hope of being furnished gratis with the bread that they might have honestly earned (Jn 6²⁶), and to look to Him to set up by the use of His miraculous powers a kingdom of meat and drink and political privilege, He knew that now, under the guise of a dazzling popularity, the same temptation was returning which He had faced and conquered in the wilderness at the very outset of His ministry (Mt 4¹⁻¹¹)—the temptation to love the praise of men more than the praise of God, and to attempt to set up the Kingdom of heaven upon earth by methods that were not Divine, but worldly and Satanic.

4. The decline of His popularity.—The miracle of the Feeding of the Five Thousand was a great turning-point in the life of Jesus. It marked, we have said, the culmination of His popularity, but also the beginning of its decline. And the reason for this decline was just that the popularity it brought was of a kind that Jesus could not accept. The people wished to take Him by force and make Him king (Jn 6¹⁵), while He wished to win in their hearts a spiritual Kingdom for His Father. They would have set Him on a worldly throne, and He knew that His Kingdom was not of this world (Jn 18³⁶). The two ideals were utterly incompatible. Henceforth, He who had sought the people and welcomed their coming began to avoid them (Jn 6¹⁵, Mk 7²⁴ 8^{10, 13, 26, 27} 9⁵⁰), and, when they still came after Him, spoke not only of the gladness of the Kingdom, but of the mysterious pathway of the Cross (Jn 6²⁶⁻⁶⁵, Mk 8^{34ff.} 10^{21ff.}). The result was soon apparent. Nothing more quickly cools the enthusiasm of the multitude than the refusal of its object to be popular on the popular terms. After this many even of Christ's disciples went back and walked no more with Him (Jn 6⁶⁶). And though Peter answered nobly for the Twelve to that pathetic question, 'Will ye also go away?' (vv. 67-69), the Lord knew that one of the very Apostles whom He had chosen had admitted into his heart a devil of dissatisfaction with his Master (vv. 70, 71). Soon, with the vision of the Cross before Him, He 'steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem' (Lk 9⁵¹). The disciples, as they followed, were afraid (Mk 10³²), and so He prepared them for what was coming, by those great 'Lessons on the Cross' which mark the stages of His progress towards the great act of sacrifice (Mt 16²¹⁻²⁸ ||, 20¹⁷⁻²⁸ ||, 26^{6-13, 26-29} ||; cf. Bruce, Training of the Twelve). Day by day the shadows lengthened across the Saviour's path. And though at His last Passover the raising of Lazarus (Jn 12⁹⁻¹¹) led to a transitory outburst of fresh enthusiasm among the Galileans who had come up to the Feast (cf. Mt 21¹¹ with v. 10), the time of His national popularity was really over from the day of the Capernaum discourse (Jn 6^{24ff.}), and what lay before Him thereafter was a growing opposition that could end only in national rejection and the death on Calvary.

this is the case, the plural form is invariably employed, viz. the 'parts' or districts (râ mēron) belonging to Galilee (Mt 2²²), of Tyre and Sidon (Mt 15²¹), of Caesarea (Mt 16¹³), of Dalmanutha (Mk 8¹⁰). In this sense the word would correspond to the Hebrew מִן־הַיָּם. Once more, the word occurs in a technical sense of the right-hand side of a ship (râ dexiâ mēron tou plōiou, Jn 21⁶). (3) mēros is used in the sense of fate, destiny, or lot; as such it occurs only twice in the Gospels: Mt 24⁵¹ 'He shall appoint his portion with the hypocrites,' and Lk 12⁴⁶ 'He shall appoint his portion with the unfaithful.'* The nearest approach to this in OT usage would be in Is 17¹⁴, where לֶחֶם has a special and restricted meaning. There is a slight variation in the force of the word as used in Jn 13⁸ 'If I wash thee not, thou hast no part (mēros) with me'; for, while in the two former passages the reference is to a final doom, in this the meaning is rather, 'If I wash thee not, thou canst have nothing to do with me.'

In one single instance 'portion' or 'part' occurs in the unique sense of one of the ways in which God is served; but here the word is meis, not mēros (Lk 10⁴² 'Mary hath chosen the good part'; the context seems to demand the sense of 'the best part').

POSSESSION.—See DEMON, DEMONIACS.

POT.—There are two words rendered 'pot' in the Gospels, ξέστης and ὕδρια. The first is a corruption of the Lat. scatarius, and stands for a wooden vessel holding about a pint and a half, used at table for holding water and wine. This it is that is mentioned by Mk. (7⁴⁻⁸) when he is relating how 'the Pharisees and all the Jews' kept 'the tradition of the elders.' 'When they come from the market,' he says, 'except they dip themselves' (βαπτίζονται, v.l. παντίζονται) 'they do not eat'; and, among the 'many other things which they have received to hold,' he specifies 'the dippings (βαπτισμοὺς) of cups and pots' (ξέστρων), etc. This he mentions to explain why the Pharisees and scribes came to ask Jesus, 'Why walk thy disciples not according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwashed hands?' thus giving Jesus occasion to apply to them the prophecy of Isaiah, 'This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me,' and otherwise exposing and rebuking their 'hypocrisy.'

When Jn. (4²⁹) tells us of the Samaritan woman, in the excitement of her new-found joy, 'leaving her water-pot,' he uses the words τὴν ὕδριαν, pointing doubtless to just such a portable earthen water-pot as women in Palestine are everywhere to-day seen carrying on their heads. But in 2⁹, where he gives an account of the miracle at the marriage feast in Cana of Galilee, he tells of 'six water-pots of stone' (λίθιναι ὕδριαι), which were clearly 'pots' of a very different kind—too large to use at table, or to be portable in the ordinary way. Their size may be gathered from the next clause, 'containing two or three firkins a piece'—about nine English gallons. They were probably just such huge stone pitchers as are shown to tourists to-day at Kefr Kennā, and as may be found elsewhere in Palestine. Scarcity of drinking water in Palestine made it necessary to keep a supply on hand in large vessels that would serve as coolers, especially in hot weather. Then a copious supply would be needed according to Jewish custom ('after the manner of the purifying of the Jews'), for use in the washing of hands and vessels before and after meals (Mt 15², Mk 7³).

POTTER.—'The Potter's Field' was the name of the property in the purchase of which the chief priests spent the thirty pieces of silver returned by Judas, and which they proposed to use as a burial-place for strangers (Mt 27⁷). Mt 27⁸ states that this spot came in consequence to be known as 'the field of blood'—that is, the field bought with the price of blood; but a different reason for that name is given in Ac 1^{18, 19}, where Judas himself purchases the field, and commits suicide in it. The 'field of blood,' or AKELDAMA (אֶקֶלְדָמָא), is generally identified with a spot in which there are numerous tombs, and where also clay is found, lying to the south of Jerusalem, in the valley of Hinnom, not far from the point where it joins the valley of the Kidron (Baedeker, p. 103). St. Matthew believes that this incident of the purchase of the field happened in fulfilment of Zec 11^{12, 13}, which he reads as a prediction, and ascribes to Jeremiah. This may be a mere slip due to the mention in the Book of Jeremiah of the potter's house (18²) and the Potsherd Gate (19²), just as in Jer 27¹ Jehoiakim is a slip for Zedekiah. Or, as Mede (d. 1638) supposed, Jeremiah may actually have been the author of these chapters. It is agreed that they are not by Zechariah. Although, however, there is no doubt that St. Matthew has this passage in his mind, his citation of it is quite free, and diverges largely from the Hebrew, and even more from the Greek, in which v. 13 becomes an injunction to throw the silver into the smelting-pit (χωρευτήριον, thus reading some derivative of πῦρ; or of עֵרֶךְ) in order to prove whether it were genuine. Neither does the Targum come any nearer to the text of Matthew. The Syr. of Zech. instead of 'potter' (ܦܬܪܐ) reads 'treasury' (ܡܘܬܒܐ), which is generally accepted as correct.

POUND (μνᾶ).—The value of the denarius (AV 'penny') being about 9½d., the mina (AV 'pound'), which was 100 of these, was = £4 in our money. It was the 60th part of a talent. The only Gospel reference in this sense is in the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19¹¹⁻²⁷). 'Pound' as a weight (λίτρα = 12 oz. avoird.) is alluded to in Jn 12³ and 19³⁹ (see art. MONEY and WEIGHTS and MEASURES).

Modern commentators of repute (including Calvin) treat the story of the Pounds (Lk 19¹¹⁻²⁷) as a variant of the parable of the Talents (Mt 25¹⁴⁻³⁰); and prevailing theories on the origin of the Gospels as we have them tend to the confirmation of this view. In Mt. the parable appears as part of the prophetic discourse delivered at Jerusalem, when days of disaster were impending, and our Lord's absence from this mortal scene became naturally an impressive theme (see art. TALENTS). Here in Lk., while activity during that absence is enjoined as a duty, colour is added to the story from local reminiscence. Jericho (v. 1) owed its magnificent palace to the son of Herod the Great, Archelaus, facts from whose history seem clearly drawn upon in the narrative. The Herodian princes, on coming to office (v. 12), went to Rome to receive imperial investiture (Jos. Ant. XIV. xiv. and XVII. xi. 4), and this same Archelaus was in such bad odour that an embassy of protest followed him (xv. xi. 1, etc.). Compare with this the action of the citizens, 'We will not have this man to reign over us' (v. 14). As if to accentuate the variation between Mt. and Lk., we have a further modification of the figures in the Gospel according to the Hebrews (c. 200 A.D.), where one servant wastes the goods of his lord among harlots and flute-players, another multiplies the pound, while a third conceals it; in the end, one is acknowledged, another reprovèd, and the third committed to prison. That Jesus uttered the parable is not to be doubted, but there seems some uncertainty in the details. The harshness of v. 27, however, as coming from His lips, can be escaped, on the theory that these words were used with reference to Archelaus, who had proved himself amply capable of cruelty.

The entire sovereignty of the Christ being not yet manifested, the broad lesson stands forth, and is unexhausted in our age, that the true note of faithfulness is active zeal in His cause (v. 13). Means diligently improved yield rich results (v. 17 and v. 19); and although these may vary among individual men, rewards are in all cases manifold (v. 17 and v. 19). The highly informing contrast comes when we turn to the Pharisaic class,—specially abhorrent to Jesus,—who not only do no sacrificing deeds, but even glory complacently in negative propriety (v. 20). The ultimate reason of their remissness is the wrong idea of God (v. 21), whom they figure as a taskmaster who exacts, instead of a kindly father who bestows. Hence the note of the 'austere,' which passes by reflexion into their own sorry travesty of the eternal life. Daily deeds of love are the familiar exchange (v. 23),—a mart which such religionists thoroughly neglect, since none are harder with their fellows. But innate law must prevail (v. 26), and indifference never ends in itself—the callous soon betray diminished receptivity. Steel rusts when never out of the sheath, and the saddest cases in religion are seen in those who start fair, but achieve nothing. The figure of reaping where one has not sown (v. 21), charged falsely against the master, tells truly on the critics themselves. The seed of truth lay to their hand, but it could not grow and reproduce till it was planted in the soil. Cherished mechanically, in their fashion, it was bound to shrivel into a withered husk, from which the germ of life had expired. Hence the verdict of the Master, that in spite of all appearances to the contrary, only the semblance of spiritual power remained—'even that he hath shall be taken away from him' (v. 26). Conversely, the more actively men employ the graces of the Christian life, the more susceptible their souls become to higher things. It is in order to emphasize this fact—and for no other purpose—that the gainers of the ten pounds and the five pounds respectively are specified and put side by side in the story. The forfeited 100 drachms are awarded to the former, not to the latter, for 'unto every one that hath shall be given' (v. 20). Life for us all means stewardship, and psychology more and more reveals a delicate and automatic system of rewards and punishments, under sanction of the One Supreme Being, who is revealed in teaching such as this, and who offers all men the saving presence of His Spirit.

GEORGE MURRAY.

POVERTY.—That the life of Christ was one of poverty is an impression very generally derived from the familiar words of Is 53, and also from Ph 27 ('took upon himself the form of a slave') and 2 Co 8⁹ ('he became poor, that ye through his poverty might become rich'). But the general picture of the surroundings of Christ which we find in the Gospels is one of healthy active life. Throughout NT times, until the final agony, the resources of Palestine were well used, and the population was able to bear considerable taxation with comparative ease; and though Judæa was liable to scarcity (cf. St. Paul's care for the Jewish Christians, 1 Co 16¹, Ac 24¹⁷), Galilee was a hive of industry (see Swete, Gospel of St Mark, p. lxxxii; and Buhl, art. 'New Testament Times' in Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. p. 45, with authorities cited at end). In accordance with this distinction, the contact of Jesus with the poor as described in the Gospels is almost confined to Judæa and Jerusalem (Mt 19¹⁶, Mk 10²¹ the rich young ruler; Mk 12⁴², Lk 21¹ the poor widow; Mt 26⁶, Mk 14⁵ 'this ointment might have been sold for much and given to the poor'; Mt 20³⁰, Mk 10⁴⁶, Lk 18³⁵ the blind beggars outside Jericho; cf. Mt 25³⁵).

1. The place of poverty in Christ's own life.—(a) The home in Nazareth.—That Christ's parents were not wealthy we gather from St. Luke's narrative of the Infancy (2²⁴), where the offering of the poor is brought at the Presentation; that 'there was no room for them in the inn' (2⁷) does not in itself show that they were badly off. Nor does the fact that Nazareth was an inconsiderable town [the question in Jn 1⁴⁶, if implying a bad reputation, is not quite borne out by the facts; see Westcott, St. John, ad loc.] condemn all its inhabitants to poverty (see Edersheim, Life and Times of the Messiah, i. 183). Since we are entirely without direct information on either side, we can only conjecture that the form of the townspeople's question as given in St. Mark ('Is not this the carpenter?' 6³; cf. Mt 13⁵⁵), and the movements of His family (Jn 2¹², where His mother and His brethren are staying at Capernaum; 2², where His mother and His disciples are guests at Cana) imply a certain position of independence (cf. Jn 1³⁸ 'Where dwellest thou?').

The story in Eusebius (HE iii. 19, 20) of the grandsons of Judas 'the Lord's brother' being summoned before Domitian, and removing his suspicion of them by the appearance of their horny labourers' hands, can hardly throw light on the circumstances of Christ's own home.

(b) The active Ministry.—Christ and His disciples certainly did not subsist on charity; true, the Son of Man had not where to lay his head (Mt 8²⁰, Lk 10⁶⁸); but this shows only that Christ was content not to have a home of His own, not that He could not have had one. The little party had a common 'bag' or purse (Jn 12⁹), from which they purchased necessaries (Jn 4⁸; cf. Mt 16⁵, Mk 8¹⁴) and gave to the poor (Jn 13²⁹; cf. Mt 26⁹). The disciples' question before the feeding of the five thousand, as given in St. Mark (6³⁷ 'Shall we buy two hundred pennyworth of bread?') cf. Lk 9¹³), though doubtless ironical, does not suggest actual penury. It would seem that Jesus was in the habit of paying the Temple tax (Mt 17²⁴). As the firstborn, He would under ordinary circumstances have the larger share of whatever property His father might leave. That He was not without well-to-do friends, and used their hospitality, is certain. Zebedee would seem to have been in a good position (Mk 1²⁰ 'with the hired servants'; one of his sons is personally known to the high priest, Jn 18¹⁵). Perhaps it was through his help that Jesus was able to have a small boat constantly in attendance on Him when preaching at the Lake of Galilee (ἵνα πλοῖάριον προσκαρτερῆ αὐτῷ, Mk 3⁹). The same thing may be gathered of the household at Bethany (Lk 10³⁸; and still more Jn 11^{3, 45} and 12⁹); certain women, including the wife of Herod's steward, 'minister' to Him (Mk 15⁴⁰, Lk 8³). He is able to secure an ass on which to enter into Jerusalem (Mt 21³, Mk 11³, Lk 19³¹), a lodging at night through the last week (Mt 21⁷, Mk 11¹⁹, Lk 21³⁷), and the use of an upper room for the Passover (Mt 26¹⁸, Mk 14¹⁵); nor is there anything to suggest that Christ's hunger when He was passing the barren fig-tree was the result of inability to procure food (Mt 21¹⁸, Mk 11¹²).

2. Teaching about poverty.—The blessedness of the poor is the subject of the first Beatitude (see the following article). In the same discourse occur the prohibitions against taking anxious thought (Mt 6²⁵) and laying up treasures (6¹⁹). Prayer for temporal wants is to be for 'daily bread' ('bread of the coming day' or 'bread of sufficiency,' ἄρτος ἐπιούσιος; see LORD'S PRAYER) alone (Mt 6¹¹, Lk 11³). Christ bids the disciples of John observe that the poor have the gospel preached unto them (Mt 11⁵, cf. Is 61¹⁻², Lk 4¹⁸), and specially contrasts the widow with the rich donors to the Temple treasury (Mk 12⁴², Lk 21³). The danger of wealth is constantly pointed out (Mt 19²³, Mk 10²³, Lk 18²⁴ 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven'; Mt 18⁸ 'If thy hand or thy foot cause thee to stumble, cut it off'; Lk 16¹⁹ the parable of Lazarus and Dives; Lk 12¹⁶ the parable of the Rich Fool, following on Christ's peremptory refusal to divide the inheritance between the two brothers). Cf. the command to the rich young ruler, 'Sell all that thou hast,' Mt 19²¹, Mk 10²¹, Lk 18²², in which there was evidently some personal appropriateness; the demand was not universally made. According to our accounts, the Temple was cleansed of buyers and sellers both at the beginning and the end of the ministry (Jn 2¹⁴, and Mt 21¹², Mk 11¹⁵). That Christ had the true Israelite contempt for money and commercial prosperity is at least hinted in the story of the Temptation (Mt 4⁸, Lk 4⁸), and shown quite plainly in the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard: 'It is my will to give unto this last even as unto thee,' Mt 20¹⁵,—a principle which, as Ruskin saw (Unto this Last), is a defiance of political economy as ordinarily understood. Compare the anti-commercial statutes in Dt 15^{1f}, Ex 23^{10f}, Lv 23¹⁻¹⁵ as to the remission of debts and the reversion of holdings in the Sabbatical year and year of Jubilee. If faithful to the Law, it was impossible for Israel to be anything but a comparatively poor nation (note, however, Dt 15⁴), as would necessarily be the case with the Christian community which obeyed the rules, 'Give to him that asketh thee,' and 'Lend, never giving up hope,' μηδὲν ἀπελπίζοντες (Lk 6³⁵; cf. Mt 6¹², Lk 11⁴). Peabody (Jesus Christ and the Social Question) points out the further opposition to current Socialism implied in the parable of the Talents (Mt 25²⁹, Lk 12⁴⁸; cf. Mt 13¹²).

An interesting echo of this teaching on poverty, or on the openhandedness that must prevent the dangerous accumulation of wealth, is found in the Gospel of the Hebrews (fragm. 11), where the rich man who came to Christ in the attitude of the young ruler is told that he could not have kept the Law, since people are dying of hunger at his gates. What we do not find, however, in the Gospels, is any eulogy of poverty for its own sake; it is enjoined simply as an almost indispensable aid to serving God aright. And the fact that Christ constantly mixes with what we should call the middle classes and the well-to-do, without rebuking them or bidding them give up all, shows that poverty must be understood in a relative sense, and not as the equivalent of penury. His life was one long protest against the attitude of 'virtus laudatur et alget.' To take Mt 26¹¹, 'Ye have the poor always with you,' to mean that the existence of poverty must be acquiesced in, is to forget all that was said about mercifulness and liberality by Him who, when He saw the multitudes, 'had compassion on them' (Mt 9³⁶ 14¹⁴). Christ demanded the surrender not of money in itself, but of everything that could interfere with the interests of the Kingdom of heaven; in this sense the verb ἀφίημι, 'to give up, leave' (Mt 19²⁹, Mk 10²⁸, Mt 4²⁰, Mk 1¹⁸; cf. Lk 9⁶⁰), is characteristic of the Gospels,—as characteristic as it is in its other meaning of 'to forgive.' The ideal is not poverty but service (Mt 20²⁷, 'Whosoever would become first among you shall be your servant').

POVERTY OF SPIRIT.—According to the Matthean version of the Sermon on the Mount, our Lord pronounced the first Beatitude on the 'poor in spirit' (πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι). In the corresponding passage of Lk. (6²⁰) the words τῷ πνεύματι are omitted; and there can be little doubt that this simpler form of the Beatitude is the more original. It may be gathered, indeed, from quotations in the early Fathers (cf. Polycarp, ii. 3; Clem. Hom. xv. 10; Polycr. 2) that the primitive reading in Mt. also was 'Blessed are the poor,' and that the qualifying words were introduced later, in order to define the sense more exactly. Though formally an addition to the actual saying of Jesus, they were felt to be necessary for the right translation of an Aramaic term which had come to bear a peculiar shade of meaning.

1. Already in the later OT writings we find poverty associated with a certain religious temper. The 'poor' are also the contrite of heart (Is 66²); they are the 'meek ones' who lend a willing ear to the Divine message (Ps 37¹¹, Is 61¹). This estimate of poverty is probably to be explained by historical circumstances. The foreign influences which began to operate in the period succeeding the Exile had chiefly affected the richer classes, while the poor still clung to the ancient traditions. Poverty thus acquired a moral significance, which was reinforced by the conditions prevailing in our Lord's own time. As a result of the externalizing process which had long been at work in religion, the rich were in a specially favoured position from the point of view of legal righteousness. They alone were at leisure to study the Law and to order their lives according to its requirements. They were not exposed, like tradesmen and artisans, to a constant risk of Levitical defilement. They could afford to give alms, and offer the stated sacrifices, and cast much into the Temple treasury. The distinction of wealth and poverty had, therefore, come to be a religious as well as a social distinction; and the Pharisaic spirit of pride and self-sufficiency was chiefly prevalent among the rich. In their consciousness of strict obedience to the Law, they could lay claim to peculiar privileges, and look down with contempt on the ignorant 'people of the land' (Jn 7⁴⁹). It must always be remembered that, when Jesus speaks of wealth or poverty, He is thinking not so much of a social status as of the religious conditions involved in it. Much in His teaching that has been supposed to bear on present-day economic questions, belongs properly to quite a different sphere.

2. It is thus apparent that the words τῷ πνεύματι, although not literally uttered by Jesus, are necessary to the right understanding of His thought. He pronounces His blessing on the poor, in so far as their spiritual temper corresponds with their outward condition. Their poverty was commonly assumed to entail certain drawbacks which placed them at a hopeless disadvantage in their relations to God. Jesus declares that, on the contrary, it was their privilege. It served to foster in them the disposition which could most readily understand the message of the Kingdom and respond to it. 'Blessed are the poor who have allowed their poverty to fulfil its work in them,—who are poor in spirit as well as in worldly circumstances.' The truth of the saying may be best illustrated by the historical fact that our Lord's earliest disciples were drawn, almost wholly, from the poorer class. In this class alone He found those who were capable of entering into sympathy with Him and co-operating with Him in His work.

3. What, then, is the religious temper, the 'poverty of spirit,' which was associated in our Lord's mind with actual poverty? When we examine the saying in the light of the general context of the teaching of Jesus, we can discover three main ideas which are implied in it. (1) In the first place, poverty of spirit is the receptivity for the Divine message. It corresponds, in this sense, with the teachable, childlike spirit to which the Kingdom is elsewhere promised (Mt 18³⁷). The wealthier classes, in their scrupulous obedience to the Law, had become enslaved to custom and tradition. Before the new teaching could make any appeal to them, they had everything to unlearn, freeing their minds entirely of the prejudices and conventional ideas which had encrusted them. In the poor, the instinct for truth had never been perverted by mistaken habit and education. They could listen to Jesus with an open mind, and allow His message to make its own impression. From those who would enter into His Kingdom our Lord demands this receptivity, which in His own time He found, almost exclusively, among the poor,—the common people who heard Him gladly (Mk 12³⁷).—(2) The idea of humility is likewise implied. Arrogance and self-complacency are at all times the peculiar vices of men of wealth; and in our Lord's day these vices bore a religious as well as a social complexion. The rich man could boast, like the Pharisee in the parable, that he was not as other men, since he had fulfilled to the letter every demand of the Law. His pride as a rich man became, in the religious sphere, self-righteousness. Our Lord perceived that to such a temper of mind no true desire for God or right relation towards Him was possible. God could not bestow His gift on those who had never, in a deep sense of personal unworthiness, realized their need of it. The Kingdom of heaven was for the 'poor in spirit,'—the poor who are conscious of their poverty, and so make their approach to God.—(3) A third idea, characteristic of the whole teaching of Jesus, seems also to be involved in the words. Discipleship is impossible without a renunciation of earthly possessions. The natural result of wealth is to hamper a man in his pursuit of the higher life, since he cannot help reflecting, like the young ruler, how much it is likely to cost him. The poor have little to lose, and need have no hesitancy. They can answer the call of Christ at any moment, with an instant, unquestioning obedience. It is not, however, an outward poverty that our Lord demands, but a 'poverty of spirit,' an inward renunciation. There may be no demand for a literal abandonment of worldly possessions, but the true disciple will hold them indifferent. He will not be retarded in any Christian service by the fear of losing them. Whatever be his outward condition, he will have laid aside every weight, detached himself from all earthly considerations, and will act in the poor man's spirit of instant readiness at the Divine call.

The effect, therefore, of the added words in Mt. is to attach a deeper, moral significance to the original idea of poverty. Among the poor of His own land and time our Lord discovered the truest examples of the receptive, humble, unworldly temper which He demanded in His followers. The idea of social status was subordinate in His mind to that of an inward spirit, which is not necessarily confined to any particular class. By whatever process the qualifying words were introduced into the saying, they correctly interpret the real thought of Jesus, and are necessary to guard it from misconception.

4. The Beatitude as a whole is clearly reminiscent of OT passages which comfort the 'poor in the land' with the promise of Messianic blessedness (cf. esp. Ps 37). As in the other Beatitudes, our Lord arrests attention by stating His idea in a bold paradoxical form. The poor, whom men despised and pitied, were the truly rich; a wonderful inheritance was reserved for them, and was already 'theirs,' in the midst of their seeming poverty. We may trace, likewise, an implied answer to current Jewish theories of worldly misfortune as evidence of God's displeasure. The poor, so far from suffering a deserved punishment, were to be regarded as 'blessed.'—Their hardships were the promise and guarantee of their entrance into the Kingdom.

5. This Beatitude is placed first in the versions of both Mt. and Lk., and evidently with a deliberate intention. Poverty of spirit is the fundamental requirement in the Christian life. It represents a condition of mind and heart without which a man is wholly irresponsive to the Divine influences. As Jesus began His ministry with a call to repentance, so He pronounced His first Beatitude on the 'poor in spirit.' He thus repeated, under a different image, the great declaration, 'Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 18³).

POWER.—The term indicates the efficient force by which personal commands and the claims of law receive obedient attention and fulfilment.

In AV of Gospels 'power' is used with about equal frequency to represent two words in the original, δυναμις and ἐξουσια. These words are thus distinguished by Grimm-Thayer:—'δύναμις, power, natural ability, general and inherent; ἐξουσία, primarily liberty of action, then authority—either as delegated power or as unrestrained, arbitrary power.' Cf. also Cremer, s.vv. In RV, except in the three cases named below, 'authority' is given as the rendering of ἐξουσια, usually in the text, sometimes in the margin. Lk 22⁶⁵ retains 'power' without any marginal alternative; Jn 12 retains 'right'; Jn 10¹⁸ retains 'power,' but has 'right' in margin.

1. Power in the personal life of Christ.—During His earthly ministry, in the impression made both upon His disciples and upon the hostile Pharisees, as well as upon the mass of the people, there is abundant testimony to the transcendent personality of Christ. With this accords also the estimate concerning Him in the Acts and the Epistles. A vague attempt at assimilation likened Him to one of the prophets (Mt 16¹⁴), and Herod saw in Him the risen John the Baptist (Mk 6¹⁶), but otherwise His life and character were ever recognized as unique and beyond comparison (see AWE). In His works of healing, wrought on mind and body, the evidence was open to all (Mk 5¹⁵, Lk 9⁴²). It was the same with His teaching (Mt 7²⁹). In dealing with the most venerated religious precepts and traditions, He acts with the ease and freedom of original authority, noting limitations and supplying enlarged meanings and higher applications (Mt 5³³⁻⁴⁸). He rejects the offer of world empire (Lk 4⁶⁻⁸), and warns those whom He sent forward to tell of His approach not to rejoice even in the exercise of His delegated power (Lk 10²⁰). The same qualities of range and originality are recognized in His sympathy with the outcast and suffering (Lk 7³⁴ 13¹¹, Jn 11³⁵), in His knowledge of the heart and its temptations (Lk 5²⁰ 7⁴⁷, Jn 4¹⁸), and in His controversies with the Jewish leaders (Mt 22¹⁵⁻⁴⁶). A still deeper insight into the uniqueness of His character is afforded by what was involved in following and serving Him (Lk 14²⁵⁻³⁵, Jn 14¹² 15⁸). His works were stated by Himself to have been wrought in God (Jn 14¹⁰), who also had sent Him (9⁴ 16²⁸); and His day had been foreseen by Abraham (8⁵⁶) and Isaiah (61¹⁻²), and by the prophets generally (Lk 24²⁷). His Kingdom was to be coextensive with the world and its nationalities (Mt 8¹¹ 26¹³ 28¹⁹, Jn 10¹⁶ 17²⁰). The gift of His life, offered freely and apart from external constraint, was to be the bond of union among His disciples (Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁸, Jn 15¹² 13), and was to be the power that would draw the world unto Him (Jn 3¹⁴ 12³²). The impression thus made upon His disciples became in turn the testimony which they gave to the world—'The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father) full of grace and truth' (Jn 1¹⁴). See AUTHORITY OF CHRIST.

2. Power in the Kingdom of Christ.—Christ declared of His Kingdom that it was not of this world (Jn 18³⁶). Those worldly kingdoms were of the sword, established by and for physical dominion. As every created thing must, by the inward necessity of that condition, come to an end, so those kingdoms would perish by the sword (Mt 26⁵²). His Kingdom, on the other hand, did not rise from beneath, but descended from above, having its origin in the eternal thought of God, the Kingdom of heaven. With the first grasp of this meaning, its administration was spoken of as different from the law of a carnal commandment, being 'the power of an endless life' (He 7¹⁶).

In the prophetic intimation of its advent through the mediation of the sorrows of Zion, the essential character and tendency of this Kingdom, the requirements of its citizenship, the extent of its dominion, the motive of its statesmanship, its estimate of heroism, and its rewards of service, were all so new and conflicting, that there seemed to be two Messiahs, one who should reign and deliver, and one who should serve and suffer (Is 53. 59¹⁶⁻¹⁹ 61¹⁻³). Only the accomplished fact was able to reveal, and in new areas of its expansion is still revealing, that for such a Kingdom the anointed Head must needs have suffered in order to enter into His glory (Lk 24²⁶). The new and wonderful element that made its citizenship not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man (Jn 1¹³), consisted in this, that whereas in the kingdoms of the world there had been an ever-ascending scale of power, man living unto himself, and governments existing for the sake of the governing classes, so there was in this Kingdom a correspondingly descending scale of service in which all those features were precisely reversed. Whereas previously in religion men were the supplicants, and sacrificed unto their deities, and propitiated them by gifts and promises of devotion, in this Kingdom God Himself was the chief sacrificer, offering His only-begotten Son; and the Almighty sought to reconcile the weak unto Himself (Jn 3¹⁶ 36 12²⁷ 18³⁷). With this leading fact of the Kingdom all the others followed in complete agreement. He who would be accounted greatest must qualify for that distinction by becoming the servant of all (Mt 20²⁶ 28). Women are declared to excel in faith (Mt 15²⁸), discernment (26¹³), and courageous sacrifice (Mk 12⁴¹⁻⁴⁴). Little children are regarded with reverence, and the loving trust of a child's heart gives direction to the wise, and appoints the duties of the great (Mt 18³⁻⁴ 19¹⁴). The constitution and aspirations of the Kingdom, as embodied in the Sermon on the Mount, not only surpass all similar requirements of government, but seem to invert all that the world had hitherto counted great and noble. The innermost instinct of empire, the white ensign of this unique Kingdom, is the joy of harmonious relationship to the will of God. Government is by beatitudes. The crucifixion of self for the sake of others is the recognition mark of its people. This pervades all gradations of its society, for He who is on the throne emptied Himself, and what is done unto the least is regarded as done unto Him (Mt 25⁴⁰). Instead of pride and ambition, the lust of power and possession that had created and controlled other dynasties, its regalia and administration are entrusted to the poor in spirit who claim no homage. The dispensing of self for the sake of others is the recognition mark of its people. This pervades all gradations of its society, for He who is on the throne emptied Himself, and what is done unto the least is regarded as done unto Him (Mt 25⁴⁰). Instead of pride and ambition, the lust of power and possession that had created and controlled other dynasties, its regalia and administration are entrusted to the poor in spirit who claim no homage. The dispensing of the beatitudes is given to those who have become acquainted with grief and discouragement, whose necks have felt the pressure of the harsh forces and sharp limitations of life. Here also for exalted office there is the partaking of the Divine nature, but it is reserved for the pure in heart. So rich is the provision for its subjects, that even the cry of hunger becomes a feast, and to bear a burden and cross with Christ is an immediate Paradise. By its connexion with the One Name of which the OT spoke it fulfilled the vision of the prophets which Judaism had obscured, and, on the other hand, included in due place and proportion those gifts for physical need and circumstance that had been the crown and consummation of Gentile desire (Mt 6³⁸). These are both represented in the familiar and venerated form of prayer which in its first part lifts the language of our possession above all gifts to God Himself, but makes it treason for His Church to covet the Name, the Kingdom, and the Will. In its second part it encourages the claim of our continual frailty, ignorance, and dependence.

Again, the same principle of looking and stooping downwards and of uplifting what is beneath is the main subject-matter of the parables of Christ. The power that is seen exemplified in them is the counterpart of what is set forth in the Sermon on the Mount. Under various aspects, in whole or in part, they unfold the meaning of discipleship, the power of the Kingdom, and the dangers that attend its service. Here also, to be in the Kingdom is beatitude; and when this privilege of entrance has been prevented by any cause whatever, the regret over the one wasted life and its great opportunity is described as weeping and gnashing of teeth (Lk 13²⁸).

Thus in His life and death, in His teaching and labours, Christ conformed to the beatitudes of the Kingdom, and afterwards entrusted its advancement to His disciples. 'Come unto me—take my yoke—learn of me,—salvation, self-devotion, sainthood,—these were the steps into the Kingdom, and the power of its service.

In His last message to the disciples our Lord gave two special commands about the Kingdom they were to establish and extend in His name. This communication was accompanied by a touching and solemn act of covenant, and endeared by the mention of all that He had been and would be to them. The first concerned the loyalty to Himself that was to carry with it the invincible power of the Kingdom. It was, 'Abide in me and I in you' (Jn 15⁴). In His cherished presence they would know His purpose, and that would be their way of power. This presence, however, could be granted only where they loved one another as He had loved them (v.¹²). It was in vain to go out to the conquest of the world unless this base of operations was safeguarded. They were to tarry in Jerusalem until it became in each heart a conscious experience beyond the reach of doubt or discouragement. This enabling supernatural power of the Kingdom came to be called the grace of God. In 1 Co 13 its essential meaning is breathed forth as from a vase containing the fragrance of what is no longer visible. Its power within the heart is exhibited in Ro 8, and its energy of diffusion in Ro 13.

The second charge affected the world that was to be His possession, the nations that were to bring each its special riches and glory into His Kingdom (Mt 28^{19, 20}, cf. Mk 16¹⁵). It was His greatest commandment, and is therefore the greatest test of love to Him. He recognized the right and claim of the world to wait until it received sufficient evidence that He had been sent to be its Ruler. He warned His disciples that the only evidence that could carry such conviction would be the sight of a Church so filled with the spirit of His Kingdom and so devoted to the fulfilment of His command, that all things would give way in order to the presentation of that proof. The world that will say the Church is one will say that Christ is Lord (Jn 10¹⁶ 17²¹⁻²³).

PRÆTORIUM.—The word occurs in the text of Mk 15¹⁶ only, but in the margin of Mt 27²⁷, Jn 18^{28, 33} 19⁹, with Ac 23³⁵ and Ph 1¹³. In the Gr. it is a transliteration of the Lat. prætorium, which originally meant the tent of the commander of an army, and then the official residence of a provincial governor; other senses, such as that of the Imperial bodyguard or even of a spacious country house, were gradually acquired. In most of the passages in the Gospels it is used in reference to a part or the whole of Pilate's official residence in Jerusalem, which was probably the palace of Herod the Great (see PAVEMENT).

Two other identifications are supported by comparatively early tradition, but are not on the whole to be approved. That Pilate's house was in the lower city, a little to the north of the Temple, is altogether unlikely. The theory has failed to be confirmed by any discovery of the site; and it is not easy to see why Pilate should prefer such a locality, when the palace built by Herod was available as the official residence of the procurator. More can be said in favour of Pilate's occupation of the castle of Antonia, which stood to the north-west of the Temple area. It was a fortress and prison, and served as the headquarters of the garrison at Jerusalem. Josephus (Ant. xv. xi. 4; B.J. i. v. 4) describes it as a citadel, with abundant accommodation, and connected with the precincts of the Temple by a private way. But, again, Pilate was not likely, especially when accompanied by his wife and household (Mt 27¹⁹), to stay there, when the sumptuous palace of Herod, with its gardens and banquetting halls, was at his disposal. It is true that the proximity of Antonia to the Temple would be a convenience to the priests and Sanhedrists, and save them from the toil of attendance at the more remote palace; but Pilate was not the man to study the wishes or comfort of the Jewish leaders at the cost of any discomfort to himself. The arguments in favour of his adoption of the castle as his residence have been accepted, amongst recent commentators, by Westcott (on Jn 18) and Swete (on Mk 15¹⁶); but, on the other hand, Herod's palace has been preferred by Schürer, Edersheim, Sir C. Wilson, and commentators such as Alford and Meyer. The practice at Jerusalem would thus correspond with that at Casarea (Ac 23³³⁻³⁵).

Such a hypothesis leaves the passages in which the prætorium is referred to without any serious difficulty; and it becomes possible to follow the probable order of events. According to St. John, the trial of Jesus took place in one of the porticoes of Herod's palace. When sentence was pronounced, Jesus was led away by the soldiers to Antonia, where they were themselves quartered, and where prisoners were ordinarily detained. He was taken into a court, to which also the name of prætorium is given (Mt 27²⁷, Mk 15¹⁶), and mocked by such of the soldiers as were off duty. In this connexion prætorium denotes probably the place of meeting of the council of chief officers for the transaction of the business of the cohort and for the trial of offences in the absence of the procurator. Such a usage of the term is anticipated, if not illustrated, in Livy (Hist. xxx. 5, xxxvii. 5); and the existence of such a court would be necessary for the maintaining of order in Jerusalem and the vicinity. When the soldiers were weary of the mocking, they led Jesus away again to be crucified.

PRAISE.—1. Introductory.—Both in the OT and the NT the predominant idea of 'praise' is that of a tribute of homage in utterance, publicly expressed and rendered to God by His creatures. It forms the essence of worship, whether as offered by angels (cf. Lk 2^{13, 14, 20}, Rev 14^{6f}) or men (cf. Lk 19^{37f}). The subject of this 'praise' is either the excellencies of God's attributes and revealed nature (cf. esp. Rev 19) or the beneficent action of His providence, as shown more particularly in creation, revelation, and redemption (thanksgiving); cf. Ac 2⁴⁷, Rev 15^{3f}. In the Gospels Jesus is sometimes the object of praise and homage (Mt 21¹⁶; cf. Lk 4¹⁵), and Himself often dispenses praise for certain qualities of human nature or character (cf. Mt 8¹⁰ 11¹¹ etc.). The praise of man by man is usually applied in the Gospels to unreal and hypocritical commendation, and is condemned by Jesus (Mt 6¹, Lk 6²⁶; cf. Jn 5⁴¹⁻⁴⁴ 12⁴³).

2. Jewish usage.—In Jewish worship the element of praise occupies a dominant place, and has received rich and manifold expression. The title of the Bk. of Psalms in the MT, Sepher Tehillim * (and its variants) = 'Book of Praises or Praise-Songs,' is an indication of the emphasis which was laid on the note of praise in later Jewish worship. This note is already prominent in the Psalter itself (cf. e.g. 'O thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel,' Ps 22³). The close connexion existing between the ideas of praise and thanksgiving (cf. e.g. Ps 100⁴ 'Enter his gates with thanksgiving, his courts with praise') has already been pointed out in this work (see art. BLESSING, § 1). Indeed, thanksgiving (Heb. hōdāh)—esp. for God's beneficence in creation, revelation, and providence—is an essential part of praise. If a distinction can be drawn, praise pure and simple is rather to be associated with extolling God's perfections and holiness, while blessing (thanksgiving) is connected rather with thankful recognition of His goodness, beneficence, and mercy. But this is true only in a general sense; the two conceptions are so intimately related that one passes over into the other almost imperceptibly.

For the Hebrew terms employed with the meaning 'praise' and its cognates, reference may be made to the art. 'Praise (in OT)' in Hastings' DB iv. 33f. The most frequent are—הָלַל 'praise' (esp. in the liturgical formula הַלְלִיָּהּ = Hallelujah), הֵרָא 'give thanks' (RV), בָּרַךְ 'bless,' יָצַר 'make melody'; rare synonyms are—שָׁבַח 'laud' (but very frequent in Jewish liturgy), הִגְדִּיל 'exalt,' גִּבֹּר 'magnify.' Cf. also such phrases as 'Sing unto J' a new song.'

In the Synagogue Liturgy the element of praise has received splendid expression. The most classical examples of this are perhaps the great 'Benediction of Song' (ברכת השיר) † and the Kaddish. ‡ The former of these, in its shortest form, runs thus:

'Be Thy name lauded for ever, O our King, the great and holy God and King, in heaven and on earth; for unto Thee, O Lord our God and God of our fathers, song and laud are becoming, praise and psalm, strength and dominion, victory, greatness and might, renown and glory, holiness and sovereignty, blessings and thanksgivings, from henceforth, even for ever. Blessed art Thou, O Lord, God and King, great in praises, God of thanksgivings, Lord of wonders, who makest choice of melodious song, O King and God, the Life of all worlds.'

* The title of one of the late (synagogal) Psalms is תְּהִלָּה לַדָּוִד, Ps 146¹ ('Praise-Song of David').

† Cf. Singer's Heb.-Eng. Daily Prayer Book, pp. 36, 125-127. See also an art. by the present writer, 'S. Peter in the Jewish Liturgy,' in the Ezpt [1903], xv. 93f.

‡ Singer, p. 37.

In the Kaddish the following characteristic paragraph occurs :

'Blessed, lauded, and glorified, exalted, extolled and honoured, magnified and praised be the name of the Holy One, Blessed be He; though He be high above all the blessings and songs, hymns of praise and consolation, which are uttered in the world.'

These are simply specimens of what pervades the entire Jewish Liturgy. In the Gospels the Angels' Song of Praise (Lk 21⁴) is an example of pure praise in worship, parallels to which are to be found in the Apocalypse (4¹¹ 7¹² 11¹⁷ 14⁷ 19¹¹). In Rabbinical theology, it is to be noticed, prayer and praise form the spiritual counterpart and fulfilment of the old daily sacrifice in the Temple. The words of Hosea (14²), 'We shall render as bullocks the offering of our lips,' were interpreted in this sense. Spiritual worship thus becomes a 'sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving.' Cf. He 13¹⁵ ('Through him'—i.e. Christ—'let us offer up a sacrifice of praise') with Westcott's note; cf. also our Lord's application of the words of Hos 6⁹ ('I desire mercy, and not sacrifice') in Mt 9¹³ 12⁷.

For the close connexion of prayer and praise—which are sometimes intermingled in the Jewish Liturgy, e.g. in the 'Eighteen Blessings'—cf. Cheyne's note on Ps 42⁹ (Book of Psalms [1888], p. 118 f.).

3. Usage in the Gospels.—The note of praise so characteristic of Jewish worship also pervades the Gospels. It is esp. prominent in the Third Gospel, where it appears not only in the Jewish-Christian Nativity-narrative (chs. 1. 2) [see HYMN], but also elsewhere (cf. 19³⁷). It is noticeable how often the people (spectators, the assembled multitude) are represented as 'praising' or 'glorifying' God for some great exhibition of power wrought by Jesus (see below).

The Greek terms for 'praise' and its cognates used in the Gospels are—αἰνῶν, 'praise' (cf. δοῦναι αἶνον τῷ θεῷ, Lk 18⁴³), used in LXX for לְהַלֵּל, לְהַלְלֵהוּ, לְהַלְלֵהוּ; δοῦναι 'glory,' δοξάζειν 'glorify' [in LXX δοῦναι most freq. כָּבוֹד; several times for הָדָר, הָרָר, etc.; δοξάζειν usually = כָּבֵד in LXX]; δοῦναι δοξαν τῷ θεῷ, Lk 17¹⁸; εὐλογεῖν 'bless' [LXX usually for בָּרַךְ]; εὐλογεῖν 'to celebrate,' 'give praise or thanks to,' Mt 11²⁵ and ||. See, further, art. BLESSING, §§ 2 and 4.

The following formulas of praise are to be noted :

- (a) The Angels' Hymn (Lk 21⁴)—
'Glory to God in the highest,
And on earth peace among men of his goodwill.'
For the arrangement in two, not three, lines, cf. Plummer, Com. on 'St. Luke' in ICC, ad loc. Here ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις = כְּכַרְוִימִים 'in the heavenly places,' and refers to the adoration of the angels in heaven (cf. Ps 148¹ LXX: αἰνεῖτε αὐτὸν (τὸν κύριον) ἐν τοῖς ὑψίστοις); cf. Lk 19³⁸. With this should be compared the doxological form (ὡς ἡ δοξα . . . εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας). See below, § 4.
- (b) 'Hosanna in the highest'; see art. HOSANNA.
- (c) 'Blessed is . . .'; especially in the phrase, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord' (εὐλογημένος ὁ ἐρχόμενος ἐν ὀνόματι Κυρίου), Mt 21⁹ 23³⁹, Mk 11⁹, Lk 13³⁵ 19³⁸, Jn 12¹³. The use of 'blessed' (μακάριος) in the Beatitudes is also notable; cf. also its use in personal address, Mt 16¹⁷ (Lk 11²⁷, 28⁹). To these may here be added—
(d) The use of the phrase 'give God (the) praise' (or 'glory') : δοῦναι δοξαν τῷ θεῷ = שִׁים כְּבוֹד לַיהוָה (תתן), and has various shades of meaning, according to the context—e.g. of thanksgiving for benefits received, Lk 17¹⁸; by confession (of sin), Jn 9²⁴; cf. Jos 7¹⁹. The phrase is frequent in Rev. of celebrating God's praises (Rev 4⁹ 11¹³ 19⁷).

The frequent mention in the Gospels of the multitudes as 'praising' or 'glorifying' God, esp. for the wonderful works wrought by Christ, is worth noting. It shows how deeply this element of public worship had impressed itself upon the popular mind and heart in Israel. A typical example is Mt 9⁸ ('But when the multitudes saw it [the healing of the sick of the palsy], they were afraid, and glorified God, which had given such power unto men'). Cf. Mk 2¹², Lk 5²⁶, 26¹²; Lk 2²⁰ (shepherds) 7¹⁶ 18⁴³ 23⁴⁷ (the centurion at the cross); cf. also Lk 13¹³ (healing of woman with spirit of infirmity: 'and . . . she was made straight, and glorified God'); Lk 17¹⁵ (healing of the ten lepers) is esp. notable, because the grateful one who returned to give thanks to Christ, combined his thanksgiving with 'glorifying God.' Our Lord's words in this connexion are striking: 'Were there none found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger?' (v. 18)—words which imply that the duty of grateful praise to God was not always fully recognized in individual practice.

Our Lord's emphatic word about giving 'glory' to God (Lk 17¹⁸) has already been referred to. As the spontaneous expression of a pure religious instinct, this would naturally be encouraged by Him whenever He met with it. According to Jn 5⁴¹⁻⁴⁴, He reproaches the Pharisees with seeking honour from one another rather than from God. But He does not hesitate to accept praise and homage offered to His own person when such is sincere and spontaneous (cf. Mt 21¹⁶). He dispenses praise in a manner implying a unique claim to appraise and publicly express moral judgments on human character: in this way He expresses His approbation of John the Baptist (Mt 11¹¹), all acts of faith (8¹⁰ 9²² 15²⁸ 16⁸, Lk 7⁹), good and loyal service (Mt 25¹¹, 23³, Lk 19¹⁷), all generosity of gift (Mk 12⁴³ 14⁶), self-devotion (Lk 10⁴¹), prudence (Lk 16⁸).*

Outside the Gospels (viz. in the Epp.) the subject of Christian praise is, as is natural, mainly the great facts of redemption (cf. 1 P 2¹⁰, Ro 15⁹⁻¹¹, Eph 13¹⁻⁴, etc.). Creation and redemption are combined in the Christian Liturgies.

4. Ascriptions of praise to Christ outside the Gospels.—It is noticeable that, in at least three (and possibly more) of the Apostolic doxologies, the address is directly to Christ, viz. 2 Ti 4¹⁸ ('The Lord . . . to whom be the glory,' etc.); 2 P 3¹⁸ ('the grace of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be the glory,' etc.); Rev 1⁶ ('him that loveth us, and loosed us from our sins, . . . to him be the glory,' etc.). He 13²¹ and 1 P 4¹¹ are possible cases also. In two cases the ascription of glory to God is made through Christ, viz. Ro 16²⁷ ('to the only wise God, through Jesus Christ') and Jude 25 ('to the only God our Saviour, through Jesus Christ our Lord, be glory, majesty, dominion, power'), etc. See, further, Westcott, Add. Note on He 13²¹ (Com. p. 464 f.).

The doxology of the Lord's Prayer is probably a later liturgical addition, inserted in the text of the Gospels, perhaps, under the influence of liturgical usage. See Chase, 'The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church' (Texts and Studies), pp. 168-174, and art. LORD'S PRAYER, p. 59^b.

PRAYER.—For the Christian what is said in the Gospels is absolute as to the duty of prayer for himself and for others; but he need not fear that in fulfilling this duty he is doing what reason cannot approve. It does not fall within the scope of this article to attempt to find a scientific basis for prayer; nor need more be said about the reasonableness of prayer than to point out two considerations: (1) The practice of countless races of mankind throughout countless generations is not likely to be based upon a complete delusion. Untold millions of human beings, including a majority of the most gifted and enlightened, have prayed and continue to pray, because they believe that experience has taught them that prayer is efficacious. (2) We have been placed in a world that is full of good things which are suitable to our needs. Yet it is certain that the world is so ordered that very few of these good things can be enjoyed by us, unless we take the trouble to appropriate them. There is, therefore, nothing unreasonable in believing that the world has been so ordered that some of the blessings which are within our reach cannot be enjoyed unless we pray for them. In the laws which govern the Universe, provision has certainly been made for the operation of men's wills and activities. Consequently there is nothing illogical or unscientific in believing that in those laws provision has been made for the operation of men's prayers. The cases are not completely parallel, because demonstration is possible in the one case but not in the other; for the connexion between work and its results can be proved, while the connexion between prayer and its results cannot, for the obvious reason that faith is an essential condition of prayer, and proof would destroy faith. Nevertheless, the analogy between the two cases is sufficiently complete to show that there is no necessary antagonism between knowledge of the reign of law and belief in the efficacy of prayer.

In discussing the subject of prayer in reference to Christ and the Gospels, we may consider these topics: (1) the words used to express the idea of prayer; (2) places and times of prayer; (3) attitude in prayer; (4) Christ's example; (5) Christ's doctrine.

1. There are a few words for 'prayer' in the NT which are not found in the Gospels: εὐχόμεαι, εὐχή, ἐντυγχάνω, ἐντευξίς, ὑπερεντυγχάνω, ἱκετηρία. But the majority of such words occur in the Gospels, and their distribution is of interest.

(1) προσιύχομαι, very frequent in the Synoptics, not in John; προσευχή, 8 times in the Synoptics, not in John; (2) δίδωμαι, Mt 13⁸, 8 times in Luke, not in John; δέχομαι, Lk 11³ 23⁷ 53³; (3) ἱκετάω, rare in this sense in the Synoptics, frequent in John; (4) αἰτέω and αἰτέομαι, in all four; αἰτήσιμα, Lk 23²⁴. Of these four sets of words, the first alone is specially appropriated to the worship of God: it implies that the person addressed in prayer is Divine. The second implies personal need and a special petition to God and man for the supply of a want. The third (which frequently means to ask a question), when used of making requests, generally asks a person to do something (Mk 7²⁶, Lk 5³⁷, Jn 4⁴⁰-47 14¹⁶ 17¹⁵, 26). The fourth indicates a simple request to give something (Mt 7⁷⁻¹¹, Lk 11⁹⁻¹³, Jn 14¹³, 14). The middle voice sometimes adding intensity to the request. All except the first may be used of petitions to men, and have no necessary connexion with the worship of God.

2. Places and times of prayer.—The chief place was the Temple: 'My house shall be called a house of prayer' (Mt 21¹³, Mk 11¹⁷, Lk 19⁴⁶). Christ called it 'My Father's house' (Lk 2⁴⁹, Jn 2¹⁶), and, as such, it is the type of heaven (Jn 14²). St. Luke tells of others worshipping in the Temple: Zacharias (1⁹), Simeon (2²⁷), Anna (2³⁷), the disciples (24⁵³), and (in a parable) the Pharisee and the Publican (18¹⁰). The worship in the synagogues was frequently attended by Christ, especially in the earlier part of His ministry (Mt 12⁹ 13⁵⁴, Mk 1²¹ 3¹ 6², Lk 4¹⁶ 6⁶, Jn 6⁵⁹ 18²⁰); and no doubt His disciples frequently did the same. There is also the inner chamber (ταμιεῖον, Mt 6⁶), and the guest-chamber (κατὰλυσμα, Mk 14¹⁴, Lk 22¹¹) or upper room (ἀνάγαιον, Mk 14¹⁵, Lk 22¹²), in which the prayer of the great High Priest seems to have been offered (Jn 17, although some would place the scene of this in the Temple, cf. 14²¹), and in which Jesus and the Eleven 'sang a hymn' (Mt 26³⁰, Mk 14²⁶) before going to the Mount of Olives. Nathanael's fig-tree (Jn 1⁴⁸) and Gethsemane (Mt 26³⁶, Mk 14³²) lead us to think of gardens as places of retirement for prayer. And there is also the mountain-top near Bethsaida (Mk 6⁴⁶), and that other which was the scene of the Transfiguration (Mt 17¹, Mk 9², Lk 9²⁸), and which St. Luke tells us was ascended for the purpose of prayer.

Not much is said in the Gospels about times of prayer; but we read of Christ rising up before daylight and going to a desert spot to pray (Mk 1³⁵), and of His continuing all night in prayer before the choosing of the twelve Apostles (Lk 6¹²). The evening before His arrest is another recorded instance.

3. The common attitude in prayer among the Jews was standing; and this our Lord assumes in His teaching (Mt 6³, Mk 11²⁵, Lk 18¹¹, 13). But He Himself knelt in the garden (Lk 22⁴¹): and it was perhaps in consequence of His example on that occasion that in the NT the first Christians are always represented as kneeling. Outside the Gospels no other posture for prayer is mentioned.

4. Christ's example.—Much more important than terminology, or the mention of places, times, and postures for prayer, is the fact that Jesus Christ, by His own example, has taught us the duty of prayer. Not that we need suppose that He prayed merely in order to set us an example: prayer was one of those things which became Him, in order that He might 'fulfil all righteousness' (Mt 3¹⁵). But example, as set by Him, is of the very strongest. If in such a life as His there was not only room but need for prayer, much more must there be room and need in such lives as ours. Nor were His prayers always prayers for others. In most cases we are not told why or for what He prayed: this we have to gather from the context. On one great occasion, in the garden, just before His Passion, we know that He prayed for Himself (Mt 26³⁹, Mk 14³⁵, Lk 22⁴¹). An hour or two before this, just after the Supper, we know that He prayed for His disciples (Jn 17⁶⁻¹⁹) and for the whole Church (Jn 17²⁰⁻²⁶); and a few hours later He prayed for those who nailed Him to the Cross (Lk 23³⁴, a verse which is historically true, whether St. Luke wrote it or not). Moreover, He has left us an example of intercession, not merely for groups of persons, large and small, but also for an individual. He assured St. Peter, 'I made supplication for thee, that thy faith fail not' (Lk 22³²).

It should be noticed that the instances of Christ's praying which are recorded in the Gospels are found just before or just after leading events in the Lord's life; also that the majority of them are given us by St. Luke, whose Gospel is sometimes called 'the Gospel of Prayer.' There are, indeed, three recorded instances of His praying which are omitted by St. Luke. St. Mark (1³⁵) mentions His retirement for prayer after healing multitudes at Capernaum, where St. Luke (4⁴²) mentions only the retirement. Both St. Mark (6⁴⁶) and St. Matthew (14²³) record His retirement for prayer after the feeding of the 5000, where St. Luke (9¹⁷) omits both retirement and prayer. And St. John (12²⁷, 28) tells of His prayer when certain Greeks were brought to Him, where St. Luke omits the whole incident. As we might expect, the prayer for Himself in the garden of Gethsemane is recorded by all three Synoptists (Mt 26³⁹, Mk 14³⁵, Lk 22⁴¹). Nothing in the Gospels is stronger evidence of the reality of our Lord's humanity than that prayer, and it evidently established itself firmly in the earliest traditions respecting Him. But there are seven instances in which St. Luke is alone in relating that Jesus prayed: at His baptism (3²¹); before His first collision with the Jewish hierarchy (5¹⁶); before choosing the Twelve (6¹²); before the first prediction of His Passion (9¹⁸); at His Transfiguration (9²⁹); before teaching the Lord's Prayer (11¹); and on the Cross (23^{34, 46}).

There are three other cases where prayer on the part of Christ seems to be implied, although it is not expressly stated. He looked up to heaven before breaking the bread at the feeding of the 5000 (Mt 14¹³, Mk 6⁴¹, Lk 9¹⁶). So also, before healing the deaf man who had an impediment in his speech, Jesus looked up to heaven and sighed (Mk 7³⁴). Still more clearly, before raising Lazarus, Jesus lifted up His eyes, and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me (Jn 11⁴¹). We venture to count all three of these as occasions on which Jesus prayed.

This gives us, in all, fourteen instances: two in all three Gospels, one in Matthew and Mark, two in Mark alone, two in John alone, and seven in Luke alone. They cover the whole of Christ's public life from His baptism to the moment of His death, and show His dependence upon His Father for help and strength and refreshment. To say with Victor of Antioch (Swete on Mk 1³⁵), that Christ prayed οὐκ αὐτὸς ταύτης δεόμενος . . . ἀλλ' οἰκονομικῶς τοῦτο ποιῶν, is not adequate, even if in some sense true. He 5⁷⁻⁸ places us nearer to the truth. We ought to beware of suggesting that our Lord's prayers were in any way unreal. It was out of the fulness of His own experience in a life of absolutely unique difficulty, toil, and suffering that He said, 'Ask, and it shall be given you.'

5. Christ's doctrine.—In addition to His weighty example as to the duty and blessedness of prayer, we have Christ's frequent sayings on the subject. That men 'ought always to pray and not to faint' was evidently a marked feature in His teaching, and it appears in three different forms: (1) On two occasions, apparently, once spontaneously (Mt 6⁵⁻¹⁵), and once at the request of a disciple (Lk 11¹⁴), Christ gave His followers a definite form of prayer. If, however, as some think, there was only one occasion on which this was done, then St. Luke rather than St. Matthew gives the historic setting. (2) He devoted certain parables to the subject. (3) He uttered a variety of sayings, enforcing and completing the teaching of the parables.

(1) The LORD'S PRAYER is the subject of separate articles, to which the reader is referred.

(2) There are five parables, three of which bear directly and two indirectly on the subject of prayer. Two, both of them in St. Luke only, teach that prayer must be importunate and persevering. These are the Friend at Midnight (11⁵⁻⁸), which follows the giving of the Lord's Prayer, and the Unjust Judge (18¹⁻⁸). So far as the two parables differ, the former teaches that prayer is never out of season, the latter that it is sure to bring a blessing and not a curse. But we must beware of supposing that either parable teaches that by constant prayer we at last overcome God's unwillingness. The argument in both parables is a fortiori, and is strongest in the second. 'If an unrighteous judge would yield to the importunity of an unknown widow, who came and spoke to him at intervals, much more will a righteous God be ready to reward the perseverance of His own elect, who cry to Him day and night.' God's desire to help is always present; by perseverance in prayer we appropriate it. In the helpful illustration of the anchored ship, pointed out by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 23), the sailors who pull the rope seem to draw the anchor to the ship; in reality they draw the ship to the anchor.

The parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, which also is preserved by St. Luke alone, and is placed by him immediately after that of the Unjust Judge, teaches the frame of mind in which God must be approached in prayer, viz. a deep sense, not only of need (as in the other two parables), but of unworthiness. Before Him we have no claim to merit, no ground for self-congratulation. The parable indicates that downcast eyes and beating of the breast are natural accompaniments of a penitent's prayer. Less directly, and apart from its main purpose, the parable of the Prodigal Son teaches a similar lesson. The lost son's prayer, as planned before his return and as actually uttered, is touching in its humility.

In both these cases, the Publican and the Prodigal, the chief thing prayed for is forgiveness, as must constantly be the case with sinful man. And there is yet another parable which teaches what is requisite, if this most necessary of all prayers is to be rightly offered: the sinner himself must have a forgiving spirit. The Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18²¹⁻³⁵) by asking for forgiveness for himself thereby bound himself to be forgiving to his fellows. His refusal to recognize this obligation became fatal to his own forgiveness. The great truth, that one who asks to be forgiven must be ready to forgive, had been clearly seen by the more spiritual among the Jews. There is a striking anticipation of Christ's teaching in Sir 28²⁻⁵.

(3) Besides the parables, there are frequent sayings of Christ on the subject of prayer, and these are found in all four Gospels. The necessity of a forgiving spirit is repeated in Mt 6^{14, 15} and Mk 11²⁵, with obvious reference to the Lord's Prayer. Two other things are stated as necessary accompaniments of prayer: watchfulness (Mk 13³³ 14³⁸, Mt 26⁴¹) and faith (Mk 11²⁴, Mt 21²²). This last is specially emphasized, as being the test of reality and the condition of success. It is the result of the human will being brought into complete union with the will of God, producing absolute trust in the fulfilment of His promises. And we may be all the more sure of success in our prayers if others join with us in making them (Mt 18¹⁹). Prayers which are approved by many are more likely to be right. Desires in which we cannot ask others to join are likely to be selfish.

And there are two things specially to be avoided: prate (Mt 6⁵⁻⁶ 23¹⁴, Mk 12⁴⁰, Lk 20⁴⁷) and prating (Mt 6⁷). In the latter passage the 'vain repetitions' of AV and RV is apt to mislead. The 'babe' of Tindale and the Genevan is perhaps better. Repetition of prayers, even in the same form of words, is encouraged by our Lord, both by precept (Lk 18¹⁻⁸) and by example (Mt 26⁴⁴). It is the mechanical repetition of a formula (1 K 18²⁶), as if it were a magical charm, to compel the compliance of the Deity, that seems to be forbidden. Our petitions must have a worthy meaning, and we must think of the meaning.

Instruction is also given as to the right objects of prayer. We are to pray for spiritual progress (Lk 11¹³) in ourselves, in others, and in the world at large. We are to pray that we ourselves may be delivered from temptation (Mt 6¹³ 26⁴¹, Mk 14³⁸, Lk 11⁴ 22^{40, 46}), and that evil may be cast out from others (Mt 17²¹, Mk 9²⁸), and that missionaries for the conversion of the world may be multiplied (Mt 9³⁸, Lk 10²). In our intercessions our enemies are to be specially included (Mt 5⁴⁴, Lk 6²⁸). About temporal blessings we are not to be over anxious; yet prayer for them is not merely allowed but enjoined (Mt 6¹¹, Lk 11³); as also is prayer against temporal calamities (Mk 13¹⁸, Mt 24²⁰). The prayer of the disciples for help in the storm was heard (Mt 8²⁶, Mk 4³⁹, Lk 8²⁴).

Parallels to some of the items of this teaching could be found in the OT. But there is one point with regard to the method of prayer which is absolutely new. Men had been taught to worship God and even to pray to Him as a Father: now they are told to pray to the Father in the name of the Son (Jn 16^{23, 24, 26}). Anything that can be rightly asked in Christ's name will be granted (Jn 14^{13, 14}); and there is no other limit. Any request which is consistent with His character and office, as represented by His name, may be made to His Father, with confidence that the prayer will be heard (Jn 15^{7, 16}). The prayer of the sons of Zebedee for the right and left hand places in the Kingdom (Mt 20²¹, Mk 10³⁷) was not of this character, and was not commended. Nor, for the same reason, were they allowed to pray for a special judgment on the inhospitable Samaritans (Lk 9^{54, 55}). Both requests were made in spiritual ignorance. It confirms our trust in the historical fidelity of the Fourth Gospel, that this remarkable development in the teaching of Christ respecting prayer in His name occurs in the farewell discourses.

There is yet another particular which is absolutely new, viz. worship offered to Christ Himself as to a Divine person: and once more the clearest instances of this are in the Fourth Gospel. St. Matthew often, and St. Mark once, mention the fact that people 'worshipped' (προσεκύνησαν) Jesus. But even where this worship is accompanied by a request that He would cleanse a leper (Mt 8²) or raise the dead (Mt 9¹⁸), this act of prostration does not necessarily imply more than that He was regarded as a great prophet (1 K 18⁷, Dn 2⁴⁶). The worship of Him by the disciples after the Resurrection (Mt 28^{9, 17}, Lk 24⁵²) carries us further: yet it might be argued that this also is the worship of mere reverence. But about the meaning of the worship of the man born blind (Jn 9³⁸) there can be little doubt; all the less so, because St. John always uses προσκυνέω of the worship of God (4²⁰⁻²⁴ 12²⁰), never of mere respect to great men; and the use of the word in the Apocalypse is similar. Still less can there be any doubt as to the meaning of the adoring exclamation of the sceptical Apostle (Jn 20²⁸)—'the loftiest view of the Lord given in the Gospels' (Westcott), and the climax to which the scheme of St. John's Gospel steadily leads up. In none of these cases did Jesus reject the worship, or rebuke those who offered it to Him.

LITERATURE.—Works on the reasonableness and the efficacy of prayer abound, but they are outside the sphere of this article. Handbooks of Biblical Theology give little help. In Bible Dictionaries the art. on 'Prayer' in Hastings, iv. p. 42 ff., should be consulted; also in Schaff-Herzog, iii. p. 1879, and in Herzog-Plitt, art. on 'Gebet,' some information will be found.

A. PLUMMER.

PREACHING.—In the Gospels three Gr. words are used for preaching, viz. κηρύσσω, 'proclaim as a herald,' with the corresponding substantive κήρυγμα; καταγγέλλω, 'announce,' 'declare'; εὐαγγελίζω, 'tell good tidings,' with the corresponding substantive εὐαγγέλιον, 'good tidings.' A fourth word, λάλέω, 'talk,' 'discourse,' is also rendered 'preach' in Mk 2² AV (as also in Ac 8²⁵ 11¹⁹ 13⁴² 14²⁵ 16⁹); but in RV this is rendered 'speak' ('he spake the word unto them'). In a general way it may be said that preaching, as the proclamation of a message, was distinguished from teaching (διδασχῆ), the explanation and vindication of truth. In some cases this distinction is marked. Thus John the Baptist was emphatically a preacher, he came to announce the coming of the Kingdom of God; Jesus began where John left off by also preaching this message; and the Twelve were sent out to preach (κηρύσσειν, Mk 3¹⁴, cf. Mt 10⁷, Lk 9⁹). The function of the Seventy was similar (Lk 10⁹). But in all but His earlier ministry our Lord was more occupied in what is expressly called 'teaching.' While John, and Jesus Himself at first, as well as His disciples throughout the Gospel period, only preached, announcing the message from heaven, it was reserved to our Lord to explain the great truths of the gospel by teaching. The forerunner and the Apostles announced that the Kingdom was to come, without discussing its nature; Jesus Christ went further, and laboured to show what this Divine Kingdom really was. So, while John was content to prepare for the Kingdom, with the assurance that it was 'at hand,' Jesus asked, 'Whereunto shall I liken the kingdom of God?' and proceeded to illustrate its characteristics. This was regarded as teaching. Further, while the preaching was for all who would hear, a public utterance designed to arrest attention, the teaching was more especially designed for disciples; and while some of it was public, much of it was given in private. In the second year of our Lord's ministry, after the breach with the authorities and the defection of the multitude, there was less preaching and more teaching in the training of the Twelve.

This distinction cannot, however, be maintained throughout. Sometimes our Lord's most public utterances are described as 'teaching,' and are of the character of instruction (e.g. Mk 2¹³ 4¹⁻²). Moreover, teaching is blended with preaching. The difference is more carefully maintained in Mk. than in Mt. Thus Mk. states that Jesus came into Galilee preaching the Kingdom of God (Mk 1¹⁴)—the public open-air proclamation; but that He went into a synagogue to teach (Mk 1²¹), where after the scripture had been read He would expound it (cf. Lk 4^{20ff.}). But in Mt. we have teaching and preaching both assigned to our Lord's work in the synagogues (Mt 4²³). We may infer from the earlier Gospel that Jesus did recognize the distinction between the two kinds of utterance, though probably one would often pass over into the other.

When we turn from verbal distinctions to the real differences, we may observe three methods followed by our Lord, according to circumstance and requirement: (1) The primitive proclamation, in making which He went on the lines laid down by John the Baptist; (2) the public teaching of the laws and principles of the Kingdom of God, offered to all who would attend to it, whether in the open air or in the synagogues; (3) the private training of His own disciples and discourse with inquirers. Both (1) and (2) come into our modern conception of Preaching, and we must understand the actual preaching of Jesus to comprehend them. See also the following article and art. TEACHING.

W. F. ADENEY.

PREACHING CHRIST.—The purpose of this article is to explain what is meant by 'preaching Christ.' It is assumed that to preach Christ is the preacher's function, and the intention is to show what such preaching involved in the beginning, and what it must include still if it is to be true to its original. Changing conditions may demand for it different forms, but presumably under all forms there will be a vital continuity or rather identity in the substance which is preached.

1. The NT as a whole presents Jesus in the character of the Christ. When the first preachers preached Him, it was in this character. 'God,' says Peter, 'hath made this same Jesus both Lord and Christ' (Ac 2³⁶). 'Saul confounded the Jews that dwelt in Damascus, proving that this is the Christ' (9²²). All the Evangelists agree with this: see Mt 1¹⁻¹⁸, Mk 1¹, Lk 2¹¹, Jn 20³¹. Now 'the Christ,' or 'the Messiah,' was not a meaningless expression for Jews: it had a distinct meaning, and a great range of ideas and hopes attached to it. There was a Messianic dogmatic, as it has been called, among the Jews, quite apart from the question who was to be the Messiah; or, to put it otherwise, Jewish disciples had a Christology before they became believers in Jesus as the Christ. It is easy to see the dangers connected with this situation. If we take the sentence, 'Jesus is the Christ,' we may put the emphasis either on the subject or the predicate. We can conceive how a Jew, whose imagination was on flame with the apocalyptic hopes associated with the Messiah, might allow these hopes, when he accepted the Christian faith, to overpower the person of Jesus; Jesus, so to speak, would become nothing to him but the person through whom expectations were to be realized which in their origin had nothing to do with Jesus. There may be occasions in the NT where we have to ask whether something of this kind has not taken place, but they are not conspicuous. In the NT, when it is said that Jesus is the Christ, the emphasis is always as much on the subject as on the predicate. The proof of the proposition is always found in something which has been done by or to Jesus. In point of fact, it is found in the first instance in His resurrection and exaltation to God's right hand. It is this participation in the sovereignty of God that makes Him Lord and Christ; and the content of this, in all essentials, is not derived from the Messianic dogmatic of the Jewish schools, but from the experience of the Apostles themselves. This experience has two aspects, the one in the stricter sense historical, the other in the stricter sense spiritual. The one, put briefly, is, 'We have seen the Lord'; the other, 'He hath poured forth this—the new life at Pentecost—which ye see and hear' (Ac 2³⁸). The one is represented by the series of witnesses to the resurrection cited by St. Paul in 1 Co 15⁵⁻⁹, the other by the series of new spiritual experiences and convictions to which he can appeal in 1 Co 15¹²⁻¹⁹. It is the testimony of the Apostles to the resurrection of Jesus, and experience of the new life in His spirit, not any pre-Christian Christology, or Jewish Messianic dogmatic, that define for the first Christians the content of the title 'the Christ.' And it may safely be said, to begin with, that there is no such thing as preaching Christ unless it is the preaching of One who lives and reigns. If Jesus is at the right hand of God,—if He is behind every revival of spiritual life in the Church,—then He is the Christ, and can be preached as such; but if not, not.

2. At first, naturally, great stress was laid upon this. The Apostles sincerely believed that they had seen the Lord, and they could not conceive of their calling as having anything in it to take precedence of this—that they were witnesses of the resurrection, and therefore of the Messiahship of Jesus. No doubt this gave its whole character to primitive Christianity; but if we accept the testimony of the Apostles to the resurrection, we shall be slow to say that it transformed its character, and made it a new and essentially an inferior thing as compared with the religion of Jesus. Jesus was not forgotten when the Apostles, appealing to the resurrection and to Pentecost, argued that He was the Christ, God's King, through whom all the hopes which God had inspired were to be fulfilled. Harnack, indeed, has argued that in its eagerness to prove that Jesus is the Christ—that is, to discharge a task in apologetic theology—the Church spent too much of the force which ought to have been given to teaching men to observe all things whatsoever He had commanded (*Dogmengesch.*¹ i. 57 f.). But there is no necessary antagonism between the two things, and except for their faith in His exaltation as the Christ the Apostles would never have taught anything at all. Weinel (Paulus, 108 f.) represents the same tendency in a much less guarded form. 'After the death of Jesus,' he says, 'the ethical religion of redemption, which had entered the world with Jesus, underwent its most decisive transformation of a formal kind; it ceased to be the religion of sonship to God, and became faith in the Christ-nature of the man Jesus. . . . The disciples demanded faith in Him as the Messiah exalted to God, and in the conception of His death as an atonement appointed by God for sins. With the experience of the resurrection and with this dogma of the death of the Messiah, the Christ-religion, Christianity in the narrower sense, begins.' One almost wonders if Weinel thinks it a pity that Jesus rose from the dead, or that His disciples believed that He did, and were overpoweringly influenced by a faith so tremendous; but this apart, the assumption in all criticism of this sort is that when the Apostles preached Jesus as the Christ they concentrated all their attention on the predicate of the proposition, which owed no part of its import to Jesus, and treated the subject as if it had no meaning. Even on a priori grounds we should say this was improbable, and there is a very significant piece of evidence that it is not true. This is found in the qualifications of the man appointed to take the place of Judas. His function was to be a witness to the resurrection—that is, to the Messiahship of Jesus; he was, in other words, to be a preacher of the Christ. But he was chosen from 'the men that have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and went out among us, beginning from the baptism of John unto the day that he was received up from us' (Ac 1^{21f.}). To preach Christ, even in the days when belief in the resurrection was so overpowering, one required to have a full knowledge of Jesus. It is idle to say that Jesus is the Christ if we do not know who or what Jesus is. It has no meaning to say that an unknown person is at God's right hand, exalted and sovereign; the more ardently men believed that God had given them a Prince and a Saviour in this exaltation, the more eager would they be to know all that could possibly be learned about Him. If there were men alive who had lived in His company, they would wait assiduously on their teaching (2⁴²). They would be more than curious to know what spirit He was of, and whether they could detect in His appearance and career on earth 'the works of the Christ' (Mt 11²). They would expect to find some kind of moral congruity between His life on the one hand, and His transcendent dignity and calling on the other; there would be a demand, from the very beginning, for facts about Him. From this point of view, then, we may say that preaching Christ is not taking leave of Jesus in any sense or to any extent; it is preaching Jesus exalted and sovereign.

The passage just quoted (Ac 1^{21f.}) is practically coterminous with the oldest form of Gospel which we possess. 'Beginning from the baptism of John unto the day that he was taken up': these are the limits within which lies the Gospel according to Mark. Hence we might say that to preach this gospel is to preach Christ, on condition, of course, that it is preached in its connexion with Jesus exalted. Merely to narrate the history of Jesus, even if we had the materials for it, would not be to preach Christ. We need, of course, to know the historical Jesus, as the qualifications for Apostleship show; but to preach Christ means to preach that Person as present in the sovereignty of His resurrection. It is not preaching Christ if we tell the story of the life and death merely as events in a past continually growing more remote. It is not preaching Christ though we tell this story in the most vivid and moving fashion, and gather round it, by the exercise of historical imagination or dramatic skill, the liveliest emotions; it is not preaching Christ to present the life and death of Jesus as a high and solemn tragedy, with power in it to purify the soul by pity and terror. There is no preaching of Christ, possessed of religious significance, that does not rest on the basis on which the Apostolic preaching rested: His exaltation in power, and therefore His perpetual presence. The historical Jesus is indispensable; but if we are to have a Christian religion, the historical must become present and eternal. This it does through the resurrection as apprehended by faith.

3. For the purposes of this article it is assumed that the Synoptic Gospels give such a knowledge of the historical Jesus as is sufficient for the preacher's ends. No doubt He is depicted for us there by writers who believed in Him as the Christ, and for whom the light of His exaltation was reflected on the lowliness of His earthly career; but this light is not necessarily a distorting one. We have no reason to say that there is anything in these Gospels which is untrue to the historical personality of Jesus, anything which represents Him in mind, in will, in temper, in character, in His consciousness as a whole of His relations to God and man, as other than He really was. Extravagant things have been said by many writers of Lives of Jesus, from Strauss downwards, on the imperfection of our knowledge, and on the way in which the real Jesus has been disguised from the very beginning by the idealization of His figure in the faith and love of those who preached Him—and especially in the Gospels. If we concentrate our attention on the character of Jesus, on the spirit of His words and deeds and death, on His consciousness of His relations to God and men—in a word, on what He was and achieved in the spiritual world—it is the present writer's conviction that we shall feel the very reverse of this to be the truth. We may be dubious about this or that word, this or that incident in the Gospels, but we have no dubiety at all about the Person. The great life that stands out before us in the Gospels is more real than anything in the world; and Jesus is so far from being hidden from us that it is no exaggeration to say that we know Him better than anybody who has ever lived on earth.

It does not follow from this that we accept the Evangelists' proofs that Jesus was the Christ, or that in preaching Christ we employ the same arguments as they to show that Jesus has the unique significance for religion which was represented for them by the Messianic title. Broadly speaking, these arguments were two—one from prophecy and one from miracles. Both may be accepted in principle without being accepted in form. The argument from prophecy is an assertion of the continuity of revelation, of the one purpose of God running through it all, and culminating in Jesus. Jesus is the fulfilment of all the hopes contained in the ancient revelation, and we look for no other: 'How many soever are the promises of God, in him is the yea' (2 Co 1²⁰); we recognize this, and the absolute significance which it secures for Jesus in religion. But we no longer prove it to ourselves by emphasizing, in the manner of the First Gospel, particular correspondences between incidents in the life of Jesus and passages in the OT. There is no religious and no intellectual value for us in such fulfilments of prophecy as Mt 2^{15, 18, 23}. We should apply the Pauline principle (2 Co 1²⁰) quite differently, recognizing that correspondence is one thing, fulfilment another. Jesus did not really come to fulfil prophecy in the sense of carrying out a programme the details of which were fixed beforehand; He came to fulfil Himself, or to fulfil the will of the Father, as the Father made it plain to Him from step to step; and though, on one occasion (Mk 11¹⁻¹⁰), He Himself arranged an incident in which a literal correspondence with a prophecy was secured, it is not such a phenomenon which makes Him the Christ to us. Its value now lies in showing that He regarded Himself as the Christ, the promised King. And so with the argument from miracles, which, though not formally put, is perhaps as characteristic of the Second Gospel as the argument from prophecy is of the First. The works of Jesus, in the largest sense,—all that He did and the power which it implied,—go to give Him the importance He has in our minds. But we do not limit His works to the class commonly called miraculous; the impression left on the minds of men by His whole being and action gathers up into itself much more than this. The arguments from prophecy and from miracles are formal ways of expressing truths which really contain much more than these forms can carry; and our impression of the truths is too direct, immediate, and complex to have justice done it by such arguments.

4. While, however, the inadequacy of such arguments to their purpose must be admitted, the purpose of the arguments is not to be overlooked. What those who first called Jesus the Christ, or preached Him as such, intended to do, was to put Him in a place which no other could share. Whatever else the name meant, it meant the King; and there was only one King. In the Christian religion Jesus was never one of a series, a person who could be classified, and be shown to His proper place in the line of great personalities who have contributed to the spiritual uplifting of the race. The study of Comparative Religion has fostered a tendency to regard Him in this light; but it cannot be said too strongly that to admit the legitimacy of such a tendency is to abandon from the very root all that has ever been known to history as Christianity. The NT is quite unequivocal about this. From the beginning Christians call Jesus 'Lord' (1 Co 12³), and recognize that God has given Him the name which is above every name (Ph 2⁹). All other men in the NT meet as equals on the same level, and all bow before Him as King. In His exaltation He confronts men as one Divine causality with the Father, working for their salvation. Historical Christianity, said Emerson (Works, Bell's ed. ii. 195), has dwelt and dwells with noxious exaggeration about the person of Jesus. As a criticism of some kinds of interest in dogmatic Christology, this may be true; but if it is meant to reflect on the devotion of Christians to Jesus as a Person, it is completely beside the mark. To Christians this Person has been from the beginning, and will be for ever, what no other can be. To talk of Him as the same in kind with other prophets or founders of religions,—with Moses and Isaiah, with Confucius or Buddha, or, what is even harder to understand, with Mohammed,—is to surrender anything that a NT Christian could have recognized as Christianity. To preach Christ at all we must preach Him as κύριος and μονογενής. The first name secures His unshared place in relation to men, as the latter does in relation to God; and unless He fills such a place, Christianity has no raison d'être. That it has is the assumption of this article, as it is the fact presented in the NT. It is, in fact, the differentia of Christianity as a religion that the distinction which can sometimes be drawn between a person and the cause for which he stands in it is no longer valid. To preach what Jesus preached is not preaching Christianity unless the thing preached is preached in its essential relation to Him. The truth which He announces is not independent of Himself; it is in the world only as it is incarnate in Him. Thus, to take as an example what many regard as the supreme category in the teaching of Jesus—the Kingdom of God: what is meant by preaching Christ here? It is very likely impossible for us to understand precisely what the expression 'Kingdom of God' conveyed in the mental atmosphere of Judaism or of the 1st cent. generally. It may be impossible for us even to understand with certainty and precision what Jesus Himself on any given occasion meant it to convey. All shades of meaning run through it,—political, eschatological, spiritual; national, universal; here, coming: how can anyone tell whether in preaching the Kingdom of God he is preaching Christ? The answer is clear if we remember that the Kingdom of God in His sense could come only in and through Him, and that its character is ultimately determined by that fact. He Himself, in the sense at least of being God's representative, is King in it (Mt 13⁴¹ 20²¹ 25³⁴, Lk 23⁴²), and it is from what we know of Him, including ultimately His resurrection and exaltation, that all our conceptions of the Kingdom must be derived. To preach the cause and ignore the Person, or to preach the cause as of universal import and to assign to the Person an importance in relation to it which He only shares with an indefinite number of others, is to be untrue to the facts as the Gospels present them. Even preaching the Kingdom of God is not preaching Christ unless the Kingdom is preached as one which owes its character to the fact that Jesus is its King, and the certainty of its consummation to the fact that Jesus shares the throne of God. Christianity is not abstract optimism; it is optimism based on the exaltation of Jesus, and on the knowledge of God as revealed in Him.

5. If we bring these ideas to a point, we shall say that to preach Christ means to preach Jesus in the absolute significance for God and man which He had to His own consciousness and to the faith of the first witnesses; and to preach Him as exalted, and as having this absolute significance now and for ever. The question then arises, In what forms did Jesus Himself present this absolute significance to His own mind? How did He conceive it, and body it forth to others, so as to make an adequate impression on them? And are the forms of thought and of imagination which He employed for this purpose in a given historical environment as indispensable to us, and as binding in our totally different environment, as they were for those with whom Jesus stood face to face? To preach Christ it is necessary to be able to answer these questions not at haphazard, but on principle; and the answer may sometimes seem difficult.

To proceed by illustration: (a) One of the ways in which Jesus represented His absolute significance for the true religion was this: He regarded Himself as the Messiah. The Messianic rôle was one which could be filled only by one Person, and He Himself was the Person in question; He and no other was the Christ. But is 'the Christ' a conception of which we, in another age and with other antecedents, can make use for the same purpose? Only, it must be answered, if we employ the term with much latitude. What it suggests to us, as already pointed out, is the continuity of revelation, and the fulfilment through Jesus of all the hopes which, through history and prophecy, God had kindled in human hearts; it is the possibility of using it to express this that justifies us in retaining the name. But it is certain that for those who first came to believe in Jesus as the Christ the name was much more definite than it is for us; it had a shape and colour that it has no longer; it had expectations connected with it which for us have lost the vitality they once possessed. In particular, the eschatological associations of the term have not, in their NT form, the importance for us which they had for the first believers. In the teaching of Jesus these associations cluster round the title 'the Son of Man,' which, at least after the confession of Peter at Caesarea Philippi, is used as synonymous with 'the Christ'; the Son of Man is identified with Jesus, and comes again, after His suffering and death, to establish the Kingdom, in the glory of His Father with the holy angels (Mk 8³¹⁻³⁸, Mt 10³⁹ 16²⁷). This coming again, or, as the original disciples conceived it, this coming (παρουσία) in the character of the Christ, was expected, by those who first preached and received the gospel, to take place in their own generation; and it is difficult to argue that this expectation could have any other basis than the teaching of Jesus Himself. Nothing was more characteristic of primitive Christianity; it was the very essence of what the early Church meant by hope; it was for it part of the very meaning of 'the Christ.' Account has been taken, in art. AUTHORITY OF CHRIST (vol. i. p. 149), of any considerations which go to qualify the certainty with which we ascribe to Jesus Himself this eschatological conception of the consummation of God's Kingdom, and especially this conviction as to its imminence; but if we do connect it with Him, and regard it as part of what is meant when He represents Himself as the Christ, clearly history requires us to recognize the inadequacy of that conception to be the vehicle of the truth. The Kingdom of God has been coming ever since Jesus left the world; but Jesus Himself, after nearly two thousand years, has not yet come in like manner as the disciples saw Him going into heaven (Ac 1¹¹). We still believe that the Kingdom of God is coming; we believe this because we believe in Jesus; we believe that it is coming only through Him and as He comes; that is what the Christian of to-day means when he says we believe in Him as the Christ. But even the belief in His exaltation to God's right hand does not make possible for us that particular kind of expectation of His coming which burnt with so intense a flame in the breast of the Apostolic Church; quite apart from any preference or effort, our outlook on the future is different from theirs; and, while we do not abate in the least our recognition of the sole sovereignty of Jesus, and our assurance that God's Kingdom can come and God's promises be fulfilled through Him alone, we are compelled, apparently, to recognize that in infusing into the disciples His own assurance of the final triumph of God's cause in His own person, our Lord had to make use of representations which have turned out unequal to the truth. He had to put His sense of the absolute significance of His Person for God and man into a form which was relative to the mind of the time. The eschatological Christ, coming on the clouds of heaven, and coming in the lifetime of some who heard His voice, was one expression for Jesus of this absolute significance; and it is as such an expression—that is, as an assurance of the speedy triumph of God's cause in and through Him, and not in its spectacular detail—that we believe in it. It is not rejecting the absolute significance of Jesus to say that this spectacular detail is relative to the age and its mental outlook; but it would be a rejection of it, and a repudiation of Jesus as the Christ, if we denied that the Kingdom of God—however experience enables us to picture its coming and consummation—comes and is consummated through Him alone. This truth must be preached if we really preach Christ.

(b) Jesus, however, has other ways of conveying His absolute significance. One of the simplest is that in which He represents Himself as judge of men, arbiter of their eternal destinies. It may be argued, no doubt, that the form in which this is expressed in Mt 7^{21ff.} 25^{21ff.} is, in part at least, due to the Evangelist; 'prophesying in the name of Jesus' was a phenomenon which came into the world only after His death, and such an allusion to it as Mt 7²², where it is treated as an obvious thing, would hardly have been intelligible in His lifetime. But there is no reason whatever to doubt that both this passage and the other convey the mind of Jesus about His own significance for men. Whatever be the rule of the judgment—doing the will of His Father (Mt 7²¹), or humanity exhibited in practice in relation to those whom He calls His brethren (Mt 25⁴⁰)—it is a rule which has been finally embodied in Him. It is in Him that we see what doing the will of the Father means; it is in Him also that we see the law of humanity fulfilled. It is what we are when measured by His standard, judged by His judgment, that discloses the very truth about us. It has been urged that this prerogative of judgment is merely an element in the Jewish conception of the Messiah, and as such has been formally transferred to Jesus in the Gospels; but nothing is less formal in the NT than the conception of Jesus as judge. It does not rest on any borrowings from a pre-Christian Messianic dogmatic, but on the most real experiences of men in the presence of Jesus: 'Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord' (Lk 5⁸); 'Come, see a man who told me all things that ever I did' (Jn 4²⁹). The experiences by which words like these were inspired give reality and solemnity to all the representations of Jesus as judge. Here again we may say that the spectacular representations of the judgment are a form which we may recognize to have only a relative value, while yet we do not dispute in the least the absolute truth that the standard of reality and of worth in the spiritual world is Jesus, and that no life can be finally estimated except by its relation to Him. The Gospel according to John is distinguished from the others by emphasizing the function of Christ as judge, and the continuous exercise of it in what might almost be called an automatic fashion. The Father has committed all judgment to the Son (Jn 5²²); and the process of judging goes on in the Gospel under our eyes. The very presence of Jesus sifts men; they gather round Him or are repelled from Him according to what they are. Something of absolute and final significance, it may be said, is transacted before our faces, as men show that they will or will not have anything to do with Jesus. It is eternal judgment revealed in the field of time, and Jesus is the judge. No one else could fill His place in this character, and we do not preach Christ as He was and is except by making this plain. Probably, however, in this case more than in any other it is rash to discount too cheaply what we think, rightly enough in principle, are but forms of conveying this truth, and forms unequal to the reality. The picture of the Last Judgment in Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶ may not be true as a picture, the moral reality of the judgment may not be dependent at all on the scenic details here presented, but whether or not it is true as a picture, it is true in the moral impression it leaves on the mind, and this is the truth that is important. There is such a thing, if there is any truth in Christ at all, as final judgment; there is a right hand of the judge and a left, an inside of the door and an outside, a character that abides for ever and a character that collapses in irreparable ruin; and to realize of what kind character is, or where it must stand at last, we have only to confront it with Him. The man who cannot withstand the attraction of Jesus does not come into judgment, he has passed from death into life (Jn 5²⁴); the man who will not yield to the attraction of Jesus is judged already (3¹⁸), and the judgment will be revealed at last. To recognize and proclaim the absolute significance of Jesus here is an essential part of preaching Christ.

(c) The supreme illustration of this incomparable significance of Jesus remains. It is given in what we may call His consciousness of His relation to God. To Jesus, God was the Father, and He Himself was the Son. It does not matter that God is a universal Father, and that all men are or are called to be His sons; Jesus recognizes this, and insists upon it, but He claims Sonship in a peculiar sense for Himself. He never speaks of Himself as a child of God, but as the Son, simpliciter. In speaking of God and Himself He uses ὁ πατήρ and ὁ υἱός in a way which implies that there could no more be a plural on the one side than on the other: see esp. Mt 11²⁷, Mk 13³². It is natural to suppose that in the account of Jesus' baptism (Mt 3¹⁷ ||) the heavenly voice which pronounces Him Son of God, in words borrowed from Ps 2, means the term there to be taken in the Messianic 'official' sense; it is the Messianic consciousness of Jesus, as the accompanying narrative of the Temptation proves, which is expressed in ὁ υἱός μου. What the relation may have been in His mind between this (which defines His calling by relation to O'F hopes) and the Divine Sonship exhibited in Mt 11²⁷, we may not be able to tell. It has been argued by some that the official Messianic Sonship, the calling to be God's King in Israel, widened and deepened in the mind of Jesus Himself into the consciousness of a unique relation to God, which found its most adequate expression in the language of Mt 11²⁷; by others, that only such a consciousness as is disclosed in Mt 11²⁷ enables us to understand how Jesus could ever have regarded Himself as the Messiah. The Messianic categories have been considered above; what we have here to do is to look at the less specifically Jewish way in which Jesus here reveals His absolute significance for religion. 'All things have been delivered to me by my Father: and no one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither knoweth any one the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (see AUTHORITY OF CHRIST, vol. i. p. 149). Here Jesus claims in the most explicit terms to have had the whole task of revealing God to men—the whole task of saving men, so far as that depends upon their coming to know God—committed to Him.* It is a task to which He is equal, and for which no other has any competence at all. Everything connected with it has been entrusted to Him, and to Him alone; there is not a man upon the earth who can know the Father except by becoming a debtor to Jesus. There is no such thing as preaching Christ unless we preach this: He is the mediator for all men of the knowledge of God as Father; that is, of that knowledge of God on which eternal life depends. This is the loftiest, the most universal, and the most gracious form in which the absolute significance of Jesus can be expressed: the loftiest, because it declares Him unequivocally to be the μονογενής, having His being in a relation to God constituted by perfect mutual understanding, and belonging to Him alone; the most universal, because the relation of Father and Son, while it can only be symbolic of the reality, uses a symbolism based on nature, not on history, and is therefore intelligible to all men, and not only (like Messiah) to one race; and the most gracious, for it suggests directly not only mutual understanding but mutual love, the love which unites the Father and the Son in the work of enlightening and redeeming men (cf. Mt 11^{28f}). It is not necessary, however, to dwell on this: the point is that in this central passage Jesus emphasizes His absolute significance in the two main directions in which it can be understood: He is to God what no other is, and He can therefore do for man what no other can do. He is the only-begotten Son, and the only Mediator between God and man. In preaching Christ in this sense, we have much more to go upon than this single utterance. The truth which it conveys, indeed, is not so much a truth revealed by Christ, as the truth which is embodied in Him; in order to appreciate it, it is necessary to have the experience of coming through Him to the Father, and of recognizing the Father in the Son. The interest of the Fourth Gospel consists to a large extent in this—that it is an expansion and illustration of these words. Jesus is presented there as the Word made flesh—the principle of revelation embodied in a human life; it is His work, so to speak, to enlighten every man, and apart from His work men remain in darkness. 'No man hath seen God at any time: the only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared—or interpreted (ἐξηγήσατο)—him' (Jn 1¹⁸); 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (14⁹); 'I am the way and the truth and the life: no one cometh to the Father but through me' (14⁶). This is the key to the peculiar passages in the Gospel in which Jesus says ἐγὼ εἰμι without any expressed predicate (4²⁶? 8²⁴, 28 13¹⁹); we are meant to think of Him as the great decisive Personality, who stands in a place which is His alone, and by relation to whom all men finally stand or fall. It may be that the expression given to this in the Fourth Gospel owes something to the writer as well as to Jesus; but what the writer expresses is at least the impression made on him by Jesus, and, as Mt 11²⁷ and Mk 13³² show, the impression is one which answers exactly to Jesus' consciousness of Himself. The words quoted above from Jn. only do justice to Jesus' sense of what He was in relation to God and man, and it is not possible to preach Christ in any adequate sense if we ignore or deny the truth they convey. To do so would be to reject both what Jesus said and what He was in the experience of those who first believed on Him.

6. With the rest of the NT in mind, the question is naturally raised at this point, whether Jesus gave any further definition to the idea of mediation than that which we find in this passage. All men owe to Him the knowledge of God as Father, but how does He impart it? All men must become His debtors if they are to have the benefit of this supreme revelation: is there anything which more than another enables us to estimate the dimensions of this debt? If there is, then in preaching Christ that thing would require to have a corresponding prominence. It is obvious that Jesus mediates the knowledge of God to men, not by His words only, but, as is shown elsewhere (AUTHORITY OF CHRIST, vol. i. p. 149), by His being and life as well. It is the Son in whom the Father is revealed, and everything in the Son contributes to the revelation: His teaching, His works, His intercourse with others, His sufferings and death. The revelation is made in and through all these, and none of them can be omitted in preaching Christ. To borrow words of Wellhausen which are not without a misleading element (Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien, p. 114): 'His religion is found not only in what He taught publicly, but in His nature and bearing under all circumstances, at home and on the street, in what He said and did not say, in what He did consciously or without being conscious of it, in the way in which He ate and drank and rejoiced and suffered. His Person, with which they had the privilege of intercourse in daily life, made an even deeper impression on His disciples than His teaching.' All this is true, but not the whole truth. The NT in all its parts lays a quite peculiar emphasis on the death of Christ, and in doing so it is not false to His own conception of the way in which He mediated the knowledge of the Father to men. His death, it may be said, does not require to be interpreted otherwise than His life; it is His life carried to a consistent consummation under the circumstances of the time; it is part of His life, not something distinct from it. This also is true, but, according to the representation in the Gospels, it is less than the whole truth. His death is a part of His life which has an essential relation to His work as the revealer of the Father, and the King in the Kingdom of God; it was recognized by Jesus Himself as Divinely necessary, it was the subject of frequent instruction to His disciples, and it is commemorated by His will in the most solemn rite of Christian worship (see Mk 8³¹ 9³¹ 10³³ 10⁴⁵ 14²⁴ and ||). It is a fair inference from this, combined with the place taken by the Passion in the Evangelic narratives, and the place given to the interpretation of Christ's death in the Epistles, that to preach Christ it is necessary to represent His death as a main part, or rather as the main part, of the cost at which His work of mediation is done. In what particular way it is to be construed is an ulterior question. Our general conception of the moral order of the world, our sense of individuality and of the solidarity of the race, our apprehension of sin as generic, or constitutional, or voluntary, the mental equipment with which we approach the whole subject, may determine us to interpret it in ways which are intellectually distinguishable; no given explanation of the death of Jesus can claim finality any more than any given interpretation of His Person. But just as we may say that Christ is not preached unless the Person of Christ is presented in its absolute significance for religion, as the one Person through whom the knowledge of the Father is mediated to men, so we may say further that Christ is not preached in the sense which answers to His own consciousness of what He was doing, unless it is made clear and central that His mediation necessitated and therefore cost His death. In the simplest words, it is necessary to say, in preaching Christ, not only that He is μωνογενής and Mediator, but that He died for men. It was not for Him to insist on this as a doctrine; it was for the Church to apprehend it as a fact, and to put it into doxologies (Rev 1⁵ 5⁹); but in doing so, it could go back to unmistakable words of Jesus Himself, and to the sacrament which speaks for Him more impressively than any words.

7. Jesus' consciousness of Himself, which, however hard it may be for us to apprehend it, has certainly the character just described—in other words, is a consciousness of His absolute and incomparable significance for all the relations of God and man—must lie at the heart of all preaching of which He is the object. He had this significance while He moved among men on the earth, and it was declared and made unmistakable to His disciples when He rose from the dead. It is on Jesus' consciousness of Himself, therefore, including His consciousness of His vocation, and on His exaltation to God's right hand, that the preaching of Christ rests. As has already been remarked (see § 3), the writer of this article assumes that in the Synoptic Gospels we have a representation given of the consciousness of Jesus, on the truth of which we can quite securely proceed. No doubt this has been questioned, most recently and radically by Wellhausen. The Gospels (to put it concisely) were written by Christians, and Jesus was not a Christian. They contain the gospel, that is, the Christian religion; but He knew nothing about the gospel, although it is put into His lips. He was a Jew. He preached no new faith. He taught men to do the will of God, which like all Jews He found in the Law and the other sacred books. The only difference was that He knew a better way of doing the will of God than that which the scribes of His day enforced on the people, and that He called men to leave their traditions and learn of Him. Wellhausen not only removes from the mind of Christ in this way everything that in Christian preaching has ever been known as gospel, everything that could by any possibility be regarded as contributing to Christology and Soteriology, but the great mass of what up till now has been regarded by criticism as the best attested part of the Evangelic record, the words of Jesus common to Matthew and Luke. Most of the parables, too, are sacrificed. Even the few in Mark are not all genuine, and Wellhausen feels free to pass severe strictures alike on those of Matthew and of Luke. All that need be said of this is, that if Jesus had been no more than Wellhausen represents Him to be, then it is inconceivable that either the Gospels or the gospel could ever have been generated from any impulse He could impart to human minds. As Jülicher puts it (Theol. Literaturztg. 1905, No. 23), the primitive Church is thus made to appear richer, greater, and freer than its Head: in Jerusalem it surpasses Him by producing the marvellous Evangelic history, in St. Paul it surpasses Him by producing a new imposing theory of redemption. The historian looks in vain for anything analogous to this elsewhere. We do not understand how it could be done. We do not understand how the Church so suddenly lost the power of doing it. We do not understand how a man like St. Paul, we may say how men like those who wrote all the NT books except the Gospels, should have been so incapable of writing a page which reminds us of them. Although it is true to say that truth guarantees only itself, not its author, the truths exhibited by the Evangelists have a way of coalescing into a sum of truth which is identical with Jesus. As Deissmann has expressed it,* they are not separate pearls threaded on a string, but flashes of the same diamond. Separately they guarantee themselves, but collectively they are a spiritual evidence to the historical reality of the great Person to whom the gospel owes its being, and to whom all preaching is a testimony. There is a kind of criticism which tacitly assumes that it is a mistake to believe in Christ as those who first preached Him believed; He was a Person who appeared in history, and therefore cannot have the absolute significance which must attach to the object of religious faith, and which does attach to Jesus throughout the NT. Such criticism makes it its business to reduce this figure to a true scale—which means to make His personality exactly like our own, and His consciousness exactly what our own may be. Wellhausen illustrates the direct application of this criticism to the Gospels; we see how it is brought to bear on the Epistles in such a remark as Wernle's, that a faith in Christ like that of St. Paul (which as good as deified its object) implies a certain want of faith in the living God. The consciousness of God must have decayed or lost its vital intensity in the Apostle before he could write the Epistle to the Colossians. Such a writing, we are almost invited to think, is on the way to justify the Jewish sneer: the creed of Christians is that there is no God, but that Jesus is His Son. In the face of criticism of this type, we hold with confidence the trustworthiness of the Evangelic representation, and venture to say that no NT writer, not even St. Paul or St. John, has anything to say of the absolute significance of Jesus, in all the relations of God and man, which goes beyond Jesus' consciousness of Himself as the Gospels preserve it. And, further, we venture to say that no NT writing, however casual or informal, falls short of the testimony which Jesus, according to the Evangelists, bears to Himself. Everywhere Jesus has the place which He claims for Himself, and Christians are conscious of an absolute dependence on Him for their standing towards God. To give Him this place is the only way to preach Christ.

8. The earliest specimens of Apostolic preaching are the sermons of St. Peter in Acts. Their value is universally acknowledged. According to Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. i. 48), 'almost the only element that is historically important (in the early chapters of Acts) is the Christology of the speeches of Peter. This, however, is important in the highest degree. . . . It is hardly possible not to believe that this Christology of the speeches of Peter must have come from a primitive source.' It starts with the historical person as such: 'Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God to you by miracles and portents and signs which God wrought through him, as you yourselves know' (Ac 2²²). This approbation of Jesus by His wonderful works might seem confuted by His death, but to this the Apostle has a twofold answer. On the one hand, the death itself was Divinely necessary; He was delivered up by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, evidence of which was found in the Scriptures (Ac 2²³, cf. 1 Co 15³). On the other hand, it was annulled by the resurrection of Jesus and His exaltation to God's right hand. It was this that made Him both Lord and Christ, and in this character He determined for the Apostles and for all men their whole relation to God. To Him they owed already the gift of the Holy Ghost; and, as St. Peter explicitly states elsewhere (Ac 11^{15, 17} 15⁸), to receive the Holy Ghost is to be religiously complete. To His coming they looked for times of refreshing, indeed for the 'times of the restoration of all things, whereof God spake by the mouth of his holy prophets that have been from of old' (3²¹). All prophecy, to put it otherwise, is conceived as Messianic; all the hopes which God has inspired are hopes to be fulfilled through Christ. He is Prince of life (3¹⁵), Lord of all (10³⁶), ordained of God as Judge of living and dead (10⁴²). Those who repent, believe, and are baptized in His name receive remission of sins and the gift of the Holy Ghost (2³⁸ 10⁴³). All these expressions imply that from the very beginning Jesus had for His disciples that absolute significance which we have seen belonged to His own consciousness of Himself; but in addition to this, it is put with singular force in a passage which expresses nothing else: 'There is not salvation in any other: for there is no other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved' (4¹²). It may be possible to strip from the gospel of St. Peter, without detriment to its essence, some of that vesture of eschatological Messianism which it necessarily wore at the time; but it is not possible that religion should be to us what it was to him,—it is not possible, in the original sense of the words, to preach Christ—unless we give to Christ that same significance in all the relations of God and man which He has in St. Peter's preaching. It is not too much to say that side by side with his frank recognition of Jesus as a man (2²²), whose career in history he could himself look back upon, St. Peter regarded Jesus in His exaltation as forming with God His Father one Divine causality at work for the salvation of men. It was only in virtue of so regarding Him that he could preach Him as he did, and essentially similar convictions are still necessary if preaching is to be called preaching Christ. It is not necessary to argue that the Christology of the First Epistle of Peter is on a level with this. In many respects it is more explicit. There has been more reflexion on the absolute significance of Jesus in religion, on His relation to the OT, on the power of His resurrection, on the virtue of His Passion as connected with redemption from sin, and on the example set in His life and death. But two passages may be briefly referred to as going to the root of the matter. The first is 1²¹, where Christians are described as 'you who through him [Jesus] are believers in God.' It is to Him that Christian faith owes its peculiar qualities and virtues: men may be theists apart from Him, but to have specifically Christian faith in God we must be His debtors. The other is the longer passage, so much discussed, 3^{18-4²}. Whatever else this passage reveals, it reveals the writer's conviction that for the dead as well as the living there is no hope of salvation but Christ. Not only in this world, but in all worlds, whatever is called redemption owes its being to Him. All spiritual beings, angels, principalities, and powers, are subject to Him. The Christian is a person who is in Him (5¹⁴), and accordingly by Him everything in the Christian life is determined. To give Christ this place in our spiritual world, though a different mode of conceiving the world of the spirit may modify the intellectual form in which we do so, is indispensable to preaching Christ. Apart from His holding such a place it is possible only to preach about Him, not to make Him the sum of our preaching.

9. To pass from St. Peter to St. Paul is to pass from one who had the most vivid personal recollections of the Man Christ Jesus to one who had no such recollections at all; and it is all the more striking to find that both of them preach Christ in the same sense; or, perhaps, we should say, mean the same thing by preaching Christ. St. Paul's acquaintance with Christ began when the Lord appeared to him on the way to Damascus, and for him Jesus is predominantly the Lord of Glory (1 Co 2⁸). When he preaches Him it is as Lord (2 Co 4⁵); that is, as exalted at God's right hand. To call Him 'Lord,' to acknowledge His exaltation, is to make the fundamental Christian confession (1 Co 12², Ro 10⁹). It is often asserted that whatever differences may have existed between St. Paul and the Jerusalem Church, there can have been no difference of a Christological character; but it is not vital to Christianity that this should be so. It is just as plausible to argue from 2 Co 1¹⁹ that the Corinthians had heard preachers who did not preach Christ precisely as Paul and Silvanus and Timothy did; and the argument might be supported by reference to 2 Co 5¹⁶ 11⁴. Further, the fact that St. Paul has something which he calls 'my gospel,' a conception of Christianity and a mode of presenting it which had peculiarities due to the peculiarity of his religious experience, might be adduced on the same side. And the presumption thus raised could not be overturned simply by an appeal to 1 Co 15⁴⁻¹¹, which would prove only that his gospel rested, exactly as did that of the Twelve, on the great facts of the death and resurrection of Jesus interpreted in the light of Scripture. What it is important to see is that, be the variations in mode of thought or conception what they may, the Apostle ascribes to Jesus that absolute significance for religion which we have already seen attach to Him both in His own mind and in the preaching of St. Peter. This is the basis and the content of preaching Christ.

It might seem enough to refer to the salutations of the Epistles, in which St. Paul wishes the Churches grace and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ (Ro 1⁷), or addresses them as having their being in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ (1 Th 1¹). Here we have the Father and Christ confronting men, so to speak, on the same plane, co-operating as one Divine power for their salvation. When St. Paul preaches Christ it is as a Person who has this power and importance, and stands in this relation to God and men. Or we might refer to what perhaps comes closest in form to Jesus' own mode of expression, the passage in 1 Co 15²⁸, in which 'the Son' is used absolutely, as in Mk 13³². There is a subordination of the Son to the Father here, and yet no more here than in Mk 13³² or in Mt 11²⁷ could we conceive of either word in the plural. Or again, we might refer to such passages as those in which St. Paul contrasts all other persons with Christ. 'What is Apollos? what is Paul? Was Paul crucified for you? or were you baptized in the name of Paul?' (1 Co 3⁵ 1¹³). This is entirely in the line of the contrast between the many servants and the one beloved Son in Mk 12¹⁻¹², or of the sayings of Jesus in Mt 23⁸⁻¹⁰. Of course both these Evangelic passages have been disputed, but the present writer sees no reason to doubt that in substance both are rightly assigned to Jesus. What St. Paul means in the words cited is that any other person has only a relative importance in Christianity, while Christ's importance is absolute. The Church would have missed Paul and Apollos, but it would have been there; whereas but for Christ it could not have been there at all. It existed only in Him. This is assumed in all preaching of which He is the object. His significance for the Church is not in the same line with that of Paul and Apollos; it is on the same line with that of the Father. No matter what the mode in which St. Paul conceives of Christ, he always conceives of Him as having 'this incomparable significance, and it is worth while to note the ways in which it appears.

(a) Sometimes they are, so to speak, unstudied: the truth is put, and possibly with emphasis, but there is no particular reflexion upon it. Thus, in 1 Co 3¹¹ 'other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Christ Jesus.' This comes very close to Ac 4¹⁶ (see above). Again, when we read in 2 Co 1²⁰ 'how many soever are the promises of God, in him is the yea,' we are confronted with the same truth. There is not a single promise God has made, not a single hope with which He has inspired human hearts, which is to have any fulfilment except in Him. The mental attitude is the same in Gal 1^{8^c}. The form of St. Paul's arguments is sometimes more disconcerting to us in Galatians than in any other of his Epistles, yet nowhere does he keep closer to the heart of his gospel. What these two seemingly intolerant verses mean is that Christ is the whole of the Christian religion, and that to introduce other things side by side with Him, as if they could supplement Him, or share in His absolute significance for salvation, is treason to Christ Himself. Christ crucified—the whole revelation of God's redeeming love to sinners is there; the sinful soul abandoning itself in unreserved faith to this revelation—the whole of the Christian religion is there. Whoever brings into religion anything else than Christ and faith, as though anything else could conceivably stand on the same plane, is, wittingly or unwittingly, the deadly enemy of the gospel. Such expressions as these exhibit the absolute significance which Christ had for the Apostle in the most unquestionable way, but they imply no speculative Christology. We may hold them, and to preach Christ we must hold them, but we may do so without raising any of the theological questions which have been raised in connexion with them. There is hardly a page of St. Paul's writings which could not be quoted in illustration.

Confining ourselves to the Epp. to the Thess., as his earliest letters, and omitting the salutations referred to above, we find everywhere the absolute dependence of the Christian on Christ,—a kind of relation which would be not only inconceivable but immoral if any other than Christ were the subject of it. Just as men in general are said to live and move and have their being in God, Christians live and move and have their being 'in Christ.' What space is to bodies, Christ is to believing souls: they live in Him, and all the functions of their life are determined by Him. St. Paul has confidence in the Lord toward the Thessalonians (II 3^d); he charges and entreats them in the Lord Jesus Christ (II 3¹²); they stand in the Lord (I 3^d); he gives them commandments through the Lord Jesus (I 4²); church rulers are those who are over them in the Lord (I 5¹²); the Christian rule of life is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning them (I 5¹⁸); the Christian departed are the dead in Christ (I 4¹⁶); all benediction is summed up in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ (I 5²⁸, II 1¹² 3¹⁸); Jesus and the Father are co-ordinated as the object of prayer (I 3¹¹), and prayer is directly addressed to the Lord, i.e. to Christ (I 3¹²). Our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we are to obtain salvation at the great day, is He who died for us, that whether we wake or sleep we should live together with Him (I 5¹⁰). It is as though all that God does for us were done in and through Him; so that He confronts us as Saviour in Divine glory and omnipotence. We may trust Him as God is trusted, live in Him as we live in God, appeal to Him to save us as only God can save; and it is only as we do so that we have in Him a Person whom we can preach. Such a Person we can have, as the passages cited show, without raising any of the questions with which St. Paul himself subsequently wrestled. But the right way to express all this—which does not first appear in Colossians, but is of the essence of Christianity from the beginning—is not to say with Wernle that the consciousness of God has been weakened, but that the idea of God has been Christianized: the Father is known in the Son, and is known as working through Him to the end of our salvation. And this, it need hardly be repeated, is identical in religious import with what we have found in the mind of Christ Himself.

(b) Sometimes, however, the Apostle presents us with more speculative conceptions of Christ. He is not simply a Person who has appeared in history, and has been exalted in Divine power and glory. He is what may be called a universal Person, a typical or representative Person, who has for the new humanity the same kind of significance as Adam had for the old. Adam was the head of the one, Christ is the head of the other. As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive. The acts of Christ have a representative or universal character: the death that He died for all has somehow the significance which the death of all would itself have; in His resurrection we see the first-fruits of a new race which shall wear the image of the heavenly. Broadly speaking, this way of conceiving Christ, in which the individual historical Person is elevated or expanded into a universal or representative Person, pervades the Epp. to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians (see esp. Ro 5^{12ff.}, 1 Co 15²¹⁻⁴⁹). As these Epp. are central in St. Paul's writings, there is a certain justification for laying this conception of Christ—the second Adam—at the basis of a Pauline Christology (as was done by Somerville in his St. Paul's Conception of Christ). It is the conception which lends itself most readily to 'mystical' interpretations of Christ's work and of Christian experience. To bear the Christian name we must 'identify ourselves' with all the experiences of the Second Adam. But though it is eminently characteristic of St. Paul, it is neither his first nor his last way of representing the absolute significance of Christ. It belongs to the controversial period in which everything Christian was defined by contrast. What St. Paul wanted to annihilate was legalism, the influence of the statutory in religion; and he argues that the really important categories in the religious history of humanity, those of universal and abiding significance, are not law, but sin and grace. The great figures in the history are not Moses, but Adam and Christ. He works out the parallel or rather the contrast between them with enthusiasm; but when we realize what he is doing, we feel that this is only one way of giving Christ His peculiar place. It is, however, a way which will maintain itself as long as the antithesis of sin and grace determines the religious life; and as this is a limit beyond which we cannot see, it seems involved in any adequate preaching of Christ that He should be preached in this universal character as the head of a new humanity.

(c) In his later Epp., St. Paul preaches Christ in what seems a more wonderful light. Christ is presented to us not merely as a historical, or as a universal, but also as an eternal or Divine Person. That which is manifested to the world in Him does not originate with its manifestation. The explanation of it is not to be sought merely in the history of Israel (as though Jesus were no more than a national Messiah), nor even in the history of humanity (as though He were no more than the restorer of the ruin which began with Adam): it is to be sought in the eternal being of God. When St. Paul came in contact with Jesus, he came in contact with what he felt instinctively was the ultimate reality in the universe. Here, he could not but be conscious, is the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, all that is meant—all that has ever been meant—by 'God.' Here is 'all the fulness of the Godhead bodily' (Col 1¹⁹ 2⁰); here is the revelation of what God essentially and eternally is, and here therefore is that by which all our thinking must be ruled. Christ belongs to, or is involved in, because He is the manifestation of, the eternal being and nature of God. How far does this carry us when we try to think it out? Possibly not further, in some respects, than we have come already. Christ, it may be said, is represented as an eternal Person when He is spoken of as final Judge of all (Ac 10⁴², 2 Co 5¹⁰); that is eternity as apprehended in conscience. Again, He is represented as an eternal Person when we speak of Him as final Heir or Lord of all things (He 1², Mt 28¹⁸); that is eternity as apprehended in imagination. But in Col. it is not through the conscience or the imagination, but through a more speculative faculty, that St. Paul interprets his conception of the eternal being of Christ. If Christ really has the absolute significance which all Christian experience implies,—for in all such experience we meet with God in Him,—then all things must be defined by relation to Christ; the universe must be reconstituted with Him as its principle, its centre of unity, its goal. Nature must be conceived as an order of things brought into being with a view to His Kingdom, and this implies that He was present in the constitution of nature. To say that He was ideally but not actually present,—present only in the mind of God as the intended consummation of the process,—would have been to St. Paul to introduce a distinction which we have no means of applying where God is concerned. The true doctrine of Christ—this is what St. Paul teaches in Colossians—involves a doctrine of the universe. The doctrine of the universe is put only negatively, or so as to exclude error, when we say that God created all things out of nothing; such a formula teaches only the absolute dependence of nature on God. But it is put positively, or so as to convey the truth in which the world is interested, when we say that all things were created in Christ. St. Paul's conviction of this truth is based (he believes) on experience: in his consciousness as a Christian man he is assured that in Christ he has touched the last reality in the universe, the ens realissimum, the truth through which all other truths are to be defined and understood. In other words, a true apprehension of the absolute significance of Christ involves a specifically Christian conception of the universe. The Christian religion is not true to Christ (as St. Paul understood His significance) unless it has the courage to conceive a Christian metaphysic, or, in simpler words, to Christianize all its thoughts of God and the world. Put in this form, we can see that in the last resort it is still necessary to share the Apostle's convictions at this point if we mean to preach Christ. For if there is any region of reality which does not depend for its meaning and value on its relation to Him,—if the truth with which we come in contact in Him is not the ultimate truth of God, the master light of all our seeing,—then His importance is only relative, and He has no abiding place in religion which requires that He should be preached at all. But in reality He is a Person so great that all nature and history and religion have to be interpreted through Him. All we call being, and all we call redemption, need Him to explain them. The love revealed in Him is the key to all mysteries. The categories we use to make His redemption intelligible are the only categories by which we can completely understand anything. Once Christ's absolute significance has become clear to us,—and, as already said, it is involved in every Christian experience,—we discover that our task, if we would understand the system of things in which we live, is not to find natural law in the spiritual world, but rather to find spiritual law—indeed, specifically Christian law—in the natural world. So far as we do so we are providing scientific attestation for the conception of Christ as a Divine and eternal Person.

10. The Epistle to the Hebrews and the Fourth Gospel, it need hardly be added, share in this conception of Christ. In neither is it allowed to infringe on the truth of His human nature while He lived on earth: indeed, of, all the NT writings, these two in various ways make most use of Christ's humanity for religious and moral ends. But as the subject of this article is not Christology, it is not necessary to go into details. The prologue to the Fourth Gospel has precisely the same Christian experience behind it as the first chapter of Col., and the same experience, when taken seriously, will always inspire the mind to think along the same lines. The conception of the Logos, as has often been remarked, is not carried by the writer beyond the prologue: it may in reality affect the Evangelist's way of representing certain things, but it is not formally embodied in the Gospel. It was a conception widely current in the writer's time, whatever its sources, and he used it to introduce Jesus in circles which naturally thought in such terms. It does not follow that to introduce or to explain Christ among men who think in other categories, the preacher is still bound to make use of this one. 'There is only one thing,' says Dr. Sanday (Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, 198) 'that he [the Evangelist] seeks. He wants a formula to express the cosmical significance of the person of Christ.' That in which we must agree with him if we in turn would preach Christ, is his conviction of this significance, not the formula in which it suited him at the close of the first century to express it. That like Paul he had such a conviction, based on experience, there is no doubt. The Son of God was not to St. John a lay figure to be draped in the borrowed robes either of Messianic dogmatic or of Alexandrian philosophy. He was a Being so great, and had left on the soul of His witness an impression so deep, that the latter felt it could be satisfied by nothing but a reconstitution of his universe in which this wonderful Person was put at the heart of everything—creation, providence, revelation, and redemption being all referred to Him. In St. John as in St. Paul the absolute significance of Christ in the relations of God and man, which is the immediate certainty of Christian experience, stamps Him as a Divine and eternal Person, by relation to whom the world and all that is in it must be described anew. We may say if we will that he uses the Logos as a formula to describe the cosmical significance of Christ, but that is perhaps less than the truth. He uses it rather to suggest that truth, as truth is in Jesus, is the deepest truth of all, and the most comprehensive, and that under its inspiration and guidance we must Christianize all our conceptions of God, nature, and history. He who is not in sympathy with this conviction will not find it easy to preach Christ in any sense in which the NT will support him.

11. If, however, we are in sympathy with this conviction, it may fairly be argued that we can preach Christ without raising any further questions. We must find the absolute significance of Jesus in the area within which Jesus presented Himself to men, 'beginning from the baptism of John until the day when he was taken up' (Ac 1²²). This was the basis on which the gospel was launched into history, faith evoked, and the Church founded. This was the gospel of the original Apostolic testimony, and it is within its limits that the power of Christ must be felt. Once we do recognize this power, and its incomparable and unique significance, we are prepared to let our minds go further, and to appreciate at its true value what the Apostles and Evangelists tell us of such things as the pre-existence of Christ and the condescension of His entrance into the world. But these can never be the first things in preaching Christ. To put them first is really to put stumbling-blocks in the way of faith. Faith is evoked by seeing Jesus and hearing Him, and we see and hear Him only within the range indicated above. It is only faith, too, that preaches; preaching is faith's testimony to Christ. Hence, although faith must amount to a conviction of Christ's absolute significance, it must find the basis of this conviction in the historical Saviour, and it is only by appeal to the historical Saviour that it can reproduce itself in others. Accordingly it may exist and may render effective testimony to Christ without raising questions that carry us beyond this area. How we are to think of the superhistorical relation to God of the Person whose absolute significance we recognize in history, how we are to think of what is usually called His pre-existence, and of the marvel of His entrance into the world of nature and of history: these are questions which faith's conviction as to Christ's significance will dispose us to face in a certain spirit rather than another, but they are not questions on which the existence of the gospel, or the possibility of faith, or of preaching Christ, is dependent. With such faculties as we have, and especially such an inability to make clear to ourselves what we mean by the relation of the temporal to the eternal,—a relation which is involved in all such questions,—it may even be that we recognize our inability to grasp truth about them in forms for which we can challenge the assent of others. We can be certain from

Christ's life that His very presence in the world is the assurance of an extraordinary condescension and grace in God, even if we are baffled in trying to think out all that is involved either in His coming forth from the Father or in His entrance into humanity. But if on the basis of an experience evoked by the Apostolic testimony we can call Him Lord and Saviour, recognizing in Him the only-begotten Son through whom alone we are brought to the Father, then we can preach Him, be our ignorance otherwise as deep as it may be.

12. It might have seemed natural, in the discussion of such a question, to refer more directly to the various criteria of Christianity which the NT itself suggests, e.g. Ro 10⁹, 1 Jn 4²⁴. But the last of these two passages only emphasizes the historical character of Christianity, the truth of our Lord's manhood, and the first the exaltation of Jesus: and to both of these justice has been done. The combination of the two is indeed required in preaching Christ, and it is all that is required. The reality of Jesus' life on earth as He Himself was conscious of it, the life of One uniquely related to God, and present in our world to make us all His debtors for revelation and redemption; and the exaltation of such a One to the right hand of God: it is on this that preaching Christ depends. Into this we can put all the convictions by which the NT writers were inspired, and all that we know of the words and deeds of Jesus; and while we share at the heart the faith of Apostles and Evangelists, we do not feel bound by all the forms in which they cast their thoughts. The faith which stimulated intelligence so wonderfully in them will have the same effect on all Christians, and they will not disown any who call Jesus Lord, and give Him the name which is above every name.

PREDICTION.—See PROPHET.

PRE-EMINENCE (OF CHRIST).—The expression is St. Paul's. We shall take the passage in which it occurs as our starting-point, and work from that.

I. St. Paul's conception.—1. The statement of it.—The locus classicus is Col 1¹³⁻²⁰. In that and its context St. Paul represents Christ as Head of both creations, the natural and the spiritual, the Cosmos and the Church. Of the former He is Creator, Upholder, and End. Its ground of existence is in Him (ἐν αὐτῷ); He is before it and over it, even its highest intelligences (πρὸ πάντων), and shapes it to His purpose (εἰς αὐτόν). Of the second He is ἀρχή, at once Source and First; Redeemer, Reconciler, Saviour (v. 20^{f.}); Fountain of Life (3^d); Treasury of Wisdom (2³); Hope of Glory (1⁷); All in All (3¹). He is sole Mediator in both (1¹⁶⁻²⁰), through whom all streams of creative, providential, redeeming light and power go forth, and in whom all lines of creaturely approach to God converge. Of both, therefore, He is rightful Lord, as is implied in πρωτότοκος (1^{15, 18}; see Lightfoot, in loc.), βασιλείαν τοῦ υἱοῦ (1¹³), and ἐν δεξιᾷ τοῦ θεοῦ καθημένος (3¹),—a phrase that everywhere carries with it (a) subordination to the Father, (b) rule over all else. In both He is pre-eminent (1¹⁸). And this, not for any arbitrary reason, but because of what He is, which explains both the place He occupies and the work He has done. For He is God's Son in a unique sense (1^{3, 13}—the phrase 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' in the former being common in St. Paul and other NT writers); He is the image—the visible Revealer—of the invisible God (1¹⁵); and in Him dwells permanently in a bodily manifestation the fulness of the Deity (1^{19, 20}), i.e. 'the totality of the Divine attributes and powers' (Lightfoot). His eternal Divinity shines out in ἔστω (1¹⁷), while γένηται (v. 18) reflects the humanity which He has assumed and glorified.

Similar teaching is found in the other Epistles of the same group. In Ephesians the ἐν αὐτῷ of Colossians becomes the dominant note. Christ is Head, Husband, and Saviour of the Church (4^{15, 25}). All blessing is in Him (1³); all things are summed up in Him (1¹⁰). In Him all, both Jew and Gentile, are built up a holy temple, Himself the Chief Corner-stone (2²⁰⁻²²). He is the Supreme Revealer of God's grace (2⁷) and wisdom (3¹⁰), the one Lord (4^{6, 7-10}) seated at God's right hand and exalted above every other present or future power (1²⁰⁻²²). Here, again, it is because of what He is—the Son of God (13 4¹²)—that He brings us to perfection, and that all these facts can be true of Him. In Philippians He is all-subduing Saviour (3^{20, 21}); through Him come righteousness (1¹¹), peace (4⁷), joy (4⁴), strength (4¹³). In Him we glory (3³); compared with Him all else is as refuse (3⁸); He is our life's mainspring (1²¹) and highest goal (3¹⁴). Essentially God, He laid aside the manifested glory of Deity, and assumed humanity with its sinless manifestations and deepest sufferings. Therefore God exalted Him, so that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow and every tongue confess Him Lord (2⁶⁻¹¹). It is probable that the title 'Lord,' when used of Jesus by St. Paul, carries with it always (as, indeed, it does in the rest of the NT) the fulness of meaning which it has here. The letter to Philemon is saturated with the conception expressed by the phrase 'in Christ,' which indeed forms the basis and strength of St. Paul's appeal.

According to this group of letters, Christ is pre-eminent primarily because of His Divine dignity, and secondarily because of His work in nature and in grace—as Creator, Mediator, Saviour, Lord. In St. Paul's mind these ideas are bound up inseparably with Him, and the probability is that he meant to express them in the full title—the Lord Jesus Christ—which he so frequently employs.

2. Genesis of this conception.—(1) It must be prior to all St. Paul's Epistles, for it is clearly present in all of them. To take the second group first. In 1 Corinthians Christ is God's power and wisdom (1^{24, 30}), the only Foundation (3¹¹), the true Passover (5⁷), our perfect Example (11¹), and the Second Adam, who gives life to all in Him (15⁴⁵). The Church is His body (12²⁷), of which, though not expressly stated, Christ must be the Head (cf. 11³). Especially worthy of note are 8⁶ (where He holds the same place in both creations as in Col.) and 15²⁷ (which tallies with Eph 1²⁰⁻²² and Ph 2¹¹). In 2 Cor. (5¹³⁻²¹) we have language substantially the same as Col 1¹⁹⁻²²; 4⁴⁻⁶ answers to Col 1¹⁵; 8⁹ implies pre-existence (cf. 1 Co 10⁴); 4⁵ and 10⁵ claim for Him unreserved obedience. In both these letters He is God's Son (I 1⁹ 15²⁸, II 1¹⁹). There is no need to quote specific passages in Gal. and Rom. representing Him as the only Saviour, for they are full of that thought. His universal Lordship is declared in Ro 9⁵ and 14⁹; His Sonship in Gal 1^{16, 20} 4⁴⁻⁶ and Ro 1^{3, 5, 10} 8^{3, 32}; His Deity implicitly in Gal 1^{1, 10-12} (in the contrast between Him and man), and expressly in Ro 9⁵. Even in Thessalonians we have the following: Deliverer (I 1¹⁰, II 3²) and Saviour (I 5^{9, 10}); Victor over evil in its mightiest manifestations, and Judge (I 5^{2f.}, II 1⁷⁻¹⁰ 2⁸⁻¹²); God's Son (I 1¹⁰), and associated with God in salutation and prayer (I 1¹, II 1^{1f.} and I 3¹¹). This linking of Christ and the Father in salutation, and the ascribing to Him what is ascribed to God, are regular features of St. Paul's writings. It should further be noted that in practically all these letters the comprehensive title—Lord Jesus Christ—is applied to Him, and that frequently the strongest statements are made incidentally in such a way as to indicate that they belong to the common Christian conviction.

(2) St. Luke's account of St. Paul's preaching harmonizes with this. Ac 16-28 is, roughly speaking, contemporaneous with the first three groups of St. Paul's letters. In these chapters Jesus is represented as Saviour and Lord, and, as such, worthy of our utmost devotion (16³¹ 20^{21-24, 35} 26¹⁸); as the Christ, the burden and goal of prophecy and the Hope of Israel (17³ 18⁵ 24¹⁴ 26^{6, 7, 22} 28^{20, 23}); as Judge of the world (17³¹), and even as God (20²⁸ text of NB). The book closes by summarizing the subject-matter of St. Paul's preaching as the Kingdom of God and the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ, where the full title is significantly given, as it is by St. Peter in his summary of the creed-content of the faith of Cornelius and his friends (11¹⁷). Working backward, we have in ch. 13 an extended report of St. Paul's address at Pisidian Antioch, which stands as representative of his teaching, at least during the First Missionary Journey. Certainly it must represent the view of Barnabas also; and its striking resemblance to St. Peter's Pentecost address is also noteworthy. In it Jesus is the Son of David, predicted by the prophets, and surely, therefore, Messiah (v. 22¹); God's holy and incorruptible One (v. 25); God's Son (v. 33); the Saviour (v. 23), through whom alone are remission of sins and justification (v. 38¹), who is the channel of grace (v. 43), the source of eternal life (v. 46), the light of the world (v. 47, cf. Eph 5⁸⁻¹⁴, Ph 2¹⁵). In 14²³ He is called Lord in a way which implies that the thought of His lordship was inseparable from faith.

The conception of Christ's Sonship here may seem to be quite different from that commonly found in the Epistles. But a comparison with Ro 14 may show that the two at root agree. Both here and in Romans the Resurrection is due to His holiness (Ac 13³⁵). In Rom., further, the holiness is due to His sonship, of which the Resurrection is God's formal declaration, or (as Meyer) into which the Resurrection instates Him. May this not be the idea here also? Linguistic usage permits; for the priest was said 'to cleanse' the leper when he officially pronounced him 'clean'; so may it not be that the thought in v. 33 is that in the Resurrection God formally declared Jesus to be His begotten Son? On the other hand, the occurrence of the term 'justified' (v. 39) shows how precarious a procedure it is to assert development of doctrine according to the occurrence or non-occurrence of a particular expression in brief letters addressed to different local conditions. The word here shows that St. Paul's doctrine of justification was not born just at the time of writing to the Galatians, even though it is not formally stated in the Thessalonian or Corinthian letters. The three accounts of St. Paul's conversion in Acts (9²²⁻²⁶) show how the details of an event may be varying presented according to the character of those addressed and the purpose of the speaker.

(3) To find the genesis of St. Paul's view of Christ, we must go back to his conversion. There his conviction, at least as to the Person and pre-eminence of Christ, seems to have been settled. For (a) the light that shone about him, brighter than the Syrian noon-day sun (cf. Rev 1¹⁶), was a light out of heaven. To him, as a well-instructed Jew, that was the Glory of God's revealed presence. Would it not be natural for Saul, with his great conscientiousness, zeal for God, and hope of attaining to the promise made to the fathers (Ac 26⁷), to conclude immediately that the Lord had again visited His people, and that the august Person who appeared to him was none other than Jehovah Himself (cf. Is 6 and 1 Co 9¹)? If so, we can understand the pre-eminent place that Person for ever after held in his thought. The words of rebuke and heaven-laden pity naturally stun and bewilder him, and lead to the strange mingling of surprise and faith that breaks out in his question, 'Who art thou, Lord?' The definite answer, 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest,' however it may have wrenched his soul, compelled his conversion. He surrendered unreservedly, and henceforth Jesus is his unchallenged and peerless Lord. Would such an unqualified surrender be justifiable had he not identified Jesus with the Jehovah of his people's history? Does any other view as fully explain all the facts? (b) Unquestionably Saul was at once committed to the acceptance of Jesus as He was preached by those whom he was persecuting. For he must have been quite familiar with the claims made on behalf of Jesus by the Apostles and their associates. That Jesus was the Messiah, for example, he must have heard again and again. And what they declared Him to be, Jesus here plainly endorses. These two facts touching Christ's Person as Divine and His office as Messiah, Saul probably apprehended in the order here given. The record of his early preaching seems to follow the same order. For there he is represented as first preaching that Jesus is the Son of God, and later proving that Jesus is the Messiah (Ac 9²⁰⁻²²).

Doubtless he experienced some intellectual bewilderment. It was one thing to feel that the Mighty One who had appeared to him was Jehovah, and another to understand how the Man Jesus of Nazareth could be verily God. It might seem to strike at Jewish monotheism, and yet the two facts are before him. His mind must find some solution. Possibly it flashed upon him that God was essentially invisible (hinted at in Ex 33¹⁷⁻²³; cf. Col 1⁴, 1 Ti 1⁷ 6¹⁶), and that therefore Jehovah, the august Person who was wont to appear to men and had now appeared to him, did not exhaust the mystery of God. Possibly he remembered that in the OT the closest relation to God was expressed by 'sonship' (2 S 7¹⁴, Hos 11¹). Perhaps he had heard from Christians utterances which suggested distinctions of Persons in the Godhead. For certainly the language both of St. John and of the Synoptists implies them, and in the baptismal formula mention would be made regularly of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. It is quite possible that in the light of his new experience some or all of these may have led him to the assertion that Jesus is the Son of God as the first declaration of his faith. But Gal 1⁵ may mean that some special access of revealing light was given him. In either case, the probability is that when he proclaimed Jesus to be the Son of God he did so in a sense transcending the ethical, equalling in significance its use on the lips of Jesus, and in full harmony with the Trinitarian conception. Jesus is God, Jesus is also Son. Certainly, if the meaning of the expression was specially revealed to him, the term chosen by St. Luke (ἐκθυσσεν, 9²⁰) becomes peculiarly appropriate, as representing not so much something which he had laboriously reasoned out, as something which he received by so direct a revelation that he can come forward proclaiming it with all the certainty of a commissioned herald.

II. Conceptions of the Twelve and their associates in the Acts.—Our discussion has brought us to the early preaching of the Twelve. Let us see more particularly the way they had come. Their approach was the opposite of St. Paul's. They began with the Man Jesus of Nazareth, and advanced slowly to the higher thought of Him; he, as a believer, began with the Divine Lord, and swiftly adjusted all else to that. They marched from earth to heaven; he came down from heaven to earth. The two forms of expression—'Jesus Christ' and 'Christ Jesus'—may represent the two lines of experience as well as the two regular standpoints of thought to which Lightfoot has called attention.

1. Statements by Peter, Stephen and Philip, and James.—St. Peter may be considered as representing the Twelve, including St. John, and his teaching may be summed up thus: Jesus of Nazareth is Lord and Messiah, exalted at God's right hand (2³⁶ 10³⁶); into His name, i.e. into allegiance to Him, believers are baptized (2³⁸ 10⁴⁸, cf. 1 Co 1¹³); He is the Holy and Righteous One, the Suffering Servant of God, the only Saviour for men anywhere under heaven, and so Prince (ἀρχηγός—Author as well as Ruler) of Life (3¹⁴. 4²⁷⁻³⁰ 4¹²); the

* A sample fact would be the use of the word Κύριος, which in LXX is used to translate Jehovah, in the Gospels 'usually designates God, and in the Epistles, especially St. Paul's, most frequently Christ' (Winer; cf. Cremer, and Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, p. 295; and esp. Knowling, Witness of the Epistles, 261 ff.). The view here taken obviates Cremer's difficulty. For it would then be natural to use θεός of the invisible God (as in Ju 1¹⁸), and Κύριος of God manifesting Himself as Jehovah in OT or as Christ in NT.

Corner-stone (4¹¹); the last and greatest of the prophets, who becomes the touchstone of destiny (3^{22f}); the Judge of living and dead (10⁴²). In St. Stephen's address several of these notes recur. Jesus is Lord (7^{56f}); the Righteous One of whom the prophets spoke (7⁵²); the Son of Man who in Divine glory stands at the right hand of God (7⁵⁶), the designation being especially appropriate as indicating that He did not lay aside His humanity when He ascended (cf. Ph 2¹⁰ the name Jesus); while the whole trend of the argument is that as Joseph and Moses were God-appointed deliverers, so Jesus is the Supreme Deliverer and Saviour (vv. 9-14, 22, 35, 37). St. Philip preaches Him as the Messiah and as the Suffering Servant of Is 53, which carries with it the ideas of Saviourship and Supremacy (8^{5, 12, 22-35}). Of the passages quoted, three (2³⁹ 4¹² 10³⁶) indicate the universality of Christ's pre-eminence, at least so far as men are concerned. This involved His being Saviour and Lord to Gentiles as well as Jews. That great fact of Christ's personal relationship to all men St. Peter seems to have seen clearly; what it involved for Judaism he had not yet apprehended,—an illustration of the fact that a great central truth may be grasped long before it is fully understood in its implications.

Whether St. Peter's conception of Christ's pre-eminence went beyond the world of men to that of higher intelligences, and the universe generally, is not so clear. And yet it is not implied in the frequent phrase 'at the right hand of God'? And might it not be understood from the prefatory words to the great Commission (Mt 28¹⁸), which would be still ringing in his ears? Further, does not the language employed compel us to see in his thought of Christ more than mere manhood? Is this not suggested by the use of the word Κύριος in the Pentecost discourse? (See, e.g., vv. 23, 34, 36, 39, where it is certainly applied both to Jehovah and to Jesus). It is a phenomenon that persists in the NT. We have noticed it already in connexion with St. Paul's experience. Another phenomenon equally persistent is found in vv. 17 and 33, where the outpouring of the Spirit is ascribed first to God and then to the exalted Christ. This, of course, if it stood alone, might be explained on the principle that what one does through another he does himself. But it does not stand alone. His sinlessness, here repeatedly asserted, demands some adequate explanation. To be Judge of the world demands knowledge more than human. Similar phenomena occur in St. Stephen's address (7³⁰⁻³²), where God, the Lord, and the Angel appear to be the same One, between whom and the people Moses mediated (v. 35).

We notice next the view of St. James, as gathered from Ac 15 and his Epistle, which is here accepted as of early date. On the understanding that the letter of Ac 15²³⁻²⁹ was drafted by him, we have two points worthy of note in that chapter. The full title 'our Lord Jesus Christ' is given (v. 26), and the 'our' as well as the quotation (vv. 16-18) show that St. James saw clearly that the sovereignty of Jesus would be accepted by the Gentiles, as well as by the Jewish world. In his Epistle there is added to the full title the phrase 'of glory,' which 'certainly attributes to Jesus a superhuman character' (Stevens, Theol. of NT, p. 287), and probably a Divine one (cf. Ac 7³). In 5⁷⁻¹¹ Κύριος is used first of God and then of Christ. In 4¹² the Judge seems to be God; in 5⁹ Christ is Judge. Is there any simpler explanation of this than that they were regarded as the same Person, and identified with the gracious Jehovah of the OT? He is probably also the Righteous One of 5⁶, and undoubtedly the Saviour in whom saving faith rests. Such expressions from a brother in the flesh who had lived with Jesus from childhood are surely commanding striking. The Lord of Glory stands forth in the thought of St. James as at least the Supreme Lord and only Saviour of men.

2. Genesis of their conception.—This takes us back to the Gospel history, and that to the prophecies of the OT. (1) Andrew and John were led to follow Him through the testimony of John the Baptist. Others were doubtless directly or indirectly affected by John's ministry. And John links us inevitably to the OT and the prophecies that went before concerning the Messiah. With these John and most of his hearers, these first disciples among them, were familiar. It is not necessary to go into the details here (they may be found in Drummond, Stanton, Edersheim, Westcott, Kirkpatrick, and a recent book by Willis J. Beecher, The Prophets and the Promise). But the heart of prophecy is God's close personal relation to man, His loving interest in man and gracious purpose for him. Thus there was in it a fact and a promise—the fact of God's kindness and grace, the promise of a Divinely-wrought deliverance. The former was the vital religious force in Israel's history, the latter its hope. Through unequalled suffering and by the might of His power the promised Deliverer was to crush the adversary, save His people, and set up an everlasting Kingdom that should fill the whole earth. Language is almost exhausted in depicting the greatness of that Deliverer and the glory of His reign (e.g. 2 S 23¹⁻⁸, Ps 72, 89, Ezk 37²¹⁻²⁸, Is 26, 52, 53, Dn 7^{3, 27}). Some passages identify the Deliverer with Jehovah Himself appearing among men as their Saviour and King (e.g. Is 9^{6f}, and, in its light and that of Mt 1²³, Is 7¹⁴ and 8⁹⁻¹⁵; Is 40³⁻⁵ comp. with Mt 3³ ||; Is 45²¹⁻²⁵ comp. with Ac 4¹² and Ph 2^{10f}.; Jer. 23⁵⁻⁸, where Jehovah our Righteousness is the Branch and King; Zec 12¹⁻¹⁰, where the pierced one is identified with Jehovah; and Mal 3¹).

Whatever may be dark or disputable in these Scriptures, the pre-eminence of the Coming One is clear. John the Baptist was the last of the prophets. In his utterances the earlier are summarized. Jesus is the 'Lamb of God' who bears the world's sin, and 'the Son of God' as possessing permanently and without measure the Spirit of God (Jn 1²⁹⁻³⁴, cf. the Evangelist's elaboration in 3^{34f}). He is executor of God's wrath as well as of His grace, baptizing in fire as well as in the Holy Spirit (Mt 3¹⁰⁻¹²); He is the Bridegroom, even as Jehovah was Husband to His people (Jn 3²⁹). In His presence John feels his own inferiority and confesses it. He is not fit to loose His sandal-strap. At best he is His herald and friend (Mt 3^{11, 14}, Jn 1²³ 3²⁹). John can tell them to repent, and can baptize them in water as a symbolic declaration of repentance; but only this greater One can deal with them in the realm of reality and baptize in the Spirit (Mt 3¹¹ || Jn 1^{26, 33}). In the light of Christ's tribute to John's greatness (Mt 11⁷⁻¹¹), what a testimony John's utterances form to the pre-eminent greatness of Christ. It was the beginning of the disciples' faith.

(2) John's testimony was confirmed to them and strengthened by Christ's own personality, words, and deeds. His personality captivated and mastered them. The hallowed influence of the first day's fellowship (Jn 1³⁹), issuing in strengthened faith and open confession, is a sample of what was continuously at work thereafter. The calm and confidence, serenity and majesty of His demeanour; His absolute rectitude and sinlessness; His artless yet reverent familiarity with God and absolute devotion to His will; His exquisite tenderness, quick sympathy, abounding compassion, and unwearying beneficence, filled them with wonder, awe, admiration, and affection, and steadily ripened their faith. His words were clothed with unparalleled authority, and were full of wisdom and grace. In this setting His deeds of might and mercy accredited Him as from God, and attested His Lordship over nature as well as His Saviourship to men (see Mk 1²⁷ 4⁴¹, Lk 4²² et al.).

To all this experience, and interpreting it, were added His own imperial claims, most fully presented in the Fourth Gospel (see art. CLAIMS OF CHRIST).

(3) To the testimony of John and that of His own character and claims was added the testimony of His enemies, both men and demons (Jn 7⁴⁶, 19⁸, Mk 1²⁴ 3¹¹), of angels (Mt 28⁶), and of the Father Himself (Mt 3¹⁷ and Lk 9³⁵). The last passage is especially strong, because intended to rebuke the thought of putting Moses and Elijah on the same level with Him.

The effect of this growing body of testimony is seen in the confessions made from time to time. The early ones in Jn. needed deepening. The disciples had misconceptions, the removal of which might stagger their faith. They had as yet but poor knowledge of their own sinfulness; while of the path of suffering Jesus must take to His glory they knew nothing. The new consciousness of sin which came to St. Peter as he beheld the miraculous draught of fishes (Lk 5⁸), and the deeper sense of it that came with his denial (Mt 26⁷⁵), are waymarks of progress on the one side; the testing times in the Capernaum synagogue, when not only most of the multitude but even professed disciples forsook Him (Jn 6⁶⁰⁻⁷¹), and at Caesarea Philippi, whither He had gone from the growing hostility in Judæa and Galilee, mark their progress on the other. It is for this reason that that confession of His Messiahship is treated as so important (Mt 16¹³⁻²⁰); their faith in Him holds when others desert. Immediately the way of the cross and the stern terms of discipleship are announced. We can see how it shook them. The Transfiguration, with its double message of death and glory (Lk 9³¹), served to steady them during the dark months that were coming; and the voice of the Father declared Jesus' Sonship and superiority to the greatest of the olden day. That scene was perhaps a means of answering the Master's prayer that their faith should not fail. Nor did it fail utterly. Peter's tears are the proof. But though their faith in Him personally held, it was intellectually eclipsed. It was the Resurrection, His subsequent teachings, and the coming of the Spirit that finally established it in clearness and power. That great conviction is expressed emphatically by Thomas when he hails Him as his Lord and God (Jn 20²⁸)—a declaration which Jesus endorsed. In keeping therewith is the closing scene in Mt 28¹⁶⁻²⁰, where, on the one hand, Jesus claims all authority in heaven and on earth, and, on the other, they worshipped (προσκύνησαν) Him,—a term which should perhaps be understood here and in Lk 24⁵² in the full religious sense. Thus in the closing scenes of the Gospels these men are consciously face to face with One whom they joyfully hail as their 'Lord and God,' and the closing words fold back and into the opening quotation from the prophet that the Coming One should be 'Immanuel—God with us' (Mt 1²²). When men so thoroughly steeped in monotheism as these Jews, and with the lofty thought of God all Jews had, so believe and receive Him, how for them could there be any doubt about His absolute pre-eminence? Many adjustments of their views on other things will yet be necessary; but this conviction will abide and become the centre, the touchstone of truth for them, the central fact into which all others must be fitted. As St. Paul expresses it, they will hold the Head and so increase with the increase of God (Col 2¹⁹).

III. Conception of the later NT books.—1. Hebrews.—The very purpose of this letter is to forestall apostasy by showing Christ's superiority to all others, including Moses and Aaron, the prophets, and all the angels. The first chapter is equal in strength and fulness to the great passages in Col. and Philippians. He is God's Son, the express image of His Person, the effulgence of His glory; Maker of the world; God's last and perfect Spokesman. The angels worship Him. The Father Himself addresses Him as God, who made all things, and outlives all things; whose throne stands for ever, whose sceptre is righteousness, and to whom all enemies shall become subject. In subsequent chapters He is represented as Captain (ἀρχηγός, Author and Leader, 2¹⁰) of our salvation; eternal High Priest made higher than the heavens, a Son perfected for evermore (7²¹⁻²⁵), who by the sacrifice of Himself obtains for us eternal redemption (9¹²), and secures us in an eternal covenant (8⁷⁻¹³ 9¹⁵ 13²⁰); the Author and Perfecter of our faith (12²); and the great Shepherd of His sheep (13²⁰). He is the One who speaks from heaven, rejection of whom is doom (12²⁵). He is our supreme goal. Others change and pass away; He abides the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever (13⁸); and to Him belongs the glory for ever and ever (13²¹).

2. First Peter.—Many of the terms with which we have become so familiar are here. He is the Lord Jesus Christ (1³). We must sanctify Him as Lord in our hearts (3¹⁵). He is seated at God's right hand, angels and principalities being made subject to Him (3²²). As Saviour He bears our sin (2²⁴), redeems us with His blood (1¹⁹), is the Chief Shepherd, the Bishop of Souls (5⁴ 2²⁵), and mediates all God's gifts to man (2⁵ 4¹¹). He is the Chief Corner-stone (2⁶); Sonship unique is implied in 1³, His place in a Trinity in 1², pre-existence in 1¹¹ (cf. 'manifested' in 2¹⁰); His identity with Jehovah in 2⁵ (where an OT declaration about Jehovah is referred to Him). In keeping with this is the contrast between His 'blood' and 'corruptible things' in 1¹⁸ (cf. Ac 20²⁸).

3. Second Peter is equally emphatic about His lordship (1², 1⁴, 1⁶), and more explicit about His Sonship (1¹⁷) and Deity (1¹, cf. v. 1¹¹ 2²⁰ 3², 1⁸; for the order of words is the same, and the presumption is that in each case but one person is referred to—Jesus Christ is God and Saviour as well as Lord and Saviour). The day of the Lord, ushered in by His coming, marks the time of His full triumph and glory (ch. 3), and His Kingdom is eternal (1¹¹).

4. Jude has in common with 2 Peter the use of the full title and of the term δεσπότης (v. 4, 2 P 2¹, cf. 2 Ti 2²¹)—a term expressive of special absoluteness of authority, and made the stronger here by the μόνον. This Epistle has in common with 1 Peter what looks like a knowledge of His place in a Trinity (v. 20¹).

5. St. John's Writings.—In Acts, St. John was linked with St. Peter, and it is instructive to note how emphatically he harks back in his Epistles to that which they had from the beginning (e.g. I 1^{1ff}, II 3¹). He seems anxious to guard against any change from that early conception of Christ which is summed up in his Gospel in the confession of Thomas and in his own declaration (20²⁸, 31).

The Prologue of St. John's Gospel restates it in the light of all the currents of thought that he has been meeting with in the intervening years. It stands, in its lofty conception of Christ, beside Col 1, Ph 2, and He 1, and forms the great thesis which the historic testimony marshalled in the Gospel was meant to establish. That testimony has been already referred to. All its strands are bound together here,—Creator, Light, Life, Revealer of God, Saviour of Men,—and all are grounded in His Godhead. What 'the Son' on the lips of Jesus involves and what the Evangelist expresses by 'the only-begotten Son' (3¹⁶), is here (v. 1⁸) expressed by 'only-begotten God,' which after all is the only adequate explanation of the phenomena, however incomprehensible to us it may be in itself. For He was in the beginning; He was face to face with God; He was God. The last statement guards against any form of Unitarianism (θεός would admit that), while in the use of θεός it provides for the Trinitarian conception which ὁ θεός might be understood to exclude, and fits in with the previous πρὸς τὸν θεόν, which implies two Persons in face to face fellowship. Being God, He creates the Universe and becomes incarnate, and so reveals God. Of this fact John the Baptist had some glimpse (1¹⁵). It is here assigned as the reason for his sense of inferiority.

St. John's Epistles assume all this, as the opening verses show, and are intended to point out that a life of righteousness, truth, and love is necessarily involved in that fellowship with God which faith in Christ effects. The liar is the one who denies that Jesus is the Christ (1 Jn 2²²); he who believes that is born of God (5¹). He who denies the Son hath not the Father, and will deny both Father and Son. Such is antichrist (2^{22f.}). Jesus Christ is the true God (5²⁰). This is final truth, beyond which none can go and have God (2 Jn 9).

In the Apocalypse the Apostle is given a vision of Christ in His ineffable glory, and a panoramic view of His march to acknowledged pre-eminence. All the main features already sketched reappear here in most striking fashion. He is the Lamb slain, the Redeemer who in His blood loosed from their sins (1⁵) and purchased unto God men out of every nation (5^{9f.}); the Living One who holds the keys of death and Hades (1¹⁸) and gives life (2¹⁷); the Ruler of the kings of the earth (1⁵), the King of kings and Lord of lords (1⁷); the Son of God (2¹⁸) worshipped as God is (5⁸⁻¹⁴ cf. with 4⁸⁻¹¹) and as no other should be (2^{28f.}). Between Him and God other parallels are drawn that find explanation and warrant only in His Deity, e.g. each is the Temple and Light of the New Jerusalem (21^{22f.}); they have a common throne (2²⁸), and the title Κύριος is applied to both.

It is clear that all the NT writers regard Jesus Christ as pre-eminent by virtue of His Person, His work, and the place which the universe of created intelligences shall yet accord Him. For, though some of them have written briefly, all that they do say fits in with this general conception. And it must be remembered that these early leaders formed a compact body, consciously bound together by the holiest ties, breathing the same atmosphere, receiving the same body of historic facts, professing the same vital religious experience, and drawn the closer together by the very opposition they encountered; and that, however they may have differed in minor matters, there is no symptom of difference or dispute among them as to the unapproachable greatness of their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, or as to the fact that He is the coming Universal King. PRE-EXISTENCE.—

The OT conception of the Messiah was, for the most part, limited by the horizon of this present world. The prominent thought is that of a king of the line of David, born of the human stock (Jer 30²¹), though supernaturally endowed and blessed. There are, however, traces of another and higher conception, in which the Messianic king tends to be identified or closely associated with the personal self-revelation of Jehovah. The most remarkable of these are the titles 'Mighty God' and 'Father of Eternity' in Is 9⁶; the statement of Mic 5², that the Ruler who is to come forth from Bethlehem will be one 'whose goings forth are from of old, from ancient days.' To these may perhaps be added Bar 3³⁷. Such passages as these, whether they are understood as implying definitely the personal pre-existence of the Messiah, or only his existence in the eternal counsels of God, tended undoubtedly to raise the Messianic conception to a higher level, and to prepare for the claims of Christ Himself, and the developed teaching of the pre-existence of Christ which is found in NT and the Christian writers generally.

In the more 'popular' teaching of Jesus Christ which is recorded in the Synoptic Gospels, though His continued existence, even to the end of time, is clearly stated, there are but few hints of His pre-existence before His human birth. His question to the Pharisees concerning Ps 110 (Mt 22⁴¹⁻⁴⁵, Mk 12³⁵⁻³⁷, Lk 20⁴¹⁻⁴⁴) would seem to imply, in the background of the Speaker's mind, His pre-existence before His birth of the line of David. A similar conclusion might be drawn from the language of the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (see esp. Mk 12⁹). And possibly the lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23³⁷, Lk 13³⁴, taken in connexion with Dt 32¹¹) implies that the attempt to 'gather together' the children of Jerusalem had extended over a much longer past than the three years' ministry.

There can be no question that St. John was profoundly convinced of the eternal pre-existence of Jesus Christ as the personal Logos. This is most clearly stated in the Prologue to the Gospel (Jn 1¹⁻¹⁸). Similarly John the Baptist is quoted as bearing witness of Jesus in this respect (v. 30). And in the discourses of Jesus Christ which are contained in this Gospel, addressed apparently to a different type of audience from that of the Synoptics, and conveying a fuller self-revelation, there are most startling claims to pre-existence. To Nicodemus (3¹³), Christ claims to know the heavenly things as having Himself descended from heaven. The same claim was made in the synagogue at Capernaum (6³³⁻⁴²), and produced strife and astonishment. A little later the Jews of Jerusalem attempt to stone Christ for blasphemy. He claimed not only priority to Abraham, but apparently an eternal pre-existence (8³⁸). And in the climax of self-revealing at the Last Supper, Jesus in His communing with the Father twice refers to His own personal relations with the Father before the world began (17^{5, 24}).

The sermons in the Acts confine themselves to the historical manifestation of Jesus Christ, the prophetic preparation for it, and the Second Advent. But in the writings of St. Paul an increasing consciousness of Christ's pre-existence and definiteness in speaking of it can be traced. In 1 Co 15⁴⁷ Christ is 'from heaven,' in 2 Co 8⁹ His earthly poverty is contrasted with an antecedent richness. It is, however, in the Epistles of the First Imprisonment that pre-existence is not only hinted at, but expressed and defined. The remarkable passage Ph 2⁵⁻¹¹ predicates deliberate will and choice of Christ Jesus, before His Incarnation. He willed to surrender (from a human point of view) His natural equality with God, and chose the glory which came through humiliation and sacrifice of self. And, still more definitely, in Col 1¹⁵⁻¹⁷ not only priority, but an eternal priority to all creation is ascribed to Him: 'he is before all things.' With this passage should be compared the opening of the Epistle to the Hebrews, where not only similar descriptions are given of the nature of Christ, but the words of Ps 102, contrasting the eternity of the Creator with the transitoriness of creation, are boldly and without any explanation applied directly to Christ (cf. also Ro 10⁹⁻¹⁵). The language of the Apocalypse is strictly parallel (Rev 1¹⁷ 3¹⁴ 21⁶ 22¹³).

PREMEDITATION.—1. There is frequent evidence of this quality in the teachings of Christ, and in the experiences of His life. Regarding Him simply on the common level of humanity, as for this faculty we necessarily must, there is little ground for the assertion so often made that He was an enthusiast, dependent on the inspiration of the moment. The occasional intuitions of the Divine are no explanation of the great body of His teaching. There is an inborn forethought, a native endowment of premeditation, that, humanly speaking, goes to the building up of His greatest thoughts, uttered or wrought. No accident or impulse gave birth to the Sermon on the Mount. Its varied teachings, the keywords of a spiritual and moral revolution yet to be effected in the world, strike one as the result of most careful observation, comparison, and imagination—all the product of patient premeditation. From His entrance into the active Gospel story, in that prelude of the Boy in the Temple, to the calm strength with which He faced the last days, it is a gift of deep insight into human probabilities that we look upon. The Saviour of men foresees His task—its glories, and its awful cost.

As a boy He is surprised that His parents have not seen this, and known that His thoughts were so fixed on Divine things that in the looked-for Jerusalem He is sure to be found about the Temple and the teachers. 'How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house?' (Lk 2⁴⁹). He 'cometh unto John to be baptized of him' with the decision already thought out that 'thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness' (Mt 3¹⁵⁻¹⁷ || Mk 1⁹⁻¹¹ Lk 3²¹⁻²²). The choice of the passage from Isaiah as the text of His first sermon at Nazareth (Lk 4¹⁸) is too distinctive to have been the chance of an opening of the roll. The more often we read and weigh it, sentence by sentence, word by word, the more wonderfully true do we find it as a summary of our Lord's mission. What care, what hesitation, must have preceded the selection of the twelve Apostles, and the delivering of that high commission that rings down through the ages with a strange attraction to all set apart for ministry. Only the deepest premeditation could have given them such a full charge—to preach the Kingdom, raise the dead, and reveal the secret of life in the cross on the one hand, and on the other to recognize the disciple's duty in the common needs of men, as in the giving of a cup of cold water (Mt 9³⁷ 10 || Mk 3¹³⁻¹⁵ 6⁷⁻¹² Lk 9¹⁻⁶). He had found the incompleteness of the Law, and with deliberate purpose declared His mission to be one that was not to destroy but to fulfil: 'Except your righteousness shall exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom' (Mt 5^{17, 20}). He sees the divisions that will come because of the gospel (Lk 12⁴⁹), but, as One who has thought out every step of the way, it can be written of Him, 'He set his face stedfastly to go to Jerusalem' (Lk 9³¹). There He speaks of the inevitable destruction of the Temple and the officialism it had so long stood for (Mt 24¹ || Mk 13¹ Lk 21⁵); there He weeps over the lost possibilities of Jerusalem, that ancient home of faith (Lk 19⁴²); and there, from the midst of His own agony and sorrow, He can bid the women of the city weep for the downfall that is to come, 'for yourselves and for your children' (Lk 23²⁸). Dwelling upon prophetic visions, He portrays the signs that shall herald the coming of the Son of Man (Mt 24²⁹ || Lk 21²⁵).

But most notable of all His personal premeditations is that which gives expression to His passion and death. As One who walked beneath the shadow of the cross, His thoughts bear frequent witness to that silent companionship. He comes to the last Passover, and Peter and John are sent ahead with instructions that suggest a prepared understanding with the householder (Mt 26¹⁸ || Mk 14¹³ Lk 22⁷), thus giving us the beautiful and precious thought that the first of the long line of celebrations of the Lord's Supper should have taken place in a room chosen beforehand by Christ Himself. The sufferings inherent in Messiahship are foreshadowed in His many utterances concerning the cross (Mt 20¹⁷⁻¹⁹ || Mk 10³² Lk 18³¹, Lk 9²², Mt 17^{22, 23} || Mk 9³¹ Lk 9⁴⁴ Jn 12^{3, 16}); the necessity for His imitators (disciples) to bear their cross (Mt 16²⁴ || Mk 8³⁴ Lk 9^{23, 14}); the certainty that He would be delivered up to His enemies (Mt 26²¹ || Mk 14¹⁸ Lk 22²¹ Jn 13²¹); the desertion by His followers, who would leave Him alone, 'and yet I am not alone, for the Father is with me' (Jn 16³², Mt 26³¹ || Mk 14²⁷ Lk 22³¹ Jn 13³⁶). But He looked beyond the cross and saw the power of the risen life, and gave the promise of the Comforter, 'the Spirit of Truth who would lead them into all truth' (Jn 15²⁶ 16¹³). See also art. PLAN.

There are occasions on which His teaching or His action seems entirely unpremeditated. The immediacy of an intuition is seen in His use of the opportunity given Him by the woman at the well (Jn 4⁷), or in the call of Nathanael (1²⁸), or in the treatment of the woman taken in sin (8¹⁻⁷), or in the scene at Simon the Pharisee's (Mt 26⁶⁻¹³ || Mk 14³⁻⁹ Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰ Jn 12¹⁻⁸), or the freeing of the Sabbath from Rabbinic tyranny (Mt 12⁹ || Mk 2²⁵ Lk 6⁵).

2. But Christ constantly advocates forethought, that yoke which brings ordered rest (Mt 11²⁸). The builder who chooses his site carelessly may build on sand instead of solid foundations, and all the finely dreamed temple of his faith be brought to the ground (Mt 7²⁴ || Lk 6⁴⁶); or he may commence a tower too great for him to finish, as a king may carelessly engage in a ruinous war (Lk 14^{28ff.}). The parables of the Hidden Treasure and the Pearl of Great Price are the records of those who thoughtfully weigh all lesser things against the great adventure (Mt 13^{44, 45}). The parable of the Wise and Foolish Virgins is obviously the story of premeditation and its worth. The Prodigal Son leaves nothing to chance when he thinks of returning: the very words with which he will meet his father are rehearsed (Lk 15¹¹). The first impulse of the Unjust Steward is to ask 'What shall I do?', and to form his plan which, though immoral in itself, shows a careful foresight that in its higher thought and morality is too often lacking in the Christian disciple; 'The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light' (Lk 16¹⁻⁸). The disciple who offers himself too readily is bidden to count the cost, and is reminded of the hardships: 'The foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head' (Mt 8²⁰); and an unwearying watchfulness is demanded, that the servant may be ready whenever his Lord knocks (Lk 12³⁶). Strongly does Christ reprove those who watch the heavens for signs of weather and can read the skies, but cannot read the spirit of their day (Mt 16² || Mk 8², Mt 12³⁹ || Lk 11³⁰).

3. And yet how plainly Jesus sees that premeditation has its dangers, and may sap away the energies and effective values of a man's life. It is easy to be over-cautious, to grow too anxious about the lesser things (Mt 6^{25, 31} || Lk 12²²), giving all our thought to the care of these rather than of the life that is life indeed (cf. the parable of the Rich Fool, Lk 12¹⁵⁻²¹). It was surely with this thought in mind that Jesus gave that command to His Apostles, 'Get you no gold, nor silver' (Mt 10⁹); and 'when they deliver you up, be not anxious what ye shall speak' (10¹⁹). Too calculating a spirit, too careful a measurement of possible dangers, too great a forethought as to an assured future different from that of other men, would paralyze the missionary spirit. The disciple must not be over-prudent: he must give himself ungrudgingly, and sow the seed broadcast, not being too careful about the purity and goodness of the ground in which he sows, even throwing some on the trodden pathways of the world, and on what seems the shallowest of soil (Mt 13¹⁻⁹ || Mk 4¹⁻⁹ Lk 8⁴⁻⁸).

PREPARATION (παρασκευή, Mt 27⁶², Mk 15⁴², Lk 23⁵⁴, Jn 19^{14, 31, 42}).—1. Since the Sabbath was a day of holy rest, the food for it was cooked and all else needful got ready on the previous day, the προσάββατον (Mk 15⁴²);* and thus that day was designated by the Jews 'the Preparation.'† The Christians took over the term,‡ and it remains to this day the regular name for Friday in the Greek Calendar.

2. The term was also used of the day of preparation, whatever day of the week it might be, for any of the sacred festivals, especially the Passover. The Paschal Supper was eaten on the evening which, since the Jewish day began at 6 p.m., ushered in the fifteenth day of the month Nisan; and the fourteenth day, when all was got ready for the celebration, was called the Preparation.

The term occurs thrice in the Synoptics (Mt 27⁶², Mk 15⁴², Lk 23⁵⁴), and in each instance it means Friday. In the Fourth Gospel also it occurs thrice (19^{14, 31, 42}), and there would be no doubt that here also it means Friday;§ were it not for two other passages. (1) At 13¹ St. John seems to put the Last Supper 'before the feast of the passover.' (2) At 18²⁸ he says that, when on the morning after the Last Supper the rulers brought Jesus before Pilate, 'they did not themselves enter into the Praetorium, that they might not be defiled, but might eat the passover'; whence it would seem that the Paschal Supper had not been celebrated the previous evening, but was to be celebrated that evening. It thus appears as though there were a glaring discrepancy between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel. They all agree that Jesus was crucified on Friday; but whereas according to the Synoptists that Friday was the 15th Nisan, and on the previous evening which ushered it in Jesus had eaten the regular Paschal Supper with His disciples (cf. Lk 22⁷), according to St. John it was the 14th Nisan, and the Supper in the upper room on the previous evening was either not the Passover at all,|| or was eaten a day too soon.* In the Synoptics παρασκευή means simply Friday; in the Fourth Gospel it means the Preparation Day, being also, as it chanced, Friday.

The problem has been discussed from the earliest times, and nowhere has harmonistic ingenuity been more lavishly expended. In our day the harmonistic method is out of fashion, and the tendency of some critics is to pronounce the Johannine representation unhistorical, and to explain how it originated. Appeal is made to the idea, suggested, it is alleged, by St. Paul (1 Co 5⁷), and definitely enunciated by Clement of Alexandria,† that Jesus, being the true Paschal Lamb, must have been slain on the Preparation Day, 14th Nisan. It is pointed out that, by way of proving Him the true Paschal Lamb, St. John (1) throws back the anointing at Bethany to 10th Nisan (12¹), the day on which the Paschal lamb was chosen (Ex 12³); (2) represents Jesus as still before Pilate at the sixth hour, i.e. noon, in order, it is alleged, to make the Crucifixion synchronize with the sacrifice of the Paschal lambs, which were slain between 3 and 5 p.m.; ‡ (3) shows how the Law's prescription that the lamb's bones should not be broken (Ex 12¹⁰, Nu 9¹²), was fulfilled in the case of Jesus (19³⁶).§

This is ingenious rather than convincing. (1) The anointing at Bethany actually took place, as St. John represents, six days before the Passover; and St. Matthew and St. Mark, with that disregard of chronological sequence which is characteristic of the Synoptic editors of the Apostolic tradition, have brought it into connexion with the Betrayal (Mt 26⁶⁻¹⁶=Mk 14³⁻¹¹); their idea being, apparently, that the traitor was angered by the Lord's rebuke (Mt 26¹⁰=Mk 14⁶=Jn 12⁷). His foul deed was a stroke of revenge.|| (2) If, as is possible, St. John computed the hours of the day, not, like the Synoptists, from 6 to 6, but, according to the method which probably obtained in Asia Minor, from 12 to 12,¶ then by 'the sixth hour' he means, not noon, but 6 a.m., thus agreeing with the Synoptists (cf. Mt 27^{1, 2}=Mk 15¹). (3) Jesus was none the less the true Paschal Lamb, though He was not crucified between 3 and 5 p.m. on the 14th of Nisan, but at 9 a.m. on the 15th. St. Paul spoke of Him as 'our passover' (1 Co 5⁷); yet he regarded the Last Supper as the regular Passover, calling the communion cup 'the cup of blessing' (10¹⁶), which was the name given in the Paschal rubric to the third cup at the Passover feast.

In the opinion of the present writer the difficulty is due to a misunderstanding of Jn 13¹ and 18²⁸. When these two passages are rightly considered, the position seems to be established that παρασκευή means Friday alike in the Fourth Gospel and in the Synoptics. Jn 13¹ should be read as a separate paragraph. As the end approached, says the Evangelist, there was a marked access of tenderness in the Lord's deportment towards His disciples. He demonstrated His affection as He had never done before. It was the pathetic tenderness of imminent farewell. 'Before the feast of the passover, Jesus, knowing that his hour had come to pass out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own that were in the world, he loved them to the uttermost,' i.e. demonstrated His affection as He had never done before.* Then begins a new paragraph, which recounts the story of the Supper (v. 22^f), assuming an acquaintance on the reader's part with the Synoptic details of time and arrangement. It was St. John's wont to correct his predecessors wherever they had erred; and had they put the Last Supper a day too late, he would have stated expressly when it took place, and would not have said vaguely 'before the feast.'

* Jesus anticipated the Passover, knowing that at the proper time He would be lying in His grave. St. Chrysostom (in Joan. lxxii.) gives this as an alternative explanation of Jn 13²⁸; Calvin: Since the Passover-day, falling that year on Friday, was reckoned a Sabbath (Lv 23^{6, 7, 11, 15}), the Jews, to avoid the inconvenience of two successive Sabbaths, postponed the Passover by a day; Jesus adhered to the regular day.

And what of Jn 18²⁸? It does not imply that they were looking forward to the Paschal Supper in the evening, and that therefore that day, when Jesus was tried and crucified, was the Preparation-day, 14th Nisan. They would indeed have been defiled by entering a heathen house, but the defilement would have remained only until the evening (cf. Lv 11^{24, 25, 27, 28, 31, 39, 40} 14⁴⁶ 15^{5, 6, 7} 17¹⁵ 22², Nu 19^{7, 8, 10, 21, 22}, Dt 23¹¹), and they could then, after due ablution, have eaten the Paschal Supper.† The truth is that it was not the Paschal Supper that they would have been precluded from, but the Chagigah or thank-offering, which was presented in the Temple on 15th Nisan, and had to be presented by each worshipper in propria persona.‡ The phrase 'eat the Passover' comprehended more than participation in the Paschal Supper. Alike in the Scripture and in the Talmud it denotes the celebration of the entire feast, including the Chagigah.§ In the Fourth Gospel 'the passover' invariably signifies not the Supper but the whole feast, τὴν ἑορτὴν πᾶσαν,|| and it is unreasonable to suppose that in this solitary instance St. John has departed from his usus loquendi.

There remains a final consideration. After the Crucifixion, Joseph of Arimathea visited Pilate, and petitioned for the body of Jesus (Jn 19³⁸=Mt 27^{57, 58}=Mk 15^{42, 43}=Lk 23⁵⁰⁻⁵²). He was a Sanhedrist, and had no less reason than his colleagues to shun pollution; yet he went without scruple to the governor's house. The explanation is that, when they refused to enter the Prætorium, it was the morning, and they must offer the Chagigah in the afternoon; when he waited upon Pilate, it was the evening (ὀψίας γενομένης), and he had already offered it.

On the above theory there is no discrepancy between St. John and the Synoptists. Both he and they represent Jesus as celebrating the Paschal Supper with His disciples on the evening which ushered in 15th Nisan; and both he and they use παρασκευὴ in the sense not of the Preparation-day, but of Friday. St. John says that 'that Sabbath-day was a great one' (19³¹), not because, being at once the weekly Sabbath and Passover-day, it was Sabbath in a double sense, but because, as Lightfoot puts it, (1) it was a Sabbath, (2) it was the day on which the people appeared before the Lord in the Temple (Ex 23¹⁷), and (3) it was the day on which the sheaf of the firstfruits was reaped (Lv 23¹¹). See also, for different views, artt. DATES, LAST SUPPER, PASSOVER (II.).

* ἵς τέλος, not 'to the end,' but 'to the uttermost.' Chrysost. in Joan. lxi. : οὐδὲν ἐνέλιπεν ἄν' τον σφόδρα ἀγαπῶντα υἱὸς ἢ τοιοῦται. Cf. Euth. Zig. : ἀγαπᾶν of tokens of affection; Mk 10²¹ ἤρασαν αὐτὸν, kissed his forehead. See Lightfoot on Mk 10²¹, Jn 13²³.

† Strauss argues that they would still have disqualified themselves from participating in the preparatory proceedings, which fell on the afternoon of 14th Nisan; as, e.g., the slaying of the lamb in the outer court of the Temple. But they might legally have deputed the business of preparation to their servants, as Jesus deputed it to Peter and John. Cf. Lightfoot on Mk 10²⁶.

PRESENCE.—The ordinary word in the Gospels for 'before' (=in the presence of) is ἐμπροσθεν. Lk. also uses ἐνώπιον, which, with the exception of Jn 20³⁰, is not in the vocabulary of the other three Evangelists. He nearly always uses it of the presence of God. Other prepositions employed are ἐπί, (ἀπ)έναντι, and ἐναντιον.—1. The value of a religion is the pledge it can give of the presence of God. In the heathen lands round Israel the Divine Being was localized in sacred places with the aid of idols. But the religion of Jehovah was rid of such a tendency through the work of the prophets, with the result that, when all other religions in the Roman Empire were vulgarized and eviscerated of power, Judaism remained like a Samson with locks unshorn, with a God who could keep His own secret, and with a faith still pregnant with possibility. True, the Divine presence had been manifested, according to the OT, in cloudy pillar and burning bush, had, indeed, been localized in the ark of the covenant. But steadily the conception of God had been clarified from material associations, and the way in which this was done may be gathered from Jer 7. So thoroughly did the moral view of God prevail, that 'the Law became God's real presence in Israel' (Schultz, OT Theol. i. p. 354). The 'angel of Jehovah,' so frequently mentioned in the OT, was simply 'the messenger' (מַלְאָכִים), so did all intermediaries dwindle in the blaze of the only God. But with this transcendence came aloofness. On the one hand, the Law became a very barrier between God and His people. Even those who followed hard after it, like Saul of Tarsus and the rich young ruler, thirsted only the more for the living God (Mk 10¹⁷, cf. Ro 7⁹⁻¹³, Gal 3²¹⁻²³). On the other hand, Greek modes of thought, already affected by Oriental dualism, represented fully in Philo, but also anticipated in Palestinian theology (cf. Schürer, II. iii. § 33), bridged the seeming gulf by theosophical and Gnostic speculations. At the very moment when Judaism had its opportunity, it failed to give that abiding pledge of the presence of God which should satisfy heart, mind, and conscience. Even the religions of Mithras and Isis, impure though the latter was, had a vogue in the Empire because they did something to meet the need which arose between the barren speculations and brutal superstitions of the age.

2. At this psychological moment came Jesus with His gospel as a challenge to the world of the presence of God. St. John himself expresses this thought no more decidedly, though much more fully, than St. Mark, even though in Mk 1¹ υἱὸς θεοῦ is a secondary reading. The common testimony of the Apostolic circle may be summed up in He 1² 'God . . . hath in these last days spoken unto us in his Son.' But nowhere is the thought that Jesus Christ was the presence of God set forth with such sublime effect as in the Prologue to John's Gospel: 'We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth' (v. 14). No need was there now of an impersonal Word or impersonated Wisdom, as between God and us (Ph 2⁹, Col 2⁹⁻¹⁰); or of sacrifices and ceremonies, as between us and God (He 9¹⁴, Gal 2²¹); for the entire gulf between God the holy and us the sinful has been bridged in Jesus Christ our Lord (2 Co 5¹⁹, Eph 2⁴⁻⁷). Thus through Christ our access to the Father is immediate (Ro 5²) by one Spirit (Eph 2¹⁸). 'There were to be no more finite mediators between God and man; no temple of Jerusalem, where alone men must worship; no necessity for interposing angels to interpret between the Divine and the human. Man was himself to be brought into immediate contact with God, and was to experience the deep conviction that heaven and earth had met together' (Matheson, Growth of Spirit of Christianity, i. 78). This faith that through Christ a man is always in the presence of God as a child in his father's house was based on (1) the testimony, and (2) the teaching of Jesus.

(1) By the testimony of Jesus is meant the unconscious impress of His Personality. It is evident, to use with all respect a familiar phrase, that Jesus had a presence. The people marvelled because He spoke with authority, although an unlettered man (Mt 7^{28, 29}, Mk 6²). His eyes were as a flame of fire (Mk 3⁵, Lk 22⁶¹). In the awe of His presence the Temple-courts were cleared, and the tempest calmed (Mk 11¹⁵ 6⁵¹); so that His disciples cried, 'What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?' (Mk 4⁴¹). He drew the children to Him, and cast out demons, and said, 'If I by the finger of God cast out devils, then is the kingdom of God come upon you' (Lk 11²⁰). These impressions upon His contemporaries simply correspond with His own self-consciousness. He gave up the workshop at Nazareth for the theatre of the world, because He knew Himself as God's beloved Son (Lk 3²² 4¹⁻¹⁴). His first address in the synagogue is not recorded, because it was all in one word, 'I am here' (4²¹). It was enough for the disciples that they should be with Him (Mk 3¹⁴). It was the last folly of the Galilean cities (Mt 11^{20ff.}) that they did not believe Him for the works' sake; and of Jerusalem, that it knew not the day of its visitation (Mt 23³⁷, Lk 19^{41ff.}). There was only one legacy He had to leave, and that alone worth leaving, His spiritual presence (Mt 28²⁰, Lk 24⁴⁹), which was the true Shekinah (Mt 18²⁰, cf. 'Ubi sedent duo qui legem tractant, Shekina cum illis est,' Pirke Aboth, 3 (Schultz, ii. 67)). The difference in this respect between St. John and the Synoptists is that whereas with them the testimony of Jesus to Himself is mostly unconscious, with him it is altogether self-conscious. St. John never fails to lay stress on the autonomy of Jesus (Moffatt in Expos. vi. iii. [1901] 469), so that, even psychologically speaking, He is not of the world, though in it.

(2) Thus in Jn. the testimony of Christ is merged in His teaching. He speaks of His own presence as living water, heavenly bread, light and life to a needy world (Jn 4¹⁴ 6³⁸ 8¹² 11²⁵). To keep His word is to keep in the presence of God as He Himself does (14²³ 15¹⁰). And that presence is an inward abiding which nothing outward can disturb (16^{22, 33}). All His words in the Synoptics similarly illustrate that—

'To turn aside from Him is hell,
To walk with Him is heaven.'

Only with them His Person is, as it were, so transparent that they present God through Jesus rather than in Him, and we are left to draw the Christian inference that He Himself is the focus of the Father's presence. It is the essential nearness of God that gives all significance to the Beatitudes (Mt 5^{8, 9}), to the teaching on prayer (6^{6, 8}), to the interpretation of worship (Mk 7⁸, cf. Jn 4²³), to the illustrations from nature (Mt 10²⁹), to the exhortations against anxiety (Lk 12³⁰⁻³²), towards watchfulness (vv. 35, 36), against covetousness (vv. 20, 21), towards compassion (Mt 10⁴⁰⁻⁴²). The sphere in which all the teaching moves, which makes it simple and intimate to the heart, and transcendent in its appeal and its authority, is the presence of God the Father, the truth that—

'Spirit with spirit can meet,
Closer is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.'

But the immanence of God reaches a further stage in the gospel of Christ. Not only does Jesus bring God close into His world, as if οὐρανός meant the atmosphere one breathes rather than the firmament above (cf. τὰ περὶ τὸ οὐρανοῦ, Mt 6³⁶ etc.), but, according to Jesus, God is immanent in the human nature that makes room for Him. This is expressed in terms of (a) relationship (Mk 3³⁵, Mt 5^{16, 44}, Jn 1¹²), (b) identification (Mt 10⁴⁰ 25⁴⁰), (c) indwelling (Jn 14^{16, 17}). This last is called the doctrine of the Holy Ghost. In order to give His own outlook to all disciples, Jesus promised His other self, the Paraclete or Comforter, in whose company and through whose intercession we live on the plane of sons, not only being in the Father's presence, but He being present in us. Although this doctrine is fully allowed for by the Synoptists (Mt 10²⁰, Lk 24⁴⁹), it is the special contribution of St. John. 'Jesus answered, If a man love me, he will keep my word: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him' (Jn 14²³). From different points of view it may be said that Jesus enjoyed the presence of God, that He was that presence, and that He gave it. This threefold presence is really the basis of the doctrine of the Trinity.

3. What then are we to gather from all this but that, according to Christianity, Christ as God incarnate is the pledge that God is present, not only Creator-like in the universe, but Father-like in the believing heart and the consecrated life? That is really the meaning of His exhibition of God in human life, and the impartation of His own Spirit. And our safeguard against the errors of Pantheism and of all such systems as tend to merge the Divine in the human instead of moulding the human by the Divine, is to be found in one small but significant phrase, 'ἐν Χριστῷ.' The Christian consciousness must always testify with a modern thinker (W. S. Palmer, An Agnostic's Progress): 'When I lifted up my eyes to God, I found God not only looking through my eyes but looking into them.' It is among a people redeemed from their sins and consecrated to service that God will tabernacle (σκηνώσει) as an abiding presence (Shekinah, fr. שָׁכַן 'abide'). And when the brotherhood is perfected, there will be no need of a Temple (Rev 21^{3, 22-27}). The revelation of God immanent in a redeemed humanity is the ideal towards which Christianity points (Eph 1-3, Col 1⁹⁻²⁰, cf. 2 P 3¹³, Jn 17²⁰⁻²³), and to which it is slowly moving, but only by outgrowing many misconceptions and leaving them behind. See, further, Schultz, OT Theol. i. 353 f., ii. 7-11; artt. 'Ark of the Covenant,' 'Shekinah' in Hastings' DB; Beyschlag, NT Theol. i. 95 ff.; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, § 3, ch. 2; Westcott on Jn 14-17.

4. Christian history has been a long series of endeavours to realize the full meaning of the Divine presence. First it was caught into Jewish preconceptions, and projected into the doctrine of the Parousia. This had its effect on the inmost circle of Christian writers with the exception of St. John, and on most of the early Fathers except for the school of Alexandria. With all its inspiration of hope, it must have tended to obscure the truth that God is present through the working of His Spirit in the individual and in society, in the unfolding of truth and the employments of love.

Under the influence of Greek thought in the Gentile world, the Divine presence has been treated as a metaphysical substance, and at last identified with the elements of the Lord's Supper (see Art. ii.), after consecration. This sacerdotal view was virtually accepted by the time of Cyprian, who wrote (Ep. lxxiii. 17): 'The passion of the Lord is the sacrifice we offer.' The doctrine of Transubstantiation became the keystone of the ecclesiastical edifice, and was maintained as a theory, by means of the prevalent philosophy of Realism, whose greatest exponent was Thomas Aquinas. As far as English thought is concerned, it crumbled under the dialectic of John Wyclif (Lechler, Life of Wycliffe, p. 351), and by the discovery made by simple men, during the next two centuries, of the spiritual presence mediated through the NT in their own experience.

The Docteric views of Christ's Person, however, which throughout the Middle Ages invested Him with apocalyptic splendours at the cost of all human sympathies, called for still other means of allaying the hunger of the religious imagination. 'The remedy was found in the reverence of the image, in the substitution of the symbol for reality. Gradually that Church, which had tried to centre its affections on an absent Lord, found that its affections must be rekindled by the mediation of some earthly form. It had dismissed from its thoughts the idea of a spiritual presence; it must regain that presence through the intervention of material agencies. It must find it in the water of Baptism, in the bread and wine of Communion, in the act of ordination, in the relics of saints, in the tombs of the martyrs, in the heart of monasteries, and in the walls of consecrated cathedrals. It must see it in the figure of a visible cross, in the monuments raised to a celestial hierarchy, in the observance of festivals in memory of the sainted dead, above all in apotheosis of the Virgin Mother (Matheson, op. cit. i. 322). In the meantime, as applied to the working of the Holy Spirit, the doctrine of the presence stamped infallibility upon the Councils, and finally upon the Pope. While with J. H. Newman it signified the validity of ecclesiastical development throughout the centuries, 'being the germination, growth, and perfection of some living or apparent truth in the minds of men during a sufficient period' (Development of Doctrine, p. 37).

But while the popular religion found the presence in the images and relics, and ecclesiastical speculations discovered it in the Conciliar assemblies and the Sacrament of the Supper, there was a parallel movement known as Mysticism, which found the real presence in the soul. To the French mystics, greatest of whom was St. Bernard of the 12th century, the presence of God was the obverse side of their own absence from the world. The Germans Eckhart and Tauler, the Dutch Thomas à Kempis, and others took up the theme, and wove it into a kind of new Stoicism, by way of purification, illumination, and union. 'They taught (following Thomas Aquinas) that the soul can even here upon earth so receive God within itself as to enjoy in the fullest sense the vision of His being, and dwell in heaven itself' (Harnack, Outlines of the Hist. of Dogma, p. 440). This 'practice of the presence of God' (Brother Lawrence) was the religious side of the preparation for Luther and his gospel for the people. He taught that Christianity was not a matter of consent to doctrine, as with the scholastics; or a method of losing oneself in the eternal, as with the mystics; but realizing the Divine presence as found through faith in Christ in 'the freedom of a Christian man.' Luther, commenting in his pointed way on Gal 2:16, says: 'Faith is, if I may use the expression, creative of Divinity, not, of course, in the substance of God, but in ourselves.' And again: 'When we truly say that He is Christ, we mean that He was given for us, without any works of ours, has won for us the Spirit of God, and has made us children of God . . . so that we might become lords of all things in heaven and earth—that is faith' (Erl. ed. 13, 251; Herrmann, Communion with God, p. 125). The primary authority of the inward witness thus established by Luther has been most fully apprehended for practical purposes by George Fox and his followers. A bright example was John Woolman (b. 1720), who, in taking his stand against prevailing customs sanctioned by the Church, records in his diary (ch. 4): 'The fear of the Lord so covered me at times that my way was made easier than I expected.' And this independent standpoint, for the sake of humanity, has found poetical expression in Lowell, Whittier, and, in a fashion, Whitman. John Wesley, too, coming from his earlier devotion to Mysticism to his doctrine of assurance, repeated the experience of Luther, and, by means of an evangelical theology, helped men to see that humanity is the proper organ of the Divine presence. This has been the inspiration of modern reformers and philanthropists, but the full bearings of this truth have not yet been realized by the churches. A new vindication of the soul's authority in matters of faith has been undertaken by A. Ritschl and his disciples—Harnack, Herrmann, and the rest. With them the Divine Man Jesus, separated from every ceremony, doctrine, or dream, vouches for the inward presence of God to the soul that believes. By their theory of value-judgments they throw the whole proof of the presence of God upon the faculties of the soul.

PRESENTATION (in the Temple) (Lk 2:22-40).—When St. Paul had mentioned (Gal 4⁴) the sending forth of the Son of God into our world, he spoke of it in two stages, 'born of a woman,' 'born under the law' (RV); and in both those acts or stages the Pauline Evangelist St. Luke is able and careful in his history of Jesus to exhibit Him. To the narrative of His nativity accordingly he sub-joins (Lk 2²¹) a notice of His circumcision on the eighth day, in obedience to Gn 17¹²; and now on the fortieth day He is brought to Jerusalem to be offered or presented (RV, παρουσία) to the Lord, in accordance with the legal requirements of Ex 13² (freely quoted in v. 23) and Nu 3. 12. 18. Along with the rite of the Presentation of the Child there was fulfilled on the same occasion another for the Purification of the Mother; but we shall consider that afterwards.

1. The law as to the Child is described in OT as having its origin in Egypt. From patriarchal times, indeed, the firstborn had been the priest in the family; but a new obligation was laid on the firstborn in Israel by the circumstances of the Exodus. When God sent Moses to Pharaoh, the Divine message to the king ran, 'Israel is my son, even my firstborn: if thou refuse to let him go I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn' (Ex 4^{22, 23}). Pharaoh refused. Nine successive plagues were sent on him in vain. The time had come for the execution of God's threatening. The Lord was to pass through the land of Egypt to execute the judgment. Israel was not so guilty as her oppressors; but neither could she stand before God if once He were angry; and God provided for her in the Paschal lamb a victim under which each Israelite household that would believe His word and keep His commandment might find shelter. 'By faith they kept the passover and the sprinkling of blood' (He 11²⁸); but in token that their firstborn had been due to death and rescued by God's mercy, all the firstborn ('every male that openeth the womb') were to be sanctified to Him (Nu 8¹⁷). God might have slain each, or kept him for His own especial service. He would not slay him: He permitted him (and required him) to be redeemed (Ex 13¹³⁻¹⁵). Instead of the firstborn, however, God took for the service of His sanctuary the tribe of Levi (Nu 3¹² 8¹⁴⁻¹⁸), requiring, at the time of this substitution, that as many firstborn as there were in Israel in excess of the number of the Levites must be redeemed by the payment of five shekels for each one (Nu 3⁴⁴⁻⁵¹). Afterwards (Nu 18^{15, 16}), every firstborn son must be presented and redeemed by the payment of this amount. Our Lord might have claimed exemption, as the Son of God; just as afterwards when they asked Him to pay the Temple rate He declared, 'Therefore the sons are free' (Mt 17²⁶ RV). But He came not to claim exemptions but to share our burdens, carry our sorrows, take away our sins, and, more particularly, to redeem them that are under the Law (Gal 4³). He 'came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mt 20²⁸); and 'thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness' (3¹⁵). Moreover, by being thus redeemed from the personal obligation of serving in the Temple, His love to it, which at His next visit to it He was to manifest (Lk 2⁴⁹ RV), and His zeal for it which devoured Him (Jn 2¹⁷), were brought into clearer light. They were not of constraint, but willing. Still, the leading thought in the history of His Presentation in the Temple is that of His having come 'that the scripture might be fulfilled' (Lk 2²²⁻²⁴ 24⁴⁴), 'and that the whole life of the God-man on earth might present a realization of that ideal depicted in the prophetic writings of the OT' (Oosterzee).

The act of presenting Him would be performed by Joseph (Ex 13¹⁵) as the putative father, at once the shield of Mary and the protector of her child (Lk 3³⁸); not by the Virgin, as Cornelius à Lapide assumes, although there is some beauty in his interpretation of the five shekels, which constituted the redemption money, as 'symbolizing the Five Wounds at the price whereof Christ redeemed the race of man' (Com. in loc.). The Law does not seem to have prescribed any particular time for the redemption of the firstborn, but many fathers would doubtless act as Joseph did, and perform the rite on the day appointed by the Law for the sacrifice of his wife's purification. There is hardly time for the visit of the Wise Men, the Flight into Egypt, and the Return thence, between the Birth of Christ and His Presentation in the Temple; moreover, a public service at Jerusalem would have been fraught with danger after the inquiries of the Magi had aroused the jealous fears of Herod. But neither is there any need for supposing that the Wise Men's visit came so soon after the Nativity. 'From two years old and under' (Mt 2¹⁶) was the age which Herod supposed the newborn 'King of the Jews' might be. Mary's availing herself of the permission, as a poor woman, to offer the two doves instead of the costlier lamb is not consistent with the idea that the gold offered by the Wise Men was at her disposal: while St. Luke's mention of the Holy Family returning into Galilee and Nazareth (Lk 2³⁹) is of the nature of a foreshortening, and does not imply that no event intervened between the Presentation and the journey to the North.

2. The Purification of Mary, besides synchronizing with the Presentation of her Son, was an event belonging to the same moral and religious category. It also was an act of a humble-minded and becoming obedience to the Law of Moses, under which she lived. St. Jerome alone among the Fathers was of opinion that in her case too it was strictly obligatory, not, of course, on account of any sin on her part, her conception of the Child being spotless and holy (Lk 1²⁶⁻³⁵) and an act of obedience to Almighty God; but ceremonially because, the Birth being a real one, she had touched things which involved ceremonial uncleanness. Whether St. Jerome is right, or the other Fathers (for the discussion see Cornelius à Lapide), and whether or not she might have claimed exemption, she is to be praised for not doing so, but quietly and humbly accepting the law binding on ordinary mothers, and being willing, as her Son will also be, to be reckoned with transgressors (Mk 15²⁸, Lk 22²⁷). It was enough for her, as it would be enough for Him, that God knew.

The reading adopted in the RV (Lk 2²²), 'the days of their (not 'her,' AV) purification,' has the highest MS authority, and is that expressly of Origen and Cyril: it is explained when we remember that while the ceremonial uncleanness was directly that of the mother only, Joseph and the Child could hardly help—especially while living in such circumstances as were theirs at Bethlehem—contracting a like defilement, in the legal sense, by contact with her. Our Lord, all holy from the first, was often to be so defiled (Lk 15¹ 19⁷). He regarded it as His glory, not His shame.

The legal ordinance (Lv 12) appointed that a woman who had borne a man child should be (ceremonially) unclean for seven days; for three and thirty days more she might touch no hallowed thing, nor come into the sanctuary. Then, on the fortieth day, she must bring 'a lamb of the first year for a burnt-offering (expressive of devotion), and a young pigeon or a turtle-dove for a sin-offering (a testimony, St. Jerome says, to the doctrine of original sin), unto the door of the tent of meeting, unto the priest, and he shall offer it before the Lord, and make atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the fountain of her blood. . . . And if her means suffice not for a lamb, then she shall take two turtle-doves or two young pigeons; the one for a burnt-offering, the other for a sin-offering.' The Virgin's humility appears in her availing herself of this merciful provision; she disdained not to admit her poverty; we may be sure she did not (as some, thinking to exalt her, have imagined) assume a false appearance of it: even if Joseph and she had not been extremely poor before, the expenses of the journey to Bethlehem, and of living there six weeks, and the five shekels for the Child, could not have failed to make deep inroads on their purse. The order of the combined rites would be as follows:—(1) The Holy Family would come into the hall of the unclean, and stand there. (2) Then would be offered the dove for her sin-offering, and perhaps they would be sprinkled with the lustral water and the ashes of the heifer (Nu 19¹⁷). (3) Then the Child would be presented. And lastly, (4) the other dove would be offered in sign of Mary's thanksgiving and self-devotion to God. The Virgin would not go further—even when she had been cleansed—than the Court of the Women.

The Evangelist's use of the words 'parents' (v. 27) and 'father and mother' (v. 33) have been urged as evidence that 'the idea of the supernatural conception of Jesus has not penetrated to this part of the legendary materials here collected together' (Schmidt and Holzendorf, Short Protestant Commentary); to which we may answer that he would have been a poor redactor who, having transcribed ch. i., did not observe an inconsistency of this kind, and that in point of fact the Third Gospel is marked by its homogeneity (see Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?). The explanation of the apparent inconsistency lies deep in the principle which led our Lord, sinless Himself (2 Co 5²¹), to accept the lot of sinners, and lay this lot also on His blessed Mother; and further, that His glory was not to be manifested till the time appointed of the Father. Till then, whatever brief epiphanies there might be were only for the favoured few. Even the Transfiguration was to be told to no man till the Son of Man was risen from the dead. The facts were secure in the hearts of sufficient witnesses (Lk 2¹⁹ 31); they would come forth in due time. More especially, His birth of a Virgin Mother—told as it was to be by two Evangelists (Mt 1¹⁸⁻²⁵, Lk 1²⁶⁻³⁸), and always an article of faith in the Church—was not a thing to be communicated to unbelieving ears and scoffing tongues; even when His claim to have come down out of heaven was contrasted with what were supposed to be the known facts of His origin as Man (Jn 6⁴², Mt 13⁵⁵). The feeling of the Early Church upon the subject is expressed in a famous passage of St. Ignatius of Antioch (c. 110): 'Hidden from the prince of this world were the virginity of Mary, and her child-bearing, and likewise also the death of the Lord—three mysteries to be cried aloud—the which were wrought in the silence of God' (ad Ephes. 19).

Both the Purification of Mary and the Presentation of our Lord in the Temple are commemorated on the 2nd of February (Candlemas). Baronius says that the Church at Rome was led to the institution of this Feast in order to supersede the Lupercalia, the observances connected wherewith were of an extremely immoral as well as idolatrous character. PRICE OF BLOOD (τιμὴ αἵματος, Mt 27⁶).—An expression used by the priests of the Temple in reference to the money Judas Iscariot had received for the betrayal of his Master. The thirty pieces of silver were the price of a traitor's service, and so ultimately the price of a man's head; and though the priests were willing to take advantage of the dastardly deed by putting the betrayed Man to death, they still regarded with feelings of disgust and abhorrence the money paid for His betrayal. It had been soiled by the hands of a traitor, and associated with blood-guiltiness of a kind that they had no desire to share. They would neither accept it for themselves, when Judas offered to restore it, nor, when flung down in the sanctuary, did they regard it as fit for the holy uses of the Temple. An appropriate use was found for it in the purchase of ground outside the walls for the burial of strangers to Jerusalem. (For the story of Judas' end, and the divergent account in Ac 1¹⁸ 19, see AKELDAMA, JUDAS ISCARIOT).

The reasoning of the Temple priests here has been usually condemned as a piece of pious hypocrisy, implying a display of honourable diffidence that stands in suspicious contrast with their previous dealings with the traitor. If the money was soiled, who was responsible, if not those who had taken it (perhaps directly from the Temple-treasury) and sent it on its dastardly mission?

Why should they, who had paid the price of blood, scruple about taking it back? 'If it was sinful to put back the price of blood in the sacred treasury, how was it any more permissible to take it out?' (Calvin, NT Com.). This is rather a one-sided judgment. It is true, their manifestation of scrupulous feeling was somewhat belated: it would have become them better to have no dealings whatever with Judas. But we may still give them the credit for the wish to be as little as possible involved in the crime of treachery. In point of fact, people will make use of a traitor who have no love for traitors. In this case the compact made with Judas was very much more dishonourable on his side than on theirs; for they were sworn enemies of Christ, he a professed friend. The priests might believe the money was well spent on their part, though ill gotten on his. The curse of treachery was now associated with it, and would help to intensify their loathing when they spoke of it as the price of blood. It was unhallowed gain; and they could use it only for some purpose less sacred than those connected with the Temple, and in which they themselves had no profit. We may compare with this scruple of the priests the similar feeling manifested by David in a contrasted case (2 S 23¹⁴⁻¹⁷). When the three mighty men at the risk of their lives brought the king a draught of water from the well of Bethlehem, he scrupled to drink it, because it was so closely associated with the blood of the men who had risked their lives to procure it. It had been procured at the price of blood, and he could not use it in the common way. It was hallowed by the sacrifice associated with it, just as the blood-money in Judas' hands was tainted and defiled by a betrayal equivalent to murder.

PRIDE.—The condemnation of pride has always been very pronounced in Christian thought. It is one of the faults most distinctly incompatible with the ethics of the NT. Certain other systems of religion have not so strenuously combated this feeling. In fact, some may not unreasonably be regarded as having contributed to its indulgence. An elementary attribute in the Christian conception of character is humility.

1. It is remarkable that the word for 'pride' (ὑπερφανία) occurs only once in the recorded conversations of our Lord, and the adj. 'proud' (ὑπερήφανος) only once in the Gospels (Lk 1⁵¹). In Mk 7²² pride is classed as one of the things which defile a man. It is in the positive precepts and general example and teaching of the Master that we find the principles which have made pride so repugnant to the Christian consciousness. Chief of all these forces is the example of our Lord's own life. The Incarnation was itself the most transcendent exhibition of humility. In it men saw their Lord counting it not a prize to be on an equality with God, emptying Himself, and taking the form of a servant. In the essential abasement of this earthly life He humbled Himself to the particular extremes of endurance of personal ill-treatment and obedience even unto death. Henceforth lowliness of station and self-forgetting passivity were consecrated by the Divine example. In the same degree the possessors of power and place were taught the limitations and responsibilities of their position, and shown the insensate evil of scornfully regarding men of inferior circumstances.

2. Before the Birth of Christ this characteristic of His mission was heralded in Mary's song. She who described herself as a handmaiden of low estate could rejoice that in the coming Kingdom the proud would be scattered in, or by (Lk 1⁵¹ RVm), the disposition of their hearts. Princes would be brought down, and rich men sent empty away. On the other hand, those of low degree would be exalted, and the hungry abundantly satisfied. The Magnificat proclaimed the truths that whilst poverty and obscurity are not bars to acceptance with God, there are evils peculiarly belonging to high rank which utterly disqualify.

3. The Temptation (Mt 4¹⁻¹³ || Lk 4¹⁻¹³) was largely an attempt to work on feelings of pride in the mind of Jesus. He was urged to prove His superiority to the conditions of ordinary humanity by a self-glorifying triumph over the laws of nature. The Tempter strove to make Him do so either (1) by providing for His special physical needs, or (2) by a public display of His might. In the offer (3) of universal sovereignty, the lures of authority and glory were especially emphasized.

4. In His definite teaching our Lord laid especial stress on the virtues of humility and lowliness of mind as fundamental requisites in His loyal followers. The Beatitude of the meek struck the dominant keynote in this respect. Men were invited to learn of Him, for He was meek and lowly in heart (Mt 11²⁹). His disciples could apply to Him the prophetic description that He was meek (Mt 21⁵). More than once He seems to have uttered the apothegm, 'Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be humbled, and whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted' (Mt 23¹², Lk 14¹¹ 18¹⁴). Various specific forms of pride were rebuked and cautioned against.

(1) Several times our Lord severely censured exhibitions of spiritual pride. This vice called forth peculiar indignation and detestation in Him. The religious ostentation of the Pharisees was unsparingly reprobated. The types are eternally stigmatized who can thank God they are not as others are, who from the heights of their own complacency can look down on the supposed inferior spirituality of their fellows (Lk 18^{9ff.}); who parade in public places their devotions (Mt 6⁵); who do all their works to be seen of men, and obtrude their religious symbols (Mt 23⁵); who for a pretence make long prayers (Lk 20⁴⁷). This species of religious self-satisfaction, of spurious spirituality, elicited the scathing invective of Christ in an altogether unparalleled degree. He declared that the publicans and harlots went into the Kingdom of God before such proud professors (Mt 21³¹).

(2) The strictures our Lord passed on the racial pride of the Jews drew against Him their fiercest anger. He showed how vain were their boasted privileges when He proclaimed that many should be admitted to the Kingdom from all quarters of the earth, but the children of the Kingdom rejected (Mt 8¹²). He tried to make them realize from their own Scriptures the futility of their reliance on descent, by referring to the favour shown Naaman the Syrian and the widow of Zarephath (Lk 4^{25ff.}). The parables of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt 20^{1ff.}) and of the Householder's rebellious servants (21^{33ff.}) were plainly intended to make His hearers see how little worth was in their lofty pretensions as the children of Abraham—the chosen people.

(3) Intellectual haughtiness was also decidedly condemned by Christ. The inclination that springs from the consciousness of ability or learning to scornfully depreciate those of more meagre mental equipment, is one of the most insidious forms of pride. To it certain natures fall victims who would consider family pretensions or religious assumptions of superiority vulgar and discreditable. Many who would loathe the commonly recognized vaingloriousness of the Pharisees are dangerously near sharing in the mental arrogance which prompted the latter to sneer, 'This multitude which knoweth not the law are accursed' (Jn 7⁴⁹).

The tendency to indulge in lofty contempt from the 'intellectual throne' is strikingly portrayed in Tennyson's Palace of Art—

'O God-like isolation which art mine,
I can but count thee perfect gain,
What time I watch the darkening droves of swine
That range on yonder plain.'

All such disdainfulness for the simple and unlearned was impressively forbidden by Christ's warning, 'See that ye despise not one of these little ones' (Mt 18¹⁰; cf. a striking sermon by Bp. Boyd Carpenter on 'The Dangers of Contempt'). Again, our Lord bore witness to the supreme importance of simplicity and innocence, as opposed to superciliousness and pride, when He said of the little children, 'Of such is the kingdom of heaven' (Lk 18¹⁶), and added that the only attitude which qualified for admission was that of a little child. It is noteworthy that the same dispositions of receptivity and absence of hard preconceptions are insisted on by scientists as prime requisites for the student of the kingdom of nature.

(4) The pride that comes from the enjoyment of high official or social rank was discountenanced in one of the most surprising actions of our Lord's earthly life—the episode of the Feet-washing (Jn 13). It was a vivid, unforgettable lesson in the duty of self-abasing service. No one who then was present was likely to fall into the sin of presuming on privileges of position, or treating subordinates with selfish, slighting inconsiderateness. The imagination of succeeding generations has been intensely impressed by the spectacle of the Son of God washing the travel-stained feet of His poor followers. The pride that jealously exacts subservience could not be more effectually proscribed. The homily against those whose self-importance made them claim the place of honour at entertainments (Lk 14^{7ff.}) is directed against the same grandiose assumptions. This social arrogance of the Pharisees was one of the points in our Lord's indictment of them. They loved the chief place at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and to be called Rabbi (Mt 23^{5ff.}). Any tendency among His disciples to assume lordship was strictly, tenderly suppressed. Once He called them together when such claims were mooted, and pointed out to them how among the outside Gentiles there were those who lorded it and exercised authority. In contrast to that should be their practice. Whoever of them was ambitious of greatness and supremacy could attain it only along the lines of submissive service (Mt 20^{25ff.}). They had Him as an example, who came not to receive service, but to minister to the needs of others, even to the point of giving up His life for them (v. 28). They were not to arrogate to themselves titles implying mastership (23^{8, 10}). The question of leadership among them was met by Christ taking a little child and placing it 'beside himself' (παρ' εαυτοῦ), and saying that the reception of a little child meant the reception of Himself and of His Father who sent Him (Lk 9^{46ff.}). In the light of how so stupendous a glory was to be won, their own shortsighted strivings after precedence stood exposed. All such grasping at power and place was a contradiction of the true conception of honour. It was he who humbled himself as a little child that was greatest (Mt 18⁴).

5. The essential vice of pride was glanced at in one of these conversations when the Master said, 'All ye are brethren' (Mt 23⁸). Pride is an injury to the bond of brotherhood; it is disloyalty in the Christian household; it is a breach of fellowship. The selfish despising of our fellow-creatures is a contradiction of the law of love. It cannot coexist with a true-hearted affection for all men. Pride is self-centred, and plumes itself on the gap between ourselves and those beneath us. It revels in the feeling of superiority. Nothing could be more opposed than this to the self-sacrificing love which is bent on raising and helping. Pride also betrays a lack of perception as to our own true position before God. It reveals an undue magnifying of relative differences.

6. The word 'pride' is often used in another and a harmless sense which may imply no more than a fit appreciation of benefits, a lofty sense of honour, a dignified aloofness that will not stoop to what is mean or defiling. In this better sense Milton can speak of 'modest pride,' and Moore deplore the loss of the 'pride of former days.' The distinction is clear between this pardonable and highly useful feeling—a feeling which may be accompanied with real humility—and a haughtiness of spirit, a contemptuous looking down on others, a selfish glorying in one's own superiority. PRIEST.—1. The Jewish priests.—The few passages in the Gospels where the word 'priest' (ιερεῖς) occurs apply solely to the Jewish priesthood, but of its position and functions very little is recorded either in the Gospels or generally in the NT. The Gr. ιερεῖς is the equivalent of the Heb. קֹהֵן. The Jewish priesthood is brought before us in the Gospels in the following connexions:—(1) The work of Zacharias (Lk 1⁸⁻⁹), where we read of the priestly courses with the duties assigned to them by lot. The priesthood was divided into twenty-four courses (ἐφημερίαι), and each course was on duty twice during the year (Plummer, in loc.). (2) The priests and Levites who interviewed John the Baptist (Jn 1¹⁹). (3) The lepers cleansed by our Lord were to show themselves to the priest (Mt 8⁴, Mk 1⁴⁴, Lk 5¹⁴ 17¹⁴) in proof of their healing and of the obedience of Jesus to the Law (Plummer, in loc.). (4) The reference to the shewbread as eaten by the priests only (Mk 2²⁶). (5) The priest who passed by the wounded traveller (Lk 10³¹). The Gospels are much more concerned with 'chief (or high) priests' (ἀρχιερεῖς) than with priests, the former word being frequently found in all four Gospels. See artt. CHIEF PRIESTS and HIGH PRIEST.

2. Priesthood of Christ.—(1) The general position of Christ's priesthood in the NT.—The English word 'priest' represents two different Heb. and Gr. words. It is used to translate ιερεῖς and קֹהֵן (Lat. sacerdos). It is also the contraction of presbyter ('prester,' 'priest'), which is the transliteration of πρεσβύτερος and LXX rendering of קֹהֵן (elder). But the NT idea of the priesthood of Christ is associated solely with the former of these words. Christ is called a priest, or high priest, in the sense of a sacrificing priest (ιερεῖς, ἀρχιερεῖς). This application of the term to our Lord is found only in Hebrews, though the priestly functions connected with sacrifice and intercession are, of course, found frequently in the NT (Mt 20²⁸, Jn 1²⁹ 14⁶, Ro 8³⁴, Eph 2¹⁸, 1 P 1¹⁹⁻²¹ 3¹⁸, Rev 1⁵ 13). It should, however, be carefully observed that it is only in Hebrews that these functions are connected with our Lord as priest. Elsewhere they simply form part of His general work as Redeemer.

(2) The specific purpose of Christ's priesthood in Hebrews.—It is important to inquire why, and under what circumstances, the priesthood of Christ is brought forward in Hebrews. The situation there described is one in which the Hebrew Christians were in danger of spiritual degeneration (5¹²), backsliding and apostasy (6⁹ 10³⁵). The Epistle was written to prevent this, and the means of accomplishing it was personal experience of the priesthood of Christ. In some way, therefore, Christ's priesthood is associated with spiritual steadfastness, progress, assurance. In the full understanding and acceptance of this truth will be found the secret of growth and maturity of experience. It is evident that these Hebrews knew Jesus as Saviour, and had an elementary knowledge of the truths of redemption (6¹), but they did not realize what it meant to have Him as priest. The distinction between the two may be seen by a consideration of the time and circumstances under which priesthood appeared in connexion with Israel. Apart from foreign priesthoods like those of Egypt and Midian (Gn 47, Ex 3), the first mention of priesthood in Israel is at Sinai. There was no priesthood in Egypt, only redemption. There was none at the Red Sea, where deliverance was the one thing needful. At Sinai they were to realize for the first time their true relation to God and God's relation to them as dwelling among them (Ex 19⁴⁻⁶ 25¹⁻⁸). The priesthood was appointed to provide the means of access to God and prevent fear in approaching Him. The essence of priesthood, therefore, is access to God based on an already existing redemption. The Hebrew Christians knew Christ as Redeemer; they were now to be taught the possibility, power, and joy of constant free access to God in Him, and in this, the removal of all fear and dissatisfaction. Any sense of unworthiness would be met by His worthiness, all fear removed by His nearness to them and to God as at once Son of Man and Divine High Priest. There is thus a whole world of difference between knowing Christ as Saviour and as Priest. The former may involve only spiritual childhood, the latter must necessarily include spiritual maturity (He 5¹⁰⁻¹⁴). This is one of the great distinctions between the teaching of Romans and of Hebrews. The former is concerned with redemption which makes access possible (Ro 5²), the latter with access which is made possible by redemption. This practical purpose of Hebrews in close connexion with spiritual growth and maturity should ever be kept in mind. Herein lies the present and permanent value of the Epistle in Christian life and service, with its constant emphasis on 'Draw near' (10²²), 'Draw not back' (10³⁹), 'Let us go on' (6¹).

(3) The essential meaning of priesthood.—In order to obtain a true idea of the priesthood of Christ, it is necessary to inquire what were the essential characteristics of priesthood. What were the functions which the priest performed as priest, those of which he had the monopoly, and which no one else could perform under any circumstances? The best definition is in He 5¹, where we are told that the priest was 'appointed for men in things pertaining to God,' that is, he represented man to God. What was included in this representation we shall see later, but meanwhile it should be clearly observed that priesthood meant the representation of man to God, and was the exact opposite and counterpart of the work of the prophet, which was to represent God to man. The priest went from man to God, the prophet went from God to man. The two ideas are seen in He 3¹, where Christ is called 'Apostle and High Priest'—'Apostle' because sent from God to man, 'High Priest' because going from man to God. In this twofold capacity lies His perfect mediation. If the priest did other duties, such as teaching, receiving tithes, and blessing the people, these were superadded functions and not inherent in the priesthood. The Levites could teach and the kings could bless, but by no possibility could either do the essential duties of the priesthood in representing man to God. This specific idea is clearly taught as the essence of priesthood both in OT and NT, where the Godward aspect of priesthood is always stated and emphasized (Ex 28¹, Nu 16³⁰, 2 Ch 26¹⁸, Ezk 44¹⁵, He 6²⁰ 7²⁵ 9²⁴). This essential idea of priesthood as representative of man to God carries with it the right of access to and of abiding in the presence of God. In primitive days, families were represented by the patriarch or head of a clan; but as the sense of sin grew and deepened, and as the Divine purpose of redemption was gradually unfolded, it became necessary to have men entirely separated for this office. Priesthood was thus the admission at once of the sinfulness of the race, of the holiness of God, and of the need of conditions of approach to God. It is of the utmost importance that we should define and keep clear these essential characteristics of the priesthood. They can be summed up in the general ideas of (a) drawing near to God by means of an offering, (b) dwelling near to God for the purpose of intercession (Ezk 44¹⁶, Lv 16⁷, Ex 28³⁰ 30⁷⁻⁸, Lk 1⁹⁻¹⁰).

(4) The special order of Christ's priesthood.—The unique feature of the discussion in Hebrews is the association of Christ's priesthood with that of Melchizedek. Three times in Scripture Melchizedek is mentioned, and each time the reference is important. (a) In Gn 14 he appears in history in connexion with Abraham. He is termed 'priest of God Most High.' (b) Then in Ps 110 he is mentioned again in a Psalm usually regarded as Messianic, and as such applied to Himself by our Lord (Mt 22⁴, Mk 12³⁶, Lk 20⁴²). The underlying thought in the Psalm is of a priesthood other than that of Aaron, and suggests a consciousness, however dim, on the part of spiritually-minded Jews, of something beyond and superior to the Aaronic priesthood. The bare mention of another priesthood at all is significant and striking. (c) He appears in Hebrews as a type of Christ. The record of Gn 14 is taken as it stands and used to symbolize and typify some of the elements of the priesthood of Christ. (a) The position of Melchizedek as king indicates the royalty of Christ's priesthood. (b) The meaning of the name 'Melchizedek' is used to suggest the thought of righteousness. (c) The meaning of the title 'king of Salem' suggests the idea of peace. The order and connexion of righteousness and peace are noted in Hebrews. First comes righteousness as the basis of relation to God, and then peace as the outcome of righteousness. Righteousness without peace vindicates the Law and punishes sin, peace without righteousness ignores the Law and condones sin. Righteousness and peace when combined honour the Law while pardoning sin. (d) The absence in the record of Gn 14 of any earthly connexions of ancestry and posterity is used in Hebrews to symbolize the perpetuity of Christ's priesthood. What was true of the record about Melchizedek is present in actual fact in Christ. One point of great importance not to be overlooked is that in Gn 14 no priestly functions are attributed to Melchizedek. The gift of bread and wine to Abraham had, of course, nothing essentially priestly in it. In the record he is just called 'priest of God Most High,' without any characteristic priestly acts being stated. This exactly corresponds to the use made of the Melchizedek priesthood in Hebrews, which does not treat of any priestly acts or functions, but of the order of the priesthood. The fundamental thought of the Melchizedek priesthood in Hebrews refers to the person of the priest, not to his acts. The functions, or acts, are considered in connexion and contrast with the functions of the Aaronic priesthood. It is the priestly person rather than the priestly work that is emphasized in the Melchizedek priesthood. He was a royal person (which Aaron was not); an abiding person (which Aaron was not); a unique person (which Aaron was not). It is the personal superiority in these respects over the priesthood of Aaron that is dwelt upon in connexion with Melchizedek. There is, of course, no comparison drawn between Melchizedek and Christ, but use is made of Melchizedek to symbolize the personal superiority of Christ's priesthood over all others—a priesthood that is older, wider, more lasting than that of Aaron.

(5) The particular functions of Christ's priesthood.—It is in connexion with the Aaronic priesthood that the work of Christ's priesthood is considered. A contrast is made, as is shown by the recurring key word 'better' (7²² 8⁶ et al.). Our Lord never was a priest of the Aaronic line (7^{13, 14} 8⁴), but it was necessary to use the illustration of the Aaronic priesthood to denote Christ's priestly functions, because no characteristic priestly functions are recorded of Melchizedek. A series of comparisons between Aaron's and Christ's priesthood needs careful attention: (a) first generally in 21^{7, 18} with reference to personal qualification; (b) then after bare mention in 3¹, more fully in 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶. (c) But it is in 5¹⁻¹⁰ that we have the first definite comparison. In vv. 1-5 the requirements of the Aaronic priesthood are stated in regard to (a) office (v. 1), (β) character (vv. 2-3), (γ) Divine appointment (vv. 4-5). In vv. 6-10 we have the fulfilment of these requirements in Christ stated in the reverse order: (a) Divine appointment (vv. 6-7), (β) character (vv. 7-8), (γ) office (vv. 9-10). (d) Then in ch. 7 we have the comparison and contrast between Melchizedek and Aaron, with the superiority of the former, on three grounds: (α) Aaron was not royal, (β) Aaron did not abide, by reason of death, (γ) Aaron had many successors. The superiority of the person gives superiority to the functions. (e) Then in chs. 8-10 the superiority of the work of Christ is compared with that of Aaron under three aspects: (a) a better covenant (ch. 8), because spiritual, not temporal; (β) a better sanctuary (ch. 9), because heavenly, not earthly; (γ) a better sacrifice (ch. 10), because real, not symbolical. In the course of this entire discussion several elements of superiority emerge. A superior order (7¹⁻¹⁷), a superior tribe (v. 14), a superior calling (v. 21), a superior tenure (vv. 23, 24), a superior character (v. 26), a superior sanctuary and a superior covenant (ch. 9), a superior sacrifice (ch. 10). After ch. 10 there is nothing priestly in the terms used, though ch. 13 refers to functions connected with the priesthood. The functions of priesthood may thus be summed up as (a) access to God for man, (b) offering to God for man, (c) intercession with God for man; and the superiority of our Lord's priesthood is shown in the following particulars: (1) It is royal in character, (2) heavenly in sphere, (3) spiritual in nature, (4) continuous in efficacy, (5) perpetual in duration, (6) universal in scope, (7) effectual in results.

At this point there are three questions that call for attention. (a) There is no real distinction between 'Priest' and 'High Priest.' Christ is both (5^{6, 10} 6²⁰ 7^{1, 3, 15, 17, 21}). The difference is one of rank only, the High Priesthood being, as it were, a specialized form. The term 'high priest' occurs only nine times in the OT, of which but two are in the Pentateuch, and it is curious that the term is never once applied to Aaron. This clearly shows that there is no real distinction between the two offices, for if there had been an essential difference from the first, Aaron would have been called 'high priest.' Christ is never termed 'High Priest' in connexion with Melchizedek, but only when Aaron is under consideration. As, however, the distinction was current in NT times, it was necessary to show that Christ fulfilled both offices.

(b) Hebrews dwells very carefully on Christ's offering as connected with His death on the cross, and also on His entrance into heaven as connected with His Ascension. The absence of reference to the Resurrection (except in 13²⁰) is explained by the fact that there was no place for this event in the type. Attention is therefore called to the two parts of the one priestly function of offering which was connected with the Day of Atonement, the sacrifice of the animal without the camp (13^{11, 12}), and the entrance into the Holiest with the blood of the animal sacrificed. Stress is laid on the Ascension because that is regarded as the moment of our High Priest's entrance into heaven on our behalf (9^{12, 24}). It is the close association of these two parts that explains 8³ 'It is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer.' The view that this verse teaches that Christ is now continually offering Himself to God in heaven is clearly inconsistent with the rest of the Epistle, which lays such stress on the association of the offering with Christ's death, and which also dwells on the uniqueness and completeness of the offering (ἐφάπαξ, 7²⁷ 9^{12, 28}), and on the session at God's right hand (the attitude of a victor, not an offerer). Further, the great and essential characteristic of the New Covenant is remission of sins (8⁸ 10^{11, 12}), and this was possible only after the offering was completed (4¹⁶ 9¹⁴⁻²²). The aorist tense in 8³ seems decisive in associating the offering with the death. It may be 'timeless' (G. Milligan, Theol. of the Ep. to the Hebrews), but at least it is not continuous (Westcott, in loc.). If with A. B. Davidson we interpret this 'somewhat to offer' of the heavenly sanctuary, as seems only natural, the conditions are exactly fulfilled by the fact and at the moment of ascension, when Christ first appeared before God for us, and then sat down at the right hand of God, having fulfilled all the requirements of the work of offering and presentation of Himself on our behalf. The offering in Hebrews is invariably associated with sin, not with consecration; with Christ's death, not with His life; and offering is thereby shown to be the characteristic work of a priest. To regard our Lord as now offering, or representing, or re-presenting Himself in heaven, is to think of Him in the attitude of a worshipper instead of on the throne. His work of offering and presentation was finished before He sat down, and it is significant that what the author calls the 'pith,' or 'crowning-point' (κεφάλαιον) of the Epistle (8¹) is a 'high priest who is set down.' This exactly answers to the type on the Day of Atonement. When the high priest had presented the blood, his work was complete; and if we could imagine him able to remain there in the presence of God, he would stay on the basis of that complete offering and not as continuing to offer or present anything. Besides, there was no altar in the Holy of Holies, and there could therefore be no real sacrificial offering. Christ is not now at an altar or a mercy-seat, but on the throne. If it be said that intercession is an insufficient idea of His priestly life above, it may be answered that offering and intercession do not exhaust His heavenly life. His presence there on our behalf as our Representative includes everything. He Himself is (not merely His death was) the propitiation (1 Jn 2²). Does it not betoken a lack of spiritual perception to demand that Christ should always be doing something? Why may we not be content with the thought that He is there, and that in His presence above is the secret of peace, the assurance of access, and the guarantee of permanent relation with God? It is just at this point that one essential difference between type and anti-type is noticed. The high priest went into the Holy of Holies 'with blood'; but when Christ's entrance into heaven is mentioned, He is said to have gone 'through his own blood,' i.e. His access is based on the offering on Calvary (9¹²). It seems impossible, therefore, to extend the idea of Christ's offering to mean 'a present and eternal offering to God of His life in heaven' (W. Milligan, Ascension, p. 116). Such a view finds no warrant in the Epistle, and everything against it in the emphasis laid on the association of Christ's offering with His death (7²⁷ 9^{13, 14} 24-28 10¹⁰⁻¹⁴), and the uniqueness and completeness of that as culminating in the entrance into heaven. The death of Christ meant propitiation, the Ascension emphasizes access based upon this propitiation (Westcott, Hebrews, p. 230).

(c) The use of the two priesthoods, Melchizedek's and Aaron's, is not to be interpreted of two aspects of priesthood,—one on earth and the other in heaven successively realized by Christ,—for this would be quite opposed to 7¹⁸ 8⁴. It means that there is one priesthood, of which Melchizedek is used for the person, and Aaron for the work. If Christ's death is associated with the Aaronic priesthood (against 8⁴), then the entrance into heaven must also be associated with Aaron (against 6²⁰ et al.), which would leave no room at all for the Melchizedek priesthood. It is impossible for the death to be associated with one priesthood, and the ascension with the other. The order or nature of the priesthood according to Melchizedek gives validity and perpetuity to the acts which are symbolized in the Aaronic priesthood.

(6) The personal qualifications of Christ as Priest.—The practical and spiritual use made of priesthood in Hebrews gives special point to the emphasis laid on the personal qualifications of our Lord as High Priest. These are dealt with mainly from the human side up to 5⁹, and thenceforward from the Divine side. Both the human and the Divine are shown to be necessary. In regard to the human qualifications, we have: (a) His manhood, involving oneness with us for sympathy and help (ch. 2); (b) His perfect sympathy (4¹⁴⁻¹⁶); (c) His perfect training by obedience through suffering (5¹⁻¹⁰). The Divine qualifications are: (a) His Divine appointment (5¹⁰); (b) His indissoluble life (7¹⁶), involving an uninterrupted tenure of office as contrasted with the constant deaths in the Aaronic priesthood; (c) His inviolable or intransmissible priesthood (7²⁴), involving the impossibility of succession or delegation (ἀπαρδύσασθαι); (d) His perpetual life of intercession (7²⁵); (e) His fitness through character (7²⁶); (f) the Divine guarantee in the Divine oath of appointment (7²⁸); (g) His position on the throne (8¹); (h) His perfect offering (9¹²⁻²⁴ 10¹²). These Divine and human qualifications of priesthood are based upon His Divine Sonship (ch. 1). His priesthood inheres in His Person as Son of God. It is this uniqueness as Son that gives Christ His qualifications for priesthood.

(7) The spiritual work of Christ as Priest.—The various aspects of His priestly work are shown in Hebrews as follows: (a) His propitiation (2¹⁷); (b) His ability to suffer (2¹⁶); (c) His ability to sympathize (4¹⁵); (d) His ability to save (7²⁵); (e) His present appearance in heaven for us (9²⁴); (f) His kingly position on the throne (8¹); (g) His coming again (9²⁸). These are the elements connected with His priestly work, though there are others which are associated with His more general and inclusive work as Redeemer. The work is at once perpetual and permanent. He offered Himself through an eternal spirit (9¹⁴); He has made an eternal covenant (9^{13, 14}); He is the cause of eternal salvation (5⁹); He obtained eternal redemption (9¹²), which culminates in eternal inheritance (9¹⁵).

(8) The practical uses of Christ's priesthood.—The definitely practical purpose of the truth of priesthood is what must ever be kept in view. It is by means of the experience of Christ's priesthood that Christians come out of spiritual infancy into spiritual maturity (6¹ 10¹). Nowhere is the practical character more clearly seen than in the various statements and exhortations which have to do with the daily life of the believer. In particular, there are the associated phrases, 'we have,' and 'therefore let us.' (a) 4¹⁴ Having the High Priest, let us hold fast. (b) 4^{15, 16} Having a sympathetic High Priest, let us come boldly. (c) 10¹⁹ Having boldness of access, let us draw near with faith; having a High Priest, let us hold fast our hope, let us consider one another in love. Then these three exhortations to faith, hope, and love are amplified respectively in ch. 11 (faith), ch. 12 (hope), ch. 13 (love). (d) 12²⁸ Receiving a kingdom, let us have grace. (e) 13^{12, 13} Jesus suffered; let us go forth. (f) 13¹⁴ We seek a city to come, therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise. The Epistle thus emphasizes one truth above all others. Christianity is 'the religion of free access' to God (Bruce, Hebrews, p. 171). It might be summed up in the exhortations, 'Draw nigh,' 'Hold fast,' 'Draw not back.' It is characteristic that the word for believers is οἱ προσερχόμενοι, 'those who come right up' to God, and its corresponding exhortation is προσερχόμεθα, 'Let us come right up' to God. Christianity is the better hope by which we 'draw nigh' to God (ἐγγίξεν τῷ θεῷ), and Christ is the surety (ἕγγυος) of a better covenant, that is, One who ensures our permanent access to God (Bruce, Hebrews, p. 275). In proportion as we realize this privilege of nearness, and respond to these exhortations to draw near and keep near, we shall find that element of παρρησία which is one of the essential features of a strong Christian life. It is this above all that the priesthood of Christ is intended to produce and perpetuate, to guarantee and guard. This truth of priesthood, as taught in Hebrews, is absolutely essential to a vigorous life, a mature experience, a joyous testimony, and an abounding work.

PRINCE.—There are four Gr. words occurring in the Gospels or applied to Christ in the NT which either in AV or RV are rendered 'prince.'

1. ἡγεμών, Mt 2⁶. Both AV and RV here give 'princes'—the only occasion of ἡγεμών being so rendered in NT. Otherwise it is almost invariably translated 'governor,' and in particular, is used to denote the Roman governor or procurator. So of Pilate (Mt 27 passim, Lk 20²⁰), as of Felix and Festus (Ac 23^{24, 26, 33, 34} 26³⁰). The description of Bethlehem as 'in no wise least among the princes of Judah' is perplexing in view of Mic 5²⁽¹⁾ from which the quotation is taken. The Heb. expression is בְּרָאשׁוֹת 'among the thousands of' (LXX ἐν χιλιάδων). Differently pointed, however, the word becomes בְּרָאשׁוֹת 'among the heads of thousands of,' i.e. the chieftains; and this apparently is the sense assigned to it in the quotation. It is worth noting that in the Gr. there is a close correspondence between the 'princes' (ἡγεμόνες) of v. 6^a and the 'governor' (ἡγεούμενος) of v. 6^b. The whole verse, however, is a very free rendering of the Heb. (see the Comm.; and cf. Hastings' DB iv. 185^a).

2. δυναστές, Lk 1⁵². Here AV has 'the mighty,' but RV 'princes.' Elsewhere in NT the word is used only in Ac 8²⁷ of the Ethiopian eunuch (EV 'of great authority') and in I Ti 6¹⁵ of God (EV 'Potentate').

3. ἄρχων. In Mt 20²⁵ AV gives 'the princes of the Gentiles,' where RV has 'rulers.' Similarly in Rev 1⁵, as applied to Jesus, we have 'prince [RV 'ruler'] of the kings of the earth'—an expression that was probably suggested by the LXX rendering of Ps 89²⁷ [88²⁸]. More important is the use of ἄρχων in two of the Gospels as applied to Satan in the phrases ἄρχων τῶν δαιμονίων (Mt 9³⁴ 12²⁴, EV 'prince of the devils'), and ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου (Jn 12³¹ 14³⁰ 16¹¹, EV 'prince of this world'). The Matthean phrase calls for no remark, especially as in 12²⁴ 'the prince of the devils' is said to be Beelzebub (wh. see). 'The prince of this world,' on the other hand, is a title that belongs to the special Johannine conception of the world as an order of things that is alienated from God and hostile to Him, and of Satan as a power dominating this sinful world and operating in it and through it (cf. Eph 2² 'the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience'). But, according to the Johannine view (I Jn 4⁴), 'Greater is he that is in you than he that is in the world (ὁ ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ).' The secret of the Saviour's superiority lay ultimately in His absolute sinlessness. The prince of this world came and had nothing in Him (Jn 14³⁰; cf. the Temptation narratives (Mt 4^{1ff.}, Lk 4^{1ff.}), and especially the offer of 'all the kingdoms of the world'). The world was Satan's, but Christ overcame the world (16³³). So far from finding in Jesus anything that he could claim as his own, the prince of this world was himself judged by Jesus (16¹¹), and by Him cast out (12³¹; cf. Lk 10¹⁸).

4. ἀρχηγός is twice applied to Christ in Acts in the expressions 'Prince [EVM 'Author'] of life' (3¹⁵) and 'a Prince and a Saviour' (5³¹). Elsewhere the Gr. word is used in NT only in He 2¹⁰ 12², both times of Christ. In 2¹⁰ AV renders 'captain,' RV 'author,' RVm 'captain'; in 12² AV and RV have 'author,' AVm 'beginner,' RVm 'captain.' For the precise force of the word in the two passages in Heb. reference may be made to art. CAPTAIN. The 'Prince' (Vulg. princeps) of Ac 5³¹ is thoroughly justified in this connexion by both classical and LXX usage, and is particularly appropriate if, as Chase suggests (Credibility of Acts, p. 130), we may see in the expression 'a Prince and a Saviour' an echo of 'the current phraseology—liturgical and literary—of the Messianic hope.' In 3¹⁵, on the other hand, 'Author of life' (Vulg. auctor vitæ) is more suitable than 'Prince of life.' The use of ἀρχηγός with a causative force (often making it practically synonymous with αἰτίος, with which it is sometimes joined) is common in Gr. writers from Plato downwards, more especially when it is followed by the genitive of the thing. Moreover, there is no suggestion here of that idea of 'leadership' which is in keeping with both of the passages in Hebrews, and seems best to bring out their full meaning.

PRINT (τύπος, the mark of a stroke or blow; cf. Athen. τοὺς τύπους τῶν πληγῶν ἰδοῦσα).—In the Gospels 'print' is found only in Jn 20²⁵, where in most MSS it occurs twice: 'Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe' (for other uses of τύπος in NT see Grimm-Thayer and Cremer, s.v.).

At the second occurrence of the word a v.l. τόπος is found in AI, which Lach., Tisch., and Treg. [marg.] read (K has εἰς τὴν χεῖρα (sic) αὐτοῦ). There is considerable variety in the Lat. VSS; Cod. Brixianus (OL) gives 'nisi videro in manibus ejus locum clavorum et mittam digitum meum in foramina clavorum'; others read 'figuram' (so D lat. in both places), which occurs in Vulg. for τόπος in Ac 7⁴⁵, I Co 10¹¹; and 'fissuram' is also found. Vulg. gives 'nisi videro in manibus fixuram clavorum, et mittam digitum meum in locum clavorum.' 'Fixuram' seems to be a correction made by Jerome, since it is not found in the older codices; but it may mean the place where the nail was fixed. Augustine preferred the word 'cicatrix,' in one place (on I Jn 1⁵) quoting Thomas' words as 'non credam nisi digitos meos misero in locum clavorum, et cicatrices ejus tetigero'; in another (on Ps 21 (22)¹⁷), 'nisi misero digitos meos in cicatrices vulnerum, non credam.' See full note in Wordsworth-White's NT Lat. (Oxford). The reading τόπος would bring out more strongly what is implied in the story, that Thomas required the evidence of his senses, both of seeing and feeling; he wished to see the τίπος, and put his finger into the τίπος; cf. Grotius, 'τίπος videtur, τόπος impletur.' Westcott, however, holds that this reading is nothing more than an early and natural mistake; and Godet says that it takes away from the denial of the disciple precisely its marked character of obstinacy, which is shown in the deliberate repetition of his phrases.

When Jesus appeared on the evening of the Resurrection to His disciples during the absence of Thomas, it is related that He showed them His hands and His feet, evidently bearing the marks of the wounds, in order to convince them of the reality and identity of His risen body (Lk 24³⁹, cf. Jn 20²⁰). He also offered them the testimony of their sense of feeling, 'Handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye behold me having.' Thomas refused to accept their account of what had taken place, and required that he himself should have proof similar to or even stronger than what they had received. The wounds inflicted upon Calvary were deeply engraven on his memory, and to all their repeated assurances (ἔλεγον, Jn 20²⁵) he had but one answer (εἶπεν). 'Si Phariseus ita dixisset nil impetrasset, sed discipulo pridem probato nil non datur' (Bengel). A week later Christ appeared again to the disciples, Thomas being present, and offered him just the test he had demanded, giving him back his own words, but making no mention of the prints of the nails, for 'He does not recall the malice of His enemies' (Alford). It is a moot question whether Thomas availed himself of this offer. Tertullian, Ambrose, Cyril, and others suppose that he did, but it is psychologically more probable that Thomas rose above such a material test; the presence of his Master, and the proof of His omniscience, shown in His knowledge of what Thomas had said on the former occasion, were sufficient; with a bound he rose to the vision of highest faith (so Meyer, Alford, Westcott, Edersheim, Dods, et al.). With this, too, agree the words of the Lord, 'Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed,' not 'because thou hast touched me.'

If it be asked, how the prints of the wounds could be seen, and even remain open, in His risen and glorified body, it is but one of many difficulties arising from our ignorance as to the nature of that body. On the same occasion Christ entered the room with this same body in which the prints were visible, the doors being shut. Since, therefore, the account deals with matters of which we have no experience, we must accept the fact on sufficient evidence, even though we may not be able to account for it. Meanwhile there is deep significance in the fact that the marks of these wounds remain. They prove the reality of the Resurrection body, and its continuity with that body which was crucified; though Christ glorified was in many respects changed, yet He was essentially the same who suffered, seeing that the prints could become visibly present to Thomas and the others. They show also the abiding nature of His atoning work, and teach us to connect the issue of His Agony with His Work in triumph (cf. the use of the perfect tense, Ἰησοῦν τὸν ἐσταυρωμένον, in Mt 28^s, cf. 1 Co 1²³). 'The prints of the nails are not only signs of recognition, but also signs of victory. . . . He points to His wounded hands and feet as proving that He bears even within the veil the tokens of redeeming love. The conception is one on which Art has always loved to dwell. We must all have seen, again and again, figures of the Lord in glory raising His wounded hands to bless, or pleading even on the throne of judgment with those who have rejected Him by the marks of His death, so showing that by these He is still known; that by these He still proclaims the unchanging Gospel, "Redemption through sacrifice"' (Westcott, The Revelation of the Risen Lord, p. 69 f.). 'He gave them confidence in His unfailing sympathy, by shewing that He bore even to the throne of heaven the marks of His dying love' (ib. p. 79).

The marks (στίγματα) which St. Paul bore in his body (Gal 6¹⁷) have by some been connected with these prints of our Lord's passion, as if they were reproduced in the Apostle's body, comparing 2 Co 4¹⁰, Ro 6⁵ etc., and referring to the well-known stigmata of Francis of Assisi. But an entirely different explanation of the passage is now generally accepted according to which the allusion is to marks of ownership branded on the bodies of temple slaves and others (see RV, Lightfoot's note in loco, and art. 'Mark' in Hastings' DB iii. 245). See STIGMATA.

PRISON.—The fact that no fewer than eight different Heb. roots are used to express 'prison' (see Hastings' DB i. 525) in the OT, testifies to the number of prisoners in ancient times, and the variety of treatment which they experienced. Not only ordinary prison-houses, but also fortresses, barracks, palaces, and temples had commonly accommodation—more or less extensive—for prisoners, just as our rural police stations have cells attached to them for temporary confinement.

The Latin and Greek terms translated 'prison' are expressive and significant. Carcer (cf. Gr. ἵππος) emphasizes restraint. Ergastulum (lit. workhouse) corresponds to our 'penitentiary.' Malefactors and slaves laboured therein, as in the building where Samson had languished. The Tullianum at Rome was a condemned cell. Perhaps the mildest form of imprisonment recorded in the NT was that of St. Paul (Ac 25³⁰), when he dwelt for two whole years in his own hired house (μισθώσιμα, — see illustration in Rome and its Story by Tina Duff Gordon and St. Clair Baddeley, p. 114), guarded by, and probably chained to, a soldier. οἰκίωμα, in polite Attic usage used for a prison, is found once (Ac 12⁷). τήρησις, 'the place of keeping' (Ac 43 5¹⁵), tr. 'hold' (RV 'ward') and 'prison' (probably that attached to the Temple or the high priest's palace, Hastings' DB iv. 103), also suggests the mildest form of restraint. The φυλακή or place of guarding, in which John the Baptist was confined (Mt 14³), is believed to have been in the royal palace of Machærus (Jos. Ant. xvii. v. 2). Custody in a φυλακή might mean anything, from the comparative comfort of a guard-room to the misery of a dungeon. Another word translated 'prison' is διαγωγῆριον, the 'place of bonds.' It is used interchangeably with φυλακή in speaking of John the Baptist's prison (Mt 11²), and became painfully familiar to the first preachers of the Cross in the course of their missionary journeys. See also following article.

If those mutilations and other horrid cruelties, familiar to the older pagan world, were less common, still vindictiveness rather than reformation was a note of imprisonment at the dawn of the Christian era. The LXX translates the place of Zedekiah's imprisonment at Babylon οἰκία μύλωνος, 'the millhouse' (Jer 52¹¹). Grinding corn in a millhouse is a somewhat more humane punishment than hard labour on the treadmill, and some of the tasks allotted to inmates of an ergastulum may have been no more disagreeable than picking oakum. But much more severe treatment was often the unhappy prisoner's lot. In our Lord's parable of the Unforgiving Servant, that ungrateful wretch fell into the hands of torturers (τοῖς βασανισταῖς, Mt 18³⁴)—a staff of officials whose very name is sinister. One means of torture was an instrument (ξύλον, Lat. nervus) in which the bodies of victims were confined. It is described as 'a wooden block or frame in which the feet and sometimes the hands and neck of prisoners were confined' (Robinson, Gr. Lex. of NT). In such durance were Paul and Silas placed at Philippi (Ac 16²⁴). The condemned cell of a Roman prison resembled that dungeon in the court of the prison into which Jeremiah was let down with cords, and where he sank in the mire (Jer 38⁶). 'They were pestilential cells, damp and cold, from which the light was excluded, and where the chains rusted on the limbs of the prisoners' (Conybeare-Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 358). The Carcer Mamer-tinus on the slope of the Capitoline of Rome, and the traditional scene of St. Paul's last imprisonment, is typical of Roman prisons all over the world during Rome's supremacy. It consists of two chambers, one above the other—the upper one an 'irregular quadrilateral.' The lower, 'originally accessible only through a hole in the ceiling, is 19 ft. long, 10 ft. wide, and 6½ ft. high. The vaulting is formed by the gradual projection of the side walls until they meet.' This prison is supposed to have been built over a well named Tullianum, and hence traditionally attributed to Servius Tullius (see Varro, v. 151). An inscription records that it was restored in B.C. 22 (Baedeker, Italy, ii. p. 226). See also art. HELL (DESCENT INTO).

D. A. MACKINNON.

PRISONER.—The word 'prisoner' (δέσμιος) is found in the Gospels only in Mt 27^{15, 16}, Mk 15⁶ (see also, however, Lk 23¹⁷ RVm), where it is used of the prisoner whom the Roman governor was wont to release to the Jews at the Feast of Pass-over, and in particular of Barabbas, a 'notable prisoner' of the time. But, apart from the word, we read of other prisoners in the Gospels, and both there and elsewhere in the NT we learn something of the attitude of Christ to the prisoner, and the prisoner's relations and obligations to Christ.

1. Of actual prisoners there are two in the Gospels much more 'notable' than Barabbas. The first is John the Baptist, who for righteousness' sake was 'cast into prison' (Mt 14³, Mk 6¹⁷, Lk 3²⁰, Jn 3²⁴), and whose imprisonment so affected his strong, free spirit that for a time his faith in Christ appears to have faltered (Mt 11^{2ff.}). The other is Jesus Himself, who was arrested (Mt 26⁵⁰) in the Garden, and taken in bonds (Jn 18²⁴ δεδεμένος [which is practically equivalent to δέσμιος; cf. Mk 15⁶ with v. 7]) first before the high priest and then before Pilate (Mt 27³, Mk 15¹, Jn 18¹²⁻²⁴).

2. The fact that the prisoners of the Gospels include a robber (Jn 18⁴⁰) and murderer (Mk 15⁷, Lk 23²⁵) like Barabbas on the one hand, and John the Baptist and Jesus on the other, shows the necessity of discriminating between prisoners, and especially of distinguishing those who deserve their punishment (cf. the admission of the penitent robber, Lk 23⁴¹) from those who 'suffer wrongfully.' To the former class Barabbas certainly belonged. His imprisonment was the reward of his crimes (Lk 23²⁵); and so long as crimes like his are committed against society, imprisonment will still be necessary. With all His pity for the prisoner, Jesus recognizes that there are cases in which a just judge will cast the offender into prison (Mt 5²⁵). But there are wrongful imprisonments as well as merited ones; and our Lord warned His disciples that a time would come when they themselves should be cast into prison for His name's sake (Lk 21¹²)—a warning that was soon abundantly fulfilled in the experience of the Apostles and the early Church (Ac 4³ 5¹⁸ 3³ 12⁴ 16²⁴ etc.).

3. In the Gospels Jesus comes before us as the prisoner's Friend. He proves His friendship (1) by the deliverance He brings. In the synagogue at Nazareth, at the very outset of His ministry (Lk

4^{17ff.}), He applied to Himself the glowing words of the great Messianic prophet (Is 61^{1f.}), and so assumed the office of one who came 'to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound.' There is, of course, a spiritual sense in which Christ fulfils this promise — by pulling down the dungeon walls of ignorance and error, by giving liberty to the human spirit, by striking off the fetters of sin. But in a more literal fashion Christ brought deliverance to the captives by destroying the very foundations of earthly tyrannies, and making it impossible that in any society which had learned to breathe the air of His gospel men should be cast into prison to gratify the pleasure of a despot or the rage of the persecutor. 'Christ died on the tree,' Carlyle said to Emerson: 'that built Dunscore kirk yonder' (Emerson, Works, ii. p. 8). And in a like sense we may say that it was Christ's hand on Calvary that tore down the walls of the Bastille, and abolished the iniquities of the Spanish Inquisition.

(2) Again, Jesus proves His friendship for the prisoner by the sympathy He gives. We see an illustration of this sympathy in the message of consolation and blessing that He sent to John the Baptist (Mt 11⁴⁻⁶) when the forerunner's heart was like to faint in the gloomy vaults of Machærus. But above all we see it in those haunting words of self-identification with the prisoner: 'I was in prison, and ye came unto me' (Mt 25³⁶); 'I was in prison, and ye visited me not' (v. 43). It is not merely with the righteous man who suffers wrongfully that our Lord here identifies Himself, but with the prisoner as such—the criminal, it may be, the pest of society, the man who deserves to die. It was Christ's love and pity for the prisoner that inspired the philanthropic labours of John Howard and Elizabeth Fry, and led to that great transformation in the prisoner's immemorial lot which is as much one of the 'Gesta Christi' as the modern missionary movement.

4. In the letters of St. Paul's captivity we find the Apostle describing himself as 'the prisoner of Jesus Christ,' or 'the prisoner of the Lord' (Eph 3¹ 4¹, Philem⁹; cf. 2 Ti 1⁸). It is a striking expression, which is by no means exhausted when understood to mean that Paul suffered imprisonment for the sake of Christ. It means that, without doubt; but it means much more (cf. Eph 3¹ 'the prisoner of Christ Jesus in behalf of you Gentiles,' where 'the δέσμιος of Christ' represents himself as suffering for the Gentiles' sake). The man who so describes himself believes that Christ has laid His arresting hand upon him, and put him where he is, and shut to the door of his prison; and that it is no other than the Lord Jesus who carries the key of that door at His girdle. St. Paul, in short, thought of Christ as the Keeper of the prison, and the thought filled him with profound content (cf. Ph 4¹¹). Like St. Peter, he had learned in his own experience that the Lord could unlock prison doors at His pleasure and set his servants free (Ac 16²⁶, cf. 12^{6ff.}). And if some day the door should be opened only that the prisoner of Christ might be led forth to die, Paul knew that this would really mean his escape through Christ's grace to a larger liberty than he could find on earth (2 Co 5¹⁻⁸). And so, as the midnight hymns that he and Silas sang to God in the prison at Philippi compelled all the prisoners to listen (Ac 16²⁵), the world has had to hearken ever since to those notes of wonder, love, and praise that turn St. Paul's prison-Epistles into prison-songs.

J. C. LAMBERT.

PROCURATOR.—A 'procurator' (the exact Gr. equivalent is ἐπιτροπος) was properly a slave or freedman who looked after (procurabat) a man's property (cf. Mt 20⁶, Lk 8²). The nearest Eng.

equivalent is 'steward' (wh. see). This upper servant acted for his master, in the absence of the latter, in all matters connected with money, and it may safely be said that only a small estate amongst the Romans would be without one. The position was one of responsibility, but it is obvious that the importance of the person in the world was directly in proportion to the importance of his master. An agent of the Emperor, who always possessed vast landed and house property, as well as the whole or part of the taxes of every province of the Roman Empire, held a higher position in society than the procurator of any other person. The Emperor's financial interests were so varied, that he required a large number of such servants to look after them, and his high position enabled him to draw them from a higher class than that of freedmen and slaves. The majority of them were of equestrian rank, and some of these procuratorships were deemed of higher importance than others. The diverse character of their duties will be seen from the fact that Cagnat (*Cours d'Épigraphie Latine*³, p. 121 ff.) enumerates thirty-nine different kinds of procurators, whose titles have reference to every possible aspect of the Emperor's revenue and expenditure.

Certain of the smaller Imperial provinces (see under GOVERNOR) were put under procurators as governors, to whom the Emperor delegated administrative and military functions. Such a procuratorship was, of course, one of the highest of the Imperial procuratorships, and carried with it a large salary; but it must be clearly understood that a procurator, however high, remained a servant of the Emperor, and owed his life and fortune solely to the favour of the prince, who advanced those quickest who served his interests best. The word 'procurator' is not used in the NT, but the participle of the verb (ἐπιτροπεύοντας) occurs as a variant in Lk 3¹ to ἡγεμονεύοντας, a more general term applicable to all governors of provinces, and even to the Emperor himself. Pontius Pilate was procurator provinciae Iudaeae. See also art. GOVERNOR.

ALEX. SOUTER.

PRODIGAL SON.—The details of this parable (Lk 15) seem to have been carefully thought out, as the structure of the story is fairly complete and its movement quite natural. The younger of a certain man's sons, dissatisfied with the quiet life he is leading, resolves to leave his father's house; and, having received the share of property that fell to him, goes to a distant country and gives himself up with the fullest abandonment to every indulgence that appetite craved. But his career of gaiety and dissipation soon comes to an end. He passes from one stage to another in his downward course till he reaches the lowest. Without a friend and in the direst straits, he is forced to take service as a swine-herd—a grade of employment esteemed by Jewish society as the lowest. The misery to which he had brought himself, however, and the neglect from which he suffers, show him how great has been his folly and how wrong his conduct. He therefore resolves to return home, confess his fault, and solicit the place of a servant in his father's household. He carries out his intention, but his father receives him with the greatest eagerness and affection, and orders a feast to be prepared in celebration of his safe return.

The elder brother, however, is very indignant, and refuses to take any part in the general rejoicing. His father entreats him to enter into the spirit of the occasion; but he is obstinate and petulant, and complains that this display in honour of his brother is in marked contrast with the treatment accorded him. He who had lived at home in dutiful submission had not received the slightest token in recognition of his merits or services, whereas his brother who had squandered his means in a career of vice is being honoured in the most enthusiastic and lavish manner.

Here, then, we have a father and his son differing as to how a younger son who had grievously misbehaved himself ought to be treated. The fact of the young man's wrongdoing and the sincerity of his repentance are accepted by both; but while the elder brother challenges the justice and propriety of rejoicing over the return of one who had been so headstrong and foolish, the father firmly defends the course he had followed, and, in terminating the discussion, speaks with a finality that is not to be questioned: 'It was meet that we should make merry and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.'

The prodigal is a minor character in the parable. The contrast is drawn between the father and the elder brother in reference to their treatment of the wrongdoer, and not between the brothers either in regard to character or conduct. The substance of the parable is this: a father who welcomes back an erring and repentant son has his action emphatically approved, and an elder brother who maintains an attitude of surly aloofness is shown to merit severe disapprobation.

The parable is thus practical in its aim—teaching men not only how they ought to treat their repentant brethren, but chiefly what is necessary to enable them to do so. For what was it that led the father to act as he did? Was it not just the love he bore his son, foolish and erring though he had been? The elder son reasoned on the lines of cold and rigid law, whereas the heart of the father spoke, and the voice of love was obeyed. And was it not just the want of this affectionate heart that allowed the elder brother to act so ungenerously? Had he loved his brother, he would have lived with his father in the warmth of his welcome; had he even loved his father, he would have acquiesced in his father's wish for his father's sake. It was poverty of affection that led him to display a selfishness that was offensive, and a temper that was childish and rude. What could the father do?—a son he loved and had lost was home again safe and sound—a son who had gone forth to a rude world had returned disillusioned and chastened by his bitter experience.

In the first instance, no doubt, the parable was meant to point out the defect in the Jewish way of dealing with those who had sinned. What was clearly lacking there was a brotherly spirit. Those who had erred were treated with unrelenting severity; the sinner looked in vain for mercy and hoped in vain for restoration, no matter how painful and prolonged his period of repentance had been. But what was true for the Jews is true for all. Love alone is capable of rendering the conscience sensitive to the finest shades of justice. Law rigidly applied does not scrutinize the motive, does not measure the force of temptation, does not take into account the fact of repentance, and is therefore often unjust when in appearance it is most just. The father showed mercy because he loved his son, and in showing mercy dispensed the truer justice; for mercy is but justice perfectly applied. The elder brother failed in his duty to brother and father alike, because he lacked the affection that would have swept away his shallow notions of justice, and pointed out a better way.

The parable thus emphasizes one aspect of the great commandment of our Lord, that men should love one another; and in this respect shows a close resemblance to several of His other parables. In that of the Good Samaritan, the Priest and the Levite saw no duty they owed to the wounded Jew, whereas the heart of the Samaritan—a member of a despised race—responded at once to the demands of the situation. And in that of the Labourers in the Vineyard, is it not the mean and grudging spirit of the whole-day labourers that is condemned, since their rights were not infringed nor their interests invaded by the generous treatment accorded to the late-comers?

What men require in their dealings with one another is the loving heart, and in dealing with our erring and repentant brethren nothing else will give the insight and tenderness needed to fulfil the ends of real justice. In the sympathy of Christ lay the secret of His power. No one who had paid the penalty of his transgression in bitter repentance was refused His countenance or His help; and the moral sense of mankind, quickened by a genuine brotherly love, will ever admit that His way is the right way—will ever say to the harsh and unforgiving, It is 'meet that we should make merry and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.'

PROFANING, PROFANITY.—1. The terms.—The word 'profane' occurs only once in EV of the Gospels, and then in the verbal form (Gr. βεβηλω), viz. in Mt 12⁵, where Jesus says, in defending His disciples and Himself from the charge of Sabbath-breaking, 'Have ye not read in the law, how that on the sabbath day the priests in the temple profane the sabbath, and are guiltless?' Elsewhere in NT the vb. (Gr. and Eng.) is found only in Ac 24⁶, where the Jews accuse St Paul of profaning the Temple. The meaning of βεβηλω must be considered in connexion with the adj. βεβηλος from which it comes, and which is found 5 times in NT (1 Ti 1⁹ 4⁷ 6²⁰, 2 Ti 2¹⁶, He 12¹⁶), 'profane' being in each case the rendering of EV. βεβηλος is the almost exact equivalent of Lat. profanus, whence Eng. 'profane.' Profanus (fr. pro = 'before,' and fanum = 'temple') means 'without the temple,' and so 'unconsecrated,' as opposed to sacer. βεβηλος (fr. βαίνω = 'to go,' whence βηλός = 'threshold') denotes that which is 'trodden,' 'open to access,' and so again 'unconsecrated,' in contrast to ιερός. Originally βεβηλος (like its opposites, ιερός, ἅγιος, etc.) had a purely ritual meaning, but out of this there gradually arose ethical and spiritual connotations. The LXX affords plentiful illustration of these various uses of the word. In Lv 10¹⁰, e.g., βεβηλος means no more than ἀκάθαρτος, as the context shows, i.e. ritually unclean. In 19²⁹ RV 'Profane [AV 'Prostitute'] not thy daughter,' the ethical meaning is apparent. In Ezk 22²⁵, with its clear distinction between βεβηλος and ἅγιος, together with its conception of a profaning of God Himself, we pass from the moral into the still higher realm of spiritual religion. Similarly, in the Gospels we find a lower and a higher conception of what is meant by profanation. There is a profaneness of the law and the letter, eagerly pounced upon by scribes and Pharisees. There is a profaneness of the soul and the spirit, which stands revealed to the eyes of Jesus.

2. The sin.—The sin of profaning consists in treating sacred things with irreverence or contempt, and in the Bible the charge of profanation is found especially in connexion with the desecration or violation of the Sabbath, of the Temple, or of the name of God Himself. In a study of Christ's life and teaching the sin of profaning comes up for consideration under each of these heads. (1) Profaning the Sabbath.—It is significant that the only occasion of the use of the word 'profane' (βεβηλώω) in the Gospels is in relation to a charge of Sabbath-breaking brought against Jesus (Mt 12⁵). For, though it is Our Lord Himself who employs the word, and employs it of the action of the priests under the Mosaic Law, He evidently does so with reference to an accusation of which He was the object.* And this, we must remember, was no solitary case. There was nothing that more frequently brought Jesus into hot collision with the ecclesiastical authorities than the question of Sabbath observance (with Mt 12^{1ff.} cf. v. 10^{ff.}, Mk 12^{1ff.} 22^{3ff.} 32^{ff.}, Lk 6^{1ff.} 6^{ff.} 13^{14ff.} 14^{3ff.}, Jn 5^{9ff.} 16. 18 72¹. 91^{4ff.}; note esp. the Johannine passages). In their eyes He was repeatedly guilty of a profanation of the holy day. And, though on this occasion He defends Himself by appealing to Jewish law and history, thus meeting His accusers on their own ground, He immediately passes from this argumentum ad hominem to state the great principles on which He really stood in His free, though reverent (cf. Lk 4¹⁶), use of the day—that God desires mercy rather than sacrifice (v. 7), and that 'the Son of Man is Lord of the sabbath' (v. 8). In other words, He shows that the charge of Sabbath profanation, as brought against Him, rested on a wrong conception of Sabbath sanctity; and the charge of breaking a Divine law, on an entirely false idea of God's meaning and purpose in giving the Law (cf. Mk 2²⁷ 'The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath'). There is a profanation according to the letter that is not a profanation according to the spirit; and there is a seeming transgression of the commandment that is in reality a revelation of the benignity of the Law itself and the 'philanthropy' of Him who gave it. See, further, SABBATH.

(2) Profaning the Temple.—Jealous as the Jewish authorities were, after their slavish fashion, in the guardianship of the Sabbath, they were not less jealous in defending the sanctity of the Temple against the least taint of what they regarded as profanation. The Temple police were ever on the alert. For any foot of Gentile or Samaritan to pass beyond the Court of the Gentiles meant death to the transgressor. And Josephus tells us how at one period the Samaritans were altogether excluded from the Temple enclosure because of an act of profanation committed by some of their people (Ant. XVIII. ii. 2). The indignation shown by the chief priests and scribes at the hosannas of the children in the Temple was apparently due not merely to the hailing of Jesus as the Son of David, but to the raising of those joyful shouts within the consecrated building (Mt 21¹⁶). But, as Jesus in meeting the charge of Sabbath-breaking showed how misplaced the Rabbinic and Pharisaic ideas of sanctity were, so in connexion with the Cleansing of the Temple (Mt 21^{2ff.} = Mk 11^{15ff.} = Lk 19^{45ff.}, Jn 2^{13ff.}), He showed how low and poor were their views on the subject of profanation.

The presence of the stall-keepers and cattle-drovers and money-changers was strictly within the letter of the Law, since it was in the Court of the Gentiles that this market was held, i.e. outside of the sacred area proper. For the Temple authorities this was quite enough; they had no compunctions about a traffic that was technically legal—least of all as the rents paid by the traders for the privilege of using the Temple court as a bazaar passed into their own pockets. To Jesus this was an illustration of the readiness of the Jewish leaders 'to blend religious rigorism and utter worldliness,' or, in His own words on another occasion, to 'strain out the gnat and swallow the camel' (Mt 23²⁴). Thus they had made His Father's house 'an house of merchandise' (Jn 2¹⁶); nay, a very 'den of robbers' (Mt 21¹³)—an allusion either to the greed and extortion of the high-priestly family as landlords of the enclosure, or to the shameful and notorious cheating practised by the privileged traders on the ignorant country people who came up to the Feasts. Moreover, this was 'the house of prayer' (Mt 21¹³)—the place to which pious folk came up for purposes of detachment and recollection and communion with God. And by reason of these abuses, such worshippers had first to make their way through the distracting scenes of this profane bazaar; and even as they knelt at prayer on the other side of the boundary, to have their ears filled with the noisy cries of the merchants, the bleating of innumerable sheep, and the lowing of excited cattle.

In the eyes of Jesus all this, however it might be defended by ecclesiastical lawyers, was a desecration of His Father's house, inasmuch as it was a hindrance to true spiritual worship. And the principles He lays down here on the subject of worship and its profanation are far-reaching and penetrating. The Temple at Jerusalem has long since vanished from the world, but the acts and words of Jesus in driving out the profane traffickers still find abundant application. Our Lord condemns everything that brings the spirit of the world into the atmosphere of the sanctuary, and turns the house of prayer into a house of merchandise. Much more does He condemn anything that associates His Church with methods and practices that are not even those of honest merchandise, but have the savour of dishonest gain. See, further, TEMPLE, § 'Cleansing of.'

(3) Profaning God's name.—For this form of the sin of profanation the word 'profanity' is usually reserved, a word that is to be distinguished from blasphemy (wh. see)—though the distinction is not always observed, nor, indeed, possible. Blasphemy (βλασφημία = 'evil-speaking') is an insult offered to God's majesty, and, in particular, a deliberate reviling of God and of Divine things. Profanity, on the other hand, is a taking of God's name in vain (Ex 20⁷)—understanding 'name' in the scriptural sense of 'anything whereby God maketh Himself known' (Shorter Catech., Qu. 55). Profanity may, and often does, run into blasphemy, but the word finds its proper application in an irreverent treatment of holy things without the motive of the scoffer. When Peter began 'to curse and to swear (καταθεματίζων και ὀμνῶν), I know not the man' (Mt 26⁷⁴, cf. Mk 14⁷¹), he was not guilty of intentional blasphemy; he was in reality employing the most solemn forms of Jewish asseveration (cf. Nu 5²¹ 'an oath of cursing,' and see EBi, art. 'Oath'). But he was guilty of profanity, for he was invoking the Divine name in support of a lie.

There was no kind of profanation against which the Jewish Rabbis were more anxious to guard than the sin of profane language. The hedge they made around the Law was particularly high at this point. Through a mistaken interpretation of Lv 24¹⁶ they forbade the very utterance of the name Jahweh, and so, in the reading of the OT,

* It is an interesting coincidence that in the LXX account of the incident at Nob (1 S 21⁴), to which Jesus alludes in the preceding verse, βιβλαι ἄρτοι is Ahimelech's expression for 'common bread,' as distinguished from ἄρτοι ἄρτοι or 'shew-bread.'

Adonai or Elohim was invariably substituted. Partly, no doubt, for similar reasons, there had grown up in the time of Christ a custom of swearing not by the Divine name, but by heaven or earth or Jerusalem or the Temple (Mt 5³³⁻³⁷ 23¹⁶⁻²²)—though there emerges here, alongside of the desire to avoid the use of God's name, the consideration that such oaths were less binding than those in which God was directly invoked (contrast the high priest's adjuration 'by the living God' at the trial of Jesus, Mt 26⁶³). And here again, as in His cleansing of the Temple, our Lord showed how poor and mean the thoughts of the Rabbis were on the subject of profanation. That system of diluted oaths was a miserable piece of casuistry at the best. For an oath has no meaning if it is not an invocation of the Divine Being Himself as a witness; and, besides, heaven is God's throne and the earth His footstool, Jerusalem is the city of the Great King, and the Temple the place of His indwelling (5³⁴, 23^{16ff.}). Moreover, those legal refinements lent themselves to all sorts of falsehood and deceit in the intercourse of men, and thus became a prostitution of the holiest realities to wicked ends. And so Jesus lays down the general principle, 'Swear not at all' (5³⁴). Make no distinctions among your statements by the use of a graduated scale of oaths, as if, while you are bound to be truthful in regard to some of the things you say, you are otherwise free to shade off your language into the veriest falsehood by diminishing grades of protestation. 'But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay' (Mt 5³⁷, cf. Ja 5¹²). See, further, OATHS.

PROFESSION.—In Biblical usage, to 'profess' is to make a public declaration (Mt 7²³, Dt 26³); then to take a certain stand or attitude (1 Ti 2¹⁰ 'which becometh women professing godliness'); and, lastly, to make an unjustifiable pretension or claim (Ro 1²², 1 Ti 6²¹, Tit 1¹⁶). In general, profession and confession are so closely related that one Greek word (ὁμολογέω) is employed indifferently for both; and the AV has not clearly distinguished between them. Yet they are by no means identical; for while both words imply the utterance or declaration of faith or of fact, confession invariably implies that there is harmony between what is declared and the inward thought or feeling of the speaker, while profession carries no such implication.

Thus the word 'confess' answers in the OT to דבר, which always implies the utterance of genuine faith or feeling (Hiph. = humbly and thankfully to acknowledge God's name and goodness, 1 K 8³³⁻³⁵ [LXX ἱσαλογοῦμαι]); Hithp. = contritely to confess sin, Lv 5³ 16²¹ [LXX ἱσαγορεύω]); while 'profess' answers to גיד = 'tell out,' 'declare,' 'make manifest' (it may be in the way of thankful acknowledgment, Dt 26³, or of not concealing one's sin, Ps 38¹⁸, or even of showing forth one's sin openly and impudently, Is 3⁹ 'They declare their sin as Sodom'). The difference reappears in the NT, where 'confess' is used as tr. of ἱσαλογοῦμαι, which is exactly parallel to דבר in both its senses, and also as tr. of ὁμολογέω in the specific sense of publicly owning one's relationship of faith and devotion to Christ, Mt 10³², Lk 12⁹; whereas 'profess' answers to ἐπαγγέλλομαι = to make a profession, whether sincerely or not; φάσκω = to assert or pretend; and to ὁμολογέω in the sense of making a formal declaration, or in the bad sense of making an outward pretence. Thus, while the one word has received a deep religious impress, the other is restricted to the sense of making a public declaration, a declaration which may or may not be sincere and justified by facts. The RV, in substituting 'confession' for 'profession' in the tr. of ὁμολογέω, for the owning of the Christian faith (He 3¹) or the faith which the Christian owns (4:4), has logically followed the rendering of ὁμολογέω in its specific Christian significance, and has helped to put the distinction between the two terms in clearer light.

The 'profession' of Christ or of Christianity is at once more and less than the confession of Christ. It is more than confession; for while the latter is the witness to actual faith or feeling, profession also covers all ill-grounded utterances to which there is little or nothing in the heart to correspond. And profession is also less than confession: it is limited to the verbal expression of faith, while confession gives evidence of itself in the tone and conduct of life as well. Confession shows itself in the exercise of faith as well as in the assertion of it. The distinction between profession and confession is valuable when we consider the varying emphasis laid by the Gospels on verbal testimony as an element in the confession of Christ. The duty of verbal profession is at times strongly insisted on (see CONFESION [of Christ], ii. and iii.), mainly because it was the sign of loyalty and steadfastness of faith. Yet the value of such professions depended on the occasions that called them forth, as well as on their genuineness and their seasonableness. Christ regarded them as peculiarly valuable in times of stress and growing opposition. So He prized the bold testimony of Peter at Cæsarea Philippi as being a sign of the rock-fast loyalty of His disciple (Mt 16¹⁷⁻¹⁹); so also He mourned over the later weakness of the disciples and the verbal denial of Peter, as betokening a certain diminution of their allegiance (Mk 14²⁷⁻³⁰, Lk 22³¹). At the same time, Christ repudiated many kinds of profession, and taught to His disciples a certain duty of reserve in the utterance of their faith. It goes without saying that He repudiated all insincere professions; and He knew that these were to be found not only among the Pharisees, but also among His own followers (Mt 7²² 21³⁰). He also feared the egoism of professions of goodness (Lk 18⁹⁻¹⁴), and the boldness of professions of constancy that might not be realized. Hence the coldness of His attitude to professions like that of the new disciple who said, 'Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest' (Lk 9⁵⁷⁻⁵⁸), or to Peter's hasty word, 'If I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee' (Mk 14³¹). But, further, Christ repeatedly cautioned His followers against all ill-timed testimony. As He Himself practised a certain reserve in His own teaching (Jn 16¹²), He also frequently laid upon His followers injunctions of silence. So in cases of healing He charges those who have seen or experienced His power to tell no man what He has done (Mk 3¹² 5⁴³ 7³⁶), and after the scenes at Cæsarea Philippi and on the Mount of Transfiguration the same injunction follows (8³⁰ 9⁹). No doubt there were temporary reasons for such reserve on Christ's part, and for such injunctions of reserve; and He looked forward to the time when the things He had taught and done in private should be proclaimed upon the housetops (Mt 10²⁷), and when the disciples should be so fully established in the faith that no further reserve should be necessary. But in any case Christ desired no hasty testimonies in His favour. It was as if He said: The profession of My name is not always needful: its value depends on its seasonableness, and the maturity of the faith lying behind it. Wait till the times are ripe and faith is ripe; till the private confession wells forth irresistibly from the lips; or till the crisis comes when everyone is called to proclaim his faith. There will come occasions when to refrain from declaring one's faith may be equivalent to disowning and denial, or at least to cowardice. Then those who have been confessing Christ in heart and life will also profess their faith boldly with their lips, and face all the consequences of their profession. It is then, when the day and hour are calling for a clear and living testimony, that profession becomes one with confession, and the word has fullest force: 'Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 10^{32f.}).

J. DICK FLEMING.

PROFIT.—

Two Gr. words are so rendered: (1) ὠφελεῖν, to further, help, profit: RV 'profit,' Mt 15⁵ (=Mk 7¹¹) 16²⁶ (=Mk 8³⁶, Lk 9²⁵ AV 'advantage'), Jn 6⁵³; 'prevail,' Mt 27²⁴, Jn 12¹⁹; 'be bettered,' Mk 5²⁶; (2) συμμερίζω, to bear or bring together; 'be profitable,' Mt 5^{20, 30} 18⁶; 'be expedient,' Mt 19¹⁰ (AV 'good'), Jn 11⁵⁰ 18¹⁴ 16⁷.

The address of Jesus is, for the most part, to the highest in human nature; but sometimes a less heroic note is struck, and there is direct appeal to the instinctive impulses of self-regard and self-preservation, and to the instincts of gain and the anxieties of the balance-sheet. The analogy of profitable trading gives force to the parables of the Talents and the Pounds (Mt 25^{14ff.}, Lk 19^{12ff.}), but in one great saying the appeal to what may be termed the business instincts is direct: 'What shall a man be profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and forfeit his life? or what shall a man give in exchange for his life?' Mt 16²⁶ (=Mk 8³⁶, Lk 9²⁵). Here the terms of commerce are used, and the 'balance-sheet of the soul' (Morison) is struck. With this we may compare Plato's words: 'What will anyone be profited if under the influence of honour or money or power, aye, or under the excitement of poetry, he neglect justice and virtue?' (see Jowett's Plato, iii. 505).

This weighing of advantages and gain finds its full force in Christ's doctrine of the supreme good of the Kingdom of God, the one secure treasure of unspeakable value, for the possession of which all other treasures may well be given in exchange (Mt 13⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶).

W. H. DYSON.

PROGRESS.—Christ and the essential truth of His teaching as preserved in the Gospels are entirely identified with the fact of human progress. Man's progress is a fact, a fact and not an idea, a fact, however, in which ideas are embedded and come to manifestation. This, moreover, is the greatest and most complex fact in the history of the individual and social life of humanity. It is of the highest importance, therefore, that Christ and His teaching should be set in the light of this fact; that not only His teaching, but Christ Himself should be examined and tested in this light. He and His teaching have nothing to lose, but everything to gain thereby.

1. In order to understand Christ and His teaching from the standpoint of progress, there are several historical facts as to the latter which require to be noted and kept in mind. (1) Man's history has been upon the whole a history of progress ever since he entered upon the course of his civilization. (2) But this fact does not imply that the idea of his progress in the path leading towards his destiny has been familiar to man ever since he began his career of advancement. The truth is that even at so late a date in history as the time of Christ's advent in it, the mind of pagan antiquity had nowhere been awakened to the clear consciousness that man had been pursuing, and that he had still for unknown ages to continue pursuing, a progressive destiny. The only historical instance slightly, not entirely, at variance with this general statement is the Zoroastrian theory as to the existence of good and evil, their hostile relations to each other, and the eventual subjugation and extinction of evil by the triumph of good. (3) Further, it is only within recent times that the general mind of the more advanced civilized races of mankind has become possessed by the idea and moved by the sentiment of the progressive destiny to which man is called in this world, and those men constitute a small minority who have begun in any true sense to realize the momentous importance of the meaning with which the fact of human progress is charged. (4) Again, it is of consequence to state expressly what is implied in the general truth just indicated, that neither the fact nor the importance of the fact of human progress, in any true sense of the word, was admitted for many centuries to a place of recognition in the ecclesiastical and theological developments of traditional Christianity; and this remark is true even of Augustine's Civitas Dei.

These facts, then, seem to encourage the conclusion, which is too often, but most unfairly, adopted, that Christ concerned Himself very little, if at all, with the fact of human progress on the earth, and that His teaching sheds little or no light upon this subject, which in reality is—as the modern mind has begun to see—a subject of urgent importance for every man and for the whole human race. But this conclusion is groundless. For in the Gospels there is abundance of evidence not only to show that the fact of man's progressive destiny had due recognition paid to it by Christ Himself and in His teaching, but also to make it manifest that in Himself and in His teaching there is a revelation of all the essential principles of human progress, and also an adequate provision of the moral conditions necessary to bring these principles to realization in the individual and social life and destiny of humanity.

2. But at this point notice requires to be taken of two other historical facts with which the position of Christ and His teaching came inevitably into immediate and important relations. First, the Jewish people occupied a unique and pre-eminent place among all the peoples of antiquity as regards the fact of human progress. Among them there had been developed, many centuries prior to Christ's time, ideas and sentiments, aspirations and hopes relative to the progressive destiny of mankind, which were entirely phenomenal, and which possessed immense value, partly because in many points they were highly enlightened, partly because of their profound moral significance, and partly because of the service they rendered in the preparation of the way for the new, progressive era to be ushered into the life of humanity by Christ's advent (e.g. Gn 22¹⁵⁻¹⁸, Is 2²⁻⁵ 10¹⁻⁹ 42¹⁻¹¹ 62, 65¹⁷⁻²⁶, Jer 31²⁷⁻³⁴, Ezk 36²²⁻²⁸, Mic 4¹⁻⁴, Ps 67, 72, 102¹³⁻²² 145¹⁻¹³). The people of Israel, as the passages referred to show, conceived of their own 'golden age' and that of the Gentile peoples as lying not behind but ahead of them in the less or more distant future, and they were the first people in whose mind this idea shaped and rooted itself. In this outlook of theirs on the future all those elements which formed their general idea of the fact of progress came into play. What those elements were need not be stated here. But one other word may be added, viz., that if conditions had favoured the free and full development of all the ideas of progress and of all the progressive sentiments and strivings to which the worthiest leaders and teachers of the nation had attained in the noontide of the prophetic age, and if this development had continued until the fulness of the times had arrived for Christ's appearance, two things would have happened: the task of His Mission, on the one hand, would have been immensely lightened; and, on the other, the task of Christianity in evolving the moral progress of mankind would have been less difficult, and its success greatly accelerated.

But, secondly, the progressive developments in the earlier stages of the nation's history had an arrest put upon them in various directions, and that while they were still immature. When Christ appeared, He found that the religion of Israel, transformed into Judaism, had departed from the path of progress and committed itself to the position of finality. The religion of the Prophets, which in its ideas, sentiments, and strivings had begun to cross the boundaries of exclusive nationality, had been changed, as a system of law, as a method of Divine worship and service, as a way of salvation, and as a political ideal, into a narrow, rigid, national institution; and this institution, it was claimed, had a right to exist throughout all ages, although it was, in effect, a wall of separation not only between Jews and Gentiles, but also between the latter and God.

It was in these circumstances, then, that Christ appeared to reveal the principles of progress and to become a moral power making for their perfect realization in the life and destiny of man. And towards the two facts thus indicated He had necessarily to relate Himself, His teaching, and, indeed, His entire work and influence. Towards the first fact and the progressive elements and tendencies, He took up an attitude of appreciation and sympathy, and made it His aim and endeavour to promote their development to higher and wider forms of realization. Towards Judaism, on the other hand, so far as its anti-progressive vices were concerned, He took up what He knew would prove to be eventually an attitude of effective reaction. It is evident, however, that the finality which Judaism claimed for itself must have rendered it necessary for Him to put some restrictions on Himself as to His method of communicating and developing His ideas on the subject of progress. For any outspoken and persistent attack on Judaism on the point in question would have been sure to arouse against Him overwhelming opposition, as is manifest from what happened to Stephen the proto-martyr. This may have been one of His reasons for His persistent non-interference as a teacher either with the nature or the administration of any of the civil or political institutions that He found existing in Palestine, or knew to exist in the Roman Empire generally.

But He had another, a deeper, a much farther-reaching reason for silently letting civil and political institutions alone. It was not that He was indifferent to them, or that He considered them as not belonging to the nature and objects of His mission as the Saviour of the world. The civil and political state of society as He knew it was a matter of profound and sorrowful interest to Him (Mt 9³⁶ 20²⁵). He must have been quite aware of the fact that the renewal of the civil and political life of mankind was needed everywhere in the existing civilized as well as uncivilized world. He was fully conscious of the fact that His own perfect self-devotion to the service of God and man endangered His life, and would bring Him to His cross to a large extent because of the vices of the civil and political condition of things under which He conducted His ministry (Mt 20¹⁷⁻¹⁹, Jn 18²⁸⁻¹⁹¹⁶). He also anticipated the fact that the continuance of this evil order of things, after He was gone, would involve His servants and His cause in suffering (Mt 24¹⁻¹³).

Lastly, He never uttered a word to indicate directly and explicitly that He entertained any hope of the regeneration of the civil, or political, or economical conditions and organizations of human society. Why was this? Why did He keep Himself so entirely and persistently aloof from these and all other great interests of a kindred nature pertaining to the external relationships and well-being of human life, declining to interfere with them even when requested to do so? (Lk 12¹³⁻¹⁴, Mt 22¹⁷⁻²²). He assumed and maintained this attitude because of the perfect understanding He had of the necessary conditions and requirements of human progress in every one of its departments. He had to consider what it was possible and what it was impossible for Him to accomplish during the short period of His lifetime on earth. In doing this He had to keep in view the existing state of society in all the various developments of its life at the time. And He must have known, as any one knowing and correctly interpreting the facts can see was actually the case, that if He had attempted to initiate or to achieve a reformation within any of the domains of human life in question, the result would inevitably have proved worse than useless for Himself and His cause, and for humanity. Knowing this, moreover, He, in the exercise of marvellous faith and patience, left, meanwhile, the renewal of man's social life in all its diversified forms of manifestation, in the hands, and to the times and ways, of God as the moral Governor of the world. For the time being He devoted Himself wholly and exclusively to the moral task which His Father had given Him to do; and in doing this, and doing it successfully, He rendered to the cause of human progress a service which will never cease increasing the glory of His name.

3. All that has been said makes it easy to show now how Christ Himself, His teaching, and, indeed, the whole of His work on earth and in heaven, can be explained in terms of progress. This explanation was adopted in effect and often used by Himself. So true is this that a great deal of His teaching—the most of it, indeed, when properly understood—can be construed into a theory of what is meant by the progress of humanity,—a theory never stated by Himself in abstract terms, but embodied in the general order of ideas that found such diversified forms of expression in His teaching. Briefly, the theory in question was this—(1) His teaching was all related to the cardinal facts of the moral nature of God and the moral nature of man. (2) A great deal of His teaching was concerned with the moral relations between God and men and between man and man. (3) In His teaching He dwelt much upon the inward and direct moral relations of men to God, which in every instance are relations of men to Him as individuals. For it is only in the individual that the moral conditions exist which make inward and direct relations of God to men possible. And this must have been one of Christ's reasons for the immense importance and value that He attached to men as individuals. (4) He also dwelt much on the subject of the rectifying and the perfecting of the moral relations of men to God and to one another. (5) He announced, and often alluded to and explained in various ways and connexions, the fact that it was His predestined task as man's Saviour to occupy the position and to exercise the function of Mediator within the sphere of the moral relations of God to men, and of men to Him and to one another. Though He never used the word 'Mediator' in this connexion, He often spoke of His relation to God and men in expressions meaning the same thing. And He taught also that His work of mediation would be continued after His work on earth had been finished (e.g. Mt 11²⁷ 28¹⁸⁻²⁰, Jn 14-17). (6) It was within the domain of the order of these great facts and ideas, which are all of an essentially moral nature, that Christ conceived the fundamental need of human progress as lying. Here also He saw the essential nature of the progress needed, and found the grounds on which to His mind man's progress was guaranteed. (7) But it was not Christ's idea that the progressive realization of these moral facts and ideas would come to manifestation only within the invisible moral sphere of the individual and social life of mankind. He cherished the certain conviction and hope that they would come gradually, in the course of their realization, to manifestation in the regeneration of all the various external relations of men to one another in the conditions, organizations, and activities of their social life. (8) He was fully persuaded that the course of human progress, such as He conceived its nature to be and the conditions on which it would proceed in the individual and social life of humanity, would strictly and persistently follow the laws of evolution. It may be added, finally, that it is within the region of these facts that the greatness of the extent of Christ's originality as a teacher is to be seen, and also the momentousness of the position and task He claimed for Himself as Mediator between God and men.

4. But did Christ's teaching as to human progress actually follow the lines just indicated? It did. In Mt 5¹⁷ He identified His position in history and His work with the essentially moral nature, and with the cause and the evolution of the progress of the individual and social life of humanity. That in the Law and the Prophets which had supreme interest and value for Him, was the nature and the extent of the revelation they contained of the will and purpose of God with reference to the moral relations between God and men and between one man and another, and with reference to the historical development of human destiny. He saw that this revelation was very incomplete and imperfect. And in strict accordance with the Law of Continuity, which is one of the greatest laws of evolution and of human progress, He sympathetically put Himself and His work in direct organic relations with it, in order to complete and perfect the revelation of the Divine will and purpose to mankind, and in order so to mediate, by means of His moral power, the moral relations of men to God and to one another, that the Divine will and purpose would eventually attain to full and universal realization in their life and destiny. And so, when He said He had come not to destroy the Law and the Prophets, but to fulfil, He must have had the thought in His mind that the fulfilling in question, and His task in achieving it, would be continued after the work of His earthly ministry was done. In Mt 6^{9, 10} His mind is to be seen moving within the order of the same ideas and facts: 'Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.' These words of prayer, as Christ understood them, are rooted in the truth of the moral nature of God and of man, and of the moral relations of God to men, and of men to Him and to each other. They imply that the sphere of the direct and inward moral relations of men to God and to one another in Him is the essential domain of God's Kingdom on the earth. They imply that the Kingdom of God on earth is predestined to arrive at universal realization in the individual and social life of mankind, and that pervasively, so that the Divine will and purpose will be manifested in all the external forms of man's existence and activities. They imply that this consummation will be reached by a progressive process of historical development; for the Kingdom of God is an order of things that is coming. And they imply that the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man will be the supreme governmental principles in the perfected conditions of human existence, which Christ hoped would be ushered in in answer to His prayer.

But these were not the only forms in which Christ expressed His great and rich order of ideas as to human progress. Man's progress is evolved in the course of his history, and nothing is more wonderful or beautiful than the parabolic forms in which Christ embodied His ideas as to the various phases that human progress assumes in the history of its evolution. (1) The gradual realization of God's will and purpose in the lives of men as individuals is everywhere and always the basis of moral progress in the social life and history of humanity; and therefore our Lord—no doubt designedly—illustrated the evolution of the Kingdom of God in its relation to the individual's heart and life in His first parable, that of the Sower (Mt 13^{1-8, 18-23}).—(2) The progressive realization of the will and purpose of God in the moral relations of men to Him and to one another in the various social forms and manifestations of life may be conceived as a fact, which indeed it is, without taking into consideration the entanglements and dangers in which the process is involved from the existence in the world of moral evil. As so conceived, the evolution of man's moral progress is destined gradually and surely to attain to complete and manifest realization in the Kingdom of God. It was from this point of view that our Lord illustrated His ideas of human progress in His parable of the Seed Growing Secretly (Mk 4²⁶⁻²⁹).—(3) But the progressive fulfilment of God's will and purpose in the history of man's social life and destiny may also be conceived as a process of historical evolution, and as actually entangled and endangered, which is the case, by the presence and developments of moral evil in the individual and social life of men. As thus conceived, then, the history of man's social progress towards the perfect and universal realization of God's will and purpose has the character of a conflict between moral good and moral evil. But this conflict, at every stage and in every section of its history, is presided over by the moral government of God, and is certain under His judgment to issue in a final crisis in which evil will be entirely and for ever separated from good, and in which righteousness will reign universally in the relations of men to God and to one another in His Kingdom. From these points of view also our Lord contemplated the evolution of human progress; and He so couched His ideas on the subject in His parable of the Wheat and the Tares (Mt 13^{24-30, 37-43}).—(4) Again, the history of man's moral progress starts from a very small and simple beginning, and eventually develops into a result of vast dimensions and great complexity. This fact as to man's progress our Lord likewise fully realized, and He expressed His sense of its truth and value in His parable of the Mustard-seed (Mt 13^{31, 32}).—(5) Finally, the end of moral progress in the life and history of humanity will be a destiny in which every department of its individual and social life, external as well as internal, will be interpenetrated and regulated by the will and purpose of God as perfectly realized and manifested in a universal and established order of righteousness and love. Could it be anything else than this that our Lord meant by His parable of the Leaven and the three measures of meal? (Mt 13³³).

Thus it becomes manifest that our Lord's teaching embodied a philosophy of human history and progress. In this point of view His teaching was absolutely original. Nor can it ever be superseded. His ideas of human progress and His faith in it are a large part of essential Christianity. This part of His gospel is urgently needed by the present age. And multitudes are waiting to welcome it as a message from Him as the world's Saviour.

PROMISE.—The NT is full of the idea that in Christ had arrived the fulfilment of a promise made over and over again in preceding ages. The gospel is regarded by all the writers not as an event unexpected and unprepared for, but as the due and natural sequel and climax of God's dealings from of old. The εὐαγγέλιον is the fulfilment of the ἐπαγγελία. It was, indeed, the strength with which this idea was rooted in the mind of the Jew ('whose is the adoption and the glory and . . . the promises,' Ro 9⁴) that made it so hard for him to understand how the Gentile could come within the full scope of the gospel. How could the 'dogs' share equally with the 'children' (Mt 15²⁶ = Mk 7²⁷)? How could the uncovenanted and uncircumcised be 'heirs according to the promise' (Gal 3²⁹)? Whole passages, therefore, in some of the Epistles (esp. Rom., Gal., Heb.) have to be devoted to showing that the implication of the promise was vaster than any of the forms in which it had been conveyed. There is no literature which is so saturated with the spirit of anticipation as the Hebrew, no nation which has cherished so ardent and irrepressible a belief in its destiny,—'a people who were looking forwards from a great Past of Wonders to a Future of Good and Glory' (Mason, *Heb. Gram.*² p. 98). It is in the NT, however, that this note of anticipation becomes dominant. Anticipation, indeed, here gives place to realization. While the NT contains several passages which show kinship with current Apocalyptic literature and its eschatology, and indicate a lingering belief in the mind of the writer that the fulfilment of the promises lies still in the future, the unmistakably prevalent thought of the writers is that in the work of Christ they have already seen the promises fulfilled. The Evangelic records exhibit, each in its own way, the consciousness that Israel's hopes had found their fulfilment in Christ; and, sober and restrained as is the narrative, one can hardly miss in it the note of jubilant realization. Mt. loses no opportunity of showing that what happened to Jesus was in accordance with ancient prophecy; Mk., while seldom citing Scripture, describes Jesus as beginning His ministry with the declaration 'The time is fulfilled' (1¹⁵); Lk. commences and concludes his Gospel with episodes (145-55. 67-69 225-38 2425-28. 44-47) intended to show how men saw, or failed to see, in Jesus the Christ foreshadowed in the Scriptures, and Jn. (5⁸⁹) quotes Jesus as stating that the Scriptures bear witness to Him, and notes (12^{16. 41} etc.) how the reception of Jesus answered to the sayings of the prophets.

It was this aspect of Christ's appearance—as the fulfilment of an eagerly awaited promise—that occupied most room in the earliest preaching of the gospel. See Stephen's speech (Ac 7), Peter's (214-36 and 1034-43), Paul's (13³² 'We bring you good tidings of the promise made unto the fathers,' and 26⁶). The main line of address taken by the early preachers was always to prove that Jesus was the Christ (9²² 17^{2. 3} 18^{5. 28}).

It is to be noticed, however, that Jesus Himself in His public preaching seldom, if ever, adopted this line of appeal. Not even in His more private teaching does He appear to have attached importance to it. When, e.g., John the Baptist definitely inquired 'Art thou he that cometh?' (Mt 11²⁻¹⁹, Lk 7¹⁹⁻²³), Jesus deliberately appealed not to the correspondence between Himself and the expectations formed of the promised Messiah, but to the effect being at the moment produced by His ministry. When the same question was being discussed between Himself and His disciples (Mt 16¹³⁻¹⁶ = Mk 8²⁷⁻²⁹ = Lk 9¹⁸⁻²⁰), Jesus was not concerned so much about their identifying Him with the One who was to come, by means of signs and tokens which were expected to accompany His coming, as that the conviction should come in an inward and secret way ('Flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father which is in heaven,' Mt 16¹⁷). He objected to being proclaimed as the Christ, not simply because He knew that the people, when persuaded of this, would seek to make Him a king and expect Him to use temporal resources, but because the very tenacity with which His countrymen clung to their stereotyped notions of the promised Messiah would prevent them from gaining a true understanding of the scope and purpose of His mission. He had a sublime contempt for the petty and pedantic way in which the scribes took upon themselves to say how the anticipations of Scripture were, or were not, to be verified, and held their pretensions up to scorn (Mt 22⁴¹⁻⁴⁶ = Mk 12³⁵⁻³⁷ = Lk 20⁴¹⁻⁴⁴). It was, in short, because His mind was so filled with the larger purpose of God that He assigned little weight to the recognition of that local and national theory which had so much more of patriotic bias and ambitious desire in it than of pure love of humanity. And it was precisely because the priests and scribes, in their blind attachment to their own interpretation of the promise, saw, in His comparative carelessness about the traditional view and His frequent insistence upon a purely spiritual interpretation, a danger to their own designs, that they resolved upon His death.

It is true, of course, that Jesus commonly used one term at least which in the current phraseology of the time was closely associated with the temporal and literally-understood fulfilment of the 'promise.' He constantly proclaimed the advent of the Kingdom of heaven or the Kingdom of God. But whatever critical view be held of the records, and leaving undecided the question whether Mt 24 and other similar passages which contain a considerable eschatological element are to be taken as representing a part of the actual teaching of Jesus, or rather His teaching as coloured by passing through minds steeped in the ideas of Jewish eschatology, it is sufficiently evident that Jesus habitually used the expression 'Kingdom of heaven' in a different sense from the ordinary and popular one, and preferred to divest it of the usual patriotic and eschatological associations. The locus classicus is the Sermon on the Mount beginning with the Beatitudes, 'Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' The 'promise,' as Jesus gives it here in sevenfold form, is a promise to the spiritually-minded of a spiritual grace, having no reference whatever to Messianic considerations, and this holds good even if the alternative form in which the Beatitudes are given in Lk. is held to be the earlier. Jesus, in the most royal and absolute fashion, gave assurances to His disciples, but these, in the Synoptics hardly less than in the Fourth Gospel, are assurances not of any kind of material benefit, but of spiritual grace, e.g. 'Thy Father which seeth in secret shall recompense thee' (Mt 6⁴ also vv. 6, 19); 'He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it' (Mt 10³⁹ 16²⁹); 'I will give you rest,' and 'Ye shall find rest to your souls' (Mt 11^{28. 29}); 'I will make you fishers of men' (Mk 1¹⁷, cf. Lk 5¹⁰); 'Your reward shall be great, and ye shall be sons of the Most High' (Lk 6³⁵); 'Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free' (Jn 8³²).

It is true, of course, that there are some passages in which the assurance of blessing includes material benefit: e.g. 'All these things (i.e. food, clothing, etc.) shall be added unto you' (Mt 6³³); the reply to Peter that those who for Christ's sake have forsaken earthly advantage 'shall receive a hundredfold, now in this time, houses,' etc. (Mk 10³⁰ = Lk 18²⁹ = Mt 19²⁹); but the very connexion in which such passages occur shows in each case that Jesus attaches importance only to the spiritual blessing; better forego all earthly profit whatever than miss this (Mt 10³⁹ 16^{25, 26}, Lk 12^{20, 21}). Anything like requests for a promise of personal advantage He sternly discourages (Mt 20²⁰⁻²³ = Mk 10³⁵⁻⁴⁵).

Generally the promises of Jesus to His disciples may be classified as follows: (a) particular assurances to individuals: to the thief on the cross (Lk 23⁴³), to the woman in the house of Simon the Leper (Mt 26¹³ = Mk 14⁹), to Nathanael (Jn 1⁵¹), to Peter (Mt 16¹⁸ = Mk 9¹ = Lk 9²⁷, cf. Mt 18¹⁸), to Peter again (Jn 13⁷ and v. ³⁶), also Mk 9¹ = Lk 9²⁷; (b) assurances about the prevailing nature of prayer and the power of faith (Mt 7⁷ 18¹⁹, Jn 14^{13, 14}, Mt 17²⁶ 21^{21, 22}, Mk 11^{23, 24}, Mt 18¹⁸); (c) assurances of His continued presence and of their support and ultimate triumph (Mt 10¹⁹ = Lk 12¹², Mt 28²⁰ [Mk 16^{17, 18}], Mt 10^{32, 39, 42} 13⁴³ 16²⁵ 19²⁸, Lk 6³⁸, Jn 6^{40, 44, 54} 8⁵¹ 11²⁵ 14²² 16²⁰). It is to promises of this kind that James refers in 1¹² 'the crown of life which the Lord promised to them that love him,' and in 2⁵ 'heirs of the kingdom which he promised to them that love him' (cf. 1 Jn 2²⁵); (d) the outstanding promise, however, is that of the Holy Spirit, and this is the one promise which is most explicitly recorded as made to the disciples (Jn 14^{16, 26} 15²⁶ 16¹³ etc.), and is directly recalled at the foundation of the Christian Church: 'He charged them . . . to wait for the promise of the Father, which, said he, ye heard from me' (Ac 1⁴, cf. 2³³). And this promise may be said practically to include and interpret almost all the foregoing.

PROPERTY.—Under this title two questions arise: (1) Is the possession of private property right according to the principles of the teaching and example of Jesus? (2) In what ways is a follower of Jesus to acquire and to use his property? These questions touch one another when it is suggested that a Christian should give away all his property and not seek to gain any more. They may, however, be kept distinct, and the second discussed on the assumption that the possession of private property is justifiable.

1. A very large section of a man's interest is connected with his possessions. Therefore, inevitably, the teaching and example of Jesus have an important bearing upon the question of property. And further, inasmuch as He gave to men a very different ideal of character and conduct from that of the world, it is to be expected that in regard to property His teaching will show marked divergence from the prevailing worldly view. But it is not therefore to be assumed that the authority of Jesus can be claimed for the socialistic view of property, which may be called the direct negative of the ordinary view which men hold. The question to be settled is—May we infer from the teaching and example of Jesus that the private ownership of property is unjustifiable? The relation of the teaching and example of Jesus to modern Socialism opens up a wide field for discussion, and this is seriously complicated by the difficulty of defining Socialism and disentangling it, as a clear economic theory, from the general revolt against the hardships of poverty and the tyranny of riches, from which it springs, and which is reflected in the generous literature and thought of all ages and countries.

The first point to make clear is that this revolt was certainly present among the Jews, and has left distinct traces in the OT (Is 5⁸) and also in the extra-canonical Jewish literature. 'There came to exist among them what has been called a "genius for hatred" of the rich' (Peabody, Jesus Christ and the Social Question, p. 206). The popular view among the Jews was that godliness invariably resulted in prosperity; and one of their problems was the prosperity of the ungodly and the adversity of the pious. This problem was exceptionally acute in our Lord's day, through the dominance of the Romans, and the wealth of the publicans acquired by their faithlessness to the national cause. Thus precisely the condition from which modern Socialism springs was present. And not only so, but a well-defined socialistic experiment was being made by the Essenes, among whom 'the strongest tie by which the members were united was absolute community of goods' (Schiirer, HJP, II. ii. 195). It has been maintained that the teaching of Jesus was greatly influenced by that of the Essenes. But as Essenism was 'in the first place merely Pharisaism in the superlative degree' (Schiirer, l.c. p. 210), whatever other elements entered into it, this view must be given up (Lightfoot, Col. 397 ff.). However, from the popular feeling about the rich, and the existence of the Essenes as a socialistic community, we may gather that the way was quite open for Jesus to adopt the doctrines of Communism; and the argument that in His teaching we find the seed of Socialism, which only required conditions of thought and life such as are found in modern times to become fully matured, is not justified.

This is the view of the matter which representative Socialists take. As a general rule, Socialists are opposed to the Christian faith, and recognize in it a basis for the present organization of society and a hindrance to the change they desire to see brought about (for citations, see Peabody, op. cit. p. 15). They quote with approval the sayings of Jesus about the blessedness of the poor and the woes of the rich, but they realize distinctly that the basis of His thought is fundamentally different from theirs. The special ground of objection on the part of Socialists to the Christian religion is its teaching as to the future, which they regard as having diverted the moral enthusiasm of religious people from the present to the 'other' world. Some, no doubt, hold that this emphasis on the future is due to the corruption of the pure teaching of Jesus, and so are ready to claim His authority for their views. But even if the contrast between present and future in the teaching of Jesus could be adjusted to the satisfaction of the Socialists, it leaves the contrast between outward circumstance and inward character, in regard to which there is a vital and all-embracing distinction between the principles of Jesus and Socialism. The phenomenon, however, of what is known as Christian Socialism has to be noted. The fierce competition of modern industrial and commercial life, with the cruelties it produces, cannot be accepted as desirable by any man of sensitive Christian convictions. And, moreover, the great hold which Socialism has taken of multitudes, and the fact that it becomes to them the only religion they feel any need of, have led Christians to desire that its influence should be exerted on the side of the Church. The Christian Socialists in England (Maurice and Kingsley) were influenced mainly by the first consideration, and were enthusiastic supporters of the Co-operative movement. The second consideration, as might be expected, appealed more especially to Roman Catholics, who are represented by Abbé Lamennais; Baron von Ketteler, Archb. of Mayence; and Count de Nurn. In Germany, among Protestants, Christian Socialism has been represented by Victor Huber and Pastor Stöcker. The views of those who may be regarded as entitled to the name Christian Socialists cannot be thought of as an isolated fact. They have been partly the result and partly the cause of a general shifting of the centre of interest from the sphere of doctrinal theology to that of practical teaching. The theological literature of the last 50 years has been largely occupied with the application of the teaching of Jesus to the practical problems of life, and many have held that there is nothing in the Christian faith which is antagonistic to Socialism as an economic theory. But with some exceptions it is agreed that Jesus did not lay down any economic theory of the State, and indeed deliberately refused to take advantage of openings in this direction which He received (Mt 22¹⁵⁻²² 17²⁴⁻²⁷, Lk 12¹³⁻²¹). 'To speak of the economics of the New Testament is in my opinion as impossible as to speak of its dietetics (Ac 15²⁰⁻²⁹), its hermeneutics (I Co 9⁴⁻¹⁰), its astronomy (Mt 2^{9, 24, 29}), or its meteorology (Mt 16²³, Lk 12^{24, 25})'—(H. Holtzmann, Die ersten Christen und die soziale Frage).

Before the actual teaching and example of Jesus on the subject are analyzed, it is desirable to consider how far the glimpses we receive in the Acts of the Apostles of the social life of the first Christians at Jerusalem form an authoritative commentary upon them. We read that 'all that believed were together, and had all things common' (Ac 2⁴). And again, 'neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common' (4³², cf. also 2⁴⁵ 4^{34, 37}). It is worthy of remark that these statements are from the pen of the author of the Third Gospel, in which the sayings of Jesus about the rich and the poor are given in their most uncompromising form (cf. Lk 6²⁰, Mt 5³). We may therefore suppose that the communistic aspect of the life of the church at Jerusalem has received full attention in the Book of Acts, and that no inference which goes in the least beyond the statements of that book is justified.*

A careful scrutiny of the relevant passages of the Book of Acts shows that: (1) the condition which prevailed in Jerusalem did not continue; (2) the churches organized by St. Paul (whose companion St. Luke was) show no trace of the community of goods, nor is any condemnation expressed because of this; (3) those who had houses and lands sold them; (4) Peter in what he said to Ananias (Ac 5⁴) clearly indicated that the right to private property was not questioned ('Whiles it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power?'). No theory, therefore, can be established on the basis of what we find prevailing among the first Christians in Jerusalem. We must rather suppose that in the special circumstances of that church an exceptional condition in relation to property was produced.

An analysis of the teaching and example of Jesus brings out quite clearly that the denial of a right to the possession of private property cannot be extracted from them. It is true that many strong statements are found in the Gospels as to the disadvantages of riches, and that the poor are represented as having a special interest in the Kingdom of God (Mt 6¹⁹, Lk 18²², Mk 10²³, Lk 6²⁰⁻²⁴ 12¹⁵, Mt 6²⁴ 19²⁴ 11⁵). Far-reaching deductions have been drawn from these in condemnation of the prevailing industrial order. And their spirit is manifestly very different from that which the modern industrial and commercial struggle tends to produce. But their full force can be realized in connexion with the common effect of riches upon character, and they do not involve any condemnation of the possession of private property. It is to be remembered, too, in connexion with this, that no single statement of our Lord can be wisely taken by itself and pressed to the extreme conclusion logically possible. This is to forget His method of teaching, which aimed 'at the greatest clearness in the briefest compass' (Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. p. 130). 'One who proposes to follow literally the specific commands of Jesus finds himself immediately plunged into contradictions and absurdities. He accepts the teaching of Jesus concerning non-resistance, "to him that smiteth thee on one cheek offer also the other," but soon he hears this same counsellor of peace bid His friends sell their garments "and buy a sword"' (Peabody, ch. i.).

We must therefore set over against the words of Jesus in which He seems to condemn the possession of riches, facts and sayings which forbid any communistic conclusion being drawn from them. Thus Jesus and His disciples had a fund for their common necessities (Jn 13⁴). Moreover, the disciples owned boats and nets, to which they returned after the crucifixion (Jn 21^{9ff.}). Peter's house appears to have been the headquarters of Jesus at Capernaum (Mk 1²⁹ 2¹). There is no condemnation of the settled life which Martha, Mary, and Lazarus lived at Bethany (Lk 10^{38ff.}, Jn 12^{1ff.}). Zacchæus, who was a rich man, was not asked to give away all that he had, but rather commended for giving a portion (Lk 19¹⁻⁹). Mary's action in 'wasting' the costly cruse of ointment (Mt 26¹²) was justified and praised. The centurion who had built a synagogue for the Jews in Capernaum (Lk 7¹⁻¹⁰) received the highest praise, but nothing was said about his wealth, evidently considerable. Nicodemus must have been a man of substance, but no question of his relation to his property was raised (Jn 3¹⁻²¹). Again, some force must be allowed to the fact that in several of the parables (Lk 19¹², Mt 21³³) Jesus used the rights which men have over their property to illustrate the duty which all owe to God. This argument cannot be pressed too far, but still such illustrations would be practically impossible to one who held that the possession of private property, with the power it gives over others, is wrong.

2. On the assumption, then, that Jesus does not condemn the possession of private property, it remains to discuss the place which property is to hold in the life of a Christian, and the use which he is to make of what he owns. The ruling consideration in this discussion is that Jesus in His teaching looks not so much to the circumstances of men's lives as to the kind of men they are and may become. His teaching, therefore, about property must be considered in relation to the effects of its acquisition and use upon character. In regard to the acquisition of property, the teaching of Jesus is directed against that greedy temper of mind in which worldly advantage is regarded as of supreme importance, and a man's wealth as the sole criterion of his worth. He also condemns dishonesty and oppression in the acquisition of wealth, which spring from this temper (Mt 23¹⁴, Mk 12⁴⁰, Lk 20⁴⁷). He warns men against covetousness on the ground that 'a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth' (Lk 12¹⁵). He calls the man a fool who had much goods laid up for many years, and was not rich towards God (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹). He condemns over-care about making provision for the necessities of this life (Lk 12²²⁻³⁴, Mt 6¹⁹⁻³⁴). And He declares that 'whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, the same shall save it' (Mk 8³⁵, Mt 10³⁹ 16²⁵, Lk 9²⁴). Thus it is clear that Jesus expects His followers to cultivate a spirit of aloofness and independence in relation to the world and its wealth.

The duty of work and of making provision for worldly needs by work may be clearly inferred from the teaching and example of Jesus, though it is not specifically inculcated. He laboured as a carpenter in Nazareth (Mk 6³, cf. Mt 13⁵⁵). In the miracle of the miraculous draught of fishes (Lk 5¹⁻⁶, Jn 21⁶) He set His seal of approval upon the industry of the disciples. In some of the parables the duty of faithfulness in secular pursuits is plainly taught (e.g. Lk 16¹⁻¹¹). This may also be inferred from the words of Mt 6⁵⁰⁻⁵⁴. If the fowls of the air are provided for and the lilies of the field are arrayed in glory in the way of their nature through the providence of God, so also will men be provided for in the way of their nature, which is declared in the words, 'In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread' (Gn 3¹⁹). Again, the necessity of providing for those dependent upon us is no remote inference from Lk 11¹³, Mt 15² and Mk 7¹¹. For the willingness of a father to give bread to his son is taken as an illustration of the willingness of God to hear and answer the prayers of His people. And the method adopted by the Pharisees to escape the practical force of the Fifth Commandment is sternly rebuked (Mt 15³⁻⁶ || Mk 7⁶⁻¹³).

About the use of property the teaching of Jesus is very full. In the first place, men are to realize that they are stewards of what they possess rather than its owners (Mt 24⁴⁵⁻⁵⁷ 25¹⁴⁻²⁰, Lk 19¹¹⁻²⁷). They are to use their property, therefore, for the glory of God and the good of men, themselves and others. In relation to the true good of the owners, the danger of riches is very clearly and constantly insisted upon (Mk 10²³⁻²⁷, Mt 6¹⁹⁻²⁴ 13²², Lk 18²⁴ 6³⁰⁻²⁴ 16¹⁹⁻³¹ 12¹⁵ 18¹⁴⁻²⁵ 12²¹ 16¹¹). From these passages it is clear that the tendency of riches is to hinder spiritual wellbeing. To avoid this, the renunciation of wealth is required (Lk 14³³, Mt 19²⁹, Lk 5¹¹, Mt 18¹⁹⁻²², Lk 6⁵⁸⁻⁶²). This renunciation of wealth is a general command holding for all who would be followers of Jesus, but it receives special emphasis in regard to the rich from the way in which the young ruler who had great possessions was dealt with. That the alienation of wealth is involved of necessity in its renunciation cannot be maintained in view of considerations formerly advanced, but, on the other hand, these considerations by no means preclude it in special circumstances (Lk 9⁵⁸⁻⁶²). The way in which renunciation is to be given effect to depends upon the circumstances of each case, and is a matter for the conscience of each individual.

Apart from the general use which a follower of Jesus is to make of all his property, which is to be determined in relation to his own spiritual welfare and that of others, he is called upon also to give (alienate) a portion of his possessions to the poor and to the support of religion. These two directions for giving were fully recognized among the Jews. And so we find that although specific injunctions as to the duty of giving are not wanting in the teaching of Jesus, it is more with the spirit in which this duty is discharged that His sayings are concerned. He definitely commands the duty of giving to the poor (Mt 5⁴², Lk 6³⁸, Mt 19²¹, Lk 18²²). We see that He and His disciples were accustomed to give alms (Jn 13²⁹). The parable of the Good Samaritan, again, is the charter of the Church for all the benevolent work of hospitals, infirmaries, etc. (Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁶). Such giving, however, is never to be formal and impersonal, an easy way of satisfying a fugitive emotion of pity. It is the service done rather than the gift made, which is emphasized in the parable of the Good Samaritan. Again, almsgiving is not to be ostentatious (Mt 6¹⁻⁴), nor are gifts to be made in the expectation of a return (Lk 14¹²⁻¹⁴). The measure of giving is to be generous (Mt 10⁸), and response to a claim is to be ready and ungrudging (Lk 11⁵⁻⁸), and is to be regulated by no consideration but that of need (Lk 10³⁰⁻³⁶, Mt 5⁴²⁻⁴⁸).

In regard to giving to the support of religion, the teaching of Jesus must be considered in relation to the ordinance of the law which required a tithe. He does not commend any definite portion of a man's possessions as that which he should devote to religious objects. His teaching in this matter, as in all others, deals with the spirit in which gifts are made rather than the law which regulates their amount. He condemns the ostentation of the Pharisees in their gifts (Mk 12⁴², Lk 21³), and also their idea that a gift to the Temple is acceptable to God from those who are neglecting the weightier matters of the Law (Mt 23²³⁻²⁶ 6^{23, 24}, Lk 18⁹⁻¹⁴). But He is very far from condemning the giving of a tithe (Mt 23²³), and suggests rather that this is not sufficient (Lk 21²). He distinctly commands giving to God (Mt 22²¹), and by the way in which Mary's devotion (Mt 26¹²) was received we are warned against any narrow utilitarian view of the objects covered by this phrase. ANDREW N. BOGLE.

PROPHET.—I. The Messiah a prophet.—1. Our Lord's redemptive work is usually divided into the threefold—prophetic, priestly, and kingly functions; and for this there is ancient precedent. Eusebius (HE i. 3) speaks of Him as 'the only High Priest of all men, the only King of all creation, and the Father's only supreme Prophet of prophets' (see also Ambrose on Ps 118⁷⁹, and Cassiodorus on Ps 132²). The Church has rightly felt that the unction bestowed on Jesus as the Messiah separated and endowed Him to these offices. She recognized that the old dispensation was established and preserved by those who were anointed to be prophets, priests, and kings, and she believed that each of these offices found its perfection in the Person and work of Jesus Christ. When, therefore, we dwell separately on any one of these three vocations of the Messiah (as we do in this article), we must remember that we are necessarily taking a partial view of His Person; for to hold that He is only a prophet, is to fall into a heresy that has ever faced the Church.

Early in the Church's history the Gnostic Ebionites rejected the Catholic doctrine of Christ's Person, but felt no difficulty in believing Him to be an inspired prophet of the highest order. They regarded Him as one of the προφήται ἀληθείας, and as superior to προφήται συνέσιων οὐκ ἀληθείας; and, as such, placed Him in line with Adam, Enoch, Noah, etc. etc., upon all of whom had rested the pre-existent Christ; and in their Gospel we find the following words ascribed to Him: 'I am he concerning whom Moses prophesied, saying, A prophet shall the Lord God raise unto you, like unto me' (Clem. Rom. iii. 53; cf. Dorner, Hist. of Person of Christ, l. i. 208 ff.); but they refused to accept the Church's teaching as to His Deity. Similarly, the Mohammedan Koran says: 'The Messiah, the son of Mary, is only a prophet' (v. 79, also iv. 160 and xix. 30); and the Racovian Catechism (A.D. 1605) of the Socinians (§ 5) accepts and accentuates the prophetic aspect of His work.

2. But while the Church thus early classified the redemptive activities of our Lord under this threefold division, it must not be assumed that the Jews of His own time had reached this full conception. It is clear from our Gospels that His contemporaries did not regard the 'coming prophet' as one with the coming Messiah; for when the multitude were astonished at Jesus' discourse at the Feast of Tabernacles, and were divided in opinion regarding Him, some saying, 'This is of a truth the Prophet,' and others, 'This is the Christ' (Jn 7⁴⁰), none declared Him to be the Christ, and therefore the Prophet.

A similar distinction is found in their view of the Baptist (Jn 1²¹). The only exception in the Gospels is the words of the woman of Samaria: 'Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet. . . . When Christ is come, he will declare unto us all things' (Jn 4^{19, 25}). But probably the Samaritans generally had small reason to expect the coming of a kingly Messiah (see Westcott, Study of the Gospels, note 2, ch. 2; Stanton, Jewish and Christian Messiah, pp. 126, 293).

3. Nor does this separation of the offices of 'the Prophet' and 'the Messiah' seem to be due to any special obtuseness on the part of our Lord's contemporaries; the OT prophets themselves appear also to have been unable to rise above it. Isaiah, prophesying during the monarchy, pictures the Messiah as a Davidic king, and foretells the outpouring of a fuller revelation during His reign, predicting that then the God of Jacob would teach Israel His way (Is 2³), and then Israel's teacher(s) would not be hidden any more, but the people would see their teacher(s), and hear a word behind them saying, 'This is the way' (30²⁰); but he does not unite these kingly and prophetic endowments in the one person of the Christ. Fuller light of truth is to be a mark of the Messianic reign, but Isaiah does not recognize the Messiah as the organ of the revelation.

The fullest references to a coming prophet are found in Deutero-Isaiah; and here He is clearly identified with 'the Servant of the Lord.' There enters largely into the prophet's conception of this great Personality the idea of His being an anointed revealer of truth. Jehovah makes 'his mouth like a sharp sword' (49²), and 'puts his spirit upon him, so that he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles' (42¹, also 59²¹ 61¹). But, clear as is our identification of 'the Servant' with Jesus, we yet know that this union of 'the Suffering One' with the Messianic King has ever been the great stumbling-block to Israel. The truth appears to be: the prophets of Israel, influenced by the national circumstances and needs of their own day, predicted under the Spirit's influence, now a coming king, now a prophet, now a priestly sufferer with prophetic functions; and these parallel lines of yearning thought found together their satisfaction in the Person of Jesus.

The Book of Malachi closes with a prediction of the return of Elijah (4⁵), and Israel's prophetic expectations centred thenceforth chiefly in him.

4. With the silence of prophecy, there came to Israel a deep yearning for the living voice of Jehovah. This was a characteristic of the Maccabean age, when the anticipation of a coming prophet overshadows that of the Messiah (1 Mac 4⁶ 14¹ 9²⁷, also Sir 48¹⁰).

The same longing is found in Ps 74⁹ 'We see not our signs, there is no more any prophet, neither is there among us any that knoweth how long.' This Psalm is therefore thought to belong to the Maccabean period; on the other hand, similar complaints are found in the writings of the Exile (L^a 2⁹, Ezk 7²⁶).

The Apocalyptic literature is mostly silent on the point. But in the Book of Enoch (Simil. 45³⁻⁶) the Son of Man is portrayed as revealing 'all the treasures of that which is hidden, and there are seen an inexhaustible fountain of righteousness, and round about many fountains of wisdom.' These promises of fuller revelation presumably imply a personal agent for its dissemination. The prophetic gift is advanced in the Test. of the XII. Patriarchs (Levi viii. 15) as an implicit claim of John Hyrcanus to the Messiahship; and he alone was said by the Jews to have held the threefold office (Jos. EJ i. ii. 8).

5. If the abeyance of prophecy added to the gloom of Israel during the interval between the time that the last OT prophet delivered his message and the beginning of the Christian era, the coming of Christ was heralded by an outburst of the prophetic gift. It is recorded as first appearing in the priestly house of Zacharias (Lk 1^{11, 67}); it was granted to the Virgin, to Simeon, and to Anna (Lk 2^{25, 36}), and reached its most notable height in the person of John the Baptist. The nation, galled by a foreign yoke, and meditating on the predictions found in their sacred books, and, above all, picturing the return of Elijah as a herald of emancipation, 'mused in their heart' whether the Baptist were himself the Messiah, or Elijah, or the Prophet, or one of the old prophets returned (Lk 3¹⁵, Jn 1^{20^{af}}). But John, realizing himself to be only a forerunner, and wishing to turn the thoughts of the people from himself to Jesus, refused to be anything save an impersonal voice crying in the wilderness. Fittingly thus was the world's supreme Prophet ushered upon His prophetic career by a volume of reawakened prophecy.

6. Whatever difficulty His contemporaries felt in acknowledging His Messiahship, they had none in recognizing Him as a prophet. Both at the commencement and at the close of His career, this was the popular view of His ministry. As soon as He became known, the general judgment was pronounced that 'a great prophet had arisen, and that God had visited his people' (Lk 7¹⁶); and when at the close of His ministry He allowed the populace openly to express their feelings regarding Him, they, in answer to the question 'Who is this?' replied, 'This is Jesus, the prophet of Nazareth' (Mt 21¹¹; also Mk 6¹⁵, Mt 21⁴⁶, Lk 24¹⁹, Jn 4¹⁹ 6¹⁴ 7⁴⁰ 9¹⁷). Indeed, only those who were biased by ecclesiastical bigotry could have concluded otherwise, for His miracles of mercy were external credentials recalling the powers of Moses and Elijah; and the authoritative tone of His teaching showed that He claimed for Himself at least the position of a God-sent teacher.

7. But not only was the title generally given to Him; He also claimed it for Himself. Thus He opened His ministry in His native village by reading in the synagogue the words of Isaiah (61¹), 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor,' and commenced His discourse upon them by saying, 'To-day hath this scripture been fulfilled in your ears' (Lk 4^{18, 21}). Later in His ministry, when His death was imminent, He openly placed Himself in line with the ancient prophets of Israel, foretelling that, similarly to them, He could not perish out of Jerusalem (Mt 23^{29^{af}}, Lk 13³³); and when He used, in the parable of the Vineyard, the familiar OT figure of the Kingdom of God, He deliberately made Himself the last of the long line of God's martyr messengers to His people; and told the Jews that, notwithstanding the fact that they had 'shamefully handled' His predecessors the prophets; yet He had been sent to them by God with a final call to repentance.

II. Jesus had the essential marks of a prophet.—When we turn to the records of the life of Jesus, we find predicated of Him every characteristic that marked the Hebrew prophets. 1. If Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel were all introduced to their prophetic career by a vision granted and a voice heard (Is 6¹⁻⁸, Jer 1⁴⁻¹⁰, Ezk 3¹⁰⁻¹⁴), so Jesus commenced His ministry by receiving at His baptism a vision from heaven and by hearing His Father's voice.

The Gospel according to the Hebrews gives the words then spoken to Him in a form different from that given by the Evangelists, and interesting in the present connexion. We read: 'It came to pass when our Lord had ascended out of the water, the whole fountain of the Holy Spirit came down and rested upon him and said unto him, "My Son, in all the prophets I was looking for thee, that thou mightest come and that I might rest in thee. For thou art my rest, thou art my first-born Son who reignest to eternity." This form shows how strong was the belief in the earliest days of the Church that Jesus at His baptism was anointed specially to the office of Prophet.

2. The OT prophets were men of God. This title, doubtless, was frequently used, as conveying little more than a customary appellation of those holding the office; yet the fact of its having been chosen as a title shows the underlying conviction, on the part of the nation, that sanctity of character was a necessary condition of receiving communications from Jehovah; and it thus suggests not only the Divine purport of their message, but also the personal religiousness of the prophets. Isaiah felt that, in order to hold intercourse with God, personal holiness was requisite (6³); and indeed so fully was this felt that the prophetic state was looked upon as closely related to communion with God in prayer; and the expression which was generally used in the OT for the answering of prayer was frequently applied to prophetic revelation (מִן־יְהוָה Mic 3⁷, Hab 2^{1st}, Jer 23³⁶. See Oehler, OT Theol. ii. 336).

That Jesus bore this characteristic of the prophetic office needs no showing. He, the one sinless Man, whose whole life was lived in conscious communication, full and continuous, with His Father, must necessarily, as regards the fitness of holiness, be the very Prophet of prophets. His perfect sinlessness rendered possible uninterrupted fellowship with God, and guaranteed the perfection of the message He delivered. The pre-eminence of that message rests on the fact that whereas 'God of old times spake unto the fathers in the prophets, he hath in these last times spoken unto us in his Son' (He 1¹).

3. Further, as men of God, the message of the prophets was one of moral import. They, as Micah (3³), could say, 'I am full of power to declare unto Jacob his transgressions and to Israel his sins.' The greater prophets had developed far beyond the earlier prophets and still earlier seers, who used their gifts to reveal matters of mere personal interest: their message to the individual or to the nation was filled, as occasion required, with moral teachings; rebuking sin, calling to repentance, and threatening Divine judgment.

It is evident that Jesus fulfilled this characteristic continuously and perfectly. For not only did He, like the prophets before Him, utter words pregnant with moral enlightenment but also by His every word and act He constantly manifested the perfection of moral being. Being Himself the revelation of God, His whole incarnate life was a continuous teaching of infinite moral import.

4. The prophets were conscious of being recipients of direct communications from Jehovah. In Amos (3⁷) it is said, 'The Lord God doeth nothing without revealing his counsel to his servants the prophets'; and in Jeremiah (23²²) we are told that the prophet stands in 'the counsel of Jehovah.' God spoke to them, and they received His words into their hearts and heard them with their ears (Ezk 3¹⁰). It might seem that here is a characteristic of the prophetic office that is not applicable to Christ. It might be thought that as He is very and eternal God, He required no revelation, having in Himself all the fulness of Divine knowledge, and that therefore when He taught, He taught not what He had received, but what was intrinsically His own. A careful study, however, of the Gospel of St. John, where naturally we seek for light on the mystery of His Person, as it is the Gospel of His self-manifestation, leads us to conclude otherwise. In a remarkable number of passages, Jesus speaks of receiving from the Father the truths He disclosed. He says, 'I speak to the world those things which I have heard'; 'as my Father hath taught me, I speak.' 'I have given unto them the words which Thou gavest me'; 'I spake not from myself, but the Father which sent me, He hath given me a commandment what I should say' (Jn 8²⁶, 28, 38, 40, 12⁴⁹, 15¹⁵, 17⁸, 14).

In such words Jesus seems clearly to teach that His supernatural knowledge was a gift given to Him from the Father, 'administered to Him in His human nature on some economic principle,' so that He might be fitted perfectly to perform the functions of Teacher and Prophet to the Church. In emptying Himself of His glory in the Incarnation, He appears so to have self-limited His Divine Powers as to have been dependent upon His Father for supernatural illumination: while the reception by Him of that revelation must have been perfect through the complete sympathy that essentially existed between Him and His Father. Like the prophets of old, He received communications from God: but in virtue of His Divine Personality He perfectly heard and faithfully expressed every thought revealed to Him. (See, especially, a valuable charge by O'Brien, Bp. of Ossory, 1865 (Macmillan); and A. B. Davidson, Biblical Essays, p. 179).

5. A further characteristic of prophecy was its power of prediction. The apologetic use of prophecy in the past no doubt led to a too exclusive consideration of this aspect of the prophetic books; and the Church has gained much by regarding the prophets as men inspired by Jehovah with special moral messages to the age in which they lived. But it is not less one-sided so to over-emphasize this aspect of their work as to exclude their undoubted predictive powers. The writings of the Hebrew prophets are saturated with prediction. They foresee and announce as much of the secret purposes of Jehovah as was needful for His people to know. And the power of Jehovah to reveal to them the future raises Him, in the eyes of Israel, at once above the heathen gods, and proves to them that He is the true God (Is 41²¹⁻²⁸, 42⁹, 43³⁻¹², 44^{28ff.}, 48³⁻⁷). No doubt their predictions usually announced the general results rather than detailed accounts of Jehovah's future dealings; nevertheless their predictions were clear unveilings of coming events. So that it may be said that a teacher without the power of foretelling would be no prophet (Dt 18²¹⁻²²), for the prophet has 'his face to the future,' and can see more or less clearly, by the inspiration granted to him, the results that God's love and righteousness are about to accomplish.

Now, full of prediction as are the writings of the prophets, the sayings of Jesus are even more so. With clear vision He was able to follow throughout future time the workings of the principles He taught, and was able to state as a matter of certain knowledge that their adoption would be universal. With an unparalleled insight He disclosed to the world the mysteries of eternity. He drew back the curtain not only from coming events of time, but with equal certainty from the hidden secrets of the invisible world. Hades, heaven, hell are all open to Him. And with a calm boldness, found only with absolute certainty, He tells us of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16¹⁹), of the many stripes and the few (Lk 12⁴⁷), and of the principles upon which the Final Judgment will be carried out (Mt 25⁴⁰).

If the Hebrew prophets received at times illumination which revealed to them glimpses of coming events, Jesus was at all times able to reveal hidden things of the future with as much certainty as He could speak of the things clearly seen in the present.

In addition to the predictions of general events, there is also found, but less frequently, among the Hebrew prophets, the power of foretelling particular events to individuals. Thus Micaiah foretells the death of Ahab (1 K 22), and Jeremiah the death of Hananiah (Jer 23¹⁶). Here also Jesus surpasses them. With a certainty and clearness far beyond theirs, He was able to announce particular coming events to His disciples. Following the Gospel narrative, we find that the treachery of Judas was open to Him for long (Jn 6^{70f.}). The fall of Peter and his final martyrdom, and the prolonged life of John, were all equally clear (Lk 22³¹, Jn 21¹⁸, 22).

Allied to His knowledge of the future of individuals was His unerring insight into character. This gift was partially granted to the prophets, and may in a measure account for their predictions. It may have been insight into character that enabled Micaiah to predict the coming cowardice of Zedekiah (1 K 22²²), and it certainly seems to have been this that gave Elisha power to read the future of Hazael (2 K 8¹²). Similarly, only in an infinitely greater degree, Jesus read the inner depths of those around Him. At once He saw the guilelessness of Nathanael (Jn 1⁴⁷) and the strength of Peter (v. 4²), and was able to read the thoughts of Simon the Pharisee while Simon was misreading His (Lk 7^{39, 40}). The records of His life show repeated instances that exemplify the statement of John, 'He knew all men . . . he knew what was in man' (Jn 2^{24, 25}).

6. As a final mark of His fulfilment of the prophetic office, His fate must be mentioned. In His own Person He gathered together every insult and cruelty that had been shown in the past to the messengers of God. And if it seems strange that Israel, which more than all other nations had spiritual instincts, should have habitually rejected those sent to them with the very message they above all should have received, and if it be stranger still that they should have crucified the Messiah whom they so passionately desired, it must be remembered that mankind at all times has been unable to receive, with patience, rebukes that shattered its self-conceit and truth that attacked its vested interests. New light ever discloses ignorance, reveals the inadequacy of much that is thought perfect, and shows the sinfulness of much that is looked upon as innocent. And thus it follows that the fuller the new light, the greater the hatred and opposition its bearer will have to endure at the hands of those who fail to recognize its truth. If, then, the preaching of Isaiah raised the gibes of the drunkards of Ephraim, and if the unwelcome predictions of Jeremiah led to bitterest persecution, is it any wonder that the clear light of the revelation of Jesus infuriated 'the blind Pharisee,' and ended in His cruel mockings and death?

III. Jesus is above all other prophets.—But while Jesus fulfils every prophetic characteristic perfectly, and is thus the world's Supreme Prophet, it is also evident, from this very perfection, that He is essentially distinct from all others who bore the title. For not only is there found in Him a man called of God to receive communications from heaven and to give them forth, when received, to his fellow-men, but in Him we have God revealing Himself directly to His creatures. As the personal, uttered 'Word of God' (λόγος προφητικός), He manifests Himself (that is, He manifests GOD) to mankind. And if the essence of the prophetic office consists in revealing the Almighty to His children, then, clearly, He alone is the one perfect Prophet, who from His very nature must have (1) constantly, (2) completely, (3) infallibly, and (4) finally revealed all that mankind may know of their Creator.

1. His revelation was constant. OT prophets, receiving their revelation only at such times as Jehovah desired to reveal His will, could exercise their functions only intermittently; whereas Jesus, living in uninterrupted communion with His Father, was in receipt of a constant revelation of the purposes and will of God. Indeed, even in His hours of silence, He must be thought of as fulfilling His prophetic office. His every act was a message, and His miracles, not less than His parables, were revelations to teach men of His Father. His spontaneous lovingkindness, as exhibited to the sinful and the suffering, revealed even more powerfully than His words the fact that 'God is Love'; the beauty of His sinless life, not less than the depth of His matchless utterances, ever taught men this, the central truth of His message. Jesus, simply by being what He was, constantly delivered His prophetic message to the world.

2. His revelation was complete. The OT prophets could be recipients of only a partial revelation. As their writings are studied, it is seen how gradually God revealed His truth through them. Their knowledge of God is seen to develop, through progressive stages, from little to fuller light; prophet after prophet being sent to add his quota of truth, each being granted that amount of illumination necessary to enable him to advance the hopes and knowledge of Israel beyond the stage already reached. With Jesus it was far otherwise. He came to raise the spiritual wisdom and knowledge of men, once and for all, to the highest point attainable by them on earth. And if we find Him, at any time during His ministry, withholding truth which He might have revealed, we know that the cause of such reserve is to be found, not in His inability to declare, but in His hearers' inability to receive (Jn 16¹²).

3. His revelation was infallible. Great as was the usefulness of the prophets to God's chosen people, yet it is clear that in them they had no infallible guides. They had to distinguish between 'the false prophets' and those who truly represented Jehovah. For succeeding generations it may have been comparatively easy to separate them, for time would demonstrate, by events, the correctness or incorrectness of prophetic utterances; but not so for contemporaries. The false prophets were not as a class mere impostors trading on the religious feelings of the people, but rather they were men who, prophets by profession, lacked the spiritual discernment to interpret the mind of Jehovah. Their messages therefore rose no higher than current spiritual ideas. The people of Israel thus had constant need of spiritual discernment on their part to select the true and to reject the untrue in messages proffered to them, which claimed to come from Jehovah. But when experience had marked out to them a prophet as a true revealer of Jehovah's will, they were not even then certain of receiving infallible guidance. The true prophet might at times confuse his own natural judgment with the voice of God. Thus Samuel at first mistook Eliab for the Lord's anointed (1 S 16⁶); and Nathan too hastily sanctioned the project of David to build a temple (2 S 7^{14f}).

But the revelation of Jesus comes to us with infallible certainty. He does not, indeed, reveal everything; for on earth He was not omniscient. He distinctly told His disciples that there was at all events one thing He did not know (Mk 13³²). Thus He willingly limited His knowledge while on earth; and it is well for us to remember that He Himself was aware of the limitation, for He knew that He did not know. But this self-limitation in no way weakened His claim to infallibility in all He taught. Ignorance is one thing, error quite another. And being the Son of God, and so the perfect recipient of all that the Father willed to teach Him during His state of humiliation, He knew perfectly all He knew. Similarly, if He did not foresee everything, yet what He did foresee, that He foresaw perfectly. Very remarkable is the calm certainty of conviction with which He claims infallibility. The tone of authority in His utterances, the repeated 'I say unto you' astounded the multitude (Mt 7²⁹); while the claim itself could not have been more strongly put forth than in His words, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away' (Mk 13³¹).

It is here especially that He stands pre-eminent. Throughout the whole course of His utterances there can be found no hesitation due to a possible conflict between His own judgment and His Father's will, but rather a claim in unmistakable language to absolute infallibility as a Teacher. In truth, His consciousness told Him that He could not be wrong, for He knew where He had received that which He taught. The words which He spake were not His own, but the Father's who sent Him. He spake that which He had seen with the Father, —that Father who was ever with Him (Jn 14^{24, 10} 8³⁸). He knew, as none else could know, the truth regarding 'the heavenly things,' for He was 'the Son of Man, who had come down from heaven' (Jn 3^{12, 13}). He is the one infallible Teacher of our race.

Jesus, in His interview with Nicodemus, draws a distinction between 'earthly things' (τὰ ἰσχυρὰ) and 'heavenly things' (τὰ ἰσούρνια). The former are spiritual truths within the range of human spiritual knowledge; the latter, spiritual truths which man can learn only by a revelation granted from God. Of these latter, Jesus is the one infallible revealer (see Adamson, Mind in Christ, p. 77 ff.).

4. His revelation is final. If the message of Jesus is thus complete and infallible, it is necessarily final. No doubt, the prophetic office of Christ is still an activity in the love of God for us; and the Church has ever the presence of the Holy Spirit leading her into fuller truth; nevertheless, the message that Jesus brought was complete in itself, and therefore final. For the office of the Holy Spirit is not to teach men something new, something outside that message, but rather to disclose truths which, though hitherto unrecognized, were implicit in His teaching. The Apostolic Church was furnished with prophets, and in a true sense prophets have appeared at intervals throughout the Christian era, and doubtless will yet appear; but, no matter how new their message may seem to the men of their own day, they are, unless they are false prophets, in reality only 'taking of the things of Christ, and declaring them' to His people (Jn 14²⁶ 16^{14, 15}).

IV. Christ's prophetic utterances. — When considering the prophetic utterances of Jesus, we must not confine ourselves to His predictions alone. If, as we have seen, foretelling is an essential element of prophecy, it is evident that forthtelling is no less so. The OT prophets not only foretold coming events, but also were the religious teachers of their own age; each in turn adding to the moral and religious knowledge of the nation. So Jesus, speaking as the world's Prophet, not only revealed the future, but once and for ever delivered potentially all truth to the world. The prophetic utterances of Jesus, therefore, include not only His predictions but all His teachings, and, as such, come within the scope of this article. As, however, His teaching is dealt with in a separate article, it is sufficient to refer the reader to the latter, and only to add some general remarks on the subject.

A. DIDACTIC UTTERANCES. — 1. The moral teaching of Christ concerned itself with general principles rather than with precepts. The Sermon on the Mount, which contains the chief elements of His ethical teaching, is not a code of injunctions, but a declaration of the fundamental principles that underlie His Kingdom; and the particular instances of right conduct mentioned in that discourse are not commandments, but illustrations of these principles. When He teaches His disciples regarding righteousness and sin, He avoids laying down laws regarding special acts, but goes at once to the very heart of moral distinctions, revealing the general principles which rule all special cases. Thus He solved all questions of meat by a single sentence, which 'made all meats clean' (Mk 7¹⁹ RV); and He answered all questions of casuistry regarding Sabbath observance by pointing out the beneficent principle which led to its institution. In a word, He reduced all right action, whether towards God or towards man, to a fulfilling, and all wrong action to an outraging, of the one all-embracing commandment of Love. And thus His teaching finds its application in every act in every age.

There is but one exception recorded in our Gospels,—that in reference to divorce (Mk 10^{11, 12}, cf. Mt 5³² 19⁹). In this case He gives a concise and direct precept; but a precept, obedience to which purifies the human race at its source.

2. But Jesus not only revealed the true principles underlying all sin and righteousness, He also taught that in Himself, and particularly in Himself dying, was to be found the true atonement for sin. As soon as He was able to teach His disciples, even if it were in dark words, regarding His coming death, He connected that death with the world's salvation. Comparatively early in His ministry He announced that He would give His body 'for the life of the world' (Jn 6⁵¹); later, He told them that, as the Good Shepherd, He would 'lay down his life for the sheep' (Jn 10¹⁵); and as the fatal result of His ministry drew nearer, He declared, with still greater clearness, that He would give 'his life a ransom for many' (Mk 10⁴⁵). It is clear, then, that Jesus explicitly taught that His death was in the highest sense sacrificial; that there was a necessary connexion between that death and man's salvation.

It is true that Jesus does not explain how His death wrought the Atonement, and that we must turn to the Epistles for this knowledge; but we may with confidence assume that the early Church derived its light on the matter from Jesus Himself; for St. Luke (24⁴⁷) tells us that among the truths taught the disciples by Jesus during the forty days were those regarding His 'death' and 'repentance and remission of sins.' Therefore the developed doctrine of the Atonement, as found in the writings of the early Church, are not mere subjective theorizings, but are based on the teaching of the risen Lord.

3. Jesus in His teaching taught the absolute value of the individual. The prophets of Israel felt the majesty of their nation as the chosen people of God, and dwelt upon Jehovah's Fatherly care of the Jewish race; but not until the preaching of Jeremiah was the Fatherhood of God over the individual brought into prominence. It was Jesus who first fully revealed the infinite value of the single soul. He insisted frequently on the madness of risking its loss, even if thereby the gain should be 'the whole world'; and He warned men that it were better that they should miserably perish than that they should cause to stumble even one of God's 'little ones' (Mk 8³⁶ 9⁴²).

4. But His teaching was also social. The individual who was so precious in his Father's sight was not to be left unsupported in isolation. Wide and manifold as are the meanings of 'Kingdom of God' as established by Jesus, it is certain that underlying all else is the thought of its members united in love by a common life. This is essential to the very idea of a kingdom. And in it is ideally presented the thought of a spiritual nation composed of spiritual individuals.

The Kingdom of heaven from its spiritual nature, and as a Kingdom of ideas and principles, rather than of codified laws, is necessarily invisible, save as to its results. But man ever wants the outward or concrete; and Jesus therefore not only founded the Kingdom of God, but established a Church (Mt 16¹⁸ 18¹⁷); the latter being an embodiment of the idea of the former, visibly presenting to the world its truths. The Kingdom is thus, in the teaching of Jesus, much wider and more fundamental than the Church.

5. When we pass from the ethical to the spiritual side of the didactic prophecies of Jesus, we enter upon an unparalleled field of revelation. As we have seen, He alone among men—and that because He was more than man—could disclose 'the heavenly things' (Jn 3¹²) to the world. When, therefore, He speaks of the nature and acts of God, our attitude is that of reverent humble reception; and our activities are to be exercised rather in the devout investigation of the meaning of His words than in the questioning of their truth.

When we turn to the teaching itself, we find little regarding the essential nature of God. It was His method rather to describe how God acts than to define what God is. Indeed, the only statement approaching to an abstract definition of His Being is found in His words to the woman of Samaria, 'God is Spirit' (Jn 4²⁴).

The titles chiefly used by Jesus to describe the character of God are 'King' (Mt 5³⁵ 18²³ 22²) and 'Father.' God is Father: in a unique sense in relation to Himself (Mt 10³² 11²⁷, Jn 5¹⁷ 10³⁰ etc.); in a special sense of His disciples (Mt 5¹⁶, Lk 12³² etc.); and in a general sense of mankind (Mt 5⁴⁵, Lk 15^{11f.}).

Further, His teaching concerning God reveals the doctrine of the Trinity. His own Deity, and the Deity and Personality of the Holy Spirit are plainly taught by Him; and the three Persons of the Godhead are with equal emphasis combined in the formula for baptism (Mt 28¹⁹).

There seems no reason sufficiently weighty to cause us to regard this latter verse as an amplification of the actual words of Jesus, after the Church had grasped fully the theological doctrine of the Trinity. Rather it appears necessary to assume that some such statement must have been made by Him in order that this belief, which is found so distinctly stated in the earliest Epistles of St. Paul, may be accounted for (see Sanday in Hastings' DB, vol. ii, p. 624).

6. Christ as Prophet chiefly revealed God by revealing Himself. It is customary to emphasize as His prime revelation of God, His teaching regarding the Fatherhood of the Almighty; but rather would we emphasize His revelation of Himself as His chief prophetic work. He stood before men, and said not, 'I will teach you about God,' but, 'I will teach you about Myself, and then you will know God.' Throughout the Gospel of St. John this self-manifestation of Jesus is the one central subject. His ministry, in that Gospel, commences with His convincing self-revelation to Peter and John, Andrew and Philip, and Nathanael (ch. 1); His first miracle 'manifested forth his glory' (2¹¹); He closes His interview with Nicodemus by declaring His mission as a bearer from heaven of spiritual truths (3¹²⁻¹³); the highest point in ch. 4 is the declaration to the woman of Samaria, 'I that speak unto thee am he' (v. 26); in ch. 5 He declares His oneness in power with the Father by saying, 'What things soever the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise' (v. 19); the teaching of ch. 6 centres round the self-revelation of 'I am the bread of life' (v. 48); at the Feast of Tabernacles He cried concerning Himself, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink' (7³⁷); in ch. 8 He asserts His own pre-existence, saying, 'Before Abraham was, I am' (v. 58); while the lengthy account of the cure of the blind man reaches its climax in the declaration, 'Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee' (9³⁷). Every section of the Gospel up to this point culminates and finds its reason in a self-revelation of Jesus made to an individual or to a few chosen ones (2²) who were capable, by reason of their sincerity, of receiving it; while the succeeding chapters record a similar revelation granted to groups of listeners and disciples. He is 'the Good Shepherd'; 'the Door'; 'one with the Father'; 'the Resurrection' . . . (10⁷⁻¹¹, 11⁵⁰ 11²⁵ . . .). Clearer and clearer grows the revelation of Himself, until at last the real fulness and power, humility and truth of His self-disclosure are seen in the words, 'He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father' (14⁹ 12⁴⁵); that is to say, 'I have revealed God while I revealed Myself.' It is this that makes Him in Himself, as also in His deeds and words, the Supreme Prophet, as forthteller of the truth of God.

B. CHRIST'S PREDICTIONS. — The predictive element enters very largely into the utterances of Christ. Not only do the Gospels contain prophecies spoken with the express intention of revealing the future to the disciples, such as those relating to His own death and the destruction of Jerusalem, but also numerous prophecies which occur incidentally. An example of the latter is found in His rebuke to those that 'troubled' Mary because of her costly offering; a rebuke that foretells the universality of His Kingdom and the perpetual memorial of her deed (Mk 14⁹).

If the Gospels be studied with a view to noting those sayings of Jesus which are predictive, surprise will be felt at their number. It will be seen that the parables grouped in Mt 13 are predictions of the history of the Kingdom; that His promises not only exhibit His love and power, but also are foretellings of His future action (e.g. Mt 18²⁰ 28²⁰). It will be found that His miracles are often prefaced by announcements beforehand of the cure to be wrought (e.g. Lk 8⁵⁰, Jn 11¹¹); that His discourse in Jn 6 is based on a prediction of His own sacrificial death, and that in Jn 14-16 on His foreknowledge of the Holy Spirit's descent. And, further, even in His High-Priestly prayer He shows knowledge of the future by pleading for those whom He foresees as His disciples in the coming age (Jn 17²⁰); and, if His first recorded word during His ministry is a prophecy of the immediate advent of the Kingdom (Mk 1¹⁵), His last is a prophecy of its spread to the uttermost part of the world (Ac 1⁸). His words are saturated with prediction.

The predictions of Jesus may be classified as follows: Those referring (1) to individuals, (2) to His Kingdom, (3) to the material world, (4) to His own career, (5) to the destruction of Jerusalem, (6) to the Parousia and the consummation of the age.

1. As His predictions regarding individuals present no special difficulties, it will be sufficient simply to mention them. In giving Simon the name of Peter (Jn 1⁴²), Jesus not only revealed his character, but foretold his pre-eminence; a prediction justified at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16¹⁸). On this latter occasion He foretold that the Apostle would become the porter of the Church, and the Acts of the Apostles records the fulfilment. Jesus also predicted his fall and restoration (Lk 22³¹, Mk 14³⁰), and finally announced in hidden language the death by which he should ultimately glorify God (Jn 21¹⁸). At this time He also used words which obscurely foretold to the Apostle John a prolonged life (v. 22). From an early period in His ministry Jesus read the heart of Judas (Jn 6⁶⁴ 13¹⁸), shortly after the Transfiguration He announced His coming betrayal (Mk 9³¹), in the Upper Room He declared that the betrayer was one of the Twelve (Mk 14¹⁸), and finally by the sign of the given sop He marked Judas as the traitor (Jn 13²⁶). To Nathanael He foretold that he would see 'heaven opened' (Jn 1⁵¹); to Caiaphas, that he would see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven (Mk 14⁶²); to James and John, that they would be baptized with His baptism (Mk 10³⁸); and to all the Apostles, that they would be persecuted like Himself, excommunicated, and in peril of death (Jn 15²⁰ 16²), that they would forsake Him in the hour of His greatest need (Mk 14²⁷), but that after His death they would do even greater works than He Himself had done (Jn 14¹²), and ultimately would sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19²⁸, Lk 22³⁰).

2. Predictions regarding the Kingdom. — The position of Jesus in reference to the idea of the Kingdom of God is partly that of a fulfiller and partly that of a foreteller. He established during His ministry the Kingdom in its simplest stage, and so far fulfilled what the OT prophets had foretold; but having established it, He made it the subject of His own predictions, projected it into the future, with the OT limitations removed, revealed its struggles throughout time, and announced its ultimate victory.

That Jesus did establish the Kingdom of God during His lifetime can hardly be doubted. To make it entirely future, as some do, seems impossible in the face of such passages as 'The kingdom of God is among you' (or 'within you,' ἐν ὑμῖν, Lk 17²¹; see art. IDEAS (LEADING), vol. i, p. 770b); 'The kingdom of God is come upon you' (ἔσθ' ὑμᾶς, Mt 12²⁸); 'From the days of John the Baptist the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence' (Mt 11¹², see Wendt's Teaching of Jesus, vol. i, p. 364 ff.).

In the parable of the Sower (Mt 13, see also Lk 14^{16f.}) He foretold the different classes of people that would become its subjects, and the varied reception they would give to its claims; and in the parables of the Tares and the Draw-net (Mt 13), the presence within it of unworthy members. He marked out for it a long career of struggle with evil, within,—false prophets deceiving (Mt 7^{15, 22}), without,—malignant foes opposing (Mt 10^{16, 33}, Lk 21¹², Jn 15^{20, 16²}); but He promised the support of His abiding presence (Mt 28²⁰), and guaranteed its invincibility (Mt 16¹⁸).

Though its beginning is unobserved (Lk 17²⁰), yet He predicted, in the parable of the Seed Growing Secretly (Mk 4²⁶), its reaching through steady growth its consummation; in the parable of the Mustard Seed (Mt 13³¹), its universal extension as a visible society; and in that of the Leaven, its gradually acquired power over the hearts of men (Mt 13³³). No longer will its bounds be confined to the Chosen Race, for adherents from every quarter of the globe will enter it (8¹¹), humanity becoming one flock under one Shepherd (Jn 10¹⁶); and towards this great end it will itself work, for it will evangelize the world before His return (Mt 28^{19, 24¹⁴}). And when He comes in the clouds, its struggles will cease, and He will gather its members to that heavenly feast which will celebrate His marriage with His bride, and then, purged from evil, it will enter upon its career of eternal glory (24^{31, 22¹⁷}, 25¹⁷, 13^{41, 25³⁴}).

3. Predictions regarding the material world.—A renewal of the face of nature enters largely into the prophecies of the OT (Is 11^{6-9, 30^{23f.}}, 35, 65¹⁷, Hos 2^{21f.}, Ezk 34^{25, 28}), and reappears in wider form in the Epistle to the Romans (8²¹), where St. Paul predicts the delivery of creation from the bondage of corruption; and in the Apocalypse (21¹), where a new heaven and a new earth are foretold (see also 2 P 3¹³). Nor can the Church look forward to any less comprehensive issue, believing as she does in the Incarnation which for ever glorifies matter by its union with the Godhead. The comparative silence of Jesus upon this subject is remarkable. He cannot be said to have alluded to it except in two passages, neither of which is of certain interpretation. The one is in the Sermon on the Mount, where we read, 'The meek shall inherit the earth' (Mt 5⁵). These words may mean no more than that meekness here on earth wins more than self-assertion; but, seeing that the meek do not, as yet at all events, receive their due, the words more probably may be eschatological in reference, and predict their ultimate recognition on a renewed earth. In the other passage Jesus promises His Apostles that 'in the regeneration' they shall sit upon twelve thrones (19²⁸). But here again there is uncertainty of interpretation; for, while He calls the culmination of the Kingdom of Grace in the Kingdom of Glory 'the regeneration,' He leaves it uncertain whether that regeneration concerns merely the whole body of the redeemed (cf. Briggs, Mess. of Gospel, pp. 228, 315), or whether it includes, as seems more probable, the physical transformation of nature (cf. Schwartzkopff, Proph. of Christ, pp. 219, 232).*

4. Predictions regarding Himself.—We find in the Gospels frequent predictions by Jesus of His death, and almost invariably in connexion with them allusions to His resurrection. There may be difficulty in deciding as to when He Himself first became conscious of the fatal end to His ministry, but there can be no doubt that as soon as He realized His death as imminent, He must have realized His resurrection as certain. To suppose Him to have recognized Himself as the true Messiah and then to have regarded His death as the end of all, is to suppose the impossible. Living as He lived in uninterrupted communion with the Father, He must have been conscious of the indestructibility of the Divine life that was His, and of the eternal value of His Person and work (cf. Schwartzkopff, Proph. of Christ, pp. 64, 147). And if a dead Messiah was a contradiction in terms to any one holding Messianic hopes, how much more was it so to the Messiah Himself?

It was not until after the confession of Peter at Cæsarea Philippi (see Mt 16²¹ 'From that time forth . . .') that Jesus plainly foretold His death; but having done so, He repeated the warning three times at short intervals, each time adding more definiteness to the prediction. (1) He outlined the Passion, foretelling the Sanhedrin's rejection of Him, His death, and resurrection (Mk 8³¹); (2) after the Transfiguration, where the highest point of His ministry was reached, He repeated the prediction, adding the fact of the betrayal (9³¹); (3) on the journey to Jerusalem He foretold in very full detail the sufferings that awaited Him (10³³), enumerating in their actual order the stages of contumely through which He was to pass. The betrayal, the judicial condemnation, the delivery to the Roman power, the mocking and spitting, the killing (Mt 20¹⁹ 'crucifying'), and, finally, the resurrection, all in turn are mentioned (cf. Swete's St. Mark, l.c.). See, further, art. ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH.

It is assumed by some that Jesus commenced His ministry with views as to His work very different from those with which He closed it, the rigour of events leading Him to modify the ideas with which He started (e.g. Weiss, Life of Christ, iii. 60). If this be true, then the delay in our Lord's plain announcement of His death until Peter had made his confession may well be due to the fact that He Himself had not before realized it as inevitable. But we should require the strongest proof to cause us to believe in such vacillation or change of purpose on His part. The argument from silence is always precarious, but never more so than in the case of One who distinctly tells us that He restrained His utterances because of His hearers' inability fully to bear the truth (Jn 16¹²). We have, therefore, more ground for assuming that His reticence was due to His loving consideration for His disciples, who had already many doubts and difficulties to conquer, rather than to His ignorance of what was before Him. Indeed, in His last discourse He stated that now at length He felt able to speak openly, and would from that moment (ἀπ' ἐπει) tell them plainly what was to come to pass, in order that they might the more readily believe that He was the Christ (Jn 13¹⁹). His reticence and His openness alike are due to His consideration for their weaknesses.

5. Predictions regarding the destruction of Jerusalem.—The chief difficulties found in the predictions of Jesus regarding the destruction of Jerusalem are in the great eschatological discourse recorded in Mk 13, and in 'the lesser Apocalypse' in Lk 17. As both these passages will come up before us under the prophecies of the Parousia, it is not necessary to consider them here. We now refer only to those other passages which foretell it.

(a) In the parable of the King's Son, Jesus declared that those who spitefully entreated and slew the messengers would be punished by the king's armies destroying the murderers and burning up their city (Mt 22⁷). These words contain, doubtless, a prediction of the punishment that through the ages ever follows apostasy, but not the less do they foretell vividly the judgment that fell upon Jerusalem.

(b) In the next chapter (Mt 23) we find the denunciation of the scribes by Jesus, which concludes with His lamentation over the city He loved. And He closes with the words, 'Your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.' Here, in foretelling the desolation of the Temple, He predicted its destruction; for while, no doubt, its desolation was a spiritual fact from the moment He finally quitted its precincts, yet the visible evidence of its being God-forsaken was given in its destruction.

* Jesus tells us that not only the brute creation (Mt 10^{29, 6²⁶}), but even the vegetable kingdom is under the Father's care (6³⁰).

Lk. (13³⁵) gives these words in a different connexion. In Mt. they are spoken at the close of His ministry, just as Jesus was leaving the Temple for the last time as a public teacher. In Lk. they arise naturally from His sad words telling that no prophet can perish out of the city. It is difficult to decide between these two occasions, and it is possible, though not probable, that the words were spoken twice by Him.

The interpretation of the last part of the prediction is also difficult. The desolation is to cease when they shall say, 'Blessed is he that cometh. . . .' What future event does this indicate? If the words were spoken in the connexion given by Mt., they cannot refer, as some think, to the cries of the multitude on Palm Sunday, as they would have been spoken after that occasion. If Lk. is right, then this is a possible, but very inadequate, interpretation. Thus they may be taken as referring either to the Parousia or to the ultimate conversion of the Jews (cf. Plummer, St. Luke, l.c.). If the latter interpretation be accepted, then they are a prophecy of the final restoration of the Chosen Race, and supplement the prediction of their rejection (Mt 21⁴³; see also Lk 21²⁴).

(c) The most minute prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem is found in Lk 19⁴¹⁻⁴⁴. On the occasion of His triumphal entry, when He saw the city before Him, He announced with cries of sorrow that He foresaw its inhabitants shut in, the city itself captured, the people slain, and the walls demolished. To some this minuteness of detail suggests that the Evangelist, writing after the event, coloured his description from facts which had already occurred. But if Jesus was able to foretell the fact of the city's destruction, He could with equal ease have described the circumstances here mentioned, which are really common to all sieges.

(d) Jesus gave His last predictive warning of the coming judgment on the city to the women who wept as He journeyed to Calvary. He told them the days would come (i.e. the days of their city's destruction) when they would call upon the mountains to fall on them (Lk 23³⁰). His grief for the sorrow that the catastrophe would bring on poor womanhood is also shown in His longer eschatological discourse (Mk 13¹⁷), where He says: 'Woe to them that are with child and to them that give suck in those days.'

6. Predictions regarding the Parousia.—The predictions of Jesus regarding the Parousia are among the most difficult of His utterances, and many weighty questions of criticism and interpretation arise which are beyond the limits of this article. We can only state the conclusions at which we have arrived, referring readers elsewhere for fuller information (see PAROUSIA, SECOND COMING). There are five chief passages in which Jesus speaks of His return, and in each of these He uses language difficult of interpretation. This fact must not be forgotten. It is not that He spoke of His return sometimes in clear and sometimes in cryptic language, but that whenever He referred to it He invariably spoke enigmatically. There must have been some reason for this persistent ambiguity; and it is to be found in the dulness of spiritual insight of the Apostles, and their unpreparedness for clearer teaching. In this connexion, as in connexion with the predictions of His death, He was unable to speak openly.

His aim seems to have been to prepare them for the following facts—(a) that He was about to leave them; (b) that His death would be due to His rejection by the hierarchy and the antagonism of the populace; (c) that the sin of that generation which culminated in His death would speedily receive its punishment in the utter destruction of their city and Temple; (d) that He Himself would, by His spiritual might, be the just avenger on Jerusalem of His own death; (e) that ages of gospel preaching would then follow, during which the curse on the Holy City would last until the times of the Gentiles were fulfilled; (f) that not until the whole world was evangelized would He visibly appear; (g) but that He Himself, though visibly withdrawn, would be spiritually present with them and succeeding generations. These facts, so plain to us, could not possibly have been grasped by those who, having found the Messiah, have been expected immediate victory at His hands. We know that even after the forty days' instruction they still were unable to shake off their preconceptions, and still hankered after a material Messianic kingdom (Ac 19); and we may therefore be certain that during the days spent with Him before His death and resurrection, they would have been absolutely unable to understand Him had He spoken openly of His continuous spiritual presence, of His spiritual coming during their lifetime to judge Jerusalem, of the long ages of the Gospel Dispensation, and of His final visible return at the end of the world. What He could do, He did. In words that hiddenly contained these truths, He revealed them enigmatically; and the logic of events would, and did, interpret them to His hearers and to the Church after them.

This characteristic of the sayings of Jesus regarding His Coming accounts in a measure for the ease with which the early Church changed her view as to the time of His return. At first she lived in expectation of an immediate return of her Lord, but when events proved that this hope was in a literal sense illusory, she, without any great rupture of faith, accepted the view that a long period would intervene before she welcomed Him in His glory. And this revolution of thought can best be accounted for by the fact that when He did not come at the expected time, she turned back to the mysterious words with which He had announced His return, and learnt, what circumstances now made plain, the deeper meaning of His pregnant sayings.

We will now consider the five chief passages which foretell His Coming, taking them not in the order in which they were spoken, but in that which best helps our investigation.

(1) Jesus, in reply to the question of Caiaphas whether He were the Christ, replied: 'I am; and ye shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven' (Mk 14⁶²). Mt. has, 'Henceforth (ἀπὸ ἄρτι) ye shall see . . . ' (26⁶⁴); Lk. 'From henceforth (ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν) . . . ' (22⁶⁹). It may be that Mk. gives the exact words spoken, and that Mt. and Lk. make the addition to show what they conceived to be the meaning; but more probably Mk. omitted the 'henceforth,' as not comprehending it. It is evident that Jesus here spoke not of His final Parousia, but rather of an immediate spiritual visitation which from that present moment Caiaphas would experience—a prediction that had not long to wait for its fulfilment; for must not the quaking rocks, the rent veil, and the opened tomb, followed as they were by Pentecost and the victories of the Church, have been felt by Caiaphas as true comings in power of Him whom he once thought he had mastered? This passage, then, is full of importance; for here, without doubt, Jesus spoke of a 'Coming' other than the final. And it compels us, when considering His other references to the same subject, to inquire whether He refers to 'historic Comings' or to His ultimate reappearance at the end of the world. It is thought by some that to make His sayings refer to such 'historic Comings,' is to use a modern key, made merely for the purpose of getting out of difficulty (Schwartzkopf, Prop. of Christ, p. 246); but in this passage it can have no other meaning, unless indeed we hold that Jesus erroneously thought that His final return would be during the lifetime of Caiaphas—a view to most impossible, for it predicates of Him not ignorance but error. On the other hand, we shall find that by the use of His enigmatic words He suggested frequently that His Coming was 'not one but manifold,' and that by His frequent 'historic returns' in the great crises of the life of Humanity, He would prepare the way for and rehearse His grand final Parousia.

It is remarkable that while Lk. follows Mt. in adding 'henceforth' to the words of Mk., he separates from both by omitting the reference to the 'Coming'; substituting 'shall the Son of Man be seated at the right hand of power' for 'ye shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.' Did he feel that 'the clouds of heaven,' as an apocalyptic phrase, was difficult to be understood by his Gentile readers; or did he miss the point of view that recognized many historic Comings? The omission by him of the words 'ye shall see' points in the latter direction. He understood the Session of the Son of Man at the right hand, but failed to grasp a 'Coming' that would be visible and immediate to Caiaphas. A somewhat similar change is made by him in the great eschatological discourse, where he substitutes 'know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh' (21³¹) for 'he is nigh' (Mk 13²⁹, Mt 24³³). It is not that, according to him, there is no final coming; for previously he had recorded (Lk 21^{25ff.}) the prediction of the signs in the heavens which, following the 'times of the Gentiles,' precede the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds with power; but rather than where the coming does not appear to him as the final coming, he substitutes the Coming of the Kingdom for the Coming of Christ. He makes a similar change in the passage which will next occupy our consideration, namely, Mk 9¹, Mt 16²⁸, Lk 9²⁷. Mk. has 'some . . . shall in no wise taste of death till they see the kingdom of God come with power.' Mt. enlarges it 'till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom,' while Lk. has simply 'till they see the kingdom of God—a change which makes interpretation easy, but which removes from the words all the allusion to such historic Comings as are implied by Mt. and not excluded by Mk.

(2) 'The Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then shall he render unto every man according to his deeds. Verily I say unto you, There be some of them that stand here, which shall in no wise taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom' (Mt 16²⁷⁻²⁸). Jesus predicts here two 'Comings'—one at the end of the world, when He returns in the glory of His Father to judge the world, the other within the lifetime of some of those present. Opinions may differ as to when this latter was fulfilled, whether at the Transfiguration, or at the Resurrection, or at Pentecost, or at the destruction of Jerusalem, or at each of these in turn; but unless we are to convict Jesus of error of judgment, we cannot hold that He identified any of these with His final coming to judgment. So that here, as in the words to Caiaphas, we find necessarily a prediction in mysterious language of His 'historic Comings'—a prediction that time would explain to His disciples by fulfilling.

(3) 'Ye shall not have gone through the cities of Israel, till the Son of Man be come' (Mt 10²³). These words are a fragment peculiar to Mt., and occur in the charge of Jesus to the Apostles when sending them out. Much of this charge as given by Mt. is found in different connexions in the other Synoptics; it is therefore impossible to say whether this particular prediction was spoken at the time given by Mt., but this doubt does not enable us to conclude that it never was spoken at all. On the contrary, the great difficulty on the face of the saying renders it the more certain that it was spoken by Him on some occasion. Further, it should be noticed that it occurs in that Gospel which, as we have seen, records most fully those sayings of our Lord which refer to His 'Comings' (16²⁷⁻²⁸). We therefore are right in seeing in the words a prediction of His 'Coming' at the Resurrection, or at Pentecost, or at the destruction of Jerusalem.

(4) 'The lesser Apocalypse of Jesus' is a title sometimes given to His discourse found in Lk 17²²⁻³⁸. Having told the Pharisees that the Kingdom of God was 'among them,' He turned to His disciples and told them that in the future they would desire to see 'one of the days of the Son of Man' but would not see it; but that when 'his day' did come, there would be no mistaking it, as it would shine as lightning and come as suddenly. He, however, would have first to suffer many things and be rejected. He then told them that as 'in the days' of Noah and of Lot (vv. 26, 28), worldliness predominated until 'the day' that Noah entered the ark and Lot left Sodom (vv. 27, 29), so would it be in 'the days of the Son of Man' until 'the day' when He would be revealed (vv. 26, 30). 'The days' of Noah and Lot were days of opportunity for repentance before 'the day' of retribution. So 'the days of the Son of Man' must be the period of grace that ever precedes 'the day' of His revelation in judgment, whether that judgment be the final judgment or such a penal visitation as the destruction of Jerusalem. That the immediate reference in the passage is to the latter, follows from the warning contained in the next verses, bidding those on the housetop not come down and those in the field not return home (v. 31). These words could not possibly apply to the final return of Jesus, but must have been spoken in reference to the flight from the city before its destruction. And as that impending doom drew near, as the atmosphere became weighted with forebodings of coming calamity, and as their hearts failed them for fear (21²⁶), then they would desire 'one of the days of the Son of Man'—one of those days of God's patient waiting; but they would not see it, for all was ripened to judgment. 'His day' of vengeance was at hand. He concluded this section with 'where the body is, thither will the vultures also be gathered together' (17³⁷)—enigmatic words whereby He told His disciples that when the circumstances became ripe, the event would happen. Then followed the parable of the Unrighteous Judge (18¹), bidding God's 'elect' pray importunately for relief during the days of trial; and, lastly, came the sorrowful question of Jesus, whether, notwithstanding the certainty of His deliverance of His people, He, when He comes, shall 'find faith on the earth' (v. 8). The worldliness of the days of Noah and Lot supply the answer.

(5) The discourse found in its simplest form in Mk 13 (cf. Mt 24, Lk 21) is the most elaborate recorded prophecy of Jesus, and presents to interpreters many and serious difficulties; but what has been said on the four preceding passages lessens the difficulties and points to the solution. Some scholars get rid of all that puzzles by assuming that the Evangelists inserted portions of a current Jewish-Christian Apocalypse throughout the discourse of Jesus. (For a good statement of this position, and for the various authorities, see Moffatt, Historical New Test. p. 637; and for a good exposition on conservative lines, see Briggs, Messiah of the Gospels, pp. 132-165).

It might be enough to object to such a radical solution by pointing out the entire absence of any external evidence; but, further, it should be said that it seems incredible that the Evangelists should, by this sort of literary patchwork, have concocted a discourse so difficult for themselves and their readers to understand. The undeniable difficulties of the passage lead us to think that Jesus spoke the words; they also show the conscientious regard for truth that actuated those who recorded them. It must also be remembered that the difficulties found in this discourse are precisely the same in nature as those found in the four passages we have just considered, so that to suppose that extraneous Apocalyptic literature is inserted here would lead us to give a like explanation of all these other passages. But that is impossible, for no such supposition would for a moment hold, in the case, for example, of the reply of Jesus to Caiaphas. Neither on external nor on internal grounds is such a solution to be accepted.

The discourse itself must now claim our attention. The disciples, having pointed out to Jesus the splendour of the Temple buildings, receive the reply that not one stone shall be left upon another: a prediction He had previously made regarding the city of Jerusalem (Lk 19⁴³). The words evidently sank deeply into their hearts, for when they sat with Him on the Mount of Olives they asked Him privately, 'When shall these things be, and what shall be the sign when these things are all about to be accomplished?' (21⁷). They thus asked two questions: first, when it would be; secondly, what sign would herald it. Mt. enlarges the latter question into 'What shall be the sign of thy coming and of the end of the age?'; showing that the disciples connected the destruction of the Temple with Christ's return, and that they sought instruction as to whether it was not also the End or consummation of the age (συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, Mt.

13³⁰, 40, 49 28²⁰, cf. He 9²⁶). Our Lord's reply is full, both as to the time and the sign of the Temple's destruction, and is also directed to the question of His return and the end of the world. The fact that He includes these latter subjects in His reply as given in all three Gospels, goes to show that they were implicit in the shorter questions of Mk. and Lk. He first tells them that it will not be when false Christs arise and when nation rises against nation, for these things are but 'the beginnings of travail'—the birth-throes preliminary to final pains issuing in a new age—(Mk 13⁸⁻⁹); but that it will be after the gospel has been preached unto all nations, they themselves in the meantime suffering persecution; and then the end will come (Mk 13¹⁰, Mt 24¹⁴).

He then spoke of the sign, which would be that predicted by Daniel, namely, 'the abomination of desolation,' which would warn of the imminent destruction of the Temple. He further told them that that would occur at a period of unprecedented affliction, and He bade them, when they saw the sign, escape at once to the mountains (Mk 13¹⁴⁻²⁰, Mt 24¹⁵⁻²², Lk 21²⁰⁻²⁴).

Having thus spoken of the time and the sign of the destruction, He passed on to speak of His 'Coming,' which He announced as following 'immediately' upon the tribulation which He had just described. In Mk. we read, 'In those days, after that tribulation (Mt 24²⁹ 'immediately' (εὐθέως) after . . .)', the sun shall be darkened . . . and then shall they see the Son of Man coming in the clouds, . . . and he shall send forth his angels and gather together his elect from the four winds . . . Thus both Evangelists make the coming of the Son of Man follow 'immediately' upon the foretold tribulation which was to preface the destruction of the Temple.

Briggs (Messiah of Gospels, p. 155) ascribes to the vibias of Mt. a prophetic sense similar to קָרוֹב of the OT. The events were near to the vision of the prophet, but not necessarily near in actual history. But this does not get over the 'in those days' of Mk., which is almost as definite as the 'immediately' of Mt.

The question at once arises, whether those words can be taken as describing the judgment of the city and Temple. As far as the signs in heaven are concerned, we may say Yes; for these theophanic signs may justly be taken as imagery of the spiritual. Thus Peter interprets the heavenly portents foretold by Joel as fulfilled in the outpouring of the Spirit (Ac 2^{16, 19}). But as regards the gathering together of the elect from the uttermost parts of the earth, we must say No. In no sense can this be said to have taken place when Jerusalem fell. What, then, we are to conclude is as follows: Jesus here foretold His 'Comings'; He wished His disciples to look forward to an early judgment on the guilty city and church, and He wished them also to look forward to a time of ingathering to take place at the consummation of all things. As He had done before (Mk 8^{38 9¹}), so now He spoke of these two events, one nigh at hand, the other far in the distant future, both as 'Comings' of Himself; but the two Evangelists, untaught as yet by events, were unable to separate in their records that which to His own mind was distinct. This view is much strengthened by our finding that that Evangelist who wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem was able then to distinguish what to them was confused. It is very remarkable that Lk., instead of placing the final return of Christ immediately after the tribulation, inserts a clause which makes the entire Christian dispensation intervene. He writes, 'Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled' (Lk 21²⁴); and thus makes room for the ages of evangelization that intervene between the destruction of Jerusalem and the Parousia.

The discourse closed with two remarkable statements: first, that that generation would not pass away until all those things were accomplished (Mk 13³⁰, Mt 24³⁴, Lk 21³²); second, that none save the Father, not even the Son, knew 'that day and hour' (Mk 13³², Mt 24³⁶). That the Evangelists should have placed side by side two such apparently conflicting utterances, can be explained only by assuming their certain knowledge that Jesus had spoken them, and by their extreme fidelity to truth. To apply both sayings to the same event makes Jesus say, 'I do not know the exact day or hour, but I know that it will occur within the lifetime of some of those present.' But the words are far too strong for such a meaning. He never would have asseverated so strongly in such a connexion the ignorance of the angels in heaven and of Himself as Son. What He evidently meant was, that He Himself would visit the Temple and city in judgment, and level them even with the ground within that generation; but that the day and hour of His final return in glory were unknown even to Himself. 'That day' is used frequently as synonymous with 'last day,' indeed appears to be always used in that sense where the antecedent is not plainly indicated, and so must be taken in that sense here (Mt 7²² 26²⁹, Lk 10¹² 21³⁴, 2 Th 1¹⁰, 2 Ti 1^{12, 18} 4⁸).

Mt. appends a series of parables which illustrate and spiritually apply the great lessons of the discourse. Jesus told His hearers to watch; for if the master of the house had kept awake, the thief would not have entered. They are to be diligent and faithful as trusted servants, so that they may receive the blessing from their Master when He returns (Mt 24^{42, 51}). By the parable of the Ten Virgins He cautioned them against indolence creeping upon them because of His delay in coming. By the parable of the Talents He taught them that definite duties are entrusted to them during 'the long time' of His absence, but that on His return He will proportionately reward faithful service and punish neglect. And, finally, by the parable of the Sheep and the Goats He pictured in majestic language the great culmination of His ministerial office, when, seated on the throne of glory, He will dispense to assembled humanity the justice which their deeds of love or selfishness have merited.

The historic Comings, which are, as we have seen, so largely predicted by the Synoptists, are as plainly taught by John; in fact, it is even more impossible in the Fourth Gospel than in the first three to narrow down the sayings of Jesus that refer to His 'Comings' to any one event. When He says, 'I will come again, and receive you unto myself' (14³), His meaning cannot be exhausted by referring the words to Pentecost, or to death, or to the Parousia; rather does it include all these. Similarly, 'I will not leave you desolate: I come to you' (14¹⁸), is not sufficiently interpreted by referring the words to the Resurrection, or to Pentecost, or to personal spiritual revelations; but must include all these.

In both these verses the Greek is not in the future tense but present (ἔρχομαι), meaning not 'I will come,' but 'I come, at all times I am coming' (see Westcott, l.c.; see also 16^{16, 22} 21²²). This view of repeated 'Comings' does not prevent John from teaching the great Final Advent, for he records the words of Jesus which foretell the hour when the dead in their graves shall hear His voice (5²⁸); and in his Epistles uses the word παρουσία in exactly the same sense as it is used by Matthew, James, and Paul (1 Jn 2²⁸; cf. Mt 24³, Ja 5⁷, 1 Co 15²⁵).

The predictions of Jesus carry us even beyond His Parousia. They tell us that His Coming will be the signal for the resurrection of the dead, both bad and good alike (Jn 5^{28, 29}), and that that resurrection will be followed by the judgment of mankind. It is revealed that He Himself will be the Judge, and that before the throne of His glory will be gathered the entire human race in order that they may receive the just recompense for their deeds (Mt 25^{31st}), each individual receiving his merited sentence (Mt 25³² 22¹¹ 16²⁷). The judgment will thus be universal and individual. It is further revealed that the decisions of that judgment will be 'age-long' in their consequences. On the one hand, the guilty will suffer from 'the unquenchable fire' and 'the undying worm' (Mk 9⁴⁴. 46. 48); they will be shut out from the marriage feast of the King's Son, and condemned to 'outer darkness' (Mt 22¹³ 8¹² 25³⁰). On the other hand, the righteous will pass in with the Bridegroom to the marriage (25¹⁰), will enter into the joy of their Lord (25²¹), will be received unto Himself (Jn 14³), and will behold His glory (17²⁴).

As regards the predicted bliss of the pardoned, there can be no doubt that Jesus taught that it was of eternal duration, for that bliss is naught but the gift of life, and that life is the life of God Himself, and so necessarily is everlasting as He is everlasting (Jn 1⁴ 5²⁶⁻²⁹, cf. 1 Jn 5^{11, 12}). His teaching regarding the duration of the punishment of the wicked, however, is less plain. Much of His language is highly figurative, and may have been used by Him only to express the terrible punishment that awaits unrepented sin in the next world, without precluding the hope that God will finally win all to Himself by love; a hope that not a few passages in the later books of the NT suggest.

V. The prophetic office of the Ascended Christ.—We must not conceive of the prophetic office of Jesus as ceasing with His ascension; for it, no less than the priestly and kingly, belongs to His essential activities as the Redeemer of men. Error as well as sin blights human life, and truth as well as righteousness is needed to restore the fallen, and therefore from the right hand of God He still teaches the world He loves.

1. His prophetic work is carried on by Him through the instrumentality of His Church, which is inspired by His Spirit. It is not that He has transferred His teaching office from Himself to the Church, but that He Himself still teaches the world through her. When the earliest preachers of the gospel proclaimed their message, He, though enthroned, worked with them and confirmed the word with signs following (Mk 16²⁰); and it was His Spirit—'the Spirit of Jesus'—that prevented Paul the missionary from entering Bithynia (Ac 16⁷), and that thus directed his steps as a teacher to Europe. In a word, the Church in her teaching office is taught, confirmed, and guided by Jesus Christ, her ever-living Prophet.

2. Shortly after the Church started on her career, the inherent prophetic power, which she possessed by her union with Christ, exhibited itself in a recognized order of prophets,—men and women who preached under the influence of direct inspiration, and who at times were able to foretell the future. These prophets were placed by St. Paul second in his list of Church ministrants (1 Co 12²⁸, Eph 4¹¹). Their natural tendency towards independence by and by brought them into collision with the Church's authoritative organizations; and their ministry of enthusiasm, under the pressure of the more regular and constant ministrations, gradually fell into disuse.

3. But the many movements claiming inspiration throughout her history tell us that the prophetic Spirit is ever present, though perhaps slumbering, within the Christian body. It is difficult to see how such a gift as prophecy, which by its spontaneity refuses to be bound by fixed rules, can coexist, without confusion, as a power along with the stated ministry; but not the least need of the present life of the Church is the discovery of means whereby she may develop her organized existence as a community, and at the same time permit the free utterance of those direct spiritual communications which she may receive from Christ her Prophet.

PROPHETESS.—Among OT prophetesses may be named Miriam (Ex 15²⁰), and esp. Deborah (Jg 4f.) and Huldah (2 K 22¹⁴, 2 Ch 34²²). The prophetess Noadiah opposed Nehemiah (Neh 6¹⁴). While it was the exception for women to be called to the prophetic office, they were by no means excluded from it, and it is manifest that Deborah and Huldah made a deep impress upon their contemporaries. The only mention of a prophetess in the Gospels is that of Anna, who recognized the infant Messiah when His parents presented Him in the Temple (Lk 2³⁶). She was of the tribe of Asher, and had lived to a great age, being probably a good deal over a hundred years old. She spoke to the pious worshippers in the Temple concerning the work of Jesus. See ANNA. JOHN R. SAMPEY.

PROPITIATION.—The idea of propitiation is directly expressed in the NT by the words ἰλάσκειν, ἰλασμός, and ἰλαστήριον, which occur but six times. The verb is found in Lk 18¹³, He 2¹⁷, the substantive in 1 Jn 2² 4¹⁰; ἰλαστήριον, be it adjective or substantive, in Ro 3²⁵, He 9⁵. As the ground of reconciliation and atonement, it is the innermost truth in reference to Christ's redemptive work.

The word ἰλάσκειν came down from classic usage through the LXX into the writings of the NT. As used in the latter, it refers to the relation of Christ's work to sin. We are interested chiefly in this article, therefore, in tracing the meaning it had in the LXX in reference to the sin- and guilt-offerings. It was used to render the Heb. kippur, 'to cover.' That which constituted the emblematic cover which hid sin from God so that He could act as though it did not exist, was the shed blood (or life) of the sacrificial victim. In the narrow limits of this article it is only possible to refer to the conclusions reached by eminent scholars with whom the writer ventures in general to agree. He would mention especially Prof. W. P. Paterson's art. 'Sacrifice' in Hastings' DB, where the conclusion is reached that 'the expiation of guilt is the leading purpose of Levitical sacrifices,' and that the expiation is accomplished through the sacrifice taking the place of the offender, and its death being accepted in place of his. While this seems the manifest import of the Levitical sin- and guilt-offerings with which we are in this discussion concerned, it is pretty certain that this was the view of the Jews in our Lord's time. As Holtzmann says (Neutest. Theol. p. 68), 'Everything pressed towards the assumption that the offering of a life substituted for sinners according to God's appointment, cancelled the death penalty which had been incurred, and that consequently the offered blood of the sacrificial victim expiated sin as the surrogate for the life of the guilty.'

1. In the teaching of our Lord.—The single instance in which our Lord is reported to have used the word ἰλάσκειν, in Lk 18¹³, has little bearing on the question whether He thought His work a propitiation. This question must be considered on the broader ground of His thought of the relation in which His work stood to the Levitical sacrifices out of which the idea of propitiation grew. Now, the Evangelists believed much relating to His birth, lifework, and death to be the fulfilment of OT prophecy (Mt 1²³ 2⁶. 18 3³ 4¹⁵. 16 12¹⁸⁻²¹ 13³⁵ 21⁵ etc.). They evidently got this impression from our Lord Himself, who saw the OT fulfilled in Himself (Mt 11¹⁰ 13¹⁴. 15 21⁴², but esp. Mt 5¹⁷ and Lk 24¹³⁻³¹). He did not view His work and teaching as a break in the continuity of religious historical development, but as woven into its evolving progress. He came to fill the Law and the Prophets full of a new meaning by stripping them of Rabbinic accretions and revealing their deepest spiritual import. He saw His life and death related to Moses (the Law) and all the Prophets.

In view of this general conception, we must interpret our Lord's references to His death. The place His death had in His thought, apart from the more direct teaching as to its purpose and import, makes it plain that it was deemed of paramount importance in His mission work. Interpreting His words at His baptism (Mt 3¹⁵ 'Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness') in the light of Mt 20^{22, 23}, but especially of His words in Lk 12⁵⁰ ('I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished'), it would seem that His death was before Him from the first as an essential part of His mission. Of the same meaning is Mk 2²⁰ (cf. Mt 9¹⁵, Lk 5³⁵) of the taking away of the bridegroom. He foretold that His resurrection would follow His death (Mt 12⁴⁰ || Lk 11²⁹). He dwelt upon the details of His betrayal and death (Mt 16²¹, cf. Mk 8³¹ 10³²⁻³⁴, Lk 9²²). In connexion with these prophetic statements He gives the warning: 'He that doth not take his cross and follow after me, is not worthy of me,' and 'he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it' (Mt 10^{38, 39} 16^{24, 25}, cf. Mk 8^{34, 35} and Lk 9^{23, 24}, see also Jn 8²⁸), referring, doubtless, to the manner of His death.

On coming down from the Transfiguration, He forbade the three to mention what they had witnessed till He was risen from the dead (Mt 17⁹, cf. Mk 8³⁰), and Lk 9³¹ declares that Moses and Elijah talked with Jesus of His death as of supreme moment. As the end drew near, He dwelt more upon His death and resurrection (Mt 17^{22, 23} 20^{18, 19} 21³³⁻⁴⁰, cf. Mk 12⁶⁻⁸, Jn 10¹¹). The great space given to the circumstances connected with our Lord's death seems to show that the Evangelists saw in it the culmination of His redemptive work.

But our Lord connects Himself more explicitly with the sacrificial system. In Lk 22²⁷ He identifies Himself with the Servant of Jehovah of Is 53, as 'he was reckoned with the transgressors.' In Mt 20²⁸ (cf. Mk 10⁴⁵) He says that He is to 'give his life a ransom for (ἀντί 'in the place of') many.' At the solemn institution of the Supper (Mt 26²⁸, cf. Mk 14²⁴, Lk 22²⁰), the wine is said to represent 'my blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many unto the remission of sins.' He was also to give His 'flesh for the life of the world' (Jn 6⁵¹⁻⁵⁶). St. John also identifies Him with the Suffering Servant of Jehovah of Is 53, in Jn 12³⁸. The words of the Baptist: 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1²⁹), probably also are in terms of Is 53, as the Servant of Jehovah, 'bruised for our iniquities,' like the sacrificial lamb, endured death silently.

From all these lines of evidence it is impossible to escape the conclusion that our Lord and the Evangelists considered His death to be of paramount importance in His mission, and gave it this value because it stood to the sins of the world in a similar relation to that which the Levitical sacrifices held to the sins of the Jews.

If the conclusion be accepted that these sacrifices were expiatory and vicarious, we have a clear idea of the purpose our Lord supposed His death served. Neither need we wonder that He taught so little about the purport of His death. The false notions of His Kingdom entertained by His disciples made them invincibly opposed to His establishing it through the Cross instead of a crown. They were 'foolish and slow of heart' (Lk 24²⁵). Consequently He had 'many things to say' to them which they could not bear before His death shattered their false ideas (Jn 16¹⁻¹⁵). It was only then that this fuller instruction could be given and was promised. Immediately after His resurrection He began to instruct His disciples as to the meaning of His mission and death as they stood related to the Law and the Prophets (Lk 24^{26, 27}). They were not the men to invent an interpretation of His death, or to go back to Levitical explanations without His sanction. They revered Him too much to break consciously with His thought. The confidence with which they taught, beginning with Pentecost, can be explained only by their receiving from our Lord Himself and from the promised Spirit a certain knowledge of the nature of His work. Any view which makes our Lord's mission a break with the religious development either before or after, but much more with both, has against it the strongest conceivable presumption. St. Paul, St. Peter, and St. John all believed themselves to be giving our Lord's own view of the purport of His work. They were in a better position to know His own thought of Himself and His mission than any at this late time of day. From them we can get the clearest light on our Lord's own conception of the purpose served by His life and death.

2. In the teaching of the Apostles.—While we may have the key to the innermost meaning of our Lord's mission work in the forms of the word ἱλάσκεσθαι, they must be interpreted in the perspective of the general teaching of the Epistles. While the word 'propitiation' is used so seldom, the idea that our Lord's work was a propitiation is woven into the warp and woof of them all. The whole aim of Hebrews is to show that Christ, as a priest representing the people, and as a sacrifice, expiated their sin, and was the antitype of the old priesthood and sacrifices. He was, as the Passover lamb, sacrificed for men without the breaking of a bone (Jn 19³⁶, 1 Co 5^{7, 8}, cf. Ex 12⁴⁰); He was a sin-offering (Ro 8³, He 13¹¹). As in the Levitical sacrifices for sin, the shed blood, representing the life given up, was the propitiation, so emphasis is laid upon the blood of Christ in His redemptive work (Ro 5⁹, Eph 1⁷ 2¹³, Col 1¹⁴⁻²⁰, Heb. passim, 1 P 1¹⁹, 1 Jn 1⁷, Rev 1⁵ 5⁹ etc.). The blood of Christ is said to be the blood of sprinkling, because the blood of the sacrifices was sprinkled (1 P 1², He 12²⁴). We must, then, interpret the definite words ἱλάσκεσθαι, ἱλασμός, and ἱλαστήριον in the light of the envolving conception of Christ as the antitype of the old sin- and guilt-offerings, which was held by those who used them.

(a) St. Paul.—The earliest, as well as the most important, instance is in Ro 3^{25, 26} 'whom God set forth to be a propitiation (ἱλαστήριον), through faith, by his blood, to show his righteousness because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God; for the showing of his righteousness at this present season: that he might himself be just, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus.' According to St. Paul's conception, Christ is a propitiation in (ἐν) His blood or death, and because He manifests or demonstrates the righteousness of God. The righteousness of God demanded this demonstration to vindicate it against the suspicion of its violation which might arise because of the passing over of sins done aforetime, and of the justification of the believer at the present season. The nature of this righteousness is also evident. It is that in God which demands that sins be punished and not passed over in forbearance, and that sinners be condemned and not justified. It is that in God which is cast under suspicion when the reverse of this is done, and therefore needs demonstration and vindication. It is subjective righteousness in God. It is true that God provided the propitiation which His righteousness demands, and He does this in love (Ro 5⁸), but all the same, the propitiation to demonstrate His righteousness had to be provided by love in order to vindicate righteousness in 'passing over' sins in forbearance and in 'justifying' on the condition of faith. To confound righteousness and love in their manifestations, would be to remove the very ground of the problem involved in being just and justifying. Neither is the faith which might be aroused by the setting forth of Christ in His blood that which has propitiatory value. The righteousness of God had to be vindicated by this very propitiation in the case of those who had faith in Jesus. Christ in His blood constitutes the propitiation. It becomes effective as a propitiation, through faith.

In what sense, then, does St. Paul regard our Lord as a propitiation? How could He in His blood or death demonstrate God's righteousness, which demanded that sins be punished and not passed over, and that the ungodly be condemned and not justified when the reverse of this took place? Could it be in any other way than that, in the death of Christ, the righteousness of God which made these demands received a satisfaction for the sins of men of the same kind as would have been paid if God had let His punitive wrath (Ro 1¹⁸) fall upon the transgressor? In His death Christ endured the just desert of sin (Ro 6²³), as 'him who knew no sin he (God) made to be sin on our behalf' (2 Co 5²¹). He could in consequence pass over sins in forbearance, and justify the believer though ungodly (Ro 4⁵), and His righteousness would not be tarnished but demonstrated, because Christ stood for sinners, and all died in His death (2 Co 5¹⁴). This is the natural interpretation of the passage itself. It also brings it into accord with St. Paul's general circle of ideas. It is in harmony with the central idea of the Levitical sacrifices for sin from which the pivotal word ἱλαστήριον is derived. In it the thought of our Lord in Mt 20²⁸ || Mk 10⁴⁵ ('give his life a ransom [λύτρον] in the stead of [ἀντί] all'), and Mt 26²⁸ etc., is reflected and expanded. The historical continuity of thought between the OT and our Lord, and our Lord and St. Paul, is also preserved.

(b) St. John.—As St. Paul, in viewing Christ as a propitiation, lays emphasis upon His demonstration of the Divine righteousness, St. John sees in His propitiation a demonstration of the Divine love. Taking the two instances where He is said to be a propitiation (ἱλασμός, 1 Jn 2⁴⁰), we find that He is a propitiation for sins. The sending of Christ as a propitiation was prompted by God's love, not as a return for man's love. The propitiation was for the whole world, and not for those alone who should be saved. It is Jesus Christ the Righteous who is the propitiation, apparently showing that His propitiatory work had a peculiar relation to righteousness. As St. John had just referred to our Lord's blood as cleansing from all sin (1 Jn 1⁷), it is plain that he thought of Christ in His blood or death as the propitiation. Neither is He the propitiation for sins because of any cleansing or other work wrought in men as a consequence of His work and death; for He is the propitiation for the whole world, many of whom will never be purified or subjectively changed by or through it. The propitiation is due to a work for us, and not in us, except as a consequence. It must then, in itself, have reference to God, and not to a work in men's hearts. This brings these passages into harmony with the Johannine conception in Revelation. There it is ever as the Lamb that was slain—the antitype of the sacrificial victim—that He is spoken of, and that His blood is said to purify and redeem (Rev 5^{6, 8, 12} 6¹ etc., cf. 1⁵ 5⁹ 7¹⁴ etc.). St. John's whole view of Christ as the antitype of the sacrificial victims, in connexion with his statement (1 Jn 2²) that He is the propitiation for the whole world, can be explained only on the ground that he thought of Christ's propitiatory work as having primarily an efficacy Godward, and manward only as a consequence.

(c) The Epistle to the Hebrews.—According to He 2¹⁷, propitiation is made for sin. It is made by Christ as the antitype of the high-priesthood of the OT. From the whole scope of the Epistle up to 10³⁰ it is made as He offers His own blood as the perfect antitype of the imperfect sacrificial system of the old economy, which was thereby fulfilled and then abolished. Through His sacrifice a 'purification of sins' (1³), a cleansing of the 'conscience from dead works' (9¹⁴), is wrought, and access to God assured (10⁹⁻²²). The eternal takes the place of the temporal, the perfect of the imperfect, the inward of the outward and fleshly, the real of the symbolical and typical. To the question whether Christ's work effected something objectively for us as well as provided for a subjective work in us, the answer is clear. By His sacrificial death He 'made purification of sins' (1³), 'obtained eternal redemption' (9¹²), 'put away sin' (9²⁶), 'perfected for ever them who are sanctified' (10¹⁴). All this is regarded as already accomplished for us in Christ's sacrificial death, and not as still to be wrought in us through its influence. This work for us, as prior to that in us, is its necessary condition and ground, as apart from the shedding of blood there is no remission (9²²). The author of Hebrews uses 'sanctify,' 'purify,' and 'perfect' in these passages in the Pauline sense of 'justify.'

The sacrifices of which that of Christ was the antitype did not give access to God's favour by removing a hindrance within the soul of the offerer, but by removing one that was objective. The interpretation which would make the author of Hebrews restrict the efficacy of Christ's work to its influence upon men, dislocates it from its whole setting, destroys its plainest antitypical significance, and would make his meaning unintelligible to the Hebrew readers for whom it was doubtless prepared. Neither are there wanting hints as to how Christ's work had this objective efficacy. The emphasis put upon the fitness of Christ's sharing man's nature and condition in order to do His work for them as high priest and sacrifice (ch. 2) is significant, and the statement that He tasted death for every man (2⁹) and bore the sins of many (9²⁸), taken in connexion with His antitypical relation to the sacrificial system, can scarcely mean less than that He represented men in some way, so that He could bear their sins for them and die on their behalf.

What, then, does 'to make propitiation for the sins of the people' (εἰς τὸ ἱλασθεῖν τὰς ἀμαρτίας) mean as embedded in the author's general thought? The verb is in the middle voice with an active sense. Doubtless Winer is right in regarding it as elliptical, and meaning 'to propitiate God for the sins of the people.' The condition of making the propitiation is Christ's identification with humanity in nature and condition. The propitiatory value is in His blood, as He tastes death for every man so as to bear the sins of all, in a way analogous to that in which the sacrificial victim bore those of the offerer. The propitiation thus effected was objective for us, and not subjective in us. Through it forgiveness and access to God are possible. The propitiation puts away sin once for all—puts it out of the way as an obstacle to the Divine favour and forgiveness. How the sin is removed by His death is not explicitly stated, but the whole sweep of thought is favourable to the view that it was as a satisfaction to that in God which sin offends—call it holiness or righteousness as one will—and is in substantial agreement with St. Paul's conception. The view that the author of Hebrews thought of propitiation as effected by a 'mysterious inherent quality' he attributed to Christ's blood giving it direct 'inherent power to cleanse the life' (Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation, p. 88 f.), is too rapid to be credited to him.

If the writer of this article has succeeded in correctly interpreting Scripture thought on this central doctrine, then our Lord neither broke with the thought of the OT, nor did the writers of the Epistles break with His conception. They were interpreting His death in the fuller light of His own teachings after His resurrection and with the Spirit's help. We are justified in interpreting His own allusions to what was done by His death in view of both. Beneath the superficial variations due to the aspects of truth treated and the special aim of each of the NT writers, there is an underlying unity of thought as to what was effected by the death of Christ, and how it had efficacy to this end. C. GOODSPEED.

PROSELYTE.—1. Derivation of the name.—προσῆλυτος (from προσέρχομαι) means lit. 'one who has arrived at a place,' hence 'a stranger,' 'a sojourner.' In the LXX it is frequently used as the equivalent of the Heb. גֵר (see Expos. IV. x. [1894] p. 264). By NT times it had acquired the technical meaning of 'one who was a convert to Judaism from heathendom,' without any indication of place of residence being involved. This special meaning had also been gradually acquired by גֵר (see W. R. Smith, *OTJC*² p. 342 n.; also Oxford Heb. Lex. s. v. גֵר), and also by the Aramaic גֵרָא (LXX γειώρας).

2. Classes of proselytes.—In the time of Christ many foreigners had fully embraced Judaism, and were called 'proselytes'; there were also others, far more numerous, who had partially adopted Jewish doctrines and customs. The latter are indicated in the NT by σεβόμενοι (Ac 13⁴⁸ 16¹⁴ 17⁴ 17¹⁸) and φοβούμενοι [ὄν ὁβόν] (10² 13¹⁶ 26). These words indicate that they revered Israel's God and in part obeyed the Law, but had not fully entered into the fellowship of Israel. These divisions correspond to those of the Mishna, where גֵר is a fully admitted proselyte, and the term חֵרֵב גֵר (lit. a resident alien) is applied to those who were more loosely attached to the Jewish worship. Later Rabbis expressed the same distinction by the phrases 'proselyte of Righteousness' (גֵר תְּרֵקָה), as contrasted with 'proselyte of the Gate' (גֵר הַשַּׁעַר).

(a) Proselytes properly so called (NT προσῆλυτος; Mishna גֵר; Rabbinic name תְּרֵקָה גֵר). These were heathen by birth, who had been admitted to full fellowship in Jewish worship. Three observances were required for their admission: (1) Circumcision. (2) Baptism, which was analogous to the ceremonial purifications so frequently required of the Jews (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 321; also Edersheim, LT II. 745). Some have maintained that the baptism of proselytes did not originate so early as the time of Christ, but the Mishna incidentally refers to it as if it had been long in use. (3) The offering of a sacrifice, by which atonement was made for the sins of the proselyte. Those thus admitted undertook to observe the whole Law (cf. Gal 5³), and they were granted privileges almost equal to those of an Israelite. Such are referred to in Mt 23¹⁵, Jn 12²⁰, Ac 2¹⁰ 6⁵ 13⁴⁸.

(b) Those denominated in the NT σεβόμενοι or φοβούμενοι (Mishna חֵרֵב גֵר; by the Rabbis חֵרֵב גֵר). The Talmud represents these as keeping what were denominated 'the seven precepts of Noah'—comprising the duties which were considered incumbent upon all men, even outside Israel (Aboda Zara, 64b). These precepts were: (1) obedience to those in authority; (2) reverence to the name of God; (3) abstinence from idolatry, (4) from fornication, (5) from stealing, (6) from murder, (7) from flesh with the blood in it (Sanh. 56b). [The decision respecting the obligations incumbent upon Gentile converts (Ac 15²⁹) shows some agreement with these precepts].

Since חֵרֵב גֵר means one permanently dwelling in the country of Israel, the Talmud involves that all who were allowed to dwell in Palestine were required to keep the precepts of Noah; but this was never actually enforced—it was theoretical only.

Persons who, without becoming full 'proselytes of Righteousness,' inclined to a greater or less extent towards Jewish doctrines and practices are referred to in the NT, Mt 8⁵⁻¹³, Lk 7¹⁻¹⁰, Ac 10² 13¹⁶ 26. 43. 50 16¹⁴ 17⁴ 17¹⁸.

3. Proselytizing in the time of Christ.—The religious restlessness of heathenism, which favoured the introduction of Oriental creeds into the West, afforded an opportunity for Jewish proselytizing. The moral earnestness and monotheism of Judaism commended it to those who, having lost faith in heathen deities, were seeking a more rational and ethical creed. The Greek-speaking Jews, who were to be found in all the great cities of the Roman Empire, carried the knowledge of the Mosaic Law into the midst of heathendom, and presented their faith in a form calculated to win the approval of their neighbours. This accommodation to their surroundings in the way of representing their creed was partly unconscious, through their contact with Gentile thought, and partly an intentional emphasizing of the moral side of Judaism, while merely national and ceremonial features which might repel inquirers were minimized (Schürer, II. ii. 297). Hence, in spite of the scorn which Roman writers heaped upon the Jews (Tac. Hist. v. 2-8; Juv. Sat. vi. and xiv.; Cic. pro Flacco, 28), numerous adherents were gained, who either fully or partially accepted Judaism (Jos. c. Apion. ii. 40, Ant. XX. ii. 3). Many of these converts were women (Jos. BJ II. xx. 2; also Ac 13⁵⁰ 16¹⁴ 17⁴).

From these proselytes a very considerable revenue was received by the Temple authorities (Jos. Ant. XIV. vii. 2). This pecuniary advantage from the spread of Judaism stimulated activity in proselytizing, such as that noticed by Christ in Mt 23¹⁵. Some Jews fraudulently enriched themselves from the gifts of proselytes (Jos. Ant. XVIII. iii. 5). Such unworthy motives for proselytizing were condemned by Jesus (Mt 23¹⁵).

Illustrations of the fanatical zeal of the Jews in making proselytes are found in Jos. Life, 23, Ant. XIII. ix. 1, xi. 3, xv. 4, XX. ii. 1, BJ II. xvi. 10, XVII. x.

The account of the Acts shows that proselytes often became converts to Christianity, and this was an important factor in the establishment of the Gentile Christian Church. The struggle between St. Paul and the Judaizers (Ac 15 and Ep. to Galatians) was an attempt on the part of Christian Pharisees to compel Gentile Christians to become 'proselytes of Righteousness.'

4. Moral quality of Jewish proselytes.—Proselytes who had accepted Judaism from pure motives must have been men of high character; nevertheless proselytes are spoken of slightly by the Talmud. Thus we read (Bab. Middah, fol. 13. 2): 'Proselytes and sodomites hinder the coming of the Messiah.' This is explained to mean that proselytes often erred through ignorance of the Law. We can readily imagine that insistence upon the minutiae of Pharisaic tradition (cf. Mt 23⁴) would tend to produce a debased character such as is charged against some in Mt 23¹⁵. Edersheim, however, suggests (LT ii. 412) that the word 'proselyte' in this passage may signify the winning of a convert to Pharisaism, rather than a convert from heathendom to Judaism.

5. Christ's relations with proselytes.—Although the number of proselytes in Palestine must have been very great, references to them in the Gospels are few. We find: (1) The centurion (Mt 8⁵⁻¹³, Lk 7¹⁻¹⁰), who was an officer in the army of Herod Antipas. There is no reason to think of him as a 'proselyte of Righteousness,' for in that case (a) he need have had no hesitation in asking Jesus to go to his house, and (b) the words of Jesus (Mt 8¹¹) would not be so suitable. But from the fact that he had built a synagogue (Lk 7⁵), he was clearly one of the wider class of adherents to Judaism, called in later days 'proselytes of the Gate' (see Edersheim, LT i. 546).—(2) The Greeks (Jn 12²⁰). From the fact that these came to attend the Feast, they would appear to have been 'proselytes of Righteousness.' (Geikie, however, Life of Christ, ii. 434, considers that they were 'proselytes of the Gate').—(3) On Mt 23¹⁵ see preceding paragraphs on 'Proselytizing' and 'Moral quality.'—(4) Pilate's wife (Mt 27¹⁹). Tradition (earliest recorded in the Gospel of Nicodemus, ch. 2) asserts that Pilate's wife was a 'proselyte of the Gate.' Origen says that she became a Christian.

F. E. ROBINSON.

PROTEVANGELIUM.—See art. FALL in vol. i. p. 571^b f.

PROVERB is the rendering of παραβολή in Lk 4²³ (RV 'parable') and of παροιμία in Jn 16^{25, 29} (RVm 'parable'). In Jn 10⁶ παροιμία is rendered 'parable' (RVm 'proverb'). Ordinarily παραβολή means 'parable,' παροιμία 'proverb'; but the words are sometimes interchanged in Hellenistic Greek. Both represent the Heb. māshāl, the primary meaning of which is 'comparison.' Such comparison lies at the base of many proverbs as well as parables; in fact many proverbs are only condensed parables; and a proverb usually sets up a single case as the type of a whole class. In the LXX māshāl is nearly always rendered παραβολή, even when a proverb is clearly meant (1 S 10¹² 24¹³ (14), 1 K 4³² (28), Ezk 12^{22, 23} 18^{2, 3}; in some of these places Aq. or Symm. substitutes παροιμία). παροιμία is found in the canonical OT only in Pr 1²⁵ (AN²; BN¹ have παιδεία); it occurs 5 times in Sirach, παραβολή 10 times; at 39² and 47¹⁷ they stand together. Thus Lk., like the LXX, uses παραβολή for 'proverb' as well as 'parable'; while Jn., on the contrary, uses παροιμία in the sense of 'figurative language, allegory' (10⁶), or 'dark saying' (16^{25, 29}) rather than 'proverb'; perhaps 'figure' best represents his use of the word. On our Lord's use of proverbs see following article.

HAROLD SMITH.

PROVERBS (JESUS' USE OF).—It is a saying of the Rabbis that 'the Law spoke in the tongue of the children of men.' And so did our Blessed Lord. He did not use the jargon of the schools, but expressed His heavenly teaching, albeit profounder than either Jewish theology or Greek philosophy, in language which the simplest could understand. The Oriental mind delights in proverbs, and Jesus, in His gracious desire to reach the hearts of His hearers, did not disdain to weave into His discourse the homely and often humorous sayings which were current in His day.

1. 'It is yet four months, and the harvest cometh' (Jn 4³⁵). It is usual to find here a note of chronology (cf. Meyer). The harvest began in April, early enough sometimes for the unleavened bread of the Passover to be baked with new flour (Orig. in Joan. xiii. § 39); and since, it is argued, the harvest was four months distant, it was in December that Jesus visited Sychar in the course of His journey from Jerusalem to Galilee. There are, however, insuperable objections to this view.

(1) December is the rainy season, and with every wayside brook running full, Jesus would not have needed to crave a drink from the woman's pitcher to slake His thirst (cf. Ps 110⁷). (2) It is incredible that, when after the Passover He retired with His disciples from Jerusalem 'into the land of Judæa' (Jn 3²²), in order doubtless to collect His thoughts and brace Himself for the commencement of His ministry, He should have protracted that season of repose for eight months. (3) Moreover, as Origen remarks, the Evangelist's explanation of the enthusiasm wherewith the Galilaëans received Him on His arrival (Jn 4⁴⁵), implies that His miracles in the capital during the Passover season were fresh in their memories.

In truth there is here no chronological datum. The logion is a husbandman's proverb, like the other which follows immediately (v. 37). The seed was sown towards the end of December, and four months elapsed ere it was ripe (see Wetstein); and the proverb conveyed the practical lesson that results mature slowly (cf. Ja 5⁷). Jesus was prepared to sow the good seed of the Kingdom and have long patience until it should ripen, and it filled His heart with surprise and gladness when He beheld His seed ripening in an hour. He spied the woman returning in haste from the town accompanied by an eager throng (Jn 4²⁸⁻³⁰), and He broke out, 'Ye have a saying (λέγετε, cf. λόγος in v. 37), It is yet four months, and the harvest cometh. Lo, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and behold the fields, that they are white for harvest!'

2. 'A prophet hath no honour in his own country, and among his own kinsfolk, and in his own house.' Jesus is reported to have quoted this proverb on two occasions (Jn 4⁴⁴, Mt 13⁵⁷ = Mk 6⁴ = Lk 4²⁴), and it was constantly exemplified in His experience. He was rejected by His townfolk of Nazareth; He was pronounced mad by His kinsfolk; His brethren did not believe in Him.

Origen (in Joan. xiii. § 54) thinks that the proverb originated in the dishonour which the prophets of Israel had always suffered at the hands of their contemporaries (cf. He 11³⁶⁻³⁸); but in truth it was not peculiarly Jewish. 'Few of the most sagacious and wise,' says Plutarch (de Exil. § 13), 'would you find cherished in their own countries.' 'Quidquid enim domi est,' says Seneca (de Benef. iii. 3), 'vile est.' 'Sordebat [Protopheta] suis,' says Pliny (HN xxxv. § 36), 'ut plerumque domestica.' Pericles would never dine abroad, lest he should be cheapened in the estimation of the company by the familiarity of social intercourse (Plut. Pericl. § 7; cf. de Impt. Chr. l. 10, § 1: 'Vellem me pluries tacuisse et inter homines non fuisse'). Cf. the ancient proverb still in vogue: 'Familiarity breeds contempt' (Chrys. in Joan. xxxiv. : ἡ γὰρ συνήθεια ὑπεταραχρῆνται τοῖς ἰσθμῖν; Bernard. Flores: 'Vulgare proverbium est, quod nimia familiaritas parit contemptum'); and the saying of the witty Frenchman that 'no man is a hero to his valet de chambre.'

3. In the course of His dispute with the people of Nazareth, Jesus quoted another proverb, 'Physician, heal thyself' (Lk 4²³). The Talmud has: 'Medice, sana claudicationem tuam' (cf. Eurip. fragm.: ἄλλων ἰατρὸς αὐτὸς ἔλκει βρῶν (ed. Witzschel, iv. p. 302); Cic. Ep. iv. 5: 'Malos medicos qui in alienis morbis profuturum se tenerent medicina scientiam, ipsi se curare non possunt' (see Wetstein)).

4. There is no saying of Jesus more astonishing than His answer to the disciple who sought permission to go and bury his father ere casting in his lot with Him: 'Leave the dead to bury their own dead' (Mt 8²¹, 22 = Lk 9⁵⁹, 60). It seems as though He were speaking here after the manner of the Rabbis, who forbade that even the burial of the dead should be allowed to interrupt the study of the Law (Wetstein on Mt 8²¹), and required that a disciple should put his teacher's claims before those of his father; 'for his father indeed brought him into this world; but his teacher, who has taught him wisdom, has introduced him into the world to come' (Taylor, Say. of Fath. iv. 17, n. 21; Schürer, HJP II. i. p. 317). Is it credible that Jesus should have rivalled the Rabbis in heartless arrogance? The difficulty disappears when it is understood that the disciple's request was merely a pretext for delay. He was quoting a flippant phrase which is current in the East to this day.

A missionary in Syria once counselled a youth to complete his education by travelling in Europe. 'I must first bury my father,' was the answer. The old gentleman was neither dead nor dying; he was in good health, and the youth meant merely that his home had the first claim upon him (Wendt, Teach. of Jesus, ii. 70, n. 1).

5. Jesus was quoting another proverb when, in answer to the man who volunteered to follow Him but craved leave first to bid his household farewell, He said: 'No one, having put his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God' (Lk 9⁶²). The OT story of Elisha's call from the plough (1 K 19¹⁹⁻²¹) seems to have leapt into His mind and suggested His reply, which is an adaptation of a common saying: 'A ploughman must bend to his work, or he will draw a crooked furrow' (Plin. HN xviii. § 49: 'Arator nisi incurvus praevaricator'; cf. Verg. Ecl. iii. 42: 'curvus arator'). 'Conveniet,' says Erasmus, 'in negotium quod absque magnis sudoribus peragi non potest.'

6. The Sermon on the Mount abounds in proverbial phrases. 'A single iota or a single tip' (Mt 5¹⁸) is like our phrase, 'The dot of an i or the stroke of a t.' It is frequent in the Talmud (cf. Lightfoot and Wetstein). 'Sound not a trumpet before thee' (6²) is a proverbial metaphor, though Calvin takes it literally, supposing that the Pharisees, those 'play-actors' (ὑποκριταί) in religion, actually blew a trumpet to summon the beggars (cf. the Greek proverb αὐτὸς ἐαυτὸν ἀλλεῖ, 'play one's own pipe,' like our 'blow one's own trumpet'; Achill. Tat. viii. 10: αὐτῆ δὲ οὐχ ὑπὸ σάλπιγγι μόνου ἀλλὰ καὶ κήρυκι μοιχεύεται).

'I have observed,' says old Thomas Fuller, 'some at the church door cast in sixpence with such ostentation that it rebounded from the bottom and rang against both sides of the basin (so that the same piece of silver was the alms and the giver's trumpet), whilst others have dropped down silent five shillings without any noise.'

'With what measure ye measure, it shall be measured to you again' (7²) is very common in the Talmud (see Wetstein; Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 225).—'Why seest thou the chip that is in thy brother's eye, but the log that is in thine own considerest not? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me cast out the chip out of thine eye, and, behold, the log is in thine own eye?' (7³, 4). This proverb is characteristically Oriental in its grotesque exaggeration, and there is no need to explain it away by supposing that 'eye' represents 'well': a chip in your neighbour's well, a log in your own (see Bruce in EGT). It is a carpenter's proverb, and has a special fitness on the lips of the Carpenter of Nazareth.

It is found in the Talmud (see Lightfoot). Cf. Baba Bathra, 15. 2: 'Cum diceret quis alicui: "Ejice festucam ex oculo tuo," respondit ille: "Ejice et tu trabem ex oculo tuo." The proverb is Jewish, but the fault which it satirizes is universal. "Many," says St. Chrysostom, "now do this. If they see a monk wearing a superfluous garment, they cast up to him the Lord's law, though themselves practising boundless extortion and covetousness every day. If they see him enjoying a somewhat piteous meal, they fall to bitter accusing, though themselves indulging daily in drunkenness and excess.'

'Give not what is holy to the dogs, neither cast your pearls before the swine' (7⁶). Cf. 2 P 2²² (Pr 26¹¹), Pr 11²², and see Wetstein. 'What man is there of you who, if his son shall ask of him a loaf, will give him a serpent; or if he shall ask of him an egg, will give him a scorpion?' (7¹⁰). There was a Greek proverb, 'For a perch a scorpion' (ἀντὶ πέρκης σκορπιόν); 'ubi quis optima captans pessima capit' (Erasm. Adag.). 'For a fish,' Wetstein explains, 'a fisherman sometimes catches a water-snake.—'Build on the sand' (eis ψάμμον οικοδομεῖς; cf. eis ψάμμον σπείρεις; see Erasm. Adag. under 'Inanis Opera') was a proverb signifying vain and unenduring labour, and it seems as though Jesus had it in His mind in His similitude of the Two Builders (Mt 7²⁴⁻²⁷ = Lk 6⁴⁷⁻⁴⁹).

7. 'If a kingdom be divided against itself, that kingdom is unable to stand; and if a house be divided against itself, that house shall be unable to stand' (Mk 3²⁴, 25 = Mt 12²⁵). A maxim of statecraft. Cf. Soph. Ant. 672-674:

ἀναρχίας δὲ μείζων οὐκ ἔστιν κακόν.
αὐτῆ πόλεις ἄλλουσιν, ἢ δ' ἀναστάτους οἴκους τίθησιν.

Xen. Mem. iv. 4. § 16: ἀνευ δὲ ὁμοιοῦς οὐτ' ἂν πόλις εἴη πολιτευθεῖη οὔτε οἶκος καλῶς οἰκηθεῖη.

8. 'Prudent as the serpents and simple as the doves' (Mt 10¹⁶). The serpent was a symbol of sharp-sightedness, and the dove, like the sheep, of simplicity and gentleness. Erasmus (Adagia) quotes the proverbs ὄφεις ὄμμα and πρᾶτερος περιστέρως (cf. Rabbinical comment on Ca 2¹⁴: 'Deus dixit Israelitis: "Erga me sunt integri scint columbae, sed erga gentes astuti sunt sicut serpentes";' see Wetstein).

9. 'He that hath found his life shall lose it, and he that hath lost his life for my sake shall find it' (Mt 10⁸⁰). 'Proverbium est militare' (Wetstein). Jesus here addresses the Twelve like a general exhorting his troops on the eve of battle.

Cf. Xenophon to the Ten Thousand: 'I have observed that as many as yearn to live by every means in warfare, these, for the most part, die evilly and shamefully; but as many as have recognized that death is common to all and necessary for men, and strive to die nobly, these I see rather arriving at old age, and, while they live, passing their days more blessedly' (Anab. iii. i. 43). Epict. iv. 1. § 165 (of Socrates): τούτων οὐκ ἴσται σώσασθαι αἰσχρῶς, ἀλλὰ ἀποθνήσκου σωζέσθαι, οὐ ρεῖζον. Juv. viii. 83. 84:

'Summum crede nefas animam preferre pudori
Et propter vitam vivendi perdere causas.'

10. 'If a blind man guide a blind, both shall fall into a ditch' (Mt 15¹⁴; cf. 23²⁴). Cf. Hor. Epp. i. 17. 3-4: 'Ut si caecus iter monstrare velit.' Wetstein quotes Sext. Empir. Hyg. Pyrrh. iii. 29: οὐδὲ τυφλὸν ὀδηγεῖν δύναται τυφλός.

11. One misses the spirit of the conversation between Jesus and the Syrophenician woman (Mt 15²¹⁻²⁸ = Mk 7²⁴⁻³⁰) unless one observes that it is a bandying of proverbs. The scene was evidently the lodging of Jesus and the Twelve. The woman had followed them indoors [in Mk 7²⁵ Tischendorf, after NLD, reads εἰσεθούσα], and she pressed her suit as they reclined at table. Perhaps a dog was in the apartment begging scraps. 'It is not right,' says Jesus, quoting an apt proverb, 'to take the children's bread and cast it to the whelps.' Cf. the Greek adage: 'You feed dogs, and do not feed yourself' (αὐτὸν οὐ τρέφω κύνas τρέφεις), which Erasmus (Adag. under 'Absurda') thus explains:

'It was said of one who, while too poor to procure the necessaries of life, endeavoured to maintain an establishment of horses or servants. It will be appropriately employed against those who, by reason of the narrowness of their means, have scarce enough to maintain life, yet ambitiously endeavour to emulate the powerful and wealthy in fineness of dress and general ostentation. In short, it will be suitable to all who regard the things which belong to pleasure or magnificence, neglecting the things which are more necessary.

There was another proverb: 'Never be kind to a neighbour's dog' (μη ποτ' εδ ερδεν γειτονος κυνα), otherwise put: 'One who feeds a strange dog gets nothing but the rope to keep' (ος κυνα τρεφει ξενον, τουτω μουν λινος μενει).

'The proverb warns you against uselessly wasting kindness in a quarter whence no profit will accrue to you in return. A neighbour's dog, after being well fed, goes back to his former master' (ib. under 'Ingratitudo').

It was some such proverb that shaped our Lord's speech to the woman. He was not speaking after the heartless and insolent manner of the Rabbis, who branded the Gentiles as 'dogs' (cf. Megill. Ex. 12. 6: "An holy convocation to you": to you, not to dogs; to you, not to strangers.' Pirk. Eliez. 29: 'He who eats with an idolater is like one that eats with a dog: for, as a dog is uncircumcised, so also is an idolater'). And the woman replied in like terms: 'Yea, Lord, for even the whelps eat of the crumbs that fall from the table of their masters.' Here also, it would appear, there is a proverb. Damis of Nineveh, the Boswell of Apollonius of Tyana, was once sneered at for the diligence wherewith he recorded his master's sayings and doings, taking note of every trifle. 'If,' he replied, 'there be feasts of gods and gods eat, certainly they have also attendants who see to it that even the scraps of ambrosia are not lost' (Philostr. Apoll. i. 19). It may be added that there is an Arabic proverb: 'It is better to feed a dog than a man,' the reason alleged being that the dog will not forget the kindness, but the man may (PEFQSt, July 1904, p. 271).

12. 'The gates of Hades' (Mt 16¹⁸). Cf. Is 38¹⁰, Job 38¹⁷, Ps 9¹³ 107¹⁸; Hom. Il. ix. 312-313:

εχθρος γαρ μοι κεινος ομως Αιδαο πύλησιν, ος χ' ετερον μεν κεύθην ενι φρεσιν άλλο δε ειση.

13. 'It is better if a heavy millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were flung into the sea' (Mt 18⁶ = Mk 9⁴² = Lk 17³). Cf. Kidd. 29. 2: 'Dicit Samuel, Traditio est ut ducat quis uxorem et postea applicet se ad discendam Legem. At R. Jochanan dicit: Non molâ collo ejus appensâ addicet se ad studium Legis.' The proverb was derived from the punishment of drowning. At Athens criminals were flung, with stones about their necks, into the Barathrum, a dark, well-like chasm (Aristoph. Equit. 1359-60; Schol. on Plut. 431). In B.C. 38 the Galileans rose against Herod, and drowned his adherents in the Lake (Jos. Ant. xiv. xv. 10).

14. The narrow gate and the two ways (Mt 7¹³, 14 = Lk 13²⁴). There is here an allusion to a favourite image of the ancient moralists which had passed into a proverb. 'Vice,' says Hesiod (B.C. 850-800), 'even in troops may be chosen easily; smooth is the way, and it lieth very nigh. But in front of Virtue the immortal gods have put sweat. Long and steep is the way to her, and rough at first; but when one cometh to the summit, then it is easy, hard as it was' (Works and Days, 287-292). Pythagoras of Samos (B.C. 570-504) adopted the image and elaborated it. He employed as a symbol of the two ways the letter ψ , the archaic form of τ , hence called 'the Samian letter' (Pers. iii. 56-57, v. 34-35). The upright stem represented the innocent period of childhood, and the divergent branches the after-course of youth and manhood, pursuing the straight path of virtue or the crooked track of vice. The image is found also in the Tablet of Kebes, an allegory in the style of a Platonic dialogue, a sort of Greek Pilgrim's Progress, purporting to be a description of a tablet which hung in the temple of Kronos, and emblematically depicted the course of human life.

"What is the way that leads to the true Instruction?" said I. "You see above," said he, "yonder place where no one dwells, but it seems to be desert?" "I do." "And a little door, and a way before the door, which is not much thronged, but very few go there; so impassable does the way seem, so rough and rocky?" "Yes, indeed," said I. "And there seems to be a lofty mound and a very steep ascent with deep precipices on this side and on that?" "I see it." "This, then, is the way," said he, "that leads to the true Instruction" (Tab. § 15).

15. 'A grain of mustard-seed' (Mt 17²⁰, Lk 17⁶)—a proverbial instance of extreme littleness (cf. Mt 13³¹, 32 = Mk 4³¹, 32 = Lk 13¹⁹). Uprooting trees (cf. Mt 21²¹ = Mk 11²³) or mountains,—an expression used of wonderful feats (cf. 1 Co 13²). Some of the greater Rabbis were called 'uprooters of mountains' (see Lightfoot and Wetstein).

16. 'Easier for a camel to pass through the needle's eye' (Mt 19²⁴ = Mk 10²⁵ = Lk 18²⁵)—a proverb denoting an impossibility. The Talmud has 'an elephant passing through the needle's eye' (see Lightfoot). The absurd exaggeration is characteristically Oriental, and should not be toned down either by substituting κάμμος, 'cable,' for κάμηλος, 'camel,' or by supposing 'needle's eye' to mean postern-gate; cf. Shak. K. Rich. II. v. v.:

'It is as hard to come as for a camel
To tread the postern of a needle's eye.'

The proverb is found in Koran, ch. vii.: 'Verily they who shall charge our signs with falsehood and shall proudly reject them, the gates of Heaven shall not be opened unto them, neither shall they enter into Paradise, until a camel pass through the eye of a needle.' Did Mohammed quote from the Gospels, or was the proverb current throughout the East in his day?

17. 'Straining out the gnat and gulping down the camel' (Mt 23²⁴). Cf. Jerus. Shabb. 107. 3: 'One who kills a flea on the Sabbath is as guilty as one who should kill a camel on the Sabbath.' Erasmus (Adag. under 'Absurda') quotes a Latin adage: 'Transmisso camelo, culex in cribro deprehensus hæsit,' and refers to the bantering remark of Anacharsis the Scythian when he found Solon busy drawing up his laws. 'They are exactly like spiders' webs: they will hold back the weak and insignificant and be broken through by the powerful and rich' (Plut. Sol. 5. 2). The proverb satirizes those who atone for laxity in important matters by scrupulosity in matters of no moment.

18. 'To every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have more abundantly; and from him that hath not, even what he hath shall be taken away from him' (Mt 25²⁹). Cf. R. Hillel: 'He who increases not, decreases,' which means that one who does not improve his knowledge, loses it (Taylor, Sayings of the Fathers, i. 14). Jesus employs the saying in this sense in Mt 13¹², Mk 4²⁵ = Lk 8¹⁸.

It raises an interesting question that several of these proverbs not only have heathen parallels but are heathen proverbs. How comes it that Greek and Latin sayings were current among the Jews? The Jewish attitude toward pagan culture was one of bitter hostility. It is true that the liberal school of R. Hillel had a more tolerant spirit. Its most distinguished adherent was R. Gamaliel, who advocated the study of the hokhmah Javanith. The prevailing sentiment, however, was that of the school of Shammai, which pronounced a common malediction on one who reared swine and one who taught his son Greek (Otho, Hist. Doct. Mishn. pp. 68-70).

The general sentiment is well illustrated by Origen's sneer at Celsus' imaginary Jew who quoted Euripides, that Jews were not wont to be so well versed in Greek literature (c. Cels. ii. 34). A Jew with Greek quotations at his finger ends was an absurd fiction. And it is certain that Jesus had no acquaintance with Greek literature. Celsus charged Him with borrowing from Plato His saying about the difficulty of a rich man entering into the kingdom of heaven, and spoiling it in the process (ib. vi. 16). The Platonic passage is Legg. v. 743: ἀγαθὸν δὲ ὄντα διαφερόντως καὶ πλείονσι εἶναι διαφερόντως ἀδύνατον; and Origen's reply is most just: 'Who that is even moderately able to handle the subject would not laugh at Celsus, whether a believer in Jesus or one of the rest of mankind, hearing that Jesus, who had been born and bred among Jews, and was supposed to be the son of Joseph the carpenter, and had studied no literature, neither Greek nor even Hebrew, according to the testimony of the veracious scriptures that tell his story, read Plato?'

Nevertheless, despite their exclusiveness, it was impossible for the Jews to escape the leaven of external influences. (1) They carried on a very considerable commerce. They had several industries of world-wide fame. The Lake of Galilee abounded in fish, which were pickled and exported far and wide. Galilee was celebrated for its linen manufacture, and the flocks which pastured on the wilderness of Judæa furnished material for a thriving trade in woollen goods. Jerusalem had a sheep-market and a wool-market. There was also an extensive import traffic. Trade involves an interchange of ideas. The merchants imported words as well as wares, and one meets many an alien vocable, uncouthly transliterated, on the pages of the Talmud. What wonder if the Jews caught up also some of the foreign merchantmen's proverbs?

(2) The traders were not the only strangers who visited the Holy Land. There were Roman soldiers and Herod's mercenaries, the latter including Thracians, Germans, and Galatians (Jos. Ant. xvii. viii. 3). King Herod the Great had built a magnificent theatre at Jerusalem and an equally magnificent amphitheatre, and had instituted athletic contests every four years after the pattern of the Greek games. From every land (ἀπὸ πάσης γῆς) came competitors and spectators (ib. xv. viii. 1). Still more numerous, however, was the concourse of worshippers who frequented the Holy City at the festal seasons. They came from all quarters (Ac 2⁸⁻¹¹). They were, indeed, devout and patriotic Jews, but they had settled in foreign countries, and had acquired the languages and manners of the strangers among whom they dwelt and traded. Is it not reasonable to suppose that they would introduce into the Holy Land many a pithy saying which they had learned in the countries of their adoption? DAVID SMITH.

PROVIDENCE.—The word 'providence' (Gr. πρόνοια) is found only once in EV of the NT, viz. in Ac 24, where it is applied to Felix by Tertullus. 'Providence' (Lat. providentia, fr. pro and videre) literally means 'foresight,' but in its recognized use a much nearer equivalent is 'forethought' (πρόνοια). But providence is more even than forethought. It implies not only thought about the future, but practical arrangements for the purpose of securing premeditated ends (cf. Ro 13¹⁴. 'Make not provision [πρόνοιαν—the only other occasion of the use of the word in the Gr. NT] for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof'). And in the specific and most familiar sense of the word, as applied to the providence of God, it carries with it, as follows of necessity in the case of the Divine Being, the actual realization of the ends which God has determined. Though the word nowhere occurs in the Gospels, the subject is one that meets us constantly. And while it is the providence of God that is especially brought before us, there are not wanting suggestive references to providence on the part of man.

1. The Divine providence. (1) In the OT the fact of God's providence—in nature, in history, and in the individual life—is everywhere prominent; and the problems presented by the doctrine of providence appear and reappear in the Prophets, and receive a special treatment in the book of Job and in certain of the Psalms (e.g. 37. 73). In the Book of Wisdom the very word 'providence' (πρόνοια) twice occurs. In 14³ it is applied to God as governing the waves of the sea; and in 17² the heathen oppressors of Israel are described as 'fugitives from the eternal providence.' From Josephus we learn that Rabbinical Judaism was much occupied with the mysteries of Divine providence in its relation to human freedom; and that, as against the Sadducees who held an exaggerated view of liberty, and the Essenes who maintained a doctrine of absolute fate, the Pharisees kept to the middle path represented by the OT teaching, affirming the freedom and responsibility of man on the one hand, and the Divine providence and omnipotence on the other (Ant. xiii. v. 9 xviii. i. 3, BJ ii. viii. 14).

(2) In the Gospels, as in the NT generally, there is everywhere assumed the faith in the Divine providence which characterizes the OT writings, and is continued in orthodox post-canonical Judaism. The confidence of the Evangelists in the fulfilment of Messianic prophecy in the Person of Jesus is a testimony to their belief in the far-sighted operation of the Divine counsels (Mt 1²² 2⁶. 15. 23 3³, and passim). Their statements as to the incarnation of the Son of God furnish a supreme proof of a Providence that overrules the laws of nature by an indwelling governance, and moves down the long paths of history to the accomplishment of its own ends (Mt 1³⁴, Lk 1³⁴, Jn 1¹⁴; cf. Gal 4¹).

(3) A doctrine of providence underlies the whole life and teaching of Jesus Christ. As against a Deistic view which makes God sit aloof from the world He has created, and a Pantheistic view which identifies Him with Nature and its laws, Jesus always takes for granted the fact of God's free and personal providence. It is in this confidence that He turns to His Father for power to work His miracles—miracles which in turn become signs that His trust in God's providence was not misplaced. It is in the same confidence that He goes to God in prayer (Mt 11²⁵ 26³⁹, Mk 1³⁵ 6⁴⁶, Lk 3²¹ 11¹ 22³², Jn 11⁴¹. 14¹⁶ 17), and teaches His disciples to do likewise (Mt 6⁶. 9⁷. 7⁷. 9³⁸ etc.). Such petitions as 'Give us this day our daily bread' (6¹¹), and 'Lead us not into temptation' (v. 13), would be mere hypocrisies apart from an assured trust in the loving providence of our Father in heaven.

(4) Not only is a doctrine of providence a constant implication of our Lord's life and ministry, it forms an express part of His teaching. Jesus told His disciples that God rules in nature, making the sun to shine and the rain to fall (5⁴⁵), feeding the birds of the air (6²⁶), and clothing the lilies of the field (v. 28^{ff}). He taught them that God also rules in human lives, bestowing His blessings on the evil and the good (5⁴⁵), supplying the bodily wants of those upon whom He has conferred the gift of rational life (6²⁵), devoting a peculiar care to such as seek His Kingdom and His righteousness (v. 33). As against the pagan notion of chance (wh. see), and the analogous idea that at most the Almighty cares only for great things and does not concern Himself with the small (cf. 'Magna dii curant, parva negligunt,' Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 66), He affirmed that there is 'a special providence in the fall of a sparrow' (10²⁹, cf. Hamlet, Ac. v. Sc. ii.), and that even the very hairs of our head are all numbered (v. 30). As against a doctrine of providence which would turn it into a blind fate, and make the strivings of the human will as meaningless as the motions of a puppet, we have to set His constant emphasis on the momentousness of choice and effort and decision (7¹³. 21 13⁴⁵. 16²⁴. 18³, etc.). As against a narrow philosophy of providence, according to which good men are openly rewarded in this life and wicked men openly punished, He taught that God governs the world by general laws (5⁴⁵), that persecution is often the earthly portion of the righteous (vv. 10³⁵), that disasters falling on the individual are not to be taken as Divine retributions upon special guiltiness (Lk 13¹⁻⁵), and that our views of Divine providence must be extended so as to include a coming day of judgment for nations as well as individuals (Mt 25^{31ff.}). Thus in His teaching He anticipated most of those questions which have been so much discussed by theologians in connexion with this whole subject—questions as to the relation of God's government to secondary causes, of providence to free will, and as to distinctions between a providence that is special and one that is merely general.

(5) But besides the underlying implications of His teaching and its broad lines of treatment, our Lord brings forward in one well-known passage some special views and arguments bearing on faith in the providence of God as a means of deliverance from anxious care (Mt 6²⁵⁻³⁴ = Lk 12²²⁻³⁴). (a) The first thing that strikes us here is the emphasis He lays on the Divine Fatherhood (Mt 6^{26, 32}). The revelation of God as our Father in heaven is the central fact of Christ's teaching, and it illuminates His doctrine of providence just as it illuminates His whole message. This is the point at which His doctrine of providence rises above the highest and best teaching of the OT upon the subject. God's providence is a more individual and a more loving care than the saints of old had ever dreamed of, and this it is precisely because He is our Father. Once we have realized the fundamental truth about our relation to Him, we find it not merely possible to believe in His loving guardianship of our lives, but impossible to conceive of anything else (cf. 7¹¹ = Lk 11¹³). (b) Taking for granted that His hearers believe in God as their Creator, Jesus argues from creation to providence as from the greater to the less. The life is more than meat, and the body than raiment. He, therefore, who breathed into the body the breath of life will assuredly sustain the life He has inspired, and clothe the body He has framed (Mt 6²⁵). (c) Next He argues, we might say, from the less to the greater. If God feeds the birds of the air, shall He not much more feed His spiritual offspring? If He clothes the flowers of the field in their radiant beauty, how can He fail to clothe His own sons and daughters? (vv. 26-28-30). (d) Again, He argues generally that the fact of our Father's knowledge of our needs carries with it the certainty that all our needs shall be supplied—an argument based directly on the thought of Fatherhood, and the love that Fatherhood implies (vv. 31, 32).

2. Human providence.—Christ's special teaching on the providence of God in the passage just considered has sometimes been misinterpreted into a pronouncement against any providence on the part of man. The language of the AV no doubt lends itself to this; for in modern English 'Take no thought' is a very misleading rendering of μή μεριμνήσατε (vv. 25, 31, 34, cf. 27, 28). It was not forethought, however, but anxiety (see RV) that Jesus warned His disciples against, when He turned their minds to the great truth of the heavenly Father's providence (see art. CARE). That He believed in the value and the need of prevision and forethought we may learn from His own example. The long years of silence at Nazareth were evidently spent in a deliberate preparation of Himself for the high tasks that lay before Him. And when His public ministry began, so far from being careless of the morrow, He shaped all His days according to a pre-conceived plan (cf. Mt 3^{33ff.}, Mk 1^{34ff.}, Lk 12⁵⁰, Jn 9⁴ 17⁴). In His teaching He lays frequent stress on the value of prudent forethought (see art. PRUDENCE), both in worldly matters and in the affairs of the Kingdom of heaven—witness the parables of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16^{1ff.}), of the Pounds (19^{13ff.}), and the Talents (Mt 25^{14ff.}), of the Wise and the Foolish Virgins (v. 10^{ff.}). His appeal, therefore, to the birds of the air and the lilies of the field was not meant to encourage a belief that God would work for the idle and provide for the improvident. The argument rather is, If God provides for His unconscious creatures who cannot exercise forethought, much more will He provide for His conscious children who can and do. If He feeds the birds that neither sow nor reap, much more will He prosper you in your sowing and reaping; if He clothes the lilies that toil not neither do they spin, be sure He will see to it that men and women, on whom He has laid toiling and spinning as a necessity, do not lack the raiment they require. Work you must; it is the law of your lives as God's rational creatures; but learn from the birds and the lilies not to be anxious in the midst of your toil. Sow your seed, trusting in God to send the harvest. Fulfil your appointed tasks, but leave the results with confidence in your Father's hands. Jesus, then, does not commend improvidence. On the other hand, He does condemn a providence that confines itself altogether to the provision of earthly things, or even gives these the chief place in the heart. He condemns the providence of the Rich Fool (Lk 12¹⁶⁻²¹), and urges His disciples to lay up their treasure in the heavens (vv. 21-33). 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness' (Mt 6³³) is the counsel with which He concludes His special teaching on the relation of His disciples to the providence of the heavenly Father.

Christ's doctrines of Divine and human providence are thus complementary to each other. The thought of God's foreseeing care does not do away with human freedom and responsibility. On the contrary, it accentuates these by assuring us that we are not the creatures of fate, but the free children of God, and that we live our lives and fulfil our tasks under His watchful and loving eyes. The realization of the need of forethought and preparation on our part for the duties and events of life does not render us independent of the Almighty care. On the contrary, man's providence rests altogether upon the providence of God, and apart from it is utterly vain. And so to win Christ's approval human providence must be the providence of religious faith, and must be directed above all to the securing of higher than earthly blessings. It is only when we seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness that we have the promise that 'all these things'—food and raiment and whatsoever else we require for the bodily life—shall be added unto us.

PRUDENCE.—This term has a wider and a narrower reference. It may denote practical sagacity, the right choice of means to ends, clear-sighted forecasting of consequences and the shaping of conduct in accordance therewith. This would bring under review the whole of Jesus' conduct, and His methods of teaching, with their adaptation to the ends of His mission. In its more common use, prudence refers to the more self-regarding acts. It is the narrower reference that we consider.

1. Jesus' conduct.—In the earlier part of His ministry Jesus withdrew from the approach of danger. When He came from the temptation in the wilderness to take up His mission, hearing that Herod had put John in prison, He departed from Jordan to Galilee (Mt 4¹²). Galilee was within the dominion of Herod Antipas, but it was remote, away from the palace where John was imprisoned, away also from the place where John had baptized, and whither the crowds had come. In Galilee He would be more withdrawn from Herod's observation. Later on, when opposition was growing, and the Pharisees and Herodians were taking counsel together against Him, He withdrew for a time to the sea (Mt 12¹⁴, Mk 3⁶). And when He heard of the execution of John, He retired with His disciples to the desert (Mt 14¹³, Mk 6²¹). The Fourth Gospel also gives instances of His shunning Judea when passions were stirred there against Him (Jn 7¹⁻¹⁰, 10^{39, 40}, 11^{8, 54}). What relation had these acts of prudence to Jesus' sense of duty and of trust in the care of the Father? He shunned danger then for His work's sake. His hour was not yet come (7⁶). Then life, and not death, was the necessity of His mission. Again, Jesus taught the most absolute trust in the guarding care of the Father. Not a sparrow falls to the ground without Him (Mt 10²⁹). Should He not then have committed Himself to the Father: could Herod defeat the mission of the Messiah, the Son who alone could reveal the Father? In the wilderness Jesus recognized that thought to be a temptation of Satan (4⁵⁻⁷). God has given us minds to look before and after; and to run into avoidable peril needlessly is to tempt God. Carefulness, even amid duty, is lowliness' way of escape from presumption. Jesus recognized that He had to accept the ordinary conditions of human life, and guard Himself, for His work's sake, from the confinement that would hinder it, or premature death that might destroy it. But there is both in the Synoptics and in the Fourth Gospel a beautiful reconciliation of Jesus' prudence with duty and faith. When He withdrew to the desert on hearing of John's death, the crowds followed Him; and Jesus, seeing them as sheep without a shepherd, had compassion on them, and began to teach them (Mk 6³⁴). The death of Lazarus makes Him return to Judæa, whence He had prudently withdrawn Himself (Jn 11⁴⁻⁸). The emergence of a duty, an appeal from circumstances to His compassion, is a call from the Father, and then Jesus enters upon danger secure in the Father's guarding providence. When a man is doing the duty clearly laid down for him at the moment, he is walking in the day, and there is no stumbling for him (11⁹).

Did Jesus sin against that earlier spirit of prudence in His last visit to Jerusalem? He knew that He was going into danger. And He went thither not quietly, but making a public demonstration. He rode up to the city on an ass's colt as the Messiah, with an enthusiastic crowd strewing palm branches and singing hosannas to the Son of David. That would rouse the Pharisees, who regarded His claim as blasphemous, and the Sadducees, who might tremble for the peace and order of the city. He went to the Temple, and drove out with a scourge of small cords them that bought and sold in the holy place. And when at last Pharisees and Sadducees were united against Him, He uttered in the public hearing His invectives against the hypocrisy of scribes and Pharisees. Jesus has been blamed for thereby running upon death. But (1) it was necessary that He should openly make His claim to be the Messiah. He had not done so at first, for He did not desire any mere political following. It was to spiritual believers, won by His preaching of the Father, who felt that He, the meek and lowly One, had the words of eternal life, that He made known the fact that He was God's Messiah. But it was necessary that the claim should ultimately be proclaimed, after all His gospel had been declared, that Israel's rejection of Him should be their rejection of Him as Messiah. (2) It was necessary also that the Lord of man's life should lay bare in judgment the evil of Pharisaism, the master sin which dwells in the Temple, serving the very altar (see PREFACE OF JESUS, p. 337). But the invectives came only after His enemies were banded together and had decreed His death. The hour was striking when He uttered the words that maddened His foes. He chose His time with forethought and sagacity. (3) The hour of sacrifice had come. This death was no way of escape from intolerable difficulties (Renan, F. Newman). It was the end foreseen from the beginning. It lies at the back of the victory over temptation in the wilderness when He put aside the suggestion to use methods of popularity. Its shadow is over the words which He spake to the Pharisees, when early in His ministry they questioned Him about His disciples and fasting: 'The days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days' (Lk 5³⁵). And as soon as Peter had made his confession of belief in Him as Messiah, Jesus began to prepare His disciples for sufferings and death (Mk 8^{30, 31}). That is clear evidence that though His disciples had never dreamed of the tragic ending, yet it had long been in their Master's thought. The joyousness and serenity of the early Galilean ministry is no proof that Jesus dreamed then of success; it only proves how absolute was His conquest over all self-assertion and all natural shrinkings of the flesh. Death was His goal, seen from the beginning. Love's kingdom could be set up only by love's absolute devotion and self-sacrifice. The Father had laid upon Him the task of laying down His life for the sheep. And when Jesus went up to Jerusalem, He recognized that this His hour was come. He read the signs of the times (Mt 16³).

2. Jesus' teaching. — His teaching follows the lines of His conduct. As in His conduct, there is a prudential side. He counsels men to lay up treasure in heaven, for that treasure abides (Mt 6^{19, 20}, Lk 12³³). He bids them count the cost of discipleship (Lk 14²⁵⁻³³). In the parables of the Unjust Steward and the Ten Virgins, He expresses His surprise at the lack of forethought and consideration on the part of the children of light. (See FOOLISHNESS). And He bids them pluck out their right eye, cut off their hand or foot, whichever it be that gives offence, and enter maimed into the Kingdom of God rather than perish (Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁹, Mt 5^{29, 30}). This has been called 'the distinctive principle of Christian asceticism' (Gore); and this may be granted, with the proviso that such asceticism has nothing to do with self-appointed penances or mortifications, but only with the self-denial which wise self-knowledge brings amid the inflow of life upon one. But it is rather Christian prudence, as St. Augustine has defined it, 'love making wise distinction between what hinders and what helps itself': it is a vivid commentary on the prayer, 'Lead us not into temptation.'

In Jesus' teaching, as in His life, these prudential maxims are always subservient to the ultimate principle of conduct, love's paradox, 'Whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it' (Mt 16²⁵, Lk 17³³, Jn 12²⁵). Self-forgetfulness through loving service of God enriches the spirit with life's treasures of wisdom and joy. That is the secret hid from the wise and prudent and revealed unto babes (Lk 10^{20, 21}).

PSALMS.—In discussing the relation of Christ to the Psalms, two questions must be kept apart: (1) His use of the Psalter, (2) His presence in the Psalter. Even if we did not know, by direct quotation and indirect allusion, that the Psalter was a favourite book of Christ's, we could have safely inferred as much from His general attitude to the OT. The Psalter, as, on the whole, the simplest and purest expression of the devotional life of Israel, must have commended itself peculiarly to Christ.

1. The influence of the Psalter upon the mind of Jesus was probably larger and more profound than His recorded allusions to it, numerous and subtle as they are, would lead us to suppose. There were indeed elements in it which He could not have appropriated—cries for vengeance upon foes (Ps 41¹¹ (10), cf. 68²⁴ (23)), or of an almost cruel delight at their defeat (18⁴³ (42)), or sorrowful laments at the prospect of a death in which fellowship with God was believed to be interrupted (6⁶ (5) 39¹⁴ (13) 88¹¹⁻¹³ (10-12)). But there were other elements which were well fitted to express, as they may have helped to nourish, His piety. Especially must He have been attracted by those psalms which breathe the spirit of quiet confidence in God: 'Thou art my God; my times are in thy hand' (31^{1st}, (14th)); 'In thy presence is fulness of joy' (16¹¹); 'As for me, I am continually with thee: thou hast holden my right hand. Thou wilt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory' (73^{23rd}). The joy which comes from fellowship with God and from the contemplation of His acts in history (95-100), the humble and childlike spirit which lifts meek eyes to the God who looks down in pity from the heavens (123, 130)—these and other such tempers and aspirations cannot have been without their influence upon the spirit of Jesus. Most welcome of all would be those fine interpretations of the character of God scattered throughout the Psalter—as of one who is not only Lord of all space and time (90, 139), but who is also 'good and ready to forgive and rich in love to all that call upon him' (86⁵ 103⁸), who opens His hand and satisfies the desire of every living thing (145¹⁶), who is father of the fatherless and judge of the widow (68⁶ (5)), who rises up at the oppression of the poor and the sighing of the needy (126 (3)).

2. But in estimating the influence of the Psalter upon Jesus, we are not left to conjecture. On many occasions—notably at the beginning and the end of His public career—He uses it directly, and expresses, sometimes the truths of His gospel, sometimes the aspirations of His soul, sometimes His premonitions of the fate of Jerusalem, almost in its very words. The Sermon on the Mount has at least half a dozen references, direct or indirect, to the Psalter; not only words of a more general kind, such as 'Depart from me, ye workers of iniquity' (Mt 7²³ || Lk 13²⁷, cf. Ps 6⁹ (8)), or the allusion to Jerusalem as the 'city of the great king' (Mt 5³⁵, cf. Ps 48³ (2)), but even such an assurance as that the heavenly Father feeds the birds (Mt 6²⁶, cf. Ps 147⁹); and some of the Beatitudes themselves are but echoes of the Psalter, e.g. 'the meek shall inherit the earth' (Mt 5⁵, cf. Ps 37¹¹ (the land)), 'the merciful shall obtain mercy' (Mt 5⁷, cf. Ps 18²⁶ (25)). Occasionally a psalm is explicitly cited by Him, e.g. Ps 82⁶ in Jn 10³⁴, and even prefigured by the words, 'Have ye never read?' (cf. Mt 21¹⁶, 42), which assume a familiar knowledge of the book, or at least of these particular psalms (8, 118), on the part of His audience. But even where there is no such citation, the language is often saturated with reminiscences of the Psalter. There can be little doubt, e.g., that 'my soul is exceeding sorrowful' (Mt 26³⁸ || Mk 14³⁴) is an echo of Ps 42⁶, 12, (5, 11)), or that 'he that eateth with me shall betray me' (Mk 14¹⁸) is an echo of Ps 41¹⁰, (9) (cf. Jn 13¹⁸, where the treachery is expressly said to be in fulfilment of the utterance in the psalm), or that 'they shall dash to the ground thy children within thee' (Lk 19⁴⁴) is a reminiscence of Ps 137⁹. In the words of a psalm (31⁶ (5)) Jesus commended His spirit into His Father's hands (Lk 23⁴⁶).

3. These references are not quite exhaustive, but they are characteristic; and they are very significant of Christ's general attitude to the Psalter. He makes its words of faith His own in the moment of His sorrow, He repeats its promises to those who are prepared to be His disciples (Lk 10¹⁹, cf. Ps 91¹³; Mt 5⁸, cf. Ps 37¹¹); but, with the single exception—if it be an exception—of Ps 110, to be afterwards discussed, He does not seem directly to countenance, by His own example, that Messianic interpretation of the Psalter upon which the Church has, from her earliest days, uniformly insisted. True, it is recorded that He said that 'all things must needs be fulfilled which are written in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms, concerning me' (Lk 24⁴⁴). But within the teaching of Christ Himself there is no certain illustration of specific passages which He applied Messianically to Himself. And this omission would be very singular, if He had generally countenanced Messianic interpretation in the narrower sense in which that word has been commonly understood. He believed in His Messiahship, but He did not rest it upon the basis of individual passages. He claimed to fulfil the Law and the Prophets; but, judging by His general practice, this appears to imply the large fulfilment of their spirit and tendency, rather than any minute and literal fulfilment of particular words. His method of dealing with the Psalms, when controversy is involved, is well illustrated by His citation of Ps 82⁶ in Jn 10³⁴. The Jews are incensed at what they regard as His blasphemy in calling Himself the Son of God. He appeals to the psalm, to show that men exalted to high office had been in the OT called 'gods'; and argues that, if the title was appropriate for them, how much more for Him who had a unique commission and equipment from the Father.

4. It is instructive to turn from Christ's use of the Psalter to that of the writers and speakers in the NT; and, in this connexion, it is important to remember that most of their citations from the Psalter are made from the LXX. Occasionally this seriously affects the argument. The author of the Ep. to the Hebrews, e.g. (11⁹⁻¹²), finds, in the great words of Ps 102²⁶⁻²⁸ (25-27)—'Thou, Lord, in the beginning, didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hands'—an allusion to Christ. In the LXX it is 'the Lord' who is said to be everlasting, and to the author of the Epistle the Lord is Christ. But in the Hebrew psalm the address is to Jehovah, a title which no Hebrew could possibly have applied to the Messiah. Here is a case—and there are others—where the argument holds only on the basis of the Greek translation; it would be irrelevant and inapplicable on the basis of the original Hebrew (cf. Eph 4⁸, Ps 68¹⁹, (18)).

Again, with regard to the psalms customarily called Messianic, it has to be remembered that the songs of the Psalter have, generally speaking, a historical background. They spring, not perhaps always, but undoubtedly often, out of a definite historical situation; that situation, or some aspect of it, is their theme. In many psalms this is obvious (cf. 44, 83, 137); and the question may fairly be raised whether this is not also the case in the Messianic psalms. Doubtless time might prove that the meaning of a psalm was larger than the original intention of its composer: this is true more or less of all great literature. But to understand truly its deeper meaning, we must start from its original intention, and from the situation in view of which it was composed. While to some of the psalms whose subject is a king a Messianic interpretation has been assigned (cf. 2), in others the actual contents and implications of the psalm render that interpretation impossible. The 'anointed,' e.g. (Heb. 'his Messiah,' LXX 'Christ'), in 207 (6) is almost necessarily some historical king, and the psalm appears to have been composed on the eve of a battle. If, then, in some of the psalms which deal with a 'Messiah' or 'Christ,' the reference is to a historic king of Israel or Judah, the presumption at least is raised that all the Messianic psalms may be similarly interpreted.

The tendency to find in the Psalter predictive references to Jesus must have set in very early. In Mt 13³⁵, e.g., the parabolic method of teaching adopted by Jesus is said to be in fulfilment of the prophecy (attributed in one MS to Isaiah), 'I will open my mouth in parables, I will utter things hidden from the foundation of the world.' In point of fact these words simply form the introduction to one of the longer historical psalms (78²), and in them the Psalmist simply declares his intention to draw instruction from the ancient history of Israel. There is here no conceivable allusion to the parabolic teaching of Jesus. This interpretation would hardly even have been possible but for the LXX, which happens to render the Hebrew מְסֻפָּרִים by ἐν παραβολαῖς—another good illustration of the control that the LXX exercised over Messianic interpretation. This tendency to 'messianize,' wherever possible, naturally is operative also outside of the NT. There is no warrant in its pages, e.g., for referring the latter part of Ps 24 to Christ; but the Fathers applied it to His ascension, and the Te Deum addresses Christ as the King of Glory. Sometimes psalms which are commonly regarded as Messianic contain sentiments which are un-Christian, and which therefore render the Messianic interpretation, in any sense worth defending, untenable. Some exegetes have even held that Ps 18 is Messianic, in spite of such a verse as 43 (42). Ps 2, whose claims are much more generally allowed, contains sentiments (cf. v. 9) which could not legitimately be reconciled with the spirit of Him who was the Prince of peace.

5. We shall now examine the psalms which are most commonly regarded as Messianic—for convenience' sake in the order in which they occur in the Psalter.

Ps 2. A study of the NT allusions to this psalm is peculiarly instructive, as, though there is a general agreement that it is Messianic, there is considerable variety in its interpretation. One passage, indeed, does not seem even to regard the psalm as Messianic, at least in the narrower sense: in Rev 2²⁷ the promise of Ps 2⁹ that the king would 'break' (LXX and NT read ποιμανεῖ(s), 'shepherd,' 'rule,' pointing תרעם instead of תרעם) the nations with a rod of iron, as the vessels of the potter are broken, is applied, in the message addressed to Thyatira, to the Christian who overcomes and keeps the works of Christ to the end.

This application of the passage shows that, even in very early times, the Messianic interpretation of such psalms was felt to be not the only possible one. It is just possible, however, that the words of the psalm were chosen simply because they were an apposite description of triumph. This becomes the more probable when we remember that elsewhere in this same book—Rev 12⁵ 19¹⁵—the passage is applied Messianically.

The first two verses of the psalm—'Why do the heathen rage?' etc.—are applied in Ac 4^{25f.} to the combination of Herod, Pilate, the Romans, and the Jews, against 'thy holy servant Jesus,' who is clearly therefore regarded as the king celebrated in the psalm. The verse which the NT most frequently lays under contribution is v. 7 'Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee.' This verse, or the first part of it, underlies Nathanael's confession (Jn 1⁴⁹), Peter's confession (Mt 16¹⁶), the high priest's question (Mt 26⁶³), and the voice which is said to have been heard on the occasion of the Baptism (Mt 3¹⁷=Mk 1¹¹=Lk 3²²) and the Transfiguration (Mt 17⁵=Mk 9⁷=Lk 9²⁶). According to the Codex Bezae in Mt 3¹⁷, the words heard on the occasion of the baptism were, 'Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee.' This attests the belief in some quarters that the Divine sonship of Jesus, which the psalm is supposed to foreshadow, dated from the day of His baptism. But in Ac 13³³ St. Paul regards the Psalmist's utterance as fulfilled not in the baptism, but in the resurrection of Jesus; and this view appears to underlie the Apostle's statement in Ro 1³ that it was by the resurrection that Jesus was declared to be the Son of God with power. The verse is further applied in He 1⁵ (cf. 5⁵) as a proof of the superiority of Jesus to the angels. In the Hebrew OT, however, the term literally translated 'sons of God' is applied to supernatural beings whether they be regarded as gods or angels; cf. Job 1⁶ 2¹, where the LXX renders by οἱ ἄγγελοι τοῦ θεοῦ. As, however, there are passages in which even the LXX speaks of these beings as 'sons of God' (Ps 29⁹ 89⁶), we must assume, if the writer has not forgotten them, that he is laying particular stress on the latter half of the verse, 'this day have I begotten thee.' According to the Epistle, however, Jesus took part in the Creation, and was pre-existent before all eternity (12¹⁰); consequently we must suppose that the 'begetting to-day' refers to His eternal generation. See art. BEGETTING.

Here, then, are three different interpretations of the verse within the NT: the Divine sonship of the Messiah is variously connected with His baptism, His resurrection, or His eternal generation. These interesting fluctuations of opinion are possible only because the historical interpretation of the psalm is ignored. The phrase 'son of God' did not necessarily imply Divinity in the technical sense, for we find it applied even to the people (Ex 4²²), and we have already seen how Jesus argues (Jn 10³⁴) from the acknowledged application of the term to human beings. In truth, the psalm seems to be addressed to some actual king of Judah, and to express the assurance of his victory and dominion, possibly on the occasion of his coronation. The day on which he was begotten as a son of God is the day on which he was installed in his regal dignity as the representative of Jehovah, the King and Father of His people. It is, we must admit, by no means impossible, especially when we consider the soaring language of the psalm, that its subject is not any reigning king, but some king yet to be; this would be the case if the psalm belongs, as it may, to the post-exilic period, when the monarchy was no more. But in neither case can it be strictly regarded as referring to Jesus, partly because the establishment of the king upon the holy hill of Zion would have no relevance in His case; partly because the conception of His function as dashing His enemies in pieces is un-Christian. Besides, as we have seen, the NT itself is not agreed as to the precise incident which the psalm is supposed to prefigure. But its solemn and emphatic predication of the Divine sonship of the king, possibly also its outlook upon a world-wide dominion, made it natural, and almost inevitable, under the conditions of early Christian interpretation, that it should be regarded as, in some sense, a prediction of Jesus.

Ps 8. It is interesting to compare the use made of this psalm by Jesus with that made elsewhere in the NT. V. 3⁽²⁾ 'Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings,' etc., is quoted by Him against the chief priests (Mt 21¹⁶), who murmur when they hear the children cry 'Hosanna.' The NT follows the LXX, which reads 'praise' instead of the Hebrew 'strength,' 'bulwark'; but the essential meaning of the psalm is finely brought out by the citation—the power, on the one hand, or the insight, on the other, of the children (cf. for a very similar thought, Mt 11²⁵). In He 2⁸⁻⁹, however (cf. 1 Co 15^{27f.}), 'Thou madest him a little (or 'for a little while') lower than the angels,'—vv. 5, 6 of the psalm are interpreted as referring to Jesus, because the supremacy which, in the psalm, is asserted of the 'son of man' is not, as a matter of fact, true of the human race, but it is true of Jesus. This is a noble application of the passage, full of poetic and spiritual insight; but it does not justify us in supposing that the psalm was, in its original intention, Messianic. The Psalmist is undoubtedly thinking of the human race, he marvels at the love of the great God towards His apparently insignificant creature in making him lord of all. 'Thou hast put all things under his feet.' To the Psalmist this supremacy is a fact: he is content with man as he finds him, and he is not thinking of One in whom this lordship would be more perfectly realized.

Ps 16. In Ac 2²⁵⁻²⁸ (cf. 13³⁵⁻³⁷) St. Peter quotes four verses of the psalm (8-11) in confirmation of the resurrection of Christ. The crucial verse is 27 'Thou wilt not leave my soul unto Hades, neither wilt thou give thy holy one to see corruption.' It is not quite certain whether the psalm is individual or collective. If it be collective, this verse implies no more than an assured faith in the future of Israel; if, however, it be individual, the speaker is probably expressing his own faith in immortality, though a more meagre meaning has been put upon the words, as if he were simply expressing his confidence in his recovery from a severe illness, or perhaps in his immunity from the sudden death which overtakes the wicked. In any case 'thy holy one'—an unfortunate translation—is undoubtedly the speaker himself. He is Jehovah's hāsîd, that is, a bond of love subsists between him and his God; and, in virtue of this bond, he is sure that Sheol cannot be his ultimate fate,—he will overleap it, and be received into glory (Ps 73²⁴). The last word of 16¹⁰ נפֿשׁ, which means 'pit,' was, however, unfortunately rendered by LXX διαφθορά, 'corruption'; and part of St. Peter's argument, as of St. Paul's in Ac 13³⁵⁻³⁷, depends upon the mistranslation. The argument is that, as the Psalmist himself 'saw corruption' (Ac 13³⁶), he was really speaking, not of himself, but, prophetically, of Jesus, who saw no corruption. The psalm is therefore regarded as a prophecy of the resurrection of Christ, though it is, in reality, only a devout believer's confession of faith in his own immortality. But it is only fair to notice that, while the form of the argument in Acts is Jewish, and rests, in part, upon a mistranslation, in substance the argument is sound. What the psalm essentially asserts is, that where a bond of love subsists between God and a man, death has no power to destroy the man—a fortiori in the case of the Man. 'It was not possible that He should be conquered by him' (Ac 2²⁴)—such a one as Jesus by such an antagonist as death.

Ps 22. Nothing is more natural than that the early Christians should have interpreted this psalm Messianically, or that that interpretation should have persisted throughout the whole history of the Christian Church. It is not only that echoes of it are heard in the Passion story of the Gospels,—in the parting of His garments and the casting of the lot for His raiment (Mt 27³⁵ = Mk 15²⁴ = Lk 23³⁴, Ps 22¹⁹ (18)), the shaking of the heads of the passers-by (Mt 27³⁹ = Mk 15²⁹ = Lk 23³⁵, Ps 22⁷), the mocking cry, 'He trusted in God, let him deliver him' (Mt 27⁴³, Ps 22⁹ (8)),—but Jesus Himself upon the cross used at least the opening words of the psalm (Mt 27⁴⁶ = Mk 15³⁴), and the parting of His garments is expressly said in Jn 19²⁴ to have taken place that the scripture might be fulfilled. It must be admitted that there is often a very startling similarity between the details of the psalm and the narrative of the Gospels. Still, many of those details are not strictly applicable to the crucifixion. Alike in the sufferings, in the triumphant issue from them, and in the contemplated conversion of the world which is to be produced by that triumph (v. 28 (27)), this psalm very powerfully recalls the Suffering Servant of Deutero-Isaiah; and the theme of both is doubtless the same, that is, the people, or at least the pious kernel of Israel. More important, however, than the similarity of detail just alluded to, striking as that is, is the large and profound insight of the psalm. It is all aglow with the consciousness that suffering means, in the end, not defeat, but victory, and that the Suffering Servant, so far from being crushed, will one day win the whole world to Himself. These truths, of course, find their highest and truest exemplification in Jesus.

Ps 34²¹ (20). According to Jn 19³⁶ the legs of Jesus were not broken, in order that the scripture might be fulfilled, 'A bone of him shall not be broken.' In the psalm the verse is intended to express the general care which Jehovah exercises over the righteous, and therefore it could hardly be regarded as an apt citation in connexion with the crucifixion of Jesus; but more probably it is intended to be, primarily, a reminiscence of Ex 12⁴⁶, Nu 9¹², which prescribe that the bones of the Paschal lamb shall not be broken. In that case the quotation would convey to a Jewish ear the subtle reminder that Jesus was the true Paschal lamb.

Ps 40. In He 10⁵⁻⁷ part of this psalm (vv. 7-9 (6-8)) is quoted, and interpreted as a prayer of Christ on coming into the world; and here, again, a large part of the argument turns upon the faulty text of the LXX. The author is arguing that the continual sacrifices of the OT dispensation have been for ever abolished by the one sacrifice of Christ. In the body which God prepared for Him, He perfectly fulfilled the Divine will by the sacrifice of Himself. But the words 'a body didst thou prepare for me,' which the author adopts from the LXX, do not represent the Heb. of 40⁷ (6), which reads, 'ears hast thou digged for me.' Fortunately the origin of the mistake is not far to seek. The word for 'ears' is ΩΤΙΑ, and for 'body' ΣΩΜΑ. The Σ at the end of ΘΩΕΛΗΣΑΣ was apparently duplicated, and then the following ΩΤΙΑ was easily transformed into ΩΜΑ; so that out of an originally correct translation, 'ears,' a new word arose, which unhappily lent itself to a dogmatic interpretation almost the opposite of that intended by the Psalmist. His point is that God demands not sacrifice but obedience—the ready ear to hear; the point in the Epistle is, not the ever-recurring sacrifice, but the one sacrifice of Christ's body. As, however, the ethical worth, in one of its aspects, of Christ's sacrifice was the perfect obedience which it illustrated, we may say that here, as in the case of Ps 16, the conclusion is essentially sound, though the argument is fallacious, at least in so far as it rests upon a mistranslation. Historically considered, the psalm appears to be a prayer expressing the mingled feelings of the people after their return from exile. It is one of the three great psalms (cf. 50. 51) which emphatically assert the superiority of obedience and contrition over sacrifice.

Ps 41¹⁰ (9). In the Gospel of John, as in the Epistle to the Hebrews, there is a strong tendency towards the Messianic interpretation of passages in which, to say the least, that interpretation is not necessary. According to Jn 13¹⁸ the treachery of Judas is said to have taken place in accordance with the scripture, which must be fulfilled, 'He that eateth my bread lifted up his heel against me.' In other words, Ps 41¹⁰ (9) is supposed to have Christ for its theme. That this is impossible, however, is clearly shown by the very verse of the psalm which follows the quotation, 'Thou, Jehovah, have mercy upon me, and raise me up, that I may requite them.' It is much more probable that Jesus simply used the words which St. Mark records of Him,—words, no doubt, suggested by the psalm, 'One of you shall betray me, even he that eateth with me.' He may have cited the words of the psalm as apposite rather than prophetic.

Ps 45. For long Ps 45 has enjoyed among Christian expositors the reputation of celebrating the love of Christ for His Church. But a glance at the psalm is enough to show that it, like others, has its roots in history; the pointed and definite reference to 'the daughter of Tyre' renders any other interpretation extremely improbable. It is apparently a song in celebration of the marriage of some king of Israel or Judah with a foreign princess, Vv. 7¹ (6¹).—'Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever,' etc.—are cited in He 1⁸, and interpreted as referring to the Son. Considering that shortly before, v. 2, and immediately after, v. 10, the author of the Epistle touches upon the pre-existence of Christ, the direct naming of the royal subject of the psalm as 'God' would be peculiarly welcome. With what admirable cogency could the psalm thus be interpreted of Christ, and how little could it be fairly referred to any one else! For the passages which some have adduced to prove that אֱלֹהִים could stand for 'judges' (cf. Ex 22⁷)—though they do not really prove as much—would in any case be insufficient to show that an ordinary human king could be addressed in the word Elohim; the king of the psalm must therefore be Divine. It has been conjectured, however, with great acuteness and probability, that instead of אֱלֹהִים 'God,' the original reading was יְיָ 'shall be' (יָקֻם). This may have been carelessly read as יְיָ, and then altered by the Elohistic redactors of Pss 42-83 to אֱלֹהִים. In that case the important dogmatic text, 'Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever,' becomes the innocent assertion that 'thy throne shall be for ever and ever,' and with the change in the text, the Messianic interpretation vanishes, especially as the next verse speaks of his companions. Of a human king this is intelligible, but who would the companions of the Messiah be?

Ps 69. It might seem surprising that a psalm marked by so vindictive a spirit as Ps 69 should ever have been interpreted Messianically, but several of its verses are even in the NT brought into relation with Christ. In his usual manner St. John (19²⁸⁻³⁰) sees in the offering of vinegar to Jesus on the cross a fulfilment of scripture, that is, of Ps 69²² (21) (cf. Mk 15³⁶, Lk 23³⁶), while St. Matthew (27^{34, 48}), who parallels the language of the psalm still more closely by speaking of the gall, does not explicitly connect the incident with the psalm, though doubtless it was in his mind. The zeal with which Jesus drove the money-changers out of the Temple, is said in Jn 2¹⁷ to have reminded the disciples of v. 10⁽⁹⁾ of the psalm; and Ro 15³, where the second half of this verse is quoted, shows that St. Paul interpreted the psalm Messianically (but cf. Ro 11^{9f.} with Ps 69^{23f.} (22f.)). In Ac 1²⁰, Ps 69²⁶ (25) and 109⁸ are regarded as inspired predictions of the fate of Judas (Ac 1¹⁶). Two difficulties, however, stand in the way of interpreting this psalm Messianically: (1) It plainly reflects a contemporary historical situation; it is the product of a time when Judah is in misery and her cities are in ruins (69³⁶ (35)); and (2) its fierce vindictive tone (cf. v. 24) is altogether unlike the spirit of Him who said, 'Father, forgive them.' The similarity of incidents in the life of Jesus to certain features of the psalm may have led to its Messianic application; but it has nothing like the claims to such a distinction which Ps 22 has.

Ps 72. The NT lends hardly any support to the Messianic interpretation of this psalm, though this interpretation has found much favour with Christian expositors. The description of the gifts of gold that were brought to the infant Jesus (Mt 2¹¹) perhaps recalls, in part, the language of the psalm, cf. vv. 10^{f.} 15; but in spite of the extravagant language of vv. 9-11 (which are possibly, as some hold, a later insertion, added after the psalm began to be interpreted Messianically), it was, in all probability, originally only a prayer for some historic king. V. 15, in which prayer is to be continually offered for the royal subject of the psalm, shows that the Messianic interpretation is hardly admissible.

Ps 110. No psalm is so frequently laid under contribution in the NT as Ps 110. V. 1, e.g., is referred to, directly or allusively, in Mt 22⁴⁴ 26⁶⁴, Mk 12³⁶ 14⁶² 16¹⁹, Lk 20^{42f.} 22⁶⁹, Ac 2^{34f.} 5³¹ 7^{55f.}, Ro 8³⁴, 1 Co 15²⁵, Eph 1²⁰, Col 3¹, 1 P 3²², He 13. 13 8¹ 10^{12f.} 12²; and v. 4 in He 5⁶ 6²⁰ 7¹¹ 17. 21 etc. The first verse is interpreted of Jesus, who, as the Messiah, is bidden by the Lord (Jehovah in the Hebrew) to sit at His right hand till He has vanquished all His enemies; while, according to the Ep. to the Heb., He is also the priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. Other priesthoods were transitory, His is eternal and inalienable (7¹⁶ 24). The use of the psalm made by Christ, together with the very deliberate, if not solemn words in which He introduces the citation, certainly raise a strong presumption that He regarded the psalm as Messianic. But in this connexion two things have to be remembered: (1) that this allusion springs from an atmosphere of controversy, and (2) that the essential meaning of Christ is independent of the Messianic view of the psalm. (1) As against the Pharisees, the citation had a peculiar relevance and propriety. Christ desires them to feel that they have not carefully considered the consequences of their views regarding the Messiah. (2) The real intention of Christ is to suggest the indefeasible superiority of the spiritual to the material. Starting from the conception of sonship, the Pharisees ended in thoughts of a material and political kingdom like David's, whereas, had they considered the sense in which the Messiah was David's Lord, they would have found themselves in a spiritual sphere.

It is certainly very difficult to resist the impression that the psalm is Maccabean. Without laying too much stress upon the singular fact that the initial letters of each verse from 1^b to 4, יְהוָה, spell the word Simon, the historical implications of the psalm point very powerfully to the Maccabean period. It implies that the king celebrated also bore the title of priest, and not till that period could this have been appropriately said of any ruler. The language of the opening verse, which, in the Hebrew, runs 'Oracle of Jehovah to my lord,' most naturally suggests that the psalm is composed by a poet in honour of his king, whom he calls 'my lord,' and for whom he foretells victory. But the vigorous language of v. 6 hardly seems compatible with the idea that its theme is Christ.

The use made of the psalm by St. Peter in Ac 2^{34f.} is thoroughly analogous to his use of Ps 16. Immediately after arguing that Ps 16, with its seeming prophecy of the resurrection, could not refer to David because he 'both died and was buried,' the Apostle goes on to argue that Ps 110 must also be referred to some other than David, because 'he did not ascend into the heavens.' But in truth the sitting at the right hand of God is simply a pictorial way of suggesting an idea similar to that of Ps 27, where a historical king is called the son of God. The grandeur of the phrase 'sitting at the right hand of God,' the contemplated completeness of the king's victory, the union in his person of the offices of priest and king, and the mysteriousness that gathered round the person and the priesthood of Melchizedek, all combined to make the Messianic interpretation easy and all but inevitable.

Ps 113. With this psalm as with Ps 8, Jesus assumed a certain familiarity on the part of His audience (Mt 21⁴² 'Did ye never read?'). His use of it strongly suggests, though perhaps it hardly compels, the belief that He regarded it as Messianic. With the words, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord' (Ps 118²⁶), He was acclaimed by the multitudes as He entered Jerusalem (Mt 21^{9, 15} = Mk 11^{9f.} = Lk 19³⁸ = Jn 12¹³), and in the same words He ends His lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23³⁹). The saying that 'the stone which the builders rejected is become the head of the corner' (Ps 118²²), is also understood to find its fulfilment in Him (Mt 21⁴² = Mk 12^{10f.} = Lk 20¹⁷; cf. Ac 4¹¹, 1 P 2^{4, 7}). In the psalm, the reference appears to be to Israel, despised yet victorious; but as the career of Jesus is the most perfect illustration of the principle pictorially expressed in the saying, the citation is thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of the psalm, though it cannot be regarded as a prediction. Similarly, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord,' is more strikingly appropriate to Jesus than even to the original subject of the psalm.

6. In conclusion, it may be said that the exegetical methods and the Messianic outlook of the early Church rendered it very natural that they should find in the Psalter, as in other parts of the OT, predictions of incidents in the life of Christ, or that psalms descriptive, on the one hand, of malignant persecution and agonized suffering, or embodying, on the other hand, a large outlook upon a universal dominion, should be claimed for Him. Usually there is an appropriateness, sometimes very striking, in the application to Him of passages in the Psalter which, for various reasons, can seldom, if ever, be with any plausibility regarded as predictions of Him. Often, as we have seen, a psalm can be regarded as Messianic only by ignoring its historical background (Ps 69), or by selecting and emphasizing certain verses while ignoring others that suggest an inadequate or unworthy view of the Messiah (Ps 2). There are undoubtedly in the Psalter many true foreshadowings of Christ; but, speaking broadly, it is in its general spirit rather than in its isolated expressions that we may find Him. Of course, it has been commonly urged that a psalm may be typically Messianic though it is not prophetic; but it may be questioned whether it is worth while to interpret literature in this fashion. Christ's own use of the Psalter is strikingly different from the occasional use of it, e.g., in the Book of the Acts. He did not commend His Messiahship after the fashion in which His Apostles sometimes do. Profound as is the insight with which they often cite and apply the Psalter, very much more than the Master do the disciples emphasize the letter, sometimes even the letter of an inadequate translation. From His use of it we learn to find in the Psalter a support of the devotional life rather than a mainstay of Messianic argument.

PUBLICAN (Gr. τελώνης).—The Roman practice of selling to the highest bidder the task of collecting the taxes and dues of a province or district for a definite period is well known. The persons thus engaged were called publicani, and usually belonged to the wealthy equestrian order. They, in their turn, employed local agents to get in the revenues, who were also called publicani. This lower class are probably the men referred to in the Gospels, wherever they belong to Judæa (or Samaria), except possibly in the case of Zacchæus, who was ἀρχιτελώνης of Jericho (Lk 19²), and may have farmed the revenues of that important commercial centre on his own account (but see Ramsay as cited below).

In Galilee the publicans had to collect, not for the Imperial treasury (as in Judæa), but for Herod Antipas the tetrarch. Such an official was St. Matthew (Levi), who was called to be an Apostle from the place of toll (τελώνιον) on the shores of the Lake of Galilee at Capernaum (Mt 9⁹, Mk 2¹⁴, Lk 5²⁷). And in his house afterwards our Lord met many other publicans of the tetrarchy at a great entertainment.

Whether in the service of the hated Roman Emperor or of Herod Antipas, who was in complete subservience to him, the tax-gatherer was most unpopular with the Jews; for, apart from the obvious liability of the method to abuse, the mere fact of the money being thus raised for an alien power was detestable in their eyes. And no doubt the publicans were often drawn from the lowest ranks in consequence. Hence common talk associated them not only with the Gentiles (Mt 18¹⁷), but with harlots (Mt 21^{31, 22}) and sinners in general (Mt 9^{10, 11}, Mk 2^{15, 16}, Lk 5^{30, 7, 34, 15}).

John the Baptist's preaching attracted many publicans to him, and when they inquired in what they must mend their ways after being baptized by him, his answer indicated that extortion was their besetting danger, as we should expect (Lk 3^{12, 13}).

The remarkable effect that our Lord's ministry also had upon these men, as in the case of St. Matthew and Zacchæus (cf. Lk 15¹), is not to be held as implying that He laid Himself out more for them than for other sinners who realized their need of Him; nor are we to infer that, in contrasting them with the Pharisees and scribes, as in the well-known parable (Lk 18^{10ff.}), He intended to clear their character altogether from current prejudices and aspersions. Extortion and oppression were as abhorrent to Him in the one class as formalism and hypocrisy were in the other. Both stood equally in need of His salvation (Lk 19¹⁰), but without a consciousness of the need on their part His salvation could not take effect.

PUBLISHING (κηρύσσω, fr. κήρυξ, 'a herald').—It is a principle in the Divine economy for God to withdraw Himself from the perception of man, except in so far as the latter is able to receive a Divine revelation to his profit (Is 45¹⁵ 53¹, Mt 7⁹). It is not that God is unwilling to manifest Himself, but that the condemnation for rejecting the light is so great, that He is constantly withdrawing and veiling Himself from men's gaze (Jn 15²²). Thus it is that He is so frequently represented as shrouded in cloud (Ex 16¹⁰, Lv 16², Nu 11²⁵). Thus Christ's Divine glory at the Transfiguration was veiled in a bright cloud (Mt 17⁵, Mk 9⁷, Lk 9³⁴); thus, too, He will come at the Last Day in a cloud (Lk 21²⁷). It is one of the paradoxes with which we are familiar in the Gospels, that manifestation should be accompanied by concealment, and revelation connected with mystery. Just as our eyes cannot see where all is dark, nor yet again in a blaze of brightest light, but as a blending of the two is necessary for physical vision, so is the law in the spiritual life. Complete darkness would leave us hopeless; a blaze of Divine glory would blind our spiritual faculties.

Christ's childhood was wrapped in concealment. Only one incident is recorded about that period in the Gospels, and that one shows that His mother did not then understand Him (Lk 2^{48ff.}). Christ was always veiling Himself throughout His ministry. He did not publish abroad the truths of His Kingdom indiscriminately. His use of parables was to avoid the casting of pearls before swine. His sayings were to a great extent allegorical. Such expressions as 'leaven' for 'doctrine' (Mt 16^{6, 11f.} ||), 'sleep' for 'death' (Mt 9²⁴ || Jn 11¹¹), cutting off the right hand (Mt 5³⁰ 18⁸ ||), the dead burying their dead (Mt 8²² ||), the buying of swords (Lk 22³⁶), the undying worm (Mk 9^{44, 46, 48}), were not, of course, intended to be understood literally. All this seems to be due to His wish to spare the greater condemnation which would follow upon the greater revelation. Persons and cities who received the latter without profiting by it are specially denounced (Mt 11²³, Lk 10¹³). In the explanation of the parable of the Sower a special condition of fertility was the right understanding. 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear' (Mt 13⁹). It was a spiritual and not an intellectual perception that was required, one that depended on the state of the heart and not on the shrewdness of the mind (Mt 11²⁵, Lk 10²¹). Christ taught people as they were able to hear (Mk 4³³, cf. Jn 16¹³). He did not force new wine into old bottles. He explained the meaning of His parables to His disciples in private (Mk 4³⁴). Towards the end of His ministry He dispensed with parables in speaking to them (Jn 16^{25, 29}). The time for concealment was past.

The same principle is observable with regard to Christ's miracles. They were worked only on those who had faith (Mk 9²³). In Capernaum He did not do many mighty works, because of their unbelief. The crowd of mourners are excluded at Jairus' house because they laughed Him to scorn (Mk 5⁴⁰ ||). The post-Resurrection appearances were not given indiscriminately, but to witnesses chosen before, who had shared the intimacy of temptation and suffering. Thus it was that after the performance of so many of our Lord's miracles the recipients of healing grace were told not to publish the news abroad. It would only provoke calumny or misrepresentation. The Pharisees were not influenced favourably by the miracles which they saw (Mt 12¹⁴, Mk 3^{2f}, Jn 5¹⁸ 10³⁹ 11⁴⁷, Lk 6¹¹) or heard of. It was only increasing their condemnation to publish the accounts abroad.

But it was especially in the healing of demoniacs that the principle received illustration (Mt 9³⁴ 12²⁴). The evil spirits are anxious to publish Christ's Divinity. They are not allowed to do so. There was evidently something repulsive to Christ in the knowledge possessed by the demons unaccompanied by love and reverence (Ja 2¹⁹). Human beings, having this knowledge without corresponding affection, would become like the demons, with hardened hearts. It was the sin against the Holy Ghost which is so severely denounced (Mt 12³¹). This was the reason for Christ's manifestation of Himself to His disciples and not to the world (Jn 14²²). They had shown the requisite spirit of submission to the Cross. They had ears to hear.

We see, then, that it was not Christ's object to reveal Himself to every one indiscriminately, but to those only who had a desire for that knowledge, together with love and reverence. The training of such recipients was gentle and gradual. Manifestation to the hardened brought with it only condemnation. Concealment implied mercy. As man had deliberately put forth his hand and tasted of the forbidden tree, so must he show by his deliberate action that he wished to taste of the tree of life, the true knowledge of God and of His Son revealed in the Incarnation (Jn 17³).

But while we observe in our Lord's ministry this principle of reserve with regard both to the mysteries of the Kingdom and the truth about His own Person, He never concealed, or wished His disciples to conceal, the saving message of the gospel. The gospel was to be 'published among all nations' (Mk 13¹⁰, RV 'preached'). The vb. κηρύσσω, which is used to denote a publication such as Jesus forbade of His miraculous cures (Mk 1⁴⁵ 7³⁶), is the same word as is constantly employed with reference to His own proclamation of the gospel (Mt 4²³ etc.) and His instruction to His disciples to proclaim it (Mt 10⁷, Mk 3¹⁴, Lk 9² etc.). When κηρύσσω is used, however, in this specific sense, it is almost invariably rendered 'preach' in EV. In Mk 13¹⁰, as noted above, RV has substituted 'preach' for 'publish' of AV. See, further, PREACHING, REVELATION.

PUNISHMENT.—1. God's punishment of sin.—For the sufferings of Christ for sin, see ATONEMENT: the present article is concerned only with the punishment of men. The Gospel teaching on this important subject can be briefly summarized in a few paragraphs:

(a) The fact of punishment.—This fact is involved in certain explicit statements of our Lord Himself (Mt 13⁴¹⁻⁴² 25³⁵, Jn 15²⁻⁶), and clearly suggested in more than one of His parables (Mk 12⁹, Mt 13³⁰ 22^{13, 14}, Lk 13^{9, 22ff.}). It is further implied both in the recognition of God's wrath upon men (Jn 3³⁶) and of a consequent difference in their destinies (Mt 13^{41, 43} 25⁴⁶, Jn 5²⁹), and in frequent references to Gehenna (Mt 5²⁹ 10²⁸, Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁸, Lk 12⁸) or to the place of outer darkness (Mt 8¹² 22¹³ 25³⁰). So serious may this punishment be, that death would be a preferable alternative (Mk 9⁴²); and, unrestricted to individual transgressors, it may fall also both upon cities (Mt 10¹⁵ 11²¹ 23³⁸) and upon nations (Mt 21^{43, 44} 23^{35, 38}). The principle of punishment was illustrated in our Lord's action (Mk 11^{12ff, 15ff.} ||) as well as inculcated in His words.

(b) The expression of punishment.—God's punishment of men for sin, the fact of which is thus recognized by the Gospels, finds expression in different ways. (a) Our Lord seems to hint that even in the conditions of a man's present life the penalty of sin may sometimes be perceived. At least it would appear that in certain cases He allows that a connexion exists between sin and physical sickness (Mk 2^{10, 11} || Jn 5¹⁴). Nowhere, however, does He approve the view, which emerges in the OT, that a similar explanation accounts for the presence in the world of human sorrow. (On the contrary, sorrow even becomes, in His esteem, a ground for rejoicing [Mt 5^{4, 10-12}]). Apart from these vague suggestions of a physical penalty, the Gospels recognize both a present and a future punishment of sin. (β) There is a sense in which a man's judgment, and hence his punishment, is immediate. And not only is this true in that his sin involves remorse (Mt 26⁷⁵ 27^{4, 5}, Mk 6¹⁶), but also because his very attitude to Christ automatically enriches his personality or issues in its impoverishment (Jn 3^{18, 19} 9^{1, 11, 12}, Mt 25^{28, 29}, cf. Lk 29⁴). (γ) There is a second sense in which a man's judgment lies in the future (Mt 13⁴¹⁻⁴³ 25^{1ff.}, and frequently). A discussion of the punishment resulting from that judgment does not fall within the scope of the present article, and the reader is therefore referred to the separate study on ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. Here it will suffice to observe that, whatever be its accidents, the essence of punishment will consist in banishment from the presence of Christ (Mt 7²³ 25⁴¹); and that it will be marked by varying degrees of severity (Mk 12⁴⁰, Mt 10¹⁵ 11^{22, 24}, Lk 12⁴⁸), each of us by his own use of opportunity providing his own criterion (Mt 5^{7, 2} 10³³, Mk 4²⁴).

(c) The aim of punishment.—Punishment may be conceived as either disciplinary or retributive in its purpose. Our Lord Himself, in all probability with deliberate intent, made no unmistakable pronouncement on the meaning of the doom of the rejected. All that we can do, therefore, is to deduce from His words certain general considerations bearing more or less closely on the end that punishment has in view. (a) On the one hand, the teaching of the Gospels confirms the verdict of our own moral sense, that so long as there is any hope of a sinner's recovery, the reformatory element must at least be prominent in the transaction. Inasmuch as judgment is self-acting (Jn 3¹⁹ 12³¹), it inevitably accompanies God's gift of His Son (Jn 3¹⁸; see Westcott, in loc.); yet we are specifically taught that not judgment but salvation is God's deepest thought for mankind (Jn 3¹⁷; so Mt 18¹⁴, Jn 6³⁹ 8¹¹, Lk 15, cf. also Jn 5²⁴). It is in keeping with this that of the two words denoting 'punishment,' κόλασις and τιμωρία, distinguished in classical Greek as respectively remedial and penal in their purpose (so Plato; see Trench, Syn. § vii.), it is the former that is preserved in the report of Christ's teaching (Mt 25⁴⁶). That the classical shade of meaning is retained in the NT is signified by the suggestive use of κολάζεσθαι in 2 P 2⁹, where the punishment precedes judgment, and therefore could scarcely yet be retributive. (β) On the other hand, the terms in which Christ refers to punishment (e.g. Mt 18³⁵, Lk 20⁴⁷ etc.) would seem to forbid us to reduce it to the mere equivalent of discipline; and He Himself, in speaking of sin that has no forgiveness (Mk 3²⁸ ||, cf. Mk 14²¹ and 1 Jn 5¹⁶), distinctly implies a punishment that is retributive in character. The proportion in which these two elements in the Divine punishment of men are combined, is beyond our knowledge. Human analogies can merely give us vague hints, every analogy being to some degree imperfect, and therefore to the same degree misleading. Instead of seeking to dogmatize on what does not at present fall within the sphere of our understanding, it would seem wise to confine our conclusions to two broad principles:

(i.) The punishment of the sinner is such as Love can inflict. If God is Love (1 Jn 4^{8, 16}), there can be no act of His which is not an expression of His nature. Sometimes Love reveals itself as tenderness. Sometimes it reveals itself as wrath (cf. the striking sequence of verses in Mt 10^{28, 29} and 21^{13, 14}); for if sin is more than a fiction, the measure of God's love for the sinner will determine the severity of His anger against his sin. Indeed, the surest proof of the punishment of sin is to be found in the love of God. It is only something less than love that would palliate evil in the life of the loved one. If, therefore, punishment is an expression of Love, it will contain the elements of discipline and retribution in such proportion as Love demands. What that proportion is we cannot say: we must be content to leave ourselves in the hands of Perfect Love.

(ii.) Hence, too, it follows that the duration of punishment will be such as Love requires. It seems reasonable to expect that as soon as a sinner becomes forgivable, the retributive aspect of punishment is at an end, and discipline alone remains; and that when discipline has utterly failed to reclaim a man, it in its turn must give place to simple retribution. Of the precise point at which either crisis is reached we have no knowledge. In one place our Lord appears to hint that it may be beyond the grave (Mt 12³²), but, as we have already seen, He gave no clear guidance in the matter. Again, we must be content to leave ourselves in the hands of Perfect Love. (On the nature and purpose of punishment, see Moberly's valuable chapter in Atonement and Personality, ch. i.)

2. Forms of human punishment.—(a) Among punishments mentioned as of general imposition are several which demand no detailed treatment. Such are decapitation (Mk 6²⁷, Mt 14¹⁰), drowning (Mk 9⁴², Mt 18⁶), incarceration (Mk 6¹⁷, Mt 5²⁵ 18³⁰, Lk 23¹⁹), and hanging (Mt 27⁵), inflicted, according to Jewish custom, only for idolatry or blasphemy, and then only after the victim had already been put to death in some other way (Edersheim, LT ii. 584). With these, too, may be classed the less familiar penalties of precipitation (attempted in the case of our Lord, Lk 4²⁹) and of mutilation (δικοτομεῖν, Mt 24⁵¹, Lk 12⁴⁶). Stoning (Lk 20⁶, Jn 8⁵, cf. Mt 21⁴⁴ || and Mt 23³⁵ ||) was imposed for many offences, including the unchastity of a betrothed maiden, idolatry, and blasphemy. On one occasion the Jews sought to inflict it on our Lord Himself (Jn 10³¹). See art. STONING. For excommunication, see art. s.v.

(b) The two prominent forms of human punishment inflicted upon Jesus were those of scourging and crucifixion. Scourging, used among the Jews as a penalty for debt (Mt 18³⁴) or for offences of a religious character (Mt 10¹⁷ 23³⁴), was also the customary precursor to Roman crucifixion. The Roman scourge was of leather thongs, weighted with bone or some form of metal. The victim's suffering was so intense that it frequently led to death before the capital sentence proper could be carried into effect. According to His own prophecy (Mk 10³⁴, Mt 20¹⁹, Lk 18³³), our Lord was subjected to this cruel instrument of torture (Mk 15¹⁵, Mt 27²⁶, Jn 19¹). It was inflicted by Pilate in the hope that it would satisfy the passion of the Jews and render the crucifixion unnecessary (Lk 23²²; see Westcott on Jn 19¹). For the details of our Lord's crucifixion (Mk 15²² ||, cf. Gal 3¹⁰⁻²³) and their significance the reader is referred to the special article under that heading. Christ foretold this form of death for other witnesses to truth (Mt 23³⁴, and probably Jn 21¹⁸) as well as for Himself (Mt 20¹⁹ 26², Lk 24⁷, Jn 12^{32, 33}).

H. BISSEKER.

PURIFICATION (1. καθαρισμός: of washings before and after meals, Jn 2⁶; of baptism, a symbol of moral cleansing, 3²⁵; of the Levitical purification of women after childbirth, Lk 2²²; of cleansing of lepers, Mk 1⁴, Lk 5¹⁴. 2. βαπτισμός: of cleansing of vessels, Mk 7⁸).—From the time of the Exile onwards, the interest of the Jew had largely centred around ritual observance, conditioned, to begin with, by the necessity of maintaining the separateness of the Remnant that remained. These observances, so far as they concerned purification, had two main sources of origin. Some must have dated from a prehistoric period when religion had but little to do with ethics, and concerned itself rather with maintaining the favour of a deity, thought of as arbitrary, by avoiding practices that might trench upon his holiness. Other observances, of later date, may have had their origin in sanitary requirements. The result, however, as is well known, was that Jewish life became completely fettered by these ordinances, written and oral. When Christ came proclaiming liberty to the captives, He could not avoid running counter in many respects to the regulations dealing with purification. See art. PURITY. The various ceremonies of purification referred to in the Gospels are these:

1. In case of leprosy (Mk 1⁴, Lk 5¹⁴, Mt 8², Lk 17¹¹⁻¹⁹).—The uncleanness of the leper seems to have been due not to the fear of contagion, for contagious diseases were not, generally speaking, regarded as unclean, but to the repulsive appearance of this particular disease. Leprosy (wh. see) was counted to be a special scourge; and the leper was, like the madman, supposed to be smitten of God. This distinctiveness of leprosy in the view of the priest is shown by the word used of its removal. Almost invariably its cleansing is denoted by the word καθαρίζω. The exception to this is in the account of the healing of the Ten Lepers (Lk 17¹⁵), where the word ἰάσθαι is used; but this exception may be accounted for on the ground that the narrative is dealing with Samaritans, who were regarded as being an alien people. The regulations for the purification of leprosy had two parts (Lv 14¹⁻³²). In the first ceremony, on the conclusion of which the leper was admitted to the camp, though not to his tent, two living birds were taken. One was killed over an earthenware vessel filled with 'living' (spring) water, in such manner that the blood dropped into the vessel. The other bird, along with cedar wood, scarlet, and hyssop, was then dipped into the blood-stained water, and the leper was sprinkled with it seven times. The bird was then released 'into the open field,' and was supposed to fly away with the leprosy, the blood-brotherhood between the leper and the bird being established by the immersion of the bird in the water.

The ceremony is akin to that of the laying of the sins of the people upon the head of the scapegoat, which was then sent away into the wilderness (Lv 16²¹). By a similar ceremony, an Arab widow who is about to remarry makes a bird fly away with the uncleanness of her widowhood (W. R. Smith, RS² 422, 447).

The second part of the ceremony took place eight days after the first part. Probably the object of the interval was to ensure an additional period of quarantine in which it might be seen whether the cure had been effective. If the leper were in good circumstances, he offered two he-lambs and was anointed by the priest with blood and oil. If the sufferer were poor, he could offer, in place of two lambs, one lamb and two turtle-doves, or two small pigeons. Our Lord did not interfere in any way with the offerings for purification of leprosy (Mk 1⁴⁴, Lk 5¹⁴, Mt 8⁴).

2. In connexion with food (Mk 7¹⁻²³, Mt 15¹⁻²⁰, Jn 2⁶⁻³²).—The particular ritual connected with the ceremonial washing of hands affected Jewish life many times a day. Of the six books of the Mishna, the longest (Toharóth) is devoted to the question of purification, and thirty chapters of this book deal with the cleansing of vessels. Even if the hands were already ceremonially clean, they had to be washed before a meal. A washing of the hands between the courses, as also a washing at the conclusion of the feast, was practised frequently; but this custom may have had its origin in obvious convenience, and not in any striving after ritual cleanliness (2 K 3¹¹). In the ceremony itself, the hands were held over a basin while water was poured over them. The water was allowed to run down to the wrist (? Mk 7³, see Swete's note). Such was the ritual in the case of an ordinary meal. But if holy or sacrificial food was to be partaken of, the hands had to be completely immersed in the water. If the hands were ceremonially unclean, there had to be two washings. In the first, the fingers were elevated and the water was allowed to run down to the wrist. In the second, the finger tips were depressed, so that the water might run from the wrist downward, and might thus carry off the water that had, on the first washing, contracted the defilement of the hands. The water to be used in ceremonial washing was kept from possible defilement by being kept in large jars (údpíai, Jn 2⁶). The vessel by which the water was drawn from these jars had to contain at least a quarter of a log, i.e. a measure equal to one and a half 'eggshells' (Edersheim, LT ii. 9 ff.).

3. Before the Passover (Jn 11⁵⁵ 18²⁸).—If the Jews were so particular to ensure ceremonial purity before an ordinary meal, they insisted on absolute ritual purity before the celebration of the Passover (Lv 7²⁰⁻²¹). The reason that kept Christ's accusers from following Him into the judgment-hall (Jn 18²⁸) may have been simply the fear of the defilement they would incur by entering a heathen house. But it is still more likely that they remained outside for fear that the judgment-hall might contain somewhere within its walls a portion of leaven. The exclusion of leaven from all sacrifices offered to Jehovah was a very early custom (Ex 23¹⁸ 34²⁵), and must have been due to the desire to avoid the association of any form of corruption with the Feast. This seems all the more clear, when it is noticed that the exclusion of leaven is associated with the command that no fat or flesh shall remain over till the morning. The efficacy of the sacrifice lay in the living flesh and blood of the victim; thus everything of the nature of putrefaction had to be avoided. For this reason, milk, the commonest of foods in the East, had no place in Hebrew sacrifice (W. R. Smith, RS 2 220).

4. After childbirth (Lk 2²²).—That childbirth renders a woman unclean is an almost universal belief among primitive peoples. Among some Arab tribes it was customary to build a hut outside the camp, where the woman had to stay for a time (Hastings' DB iv. 828^b; Wellhausen, Reste 2, 170). The Priestly Code recognized two degrees of uncleanness (Lv 12). After the birth of a boy, the mother was to be counted unclean, as in menstruation, for a week, and was to continue 'in the blood of her purifying' for 33 days longer, during which she could touch no hallowed thing nor come into the sanctuary. She was thus unclean, in greater or less degree, for 40 days. But if the child were a girl, both periods of uncleanness were doubled. At the expiry of the 40, or of the 80, days, the mother offered a lamb of the first year for a burnt-offering, and a young pigeon or a turtle-dove for a sin-offering. But if she were poor (as was Mary, Lk 2²⁴), she could substitute for the lamb a young pigeon or a turtle-dove.

5. Graves as causes of defilement are referred to in Mt 23²⁷, Lk 11⁴⁴ (cf. TOMB).

PURIM.—A feast of the Jews occurring on the 14th and 15th of the month Adar, one month before the Passover. It had only the slightest religious character, and was devoted to feasting and holiday.

The Book of Esther purports to give the origin of Purim in the feast kept by the Jews when the afflictions that threatened them through Haman were turned into joy and blessing. This explanation is now generally regarded as fanciful, in part because of the antecedent improbability of the narrative in Esther and the lack of historical evidence for its truthfulness, and in part because of the impossibility of verifying in Persian the meaning of the word purim (= 'lot'), upon which the connexion rests.

Several different theories have been held of its origin. (1) The outgrowth of the Nicanor festival kept on the 13th of Adar, to celebrate the victory over that general in B.C. 161. (2) Derived from a New Year's festival of Parthian origin. (3) A Persian spring festival. (4) Connected with the Persian Fardigán, festival of the dead. (5) The Greek Pithoigia, corresponding to the Roman Funalia. (6) Others most recently (Zimmern, Jensen, Meissner, Wildeboer) derive it from a Babylonian New Year's festival, and make Mordecai the same as Marduk, and Esther—the goddess Ishtar.

The feast is not mentioned by name in the NT, but is by some supposed to be the 'feast of the Jews' of Jn 5¹. If so, this Gospel mentions three Passovers during the ministry of Jesus (2¹³ 6⁴ 12¹), and His ministry thus extends, according to Jn., over two and a half years. On the other hand, if the alternative view is held, that 5¹ is a Passover feast, there are four mentioned, and the ministry, according to Jn., extends over three and a half years. Before either figure can be assumed as giving the correct chronology of the life of Christ, the accounts in the Fourth Gospel must be subjected to criticism in connexion with those of the Synoptics. See art. DATES, FEASTS, MINISTRY. O. H. GATES.

PURITY.—To form a clear conception of purity in its Christian sense is a matter of some difficulty, for two reasons. Historically, the idea has undergone great changes, and the terms by which it has been expressed have been applied to very different qualities, which to-day we should classify as physical, ceremonial, and moral purity,—qualities which have nothing necessarily in common. On the other hand, if the idea in its highest significance be considered, it is singularly elusive, and therefore exact treatment is hardly practicable. It will be necessary to meet these two difficulties separately, and therefore to subdivide the subject.

1. In the Jewish world, wherein Christianity arose, purity occupied a commanding position. Since the return from the Exile, and especially since the reconstruction under Ezra and Nehemiah, there had been a strenuous and sustained endeavour to secure the purity of both the national and the individual life by means of the jealous exclusion of all that could cause impurity. The Law laid down in detail the requirements of 'clean' and 'unclean,' alike in matters of worship, of food and conduct, and of relations with the heathen world. Purity of descent in Israel also involved great insistence on genealogical records. And all these questions had received further elaboration at the hands of the later scribes. In this way the idea of purity had become increasingly artificial and external; till at last it became an obsession which went far to destroy the spontaneity of life, and to obscure the positive aspects of virtue and religion (cf. Ac 15¹⁰, Col 2²⁰⁻²³). It follows that in most of the passages in the Gospels in which purity is mentioned, it is this current conception of it which is referred to; a conception which was almost entirely negative, and was mainly ceremonial, though not without confused intermixture of elements which were strictly physical, and others which were really spiritual.

There are two groups of words by which purity is expressed, alike in the Greek and in the English NT, though these do not answer strictly each to each. In the Greek the first group consists of καθαρός, καθαρίζω, καθαρισμός (frequently); καθαίρα, διακαθαρίζω (twice each); καθαρότης, καθαρισμα, περικαθαρισμα (once each); and ἀκαθάρτος, ἀκαθαρσία. In the English (RV) these are most often rendered by 'clean,' 'cleansed,' etc.; but often by 'pure,' 'purify,' etc. The other group consists of ἄγιος, ἀγιάζω, ἁγισμός, ἁγιάζω, ἁγία, which are found less frequently, and which in the EV are always rendered by 'pure,' 'purify,' etc., never by 'clean,' 'cleansed,' or the like. The failure of the EV to distinguish these terms is, however, of no great importance, inasmuch as the Greek words themselves appear to be used as completely equivalent. This appears well in He 9¹³ ἀγιάζω πρὸς . . . καθαρότητα; in the parallel use of αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ καθαρισμοῦ (Lk 22²) and αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ ἁγισμοῦ (Ac 21²⁶); and in the use of καθαρισμός twice (26³²⁵) and of ἀγιάζω once (1155) in St. John's Gospel to stand indifferently for the customary purifying of the Jews. It is, however, worth while to notice that, with the exception of the last mentioned instance, the second group of words is never met with in the Gospels. (For use of κοινῶν in the sense of making impure, see below).

The important point is to observe how Christ altered the significance of καθαρός and its cognates, correcting and deepening the idea of purity which they served to express. Often He used these terms in the senses which they currently bore. He employed them in connexion with physical disease: 'The lepers are cleansed' (Mt 11⁵, cf. Lk 17¹⁷, Mk 14¹); and of the vine in a figure where more is symbolized by the want of physical vigour (Jn 15²). He spoke also of 'unclean spirits' when treating those 'possessed' (Mt 12⁴³, Mk 5⁸). But His characteristic habit was to look below the outward and visible evidences of purity and impurity, whether these were physical or ceremonial, to the purity or impurity of the heart. The leading instance is Mk 7¹⁴⁻²³ 'Nothing from without the man going into him can defile (δύναται κοινῶσαι) him. . . . These evil things proceed from within and defile the man.' Here the Evangelist expressly notes that the saying 'makes all foods clean.' And other passages show the same teaching if less fully expressed: e.g. the Pharisees are denounced for their hypocrisy in cleansing the outside of the cup and platter while inwardly full of extortion and excess, whereas practical love shown in alms would have made all clean to them (Mt 23^{25, 26}, cf. Lk 11⁴¹); and they are also condemned for being 'like whited sepulchres, full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness,' which is defined as 'hypocrisy and iniquity' (Mt 23^{27, 28}). So He gave His blessing to the 'pure in heart' (5⁸), setting the ideal of purity which He would have His followers share with Him. And that this is to be understood in no negative sense is made very plain by Christ's teaching elsewhere. In Jn 13¹⁻¹¹ the practice of the Lord's own humility is taught as the means of purity in His followers: in 15³ He says, 'Ye are clean because of the word that I have spoken unto you,' with which should be compared St. Peter's words, 'cleansing their hearts by faith' (Ac 15⁹); while in Lk 11²⁴⁻²⁶ || it is expressly taught that a merely negative purity of heart, due to the extrusion or exclusion of evil, is hopeless, and 'the last state of that man cometh worse than the first.'

It is in the fullest accordance with Christ's habitual standpoint and with His teaching elsewhere that He adopted baptism, which had long been a symbolic and ceremonial rite of purification in Judaism, as a fundamental ordinance for His followers; but it is equally in character with His mind and teaching that in the place of its old negative significance He gave it a new and positive meaning, by making it baptism into the Divine

Name He had revealed, and into the practical observance of His commands, and the enduring possession of His Spirit (Mt 28^{19, 20}). The reference of Christian baptism is thus far less to the past—which it was in Jewish usage—than to the future; to the life, i.e., to be found and shared in the 'true Israel of God.'

2. But when the lesson has been learnt that purity can never consist in externals or negations, but must be a positive characteristic of the heart or inner man, there still remains the harder question, Wherein does such purity consist? This has often been discussed by moralists, and it is curious how little they have to give in answer. No definition based on acts can be framed, for the same act under different conditions may be pure or impure. Nor is it easy to find one by the analysis of motives, as the treatment of the matter by the casuists clearly shows; for they have almost always ended in defining impurity only—a thing best left alone. A clue to the answer may, however, be found in Christ's teaching, though not one admitting of any formal analysis or definition. He laid it down emphatically that evil things proceeding from within can defile (δύναται κοινῶσαι). The word employed is most instructive; and the more so when one recollects that it occurs again in this sense in the decisive lesson taught St. Peter as to the nature of purity (ἀ ὁ θεὸς ἐκαθάρισεν σὺ μὴ κοῖνον, Ac 10¹⁵ 11⁹, cf. 21²⁶). To make common, i.e. to vulgarize, is the way to make impure: profanity is the ruin of purity. A well-spring of living water, fenced about by reverence—that is purity. When reverence is broken through, or when careless frequency leaves the bulwark open, every beast may enter and foul the spring after slaking its thirst; then purity is gone. Not that purity is the flow of living water, but its characteristic so long as it is guarded. The water-spring may be a fount of truth, or love, or life; it may be an aspiration, a resolve, an idea; it may consist in an opportunity met with, or an experience felt; it may be a holy memory, or an act of worship; sometimes it will be the new perception of some beauty natural or moral, and sometimes an inborn faculty of service for others. Round any or all of these God sets reverence in our hearts for a fence, and bids us bare our heads as we draw near to what for us is holy ground. If we give no heed, but vulgarize by common use that opening which was afforded us to be a 'window in heaven,' we may do this, but at the cost of purity. God endows all with faculties of body, of intellect, of soul, which He means to be exercised and kept pure; but used without reverence, and viewed without wonder, they miss their purpose. It was the sense of what true purity consists in that led an old writer to say, 'Keep thy heart above all that thou guardest, for out of it are the issues of life' (Pr 4²³),—a saying which half-anticipates the Beatitude promising the vision of God to the pure in heart. Reverence is the root from which purity grows; and never was the essential nature of purity set in more vivid contrast with that blind and brutal profanity which is its opposite, than in Christ's striking utterance, 'Give not that which is holy to the dogs, nor cast your pearls before the swine, that they may never trample them between their feet, and, turning, rend you' (Mt 7⁶).

PURPLE.—The adj. πορφύρεος had originally no

connexion with a particular colour either by derivation or by use (see Liddell and Scott's Lex. s.v. πορφύρω). Similarly in the Latin poets purpureus regularly stands for nothing more than 'bright.' In Greek, after the discovery of the purple dye, the notion of colour became inherent. The gradations of colour were φούξ (darker shades—purple to crimson), πορφύρεος (brighter red, rosy), κόκκινος (scarlet). In Mt 27²⁸ || Mk 15^{17, 20}, Jn 19^{2, 5}, the last two words are used indiscriminately for the same colour (see art. SCARLET). Manufactured purples were of various kinds, all extracted from the juice of sea molluscs. The following is a summary of their varieties, though the terms employed to describe them were not always confined to their proper use.

(1) Purple proper; of a bright red hue; obtained from the purple-snail (πορφύρα, purpura). This was used sometimes pure (called blatta), sometimes diluted (conchylium). Of the pure there were two sorts—(a) Tyrian, the most celebrated, which was 'twice-dyed'; (b) amethystine, of a paler tint. One pound of wool dyed with Tyrian purple cost 1000 denarii, with amethystine 100 (Plin. HN ix. 38, 63). The use of such purples (especially the former) is mentioned frequently in satirists and historians as a feature of ancient luxury (cf. Juv. Sat. vii. 134 ff.; Mart. viii. 10, etc.); hence Christ's expression in Lk 16¹⁹.

(2) Common purple; of a violet hue (i.e. ζώνη rather than πορφύρεος); obtained from the trumpet-snail (κόρυξ, buccinum, purpura). This was much less esteemed. Its colour apparently could even be compared to the dark blue of an Eastern sky (Jos. Ant. iii. vii. 7): but probably there were different tints.

The fiery-red purple (proper) of antiquity had practically no resemblance, as a colour, to the modern purple: the latter could never be described, even approximately, as 'scarlet' (Mt 27²⁸). Yet, independently of the hue, the name carries with it in both cases the distinction of being the royal colour. Under the Roman Empire restrictions were imposed from time to time as to its general use; and the purple toga was the garb of the Emperor alone. It was as the badge of kingship that the purple formed part of the soldiers' mockery (Mk 15^{17, 20} ||).

PURSE.—1. βαλλάντιον, peculiar to St. Luke, which occurs in LXX as the tr. of פֶּרֶק (Job 14¹⁷) and פֶּרֶק (Pr 1¹⁴). 'The purse of the modern Syrian peasant is a little bag, sometimes of woven silk thread, but usually of yellow cotton. The open mouth is not drawn close by a string, but is gathered up by one hand, and then by the other the neck of the bag is carefully whipped round' (Hastings' DB, art. 'Bag'); it, no doubt, corresponds to βαλλάντιον. The 'Seventy' were directed not to carry a purse (Lk 10⁴); in 22^{35f}. Christ asked the Apostles, 'When I sent you forth without purse, lacked ye anything?' and gave the new direction, 'He that hath a purse, let him take it.' In v.³⁶ RV gives 'and he that hath none,' i.e. no purse (so Cov., Rhem., Gen., Meyer, etc.); on the other hand, Tind., Cran., Beza, Ewald, Godet prefer to supply μάχαρα as AV ('he that hath no sword'). The passage, says Wendt, is to be explained from foresight of an impending period of persecution for the disciples; Jesus sets the necessity of buying a sword in contrast to the freedom from all want hitherto enjoyed by His disciples in their work as His messengers, and bases His exhortation on a reference to the doom about to fall on Himself; a period would begin when the disciples would no longer be unharmed, but would be in the midst of conflicts and persecutions (see Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, ii. p. 358). In Lk 12³³ βαλλάντια is used in a figurative sense, 'make for yourselves purses (AV after Tind. 'bags') which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not' ('continens pro contento,' de Wette).

2. ζώνη (Mt 10⁹=Mk 6⁸ in the directions to the Twelve), properly the girdle, which is still in Syria made 'double for a foot and a half from the buckle, thus making a safe and well-guarded purse' (Hastings' DB, art. 'Bag'). RVm tr. 'girdle.'

'There was no extraordinary self-denial in the matter or mode of their mission. We may expound the instructions given to these primitive evangelists somewhat after the following manner—'Provide neither gold nor silver nor brass in your purses. You are going to your brethren in the neighbouring villages, and the best way to get to their hearts and their confidence is to throw yourselves upon their hospitality. . . . At this day the farmer sets out on excursions quite as extensive without a para in his purse' (Thomson, LB p. 345 f.). See also BAG.

QUARANTANIA.—See WILDERNESS.

QUATERNION (τετραδίων).—The word occurs only once in NT, and then not in the Gospels (Ac 12⁴); but we know that four soldiers at a time were ordinarily told off for work in the Roman army (Vegetius, de Re Milit. iii. 8), and that there were that number in charge of our Lord's Crucifixion (Jn 19^{23, 24}; cf. Evang. Petr. 9; see art. COAT).

C. L. FELTOE.

QUEEN (βασίλισσα).—A title occurring only once in the Gospels (Mt 12⁴², Lk 11³¹), in our Lord's reference to the queen of Sheba as 'the queen of the south.' The visit of the queen of Sheba to king Solomon is related in 1 K 10¹⁻¹³ and in 2 Ch 9¹⁻⁹; and the chief object of her journey was to satisfy herself as to his great wisdom, the report of which had reached her, although she was also attracted by the accounts which had been brought to her of his riches and magnificence. It is to the former of these two purposes of her visit that our Lord refers. The Pharisees had demanded of Him a special sign, and He replied that no such sign should be given them, but that they should have a sign in Himself and in His burial and resurrection, as the Ninevites had had in Jonah. But the Ninevites, He added, would in the judgment condemn the men of that generation; for they had repented at the preaching of Jonah, who was a sign to them, while the men of that generation, He implied, would not repent at the preaching of one greater than Jonah. Then, referring to the celebrated queen, He added: 'The queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it; for she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and, behold, a greater than Solomon is here.'

The connexion between the case of the Ninevites and that of the queen of Sheba does not lie on the surface. Some have supposed that our Lord refers to a woman as the correlative to the men of Nineveh previously spoken of. Others think that, having spoken of the Ninevites to whom without any seeking of theirs a preaching of repentance was brought, He refers, to complete the warning, to one who was herself a spontaneous seeker of wisdom. Without setting aside these suggestions, it is more to the point to observe that our Lord brings into juxtaposition the two characteristics—so strongly emphasized in the case of Jew and Gentile—of the desire for a sign, and the seeking after wisdom; and it has been suggested that St. Paul may well have had this whole incident in mind when he wrote 1 Co 1¹⁸⁻²⁷ (see esp. v. 22). We may also notice how our Lord in effect boldly claims to be what St. Paul says that He is, 'the wisdom of God.' Solomon was 'wiser than all men' (1 K 4³¹), and later Jewish literature delighted to magnify his wisdom (cf. Wis 7¹⁷⁻²¹). For our Lord, then, to claim before a Jewish audience to be 'something more' than Solomon, was to claim to be Wisdom itself. We may also remark how here again, as in the discourse at Nazareth, our Lord chooses His examples from among Gentiles (cf. also Mt 8^{11, 12} 10¹³ 11²²⁻²⁴).

Abyssinian legend has many strange tales of the queen of Sheba, declaring that she came from Ethiopia, that her name was Maqueda, and that she had a son by Solomon. (For many curious details, see Ludolf, Hist. Aethiop. ii. 3; Vite sanctorum indigenarum, ed. K. Conti Rossini; Legend of the Queen of Sheba, ed. E. Littmann; also Jos. Ant. vii. vi. 5). All this, however, probably rests on a confusion between Seba (שֶׁבָא) and Sheba (שֶׁבַע), cf. Ps 72¹⁰. Our Lord's phrase, 'the queen of the south,' falls in with the most widely accepted opinion, i.e. that Sheba was in South Arabia; her land was accordingly more than a thousand miles from Jerusalem, a fact which justifies our Lord's words, ἐκ τῶν μερῶν τῆς γῆς (cf. Jer 6²⁰).

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.—A full examination of the questions asked and the answers given by Jesus would involve a general consideration of the methods He employed in His teaching, and in meeting the difficulties of His hearers. Every good teacher must adopt the plan, associated for classical students with the name of Socrates, of using questions to make his hearers define their own position and ideas, and to help them to see clearly the admitted fundamental principles which underlie the discussion; and he will further find in the questions they ask, since they give him an insight into the way in which their minds are working, opportunities for emphasizing, explaining, or developing his teaching according to their requirements. If any one will take the trouble to read through the Gospels, and note and mark in the margin all the questions and answers of Jesus, he can hardly fail to learn from the method employed by the world's greatest Teacher much that will be of use to one who has himself to teach others. It is personal work at the records themselves that has a real value, and the main object of this article is to suggest lines of study, since an exhaustive investigation is obviously impossible within the space available.

i. Questions put by Jesus.—1. The prominence of interrogative sentences in the Gospels is due in part to the characteristic avoidance of indirect constructions; but no doubt both in this particular and in the number of questions introduced they reflect the vividness of the Saviour's methods of teaching. The interrogative form was also particularly adapted to make people think for themselves, and we can trace all through our Lord's utterances the desire to promote thought. In a few cases the questions are simply requests for information. One instance is of special interest. According to Mk 6³⁸, Jesus asked the disciples, before the feeding of the 5000, 'How many loaves have ye?' This question is omitted in Mt. (14^{16f.}) and Lk. (9¹³). Jn. (6^{5c}) relates that Christ asked a similar question of Philip on the same occasion,

'Whence are we to buy loaves, that these may eat?' But the Evangelist is careful to show that he does not understand this to be simply a request for information, by adding, 'And this he said to prove him: for he himself knew what he would do.' The following is a list of simple requests for information; it will be noted that they occur mostly in Mk., and fall in with the simpler conception of the Person of Christ presented in that Gospel:

- Mk 5⁹, Lk 8³⁰ 'What is thy name?' [wanting in Mt.].
- „ 6³⁸. See above.
- „ 8⁵, Mt 15³⁴ 'How many loaves have ye?' [wanting in Lk.].
- „ 8²³ 9^{16, 21} [peculiar to Mk.].
- „ 9³³ 'What were ye reasoning in the way?' [Mt. avoids the question; it is wanting in Lk.].
- Jn 11³⁴ 'Where have ye laid him?'
- „ 18^{4, 7, 34} probably do not come under this category; in each of these instances the question seems to be intended to suggest some thought to the hearers. Jn 20¹⁵, like Lk 24^{17, 19}, seems to be due to the character of a stranger assumed for the moment by Christ.

2. Instances of purely rhetorical questions occur with normal frequency (e.g. Mt 15³, where the parallel Mk 7⁹ has an assertion; Mk 4¹³, Lk 18⁷, Jn 6⁷⁰). Christ habitually used such questions as a form of mild rebuke, often implying a notion of surprise or of sorrow (e.g. Mk 4³⁰ = Mt 8²⁶ = Lk 8²⁵, Jn 3¹⁰).

3. The use of a rhetorical question to introduce parables or parabolic utterances is characteristic of Luke, but is found also in Matthew and Mark. In the latter Gospel the parable of the Mustard-seed (4³⁰) is introduced by the striking double question, 'How shall we liken the kingdom of God? or in what parable shall we set it forth?' which Swete (ad loc.) thus paraphrases: 'How are we to depict the kingdom of God? in what new light can we place it?' He adds, 'The Lord, as a wise teacher, seems to take His audience into His counsels, and to seek their help.' Lk 13¹⁸ retains the double question in an obviously less original and really tautological form, in which the hearers are not taken into the Master's counsels ('Unto what is the kingdom of God like? and whereunto shall I liken it?'), but Mt 13³¹ drops it. Cf. also Mk 2¹⁹ = Mt 9⁵ = Lk 5³⁴, Mk 8^{36f.} = Mt 16²⁶ = Lk 9²⁵, Mk 9⁵⁰ = Mt 5¹³ = Lk 14³⁴; examples peculiar to Mk. are found in 3²³ and 4²¹. This use occurs also in Mt. in passages where the matter is common to himself and Lk. (Mt 6²⁷ = Lk 12²⁵, Mt 11¹⁶ = Lk 7³¹, Mt 18¹² = Lk 15³, Mt 24⁴⁰ = Lk 12⁴²), but there do not appear to be any instances of it in matter peculiar to Matthew. Further examples in Lk. are 6³⁹ 11⁵ (where the interrogative form in which the parable of the Friend at Midnight begins is not carried to a grammatical conclusion), 13²⁰ (= Mt 13³³ where the question is dropped) 14^{26, 31} 15³ 17^{7f.}. A somewhat similar use is found in Jn 4³⁵ and 11⁹, where a parabolic meaning is apparently given to popular proverbs.

This investigation throws an interesting side-light on the Synoptic problem: one of the four parables recorded by Mk. is introduced by a very striking interrogative formula, and many parables in the non-Markan document used by Mt. and Lk. seem to have been similarly introduced; Mt., however, did not care for this use, and was inclined to avoid it.

4. Christ often asked a question also in order to make men draw their own conclusions from His parables: cf. Mk 12²⁹ = Mt 21⁴⁰ = Lk 20¹⁵ (where He apparently answered the question Himself, though Mt. ascribes the answer to the audience), Mt 21³¹, Lk 7⁴² 10³⁶ 16¹¹.

5. Very frequently Christ, by means of a question, led His hearers to admit the truth of matters of common knowledge, or of generally accepted principles, on which He was going to base His teaching: some characteristic examples are here classified:

(a) Matters of common knowledge: Mt 10²⁹ = Lk 12⁹ (price of sparrows), Mt 17²⁵ (tribute collected of strangers).

(b) Appeals to common sense: Mt 5^{46f.} = Lk 6^{32f.}, Mt 7^{3f.} = Lk 6^{41f.} (the mote and the beam—almost parabolic), Mt 7^{9ff.} = Lk 11^{11ff.}, Mt 7¹⁶ (question-form dropped in Lk 6⁴⁴), Mk 7^{18f.} = Mt 15¹⁷, Mk 12¹⁶ = Mt 22²⁰ = Lk 20²⁴ ('Whose is this image and superscription?'), Lk 11⁴⁰ 22²⁷.

(c) Appeals to the conscience of the hearers: Mt 23^{17ff.}, Mk 3⁴ = Mt 12¹¹ = Lk 6⁹, Lk 13¹⁵ 14³ 5 (cf. Mt 12^{10ff.}).

(d) Appeals to OT Scriptures: Mt 22^{5f.} = Mt 12^{3f.} = Lk 6^{3f.}, Mk 11¹⁷ (question-form dropped in Mt 21¹³ and Lk 19⁴⁶), Mk 12^{10f.} = Mt 21³² = Lk 20¹⁷, Mk 12²⁶ = Mt 22^{31f.} (question-form dropped in Lk 20^{37f.}), Mt 21¹⁶, Jn 10³⁴.

(e) To establish principles closely connected with the teaching of Christ in the immediate context: Jn 3¹² 5⁴⁴ 47 8⁴³ 46.

6. Again, Jesus often asked questions to lead men to an exact understanding of the circumstances connected with a question addressed to Himself, or with a request asked of Him; Mk 10³ (contrast Mt 19⁷) leads to a clear statement of the position of the Mosaic Law in regard to divorce, and enables Christ to contrast with it the higher law of God; Mk 10³⁸ = Mt 20²² corrects the false notions of the sons of Zebedee in regard to the Messianic Kingdom; cf. also Mk 10¹⁸ = Mt 19¹⁷ = Lk 18¹⁹ ('Why callest thou me good?'), Mt 11^{7ff.} = Lk 7^{24ff.}, Lk 13²⁻⁴. The instances of this sort of question in the Fourth Gospel are of interest; sometimes the question seems intended to make people think what they are doing (1³⁸ 10³² 18⁵ 7. 23. 34 20¹⁵); at other times, to make them consider how they really stand in regard to Christ (1⁵⁰ 3¹² 6^{61f.} 67. 70 71⁹ 22). Similarly a direct question often made men state exactly what they wanted (e.g. Mk 10⁵¹ = Mt 20³² = Lk 18⁴¹, Jn 5⁶).

7. Questions were also employed by Christ to draw from men a confession of faith; the chief example is Mk 8²⁹ = 16¹⁵ = Lk 9²⁰, where, after the disciples had stated the opinions of the crowds concerning Himself, a further question led to St. Peter's great confession (cf. also Mt 9²⁸, Jn 6⁶⁷ 9³⁵ 11²⁶).

8. Quite alone stands the awful question of human despair addressed from the Cross to the Almighty (Mk 15³⁴ = Mt 27⁴⁶). To attempt to examine the import of that question would be to enter on a discussion of the relation in which Jesus stood to His heavenly Father. See art. DERELICTION.

9. In two instances Christ asked questions of the learned men among the Jews which they were unable to answer: in each case He evidently intended to show that the fundamental principles on which their boasted knowledge rested were wrong. When they demanded by what authority He acted, He asked them whether the baptism of John was from heaven or of men (Mk 11³⁰ = Mt 21²⁸ = Lk 20⁴). Their inability to answer showed that they did not possess the spiritual powers necessary for forming a judgment on claims which rested on eternal principles of right and wrong. The question (Mk 12³⁵ = Mt 22^{32ff.} = Lk 20⁴¹) concerning the Davidic descent of the Messiah showed that their interpretation of the Scriptures was not consistent, even when judged according to their own principles.

ii. Answers of Jesus to questions put to Him.

—1. We turn now to the answers which Jesus gave. Very striking are those instances where the silence of Christ was more eloquent than words could have been. It was useless to attempt any answer to the charges of witnesses, brought against Him before judges who had procured their false evidence (Mk 14⁶¹ = Mt 26⁶³), or to similar charges before Pilate (Mk 15⁵ = Mt 27¹⁴) and Herod (Lk 23⁹); it was useless to discuss with such a man as Pilate the nature of truth (Jn 18³⁸), or His heavenly mission (Jn 19⁹). Only when such questions are asked in a right spirit is it worth answering them. When Pilate asked Him (Mk 15² = Mt 27¹¹ = Lk 23³, cf. Jn 18⁵⁷) whether He was 'the King of the Jews,' He gave an ambiguous answer—'Thou sayest': it was a title He had not Himself claimed, and which belonged to Him only in a sense that Pilate could not understand. But Christ did not hesitate, in spite of the obvious danger, to give direct answers to questions concerning His own claims (Mk 14⁶² = Mt 26⁶⁴, cf. Lk 22⁷⁰). See art. SILENCE.

A very interesting problem arises, however, in regard to this last answer. The high priest asked (Mk 14⁶²), 'Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?' (According to Mt 26⁶³ he said, 'I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God': Lk 22⁷⁰ has, 'And they all said, Art thou then the Son of God?'). Jesus answered, according to Mk. 'I am' (Ἰγώ εἰμι), according to Mt. 'Thou hast said' (σὺ εἶπας), and according to Lk. 'Ye say that I am' (ὡς οἱ ἄλλοι εἶπεν ὅτι Ἰγώ εἰμι). It is usual to interpret the answer in each Gospel as a strong affirmation, and, in view of the fact that the order of Lk. (who continues at once, 'And they said, What further need have we of witness?') supports this interpretation, it may probably be accepted as the right one. But it is possible that the answer to the high priest was really ambiguous, as the answer to Pilate seems to have been (so Westcott on Jn 18³⁷), and that Mk. and Mt. each dropped a half of the answer which is more accurately preserved in Lk.

2. Often He answered a question somewhat indirectly, correcting the mental attitude, or some misconception, of the questioner. Thus in answer to, 'Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?' (Mt 18¹), He shows the character of true greatness in the judgment of God. When a man asked (Lk 13²³), 'Lord, are there few that be saved?' Jesus puts the word 'strive' (ἀγωνίζεσθε) at the head of His answer, and thus corrects the spirit of the questioner: this was no matter, He evidently thought, for academic discussion such as the Jewish Rabbis delighted in, nor was it a question of privilege—it was a practical matter, in which personal effort was of vital importance.

The following passages will repay careful study, and show how ready the Master was to avail Himself of any opportunities of giving teaching, even if they were due to the hostile questions of His foes, and also how He always drew the questioner away from details and misconceptions to principles of vital importance:—Mk 27¹² and parallels (the parallel between physical and mental healing—both are proper functions of the representative Son of Man), Mk 2¹⁸⁻²² and parallels (formal fasting has no value), Mk 7^{5ff.} = Mt 15^{2ff.} (observance of the traditions of the elders), Mk 10^{17ff.} and parallels ('What does the word good really imply?'—then the young questioner is made to feel that his knowledge, that of the letter of the Law, is not enough to lead to goodness, and a counsel of perfection is given), Mk 12^{16ff.} and parallels (distinction between carnal and spiritual things), Mk 13^{3ff.} and parallels (men are not concerned with foreknowing the dates of future events, but with recognizing their import as they come), Mt 11^{2ff.} = Lk 7^{19ff.} (What are the true signs of the Messiah?), Mt 15¹² (it matters not if the carnally-minded are offended, whatever their worldly position), Lk 9^{54f.} (where the TR evidently contains a correct exegesis), Lk 10^{40ff.} (there is something better than anxious outward service), Lk 12^{41ff.} (those who have to teach others must learn all they can). It is evident that in most cases the answer was given in such a way as to cause thought, without which its reference to the question is by no means obvious; this is notably the case in Lk 17³⁷; the epigrammatic answer to the question of the perplexed disciples—'Where, Lord?'—finds a solution only when we remember that the Master's thoughts were fixed on eternal principles, not on the examples of them that take place in time.

3. Very characteristic of the Fourth Gospel is the way in which Christ is represented as making questions of quite ordinary import, or those caused by utter bewilderment, the occasion of spiritual teaching. When Nicodemus asks (3⁴) how a man can be born a second time, Christ does not attempt to explain the difficulty, but goes on to speak of being born from water and spirit. Each question of the puzzled crowd in the Capernaum synagogue (ch. 6) leads on to deeper teaching, so that those disciples who could neither follow it nor accept it on trust left Him. When the Jews ask where Christ got His education (7¹⁵), His answer points them to the Divine Author of His teaching. The disciples ask (9²) whether blindness from birth is the punishment of pre-natal or of parental sin; the answer sets aside such a question as trivial, and embodies the only explanation of human suffering that can be given—it is necessary to the working out of God's plan. Judas (not Iscariot) asks in surprise (14²²), 'Lord, what has happened that thou art about to manifest thyself to us and not to the world?'—the answer shows the condition of communion with the Father. The careful student will multiply instances for himself.

4. Christ made people answer their own questions by Himself putting leading questions. The image and superscription of Caesar on the tribute money (Mk 12¹⁶ and parallels) gave a practical answer to the question of the Pharisees and Herodians, and to the lesson thus taught He Himself added a spiritual one. Many instances in which the questioners were forced to think out the answers for themselves will be found referred to under i. §§ 5 and 6 above, for it was characteristic of Christ's methods to answer a question by a question.

5. The answers given by Christ to questions which were asked for the express purpose of placing Him in a difficult position, or of showing the falsity of His principles, may at first sight seem to require separate treatment; but further consideration will show that He avoided the pitfalls prepared for Him by using the same dialectical methods as in replying to the inquiries of disciples: either He made the hostile questioners practically answer their own question, as in the case of the paying of tribute to Rome (Mk 12¹⁷ ||); or else He took occasion to state a great general principle, which included and forced into its right place the particular detail referred to in the question (Mk 2¹⁸⁻²² ||, and other passages referred to under § 2 above).

QUIRINIUS.—Lk 2² AV, 'And this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria' is better rendered in RV, 'This was the first enrolment made when Quirinius was governor of Syria.' From art. CENSUS it will be seen that this statement probably means that this was the first occasion of an enrolment of this nature, an enrolment of population by households as distinct from a rating-enrolment in reference to property, and that it took place during the governorship of Quirinius in Syria. Here, however, there seems to emerge a great discrepancy between St. Luke's account and what is known from secular history. It is certain that Publius Sulpicius Quirinius was the administrator of Syria from A.D. 6 to 9, and that in that period he took the rating-census mentioned in Ac 5³⁷ (Jos. Ant. xvii. xiii. 5, xviii. i. 1). But the birth of Jesus took place before the death of Herod the Great (Mt 2), and that was in B.C. 4. The narratives of the two Evangelists seem to be at hopeless variance on a most important point. How are they to be reconciled?

One way of cutting the knot readily occurs. We might suppose that the clause Lk 2² was not in the original narrative, but was a marginal date inserted by an early copyist, who made a mistake as to the census intended; but the MSS afford no warrant for this suggestion. Now, assuming the text to be as St. Luke wrote it, we can have no doubt that he did so quite deliberately, for he was most careful to give an accurate account (see Lk 1¹⁻⁴), and he himself has chronicled the census of A.D. 6 to 9 in Ac 5³⁷. This would lead us a priori to reckon that as in his view at least there was no discrepancy, there must be some explanation that does not lie on the surface. Dr. Lardner's method of solving the difficulty is to interpret the verse thus: 'This was the first census of Cyrenius, who (afterwards) was governor of Syria,' St. Luke taking pains to distinguish, according to this view, between the two enrolments, and giving the information that Quirinius was the man who at a later time became governor of Syria. Thus Herodian says that 'to Marcus the emperor were born several daughters and two sons'; yet we know that some of them at least were born before he became emperor. Dr. Lardner's interpretation, however, does violence to the construction of the text, and is at best a forced expedient to avoid a difficulty. Fortunately, later scholarship is able to dispense with it. Zumpt (Commentatio de Syria Romanorum provincia ab Cesare Augusto ad Titum Vespasianum) has shown that Quirinius seems to have been governor of Syria on two occasions; and this clue has been followed up by independent studies of Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?). A fragment of an inscribed stone found at Tivoli in 1764 tells of the doings of a Roman official in the time of Augustus. The name has perished, but from the facts recorded antiquarians of note agree in believing that he was Quirinius. Now this stone distinctly mentions that he was twice legatus of Syria. [The actual word legatus is wanting in the fragment preserved, but some such word is required by the context]. Still the problem is not solved by this discovery, though secular as well as sacred history must share the difficulty: for it happens that we know who were governors of that province for the whole period prior to Herod's death in B.C. 4. In B.C. 9 Sentius Saturninus succeeded Marcus Titius, and Josephus (Ant. xvii. v. 2) says: 'Now Quintilius Varus was at this time at Jerusalem, being sent to succeed Saturninus as president of Syria'; and this statement is verified by coins of Antioch-in-Syria bearing his name with date. As we know that Augustus had a rule that no governor of a province should hold that office for less than three or more than five years, the whole period from B.C. 12 to 4 is covered, and there is no room to place the governorship of Quirinius at the time required. He cannot have been governor before B.C. 12, for he was then consul at Rome; and even if it were of any service, we cannot place him later, for he became tutor of Caius Caesar and governor of Asia; so that there is a difficulty in fixing his earlier period of holding office in Syria, if, indeed, he was twice governor. Farrar has suggested that, the above-mentioned rule of Augustus notwithstanding, Varus was displaced 'because his close friendship with Archelaus, who resembled him in character, might have done mischief'; but of this there is no evidence, and the conjecture is but a make-shift. A better solution of the problem is to reckon that the governorship of which St. Luke speaks may have been of a different character from that held by Saturninus and Varus. Quirinius was a man who had shown himself very capable in military affairs. Now at this period there were troubles with various tribes in Syria and its frontiers. Tacitus (Ann. iii. 48) tells us that Quirinius waged successful war against the Homonadenses in Cilicia (which belonged to Syria) at a time prior at least to A.D. 2, when he became rector to Caius Caesar. There is therefore, to say the least, no unlikelihood that while Varus, who had no military renown, was left as the ordinary governor to administer the internal affairs of the province, Quirinius was appointed an extraordinary governor in charge of the military operations in the same region, with the title of legatus, or more specifically of dux. Inasmuch as the Greek equivalent in the case of either civil or military governor is ἡγεμών, St. Luke would be justified in saying, as he does, that the first enrolment was made 'when Quirinius was acting as governor' (ἡγεμονεύοντος Κυρηναίου).* Those nearer the Evangelist's own day, for whom he was specially writing, and who were better acquainted with the secular history of the time than readers nowadays, would find the date he thus gives even more exact than if he had mentioned either Saturninus or Varus; for, as has been shown in art. CENSUS, the enrolment was determined during the rule of the former, but, so far as Palestine was concerned, probably carried out during the rule of the latter. The likelihood of there being two simultaneous governors, one for military the other for civil affairs, in the same province, is supported by parallel instances adduced by Ramsay (op. cit. 238 ff.).

Another theory in explanation of the passage about Quirinius is that he was neither civil nor military governor, but merely one of the commissioners appointed to take the enrolment throughout the whole Roman world, the district for which he was responsible being Syria. Palestine, though not at this period actually a Roman province, was under the Roman suzerainty, and from its proximity it would be included under Syria. St. Luke, having no better word for the enrolment commissioner, might use ἡγεμονεύων [ἡγ. τῆς σκέψεως 'taking lead in the inquiry,' Plat. Prot. 351 E]. Tertullian (adv. Marc. iv. 19) states that the census at the time of Christ's birth was taken by Saturninus, not Quirinius, and thus seems to correct the narrative; but that must be merely because he knew that the enrolment had been decided upon during the civil governorship of Saturninus; he cannot have meant that it was actually accomplished then; for that would be utterly inconsistent with the date he elsewhere (adv. Jud. 8) gives for the nativity, B.C. 3.

QUOTATIONS.—1. Use of the OT in the Gospels.—In general it is agreed that a quotation is the intentional reproduction of some thought or fact already expressed in language by the use of the very words previously employed. This is an exact quotation. A free quotation is one which fails to reproduce the self-same words, because, either through defect of memory or lack of care, the person making it employed language varying more or less widely from that of his source, or he may have intended merely to give the substance of the original. Ordinarily an unintentional use of the same thought or of identical words is not to be regarded as a quotation. The intention is essential, to constitute a quotation either exact or free. The quotations in the Gospels may be classed as follows:

(a) Quotations which conform to both the Hebrew and the Greek of the OT: (α) by Jesus, Mt 15^{4b} (Mk 7^{10a}) 15^{4b} (Mk 7^{10b}) 19⁵ (Mk 10⁷, 8) 19¹⁸, 19a, 19b 21^{13a} (Mk 11^{17a}, Lk 19^{46a}) 22³⁹ (Mk 12²¹), Mk 12²⁶ (Lk 20⁴², 43), Jn 10³⁴; (β) by others, Mt 5²¹, 27, 38, 43 21⁹ (Mk 11⁹, Lk 19³⁸, Jn 12¹³), Lk 10²⁷; (γ) by the Evangelist, Jn 19²⁴.

(b) Quotations conforming to the Hebrew alone: by Jesus, Mt 9¹³ 12⁷ 27⁴⁶ (Mk 15³⁴), Lk 22³⁷ 23⁴⁶.

* Plut. Camill. 23 uses ἡγεμονία for the division of an army under an officer.

(c) Quotations conforming to the Greek alone: (α) by Jesus, Mt 4⁷ (Lk 4¹²) 13¹⁴, 15 19⁴ (Mk 10⁶) 21¹⁶, 42 (Mk 12¹⁰, 11, Lk 20¹⁷); (β) by the Evangelist, Jn 12²⁸.

(d) Free quotations varying from both Hebrew and Greek: (α) by Jesus, Mt 4⁴ (Lk 4⁴) 4¹⁰ (Lk 4⁸) 4¹⁵, 16 11¹⁰ (Lk 7²⁷) 18¹⁶ 22³² (Mk 12²⁶, Lk 20³⁷) 22³⁷ (Mk 12²⁹, 30) 22⁴⁴ 26³¹ (Mk 14²⁷), Mk 4¹² 10¹⁹ (Lk 18²⁰), Jn 6³⁵ 13¹⁸ 15²⁵; (β) by others, Mt 26⁴⁶ (Lk 4¹⁰, 11), Mk 12³², 33, Lk 10²⁷, Jn 2¹⁷; (γ) by the Evangelist, Mt 2¹⁸ 21⁵ (Jn 12¹⁵) 27⁹, 10, Mk 1², Lk 2²³, 24, Jn 12⁴⁰ 19³⁶, 37.

(e) Free quotations varying less from the Hebrew than from the Greek: by the Evangelist, Mt 8¹⁷ 12¹⁸⁻²¹.

(f) Free quotations varying less from the Greek than from the Hebrew: by Jesus, Mt 15⁵, 9 (Mk 7⁶, 7) 24¹⁵ (Mk 13¹⁴), Lk 4¹⁸, 19 8¹⁰.

The variations in exactness of quotation and in the standard to which they conform are interesting. The importance of the variations is open to question. Few of them are noticeable. Yet more, if the teaching of Jesus had been confined to a few days or weeks, if He had spoken about the topics recorded in the Gospels but once or twice, and if there were evidence that He was particular about the exact phrasing of His teachings, the question might be of more importance. We remember, however, that Jesus lived three years with disciples, teaching them and speaking on a great variety of occasions; and these facts were inconsistent with a stereotyped mode of utterance. Moreover, the record of His deeds and teachings is brief at best. The Gospels give from one-fifth to one-third of their scanty space to a period of one week, and but slight, though vivid, glimpses of occasional scenes during the remaining three years. He must have spoken many times on the same subjects, and have uttered the same thoughts in many modes of expression. One who insisted, as He did, upon the supremacy of the spirit over the form would scarcely have permitted Himself to be bound by a strict conformity to the letter, while appealing to the OT for the authority of the truths which He taught. This fact makes it seem strange that the collection of His teachings is not much larger and the variety of His expressions much greater. Under the influence of such a Teacher it is not likely that the disciples were over anxious to conform with exactness to the text of the OT.

The passages cited give evidence of intentional use of the OT. Usually they are introduced by some formula of citation such as 'it is written,' 'the Scripture saith,' and the like. There are about fifty different variants in the mode of introducing explicit quotations found in the Gospels.

Some of the passages given above have no formula of introduction, but the context of the passage shows conscious and intentional use of OT material. It is also to be noticed that the Gospels vary in their representation of the same passage or fact. E.g. the Evangelist in Jn 19²⁴, 28 connects the events with a passage in the OT; the parallel narratives in the Synoptics mention these facts without connecting them in any way with the OT, so that at the utmost, so far as these Gospels are concerned, the passage is, so to say, an accidental parallel having no proper classification with quotations. It cannot be regarded as in the slightest degree an instance of use of the OT by these Evangelists. This is equally true of all events narrated in the Gospels which are not explicitly connected with OT passages, no matter how striking the coincidence; e.g. Is 50⁶ might well have been referred to in the narratives in Mt 26⁶⁷ 27²⁶, Mk 14⁶⁵, Lk 22⁶³, 64, Jn 18²², and so also might Ps 22⁸, 16, but neither of these notable OT passages was so used. Again, while Mt 13^{14, 15} is unquestionably a quotation, the same thought expressed in the parallel passage, Mk 4¹², has no formula of quotation, and has such transpositions and omissions that if we did not know of the passages in Isaiah and Mt., we might well doubt if it were a real quotation. As it is, we think it was intentionally derived from Isaiah. Further, Lk 8¹⁰ is parallel with the passages just cited from Mt. and Mk.; it has a sentence from Is 6⁹, nothing from v.¹⁰, and is much more brief than Mark. If the parallel passages in Mt. and Mk. were unknown, even though we were fully acquainted with Is 6^{9, 10}, we should think that the use of the OT thought and phraseology was due to familiarity with the language rather than to an intention to quote from it. As it is, we have little doubt that the writers had in mind to report the same utterances of Jesus, and that the report is more incomplete in one case than in the other. Yet it is quite possible that different discourses of Jesus are reported. These instances, the words recorded in Jn 9³⁹ as uttered by Jesus, and those of the Evangelist in Jn 12⁴⁰, lead us to think the passage in Is 6^{9, 10} pointed many an utterance of Jesus.

How many more passages like this in Lk 8¹⁰ do the Gospels contain? That is a matter of conjecture. It is desirable to add to the lists already given several other lists of passages which go to show the nature of the connexion between the OT and the NT.

(g) Intentional and free use of OT laws, facts, or statements independently of the original form of expression: (a) by Jesus, Mt 5^{2b} (Lk 13^{34a}) 8⁴ (Mk 1⁴⁴, Lk 5¹⁴) 11¹⁴ 17^{10, 11} (Mk 9^{12, 13}) 12^{8, 4} (Mk 2^{25, 26}, Lk 6^{3, 4}) 12^{5, 40, 41} (Mt 16^{4b}, Lk 11^{29, 30, 32}) 12⁴² (Lk 11³¹) 23³⁵ (Lk 11^{50, 51}) 24^{37, 39} (Lk 17^{26, 27}), Lk 4²⁵⁻²⁷ 17^{28, 29}, Jn 5^{39c, 46} 8¹⁷; (β) by others, Mt 22²⁴ (Mk 12¹⁹, Lk 20²⁸) 23^{30, 31} (Lk 11^{47, 48}), Lk 17^{2b}, Jn 5¹⁰ 6^{31, 40, 58} 8⁵ 19³¹; (γ) by the Evangelist, Lk 2²², Jn 4² (?).

(h) Another interesting group of passages consists of those which have a formula of reference to the OT as their source or authority, but whose content cannot be referred to any specific OT passage. These are all from the words of Jesus: Mt 26^{24a} (Mk 14²¹) 26^{34, 56a} (Mk 14⁴⁹), Mk 9^{12b, 13}, Lk 11⁴⁹ 18³¹ 21^{22b} 24^{44, 46}, Jn 1⁴⁵ 17¹².

(i) Still another class of passages consists of intentional allusions to something in the OT, but they make no formal use of OT material, and are not quotations in any strict sense of the term. The allusion to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is an illustration. (a) By Jesus, Mt 8¹¹ (Lk 13²⁹) 10^{15, 21} (Mk 13¹²) 10^{35, 36} (Lk 12^{52, 53}) 11²⁵ (Lk 10²¹) 21^{13b} (Mk 11^{17b}, Lk 19^{46b}) 24^{30b} (Lk 23³⁷) 24^{30a, c} (Mk 13³⁶, Lk 21²⁷) 26⁶⁴ (Mk 14⁶², Mt 16²⁷ 25³¹), Lk 17³², Jn 15¹ 31^{4a, 15} 8^{7, 35, 56} 9³⁹; (β) by others, Mt 8²¹, Lk 9⁵⁴, Jn 1^{21, 25} 6¹⁴ 7⁴⁰ 16³².

The instances thus far classified come almost entirely under the head of the use of the OT as an authoritative Scripture. Another influence is quite as evident. It is the literary influence. This is the influence of any work of literature over the modes of thought and habits of expression of those who make much use of that work of literature. Men may be unconscious of this influence, or they may consciously use the forms of utterance which they have learned to love. It is doubtless more a matter of habit working within the region of the unconscious, while it is the appeal to authority which is operative within the region of the conscious use of the OT. These two causes produce phenomena which are not altogether easy to classify together.

(j) Such a passage as Lk 8¹⁰ cited above compels the recognition of passages which may have intentionally used the OT thought or language, yet do not give conclusive evidence that they were so used. Its use may have been due to literary and unconscious influence. In any case there is such coincidence in thought and phraseology that an intimate connexion is shown between the thought of the Gospels and that of the OT. For example, when we read in He 12²⁹ καὶ ὁ θεὸς ἡμῶν πύρ καταναλίσκων, and learn that the last two words are found together in the LXX only in Dt 4²⁴ and 9⁸, we think it likely that the writer either intentionally used the phrase, with a thought of the passages in Dt., or that he was so familiar with Dt. that unintentionally and unconsciously he used its words and phrases. Thus also may we connect οἱ πενθούντες of Mt 5⁴ with עֲרִיבָא or טוֹבֵי פֶנְתוּנְטָא of Is 61². When we remember the fact that the mind of Jesus was saturated with the Book of Isaiah, we can easily be convinced that there is a literary connexion between the utterance of Jesus and the OT passage.

The following passages show a similar connexion: Mt 5^{5, 8, 34, 35} 7^{7, 8} (Lk 11^{9, 10}) 7²³ (Lk 13²⁷) 10^{28b} 11⁵ (Lk 7²²) 11²³ (Lk 10¹⁵) 12³⁷ 13¹⁶ 15¹⁴ 16^{27b} 19¹⁷ (Lk 10²⁸) 19²⁶ (Mk 10²⁷, Lk 18²⁷, Mk 14³⁶) 20²⁸ (Mk 10⁴⁵) 21^{11, 12} (Mk 11¹⁵, Lk 19⁴⁵, Jn 21⁶) 23¹² (Lk 14¹¹ 18¹⁴) 23³⁷ (Lk 13³⁴, 23³⁸) (Lk 13^{35a}) 24² (Mk 13², Lk 21⁶) 24²¹ (Mk 13¹⁹) 24²⁹ (Mk 13^{24, 25}, Lk 21^{25, 26a}) 24^{30b} 25³² 26¹¹ (Mk 14⁷, Jn 12⁹) 27⁴⁶ (Mk 15³⁴) 28³, Lk 13^{32, 39, 69} 62¹ 14⁸⁻¹⁰ 16^{15b} 23³⁰, Jn 11^{4, 34} 32¹ 72⁴ 9³⁹ 12^{9a} 14^{15, 21, 24}.

(k) Prolonged examination brings to recognition a class of passages in which, without marked literary relation, or intentional use of the OT, there is yet a genetic relation between the OT and the NT. Jesus had the Spirit without measure, and was an authoritative interpreter of the OT. He had so absorbed the OT that its ideals were His commonplaces of thought, and the scattered suggestions of truth in the OT were apprehended by Him in their full or explicit meaning. Imperfect or fragmentary suggestions became positive principles. In dealing with divorce He went to the fundamental conception of marriage (Mt 13⁵ = Mk 10^{7, 8}). In dealing with the Sabbath, He said that the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath (Mk 2²⁷). This is a universal statement which is suggested in Ex 23¹² and Dt 5¹⁴. Again Jn 4³⁷: 'For herein is the saying true, One soweth and another reapeth' may be a current proverb, or it may be derived in thought from Job 31⁸, Mic 6¹⁵. Whatever be true about that passage, there can be little doubt that the words of Jesus given in Mt 5⁴⁴ 'Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you,' is the explicit statement of an ideal of conduct that finds suggestion in Job 31²⁹ and several other OT passages.

The following is a list of similar passages: Mt 5^{3, 6} (Lk 6^{21a}) 5^{7, 9, 11} (Lk 6²²) 5^{14, 18a} (Lk 16¹⁷) 5^{28, 30} 18⁷ (Mk 9⁴³) 5^{42a} (Lk 6^{30a}) 5^{43, 44a} (Lk 6²⁷) 5^{44b, 48} (6^{9, 11, 14, 15, 19, 24, 25, 26}) (Lk 12²⁴) 7^{6, 21b} (Jn 13¹⁷) 10⁶ 15²⁴ (Lk 15^{6, 19}) Mt 18¹²) 10^{10b, 19, 37, 28} (Jn 6²⁷ 7^{37b}) 19^{29b} (Mk 10⁵⁰) Lk 18³⁰) 10⁴¹ 12²⁹ (Mk 3²⁷, Lk 11^{21, 22}) 19^{28b} 13^{39, 40, 41, 43, 44, 45, 46} 15¹³ 16²⁶ (Mk 8³⁷, Lk 9²⁵) 18¹⁵ (Lk 17³) 21³³ (Mk 12¹, Lk 20⁹) 21¹⁴ (Lk 20¹⁸) 24¹⁶⁻¹⁸ (Mk 13¹⁴⁻¹⁶, Lk 21^{21, 25}) 24³⁵ (Mk 13³¹, Lk 21³³ 16¹⁷) 25^{35, 36, 40, 45, 42, 46} 26²⁸ (Mk 14²⁴, Lk 22²⁰) 26^{52b} 27⁶ 28^{18, 20} Mk 22²⁷ 9⁴⁸, Lk 6^{28, 34, 35, 36} 12^{47, 48} 13^{6, 7} 14¹³ 15^{18, 19, 21} 16^{15b} 19^{8, 42} 21^{24, 25, 26} 22^{19, 31} 23^{34a}, Jn 16^{11, 18} 53^{7b} 64⁶ 216³⁵ (Ezk 36²⁵⁻²⁷ 119⁷) 42^{2b, 37} 51^{7, 21, 22, 27, 29, 30b, 44} 73^{7b, 38, 39a, 42} 81^{1, 9, 31, 41, 103, 104, 16} 13⁵⁴ 15^{12, 17} 14²³ 15^{1, 14, 15} 19⁷ 20³¹.

These lists of passages under (j) and (k) are by no means exhaustive. Dittmar (Vetus Test. in Novo) gives many more passages than have been enumerated, and Hühm (Die alttest. Citate und Reminiscenzen im NT) gives a far greater number. It is not always easy to discriminate to one's own satisfaction between classes (j) and (k). We must follow the more pronounced character of the passage as it appears to us at the moment of investigation. The border-line between a real literary reminiscence and an accidental coincidence is also difficult to determine. Not only would it be possible to increase the lists (j) and (k), but at least two other classes could be made out. One such class (l) would consist of expressions which belong to the life of the land, or the common utterances of the people of the land, such as Mt 9³⁶ 'as sheep not having a shepherd.' These have no real significance, literary or otherwise. Again, there is another class of expressions (m) in which imagery similar to that of the OT is found. 'Wise as serpents' (Mt 10¹⁶) is possibly a comparison suggested by Gn 3¹, or it may have been current rhetoric. Or, again, the image of sifting (Lk 22³¹) may have been a current phrase, or it may possibly have had a suggestion from Am 9⁹.

2. Use of other writings in the Gospels.—Are other writings than the OT used in the Gospels? This question recognizes the possibility (a) of explicit citations from writings outside of the OT as authoritative documents, or (b) of a general use of material as a source of historical example or explicit allusion, or (c) of literary relationship, or (d) of other writings with a genetic relation to the teachings of the Gospels.

Mt 27⁹. Is this a citation from some lost writing outside the OT and attributed to Jeremiah? Apparently the dictate of common sense is that the passage is really from Zec 11¹²⁻¹³, and that there was some slip in the memory of the writer of the Gospel, or that there was an error on the part of the earliest transcribers.

Lk 7^{32b}. Doubtless here Jesus was using as an illustration facts with which all persons who observed children at play were familiar. It seems an attempt to manufacture a difficulty. This passage should be dismissed from consideration.

Lk 11⁴⁹. This is a passage which is not so easily explained. (1) Is 'The Wisdom of God' the name of a book? No such book is known. (2) Is 'The Wisdom of God' a speaker in a book, after the manner of 'Wisdom' in Pr 8? Every trace of such a book now seems lost. (3) Is Jesus quoting Himself? See Mt 23³⁴, where Jesus says, 'Behold I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes,' just as in this passage Wisdom says, 'I will send unto them prophets and apostles.' The words in Mt. are dated in the second day of Passion Week, while the passage in Lk. belongs to a time several weeks or months earlier. If Jesus in Lk. is quoting Himself, it is from an utterance of an earlier date, not elsewhere transmitted to us. Resch (*Agrapha*², p. 184) would show that 'The Wisdom of God' was one of the self-designations of Jesus like 'The Son of Man.' To these statements it must be said that while they are possible, Jesus is nowhere else designated in this manner, nor is He elsewhere represented as quoting Himself in this manner. (4) It is claimed that the passage is founded upon Pr 1²⁰⁻³¹, and this is supported by the fact that in the early Christian Church the Book of Proverbs was called a Sophia. The passage hardly seems adequate for the words of Jesus. (5) This passage is claimed as an amplification of 2 Ch 24²⁰⁻²². This is in reality the same as (7) below. (6) Used of Divine Providence, as manifested in history (cf. Pr 8²²⁻³¹), sending prophets and apostles, equivalent to saying 'God in His wisdom said.' This is supported by the passage Lk 7³⁵ 'and wisdom is justified of all her children.' This is quite tenable. (7) The personal wisdom of God in Christ. In support of this are the facts that Jesus says the same thing in Mt 23³⁷ in His own Person, that He is elsewhere said to send prophets and apostles (Lk 10³, Eph 4¹¹), and that this is a Logos conception of Jesus. Even so, a reason for the expression is not obvious, nor is it at all evident why Jesus should have used this unusual phrase. There are difficulties in regard to any explanation of this passage. The greatest of all is in the theory of an extra-OT source. The passage is perfectly intelligible without such a theory, whatever be said as to the reason of the expression.

Jn 4³⁷. 'For herein is the saying true, One soweth, and another reapeth.' Is this an explicit quotation from some writing? The word 'saying' does not point back to a writing. It might readily be something of a proverbial character, which had its origin in the mode of thought and utterance which is found in Lv 26¹⁶, Dt 28³⁸⁻⁴⁰ 6¹¹, Job 31⁸, Mic 6¹⁵, thus having a literary connexion of some sort with the OT.

Jn 7³⁸. If this is a quotation from a writing outside the OT, a wholly unknown writing has to be assumed. Nowhere else in the NT is a writing outside the OT called γραφή, 'Scripture.' It is a tenable and adequate explanation to treat it as 'a free quotation harmonizing in thought with parts of various passages, especially Is 44³ 55¹ 58¹¹' (Meyer). See, on an attempt to trace the saying to a Buddhist source, Exp T xviii. [1906] p. 100.

The examination of these passages fails to show the slightest probability that Jesus, a speaker in the Gospels, or any writer of the Gospels, explicitly cited any writing outside the OT as authoritative Scripture.

(b) Examination of the facts gives no greater probability that historical illustrations from writings other than the OT occur in the Gospels, or intentional allusions to such writings, in any such manner as the illustrations taken from the OT, or as the allusions to the OT found in the Gospels.

(c) It is difficult not to believe that literary connexion is quite marked. Note, especially, the following passages: Mt 5³⁴⁻³⁵ (Sir 23⁹) 5^{42a} (Sir 4⁴⁻⁵) 5^{42b} (Sir 29^{2a}) 5⁴⁴ (Wis 12^{19a}) 6¹²⁻¹⁴ (Sir 28²) 7¹² (To 4¹⁵) 11^{28f}. (Sir 51^{23ff.}) 19²¹ (Sir 29¹¹) 23³⁸ (To 14⁴), Lk 6³⁸ (Sir 14^{18a}) 10²⁵ 18⁸ (Enoch 40⁹, Sibyl. proem. 85=frag. ii. 47) 16⁸ (Enoch 108¹¹) 18⁷ (Enoch 47¹⁻²) 18¹⁻⁸ (Sir 32¹⁷⁻¹⁸) 20¹⁰⁻¹¹ (Enoch 89²¹), Jn 6^{27a} (Sir 15^{24¹⁹}) 8⁴⁴ (Wis 2²⁴, Enoch 60⁶).

(d) Is the relation between these writings more important than a merely literary relation? If it is, how important is it? What does it signify? In the references above, the extra-OT books are all prior to the birth of Jesus. They reveal something of the thought of the Jews before His time, and doubtless of His own generation. The very tone of the words of Jesus to Martha (Jn 11^{25, 25, 26}) shows that He assumed the truth of beliefs which had no prominence in the thought and life revealed in the OT. The non-canonical literature gives abundant evidence that the belief in the resurrection had become an important factor in the beliefs of the Jews. Such a passage as Mt 25³¹⁻⁴⁶ can hardly be said to be suggested by the OT writings. Compare it with Enoch 90¹⁸⁻³⁸, and striking similarities are found. Mt 25^{41b} 'Depart from me, ye cursed, into the eternal fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels,' and similar passages, as also 13^{42, 50}, may be compared with Enoch 103^{7, 8} and 108⁵⁻⁶. In Lk 16²⁶ the picture of separation between the righteous and sinners in Sheol may suggest Enoch 229¹³, where the righteous and sinners, in separate divisions, await the Great Judgment.

Although there is often a striking likeness in outstanding features, there is also a lack of harmony in details with the spirit of Jesus, which shows why He could not use these writings as an authority. For the possible connexion between the Book of Enoch and Christian thought, see The Book of Enoch, tr. and ed. by R. H. Charles, pp. 48-53, where he enumerates 'doctrines in Enoch which had an undoubted share in moulding the corresponding NT doctrines, or at all events are necessary to the comprehension of the latter.' Without doubt the points of contact between the Book of Enoch and Christian beliefs of the earlier Christian generations were more numerous and intimate than between the Book of Enoch and the Gospels. Also such literature as the extra-canonical Jewish writings had great influence in the early development of Christian doctrine. Their importance, so far as the Gospels are concerned, is chiefly that of explaining the surroundings of Jesus and the spiritual and mental conditions amidst which He worked. Instances such as have been given could be multiplied, but it is doubtful if they could change the conclusions already given. The centuries between the prophets of ancient Israel and Jesus had witnessed a development of thought, especially on eschatological subjects. 'Jesus was a true OT saint' (Davidson, Theology of the OT, p. 520), and joined the work which He did as closely as possible to that of the OT prophets, using their authority for His teachings. Jesus was also a Prophet greater than any that had gone before Him, and He appropriated such current beliefs as were in harmony with His mission, without thereby authenticating other associated beliefs, but rather discrediting them by the general spirit of His teachings.

R

RABBI (from Heb. רַבִּי, which means as adj. 'great' or 'much,' as subst. 'chief' or 'master.' The final syllable is the pronominal suffix, signifying 'my,' the force of which, however, is not expressed in the use of the word).—A title of honour and respect addressed to religious teachers; and in this sense frequently applied in the Gospels to Jesus, and also once (Jn 3²⁶) to John the Baptist. It appears to have come into use in the time of Hillel, who was born c. B.C. 112. That St. John regarded it as a comparatively modern word, and not universally known in his time, seems evident from the fact that he deemed it necessary to explain its meaning (see Jn 1³⁸, where it is expressly stated to be equivalent to διδάσκαλος, rendered 'master' in AV, and 'teacher' in RVm). ῥαββί (ῥαββεί, WH) is frequently tr. 'master' in AV, but RV transliterates 'rabbi' throughout. See MASTER.

DUGALD CLARK.

RABBONI (from Heb. רַבִּיִּן or רַבִּיָּן) is another form of 'Rabbi,' but was considered a higher and more honourable title. Hence possibly its preference by the blind man (Mk 10⁵¹) in his natural anxiety to address Jesus with the title of greatest courtesy and respect that he knew. The word occurs only twice in the Gospels, viz. Mk 10⁵¹ (RV following the reading of most authorities), and Jn 20¹⁶ (ῥαββουὶ, TR; ῥαββουεὶ, WH). In the latter passage it is explained as a synonym for διδάσκαλος.

DUGALD CLARK.

RACA.—The word occurs only in Mt 5²², and offers one of the little riddles of the Gospels which have not found as yet a sufficient explanation. It had been spelt 'Racha' in the AV of 1611; so in Tindale and other earlier versions. It was replaced by 'Raca' in 1638, and explained 'that is, Vain fellow, 2 S 6²⁰,' by one of the marginal notes added to the AV at various times, chiefly in 1762 (see the Introduction to Scrivener's Paragraph Bible, p. xxx). The RV confines itself to the marginal note, 'an expression of contempt.' The spelling of the Greek MSS is ραχα in N⁴D, adopted by Tischendorf; ρακα in N⁶BE, etc., with -â in B, -â in other MSS, as 13. 124. 556 (see Scrivener, Adversaria); ρακα, ρακαβ, ρακαβ in Apost. Const. ii. 32; racha in most MSS of the Latin Versions; racca in d; only f k z and the official Vulgate have raca; רקא in all Syriac Versions, vocalized רַקָּא, רַקָּא, רַקָּא, רַקָּא (see the edition of the Tetraevangelium by Pusey-Gwilliam, and the Thesaurus Syriacus; it is explained as = שׂוֹמֵא, i.e. 'despised,' by Barhebraeus).

The puzzle in the word is the a of the first syllable, which is not found in the corresponding Hebrew word. It is true, J. Lightfoot (Hor. Heb., new ed. by Rob. Gandell, Oxford, 1859, ii. 108) writes:

'Raca: A word used by one that despiseth another in the highest scorn: very usual in the Hebrew writers, and very common in the mouth of the nation.' Then he gives examples from Tanchum, fol. 5, col. 2; fol. 18, col. 4; fol. 38, col. 4; Midrash Tillin upon Ps 138; Bab. Berak. fol. 32. 2, of which the following are worth quoting: 'A heathen said to an Israelite, "Very suitable food is made ready for you at my house." "What is it?" saith the other. To whom he replied, "Swine's flesh." "Raca," saith the Jew, "I must not eat of clean beasts with you." 'A king's daughter was married to a certain dirty fellow. He commanded her to stand by him as a mean servant, and to be his butler. To whom she said, "Raca, I am a king's daughter." 'One of the scholars of R. Jochanan made sport with the teaching of his master; but returning at last to a sober mind: "Teach thou, O master," saith he, "for thou art worthy to teach, for I have found and seen that which thou hast taught." To whom he replied, "רַקָּא, Raca, thou hadst not believed unless thou hadst seen." 'A certain captain saluted a religious man praying in the way, but he saluted him not again: he waited till he had done his prayer, and saith to him, "רַקָּא Raca, it is written in your law," etc.

But in all these cases the Semitic word is spelt רַקָּא (with yod), which must be vocalized רַקָּא, i.e. Reca; see Dalman, Aram.-Neuheb. Wörterbuch, p. 384; Jastrow, Dictionary, ii. 1476. In the first edition of his Gram. d. Jud.-Pal. Aram. (1896) Dalman assumed that in the form of the NT ai had been contracted to a, and that the spelling with χ in the MSS ND was due to an aspirated pronunciation of the Hebrew goph, by which it approached to the aspirated kaph. In the second (1905, p. 174) he suggested at last a more probable solution, that the word in Greek assumed its form through assimilation to Greek ράκος, 'lump' = rag (a tattered piece of cloth, and then used of a shabby, beggarly fellow). This is possible. But there is another strange and not yet corroborated statement about the use of the word, found in Chrysostom, who was acquainted with Syriac as spoken in the neighbourhood of Antioch. He says (p. 214) that it was not a word 'of the highest scorn,' as Lightfoot styled it :

Τὸ δὲ ῥάκᾳ τούτῳ οὐ μεγάλη ἐστὶν ὕβρεως ῥήμα, ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον καταφρονήσεως καὶ ὀλιγωρίας τινος τοῦ λίγοντος. καθάτιερ γὰρ ἡμεῖς ἠοικεῖται, ἢ τισὶ τῶν καταδεδωμένων ἵπιταττοντες λέγουμεν ἀτίλθε σὺ, εἰτὶ τῷ δίνῃ σὺ ὅταν καὶ αὐτῆ Σύρων κερχρῆμοιο γλώττη ῥάκᾳ λέγουσιν, ἀντὶ τοῦ σὺ, τούτῳ τῆβιντες. ἀλλ' ὁ φιλάνθρωπος θεὸς καὶ τὰ μικρότατα ἀνάστα, καθήκοντως ἡμῖν κερχρῆσθαι ἀλλήλοις κελίονα, καὶ μετὰ τῆς προσηκούσης τιμῆς, καὶ ἵνα διὰ τούτων καὶ τὰ μείζονα ἀναρῆται.

In contradistinction to ράκᾳ, Chrysostom considers μωρέ as χαλεπώτερον, as ῥῆμα τῆς ὕβρεως πληκτικώτερον, for which διπλῆ γίνεται ἡ πυρά. The same statement by a later hand is also found on the margin of codex B, τὸ ράκᾳ ἀντὶ τοῦ σὺ being one of the few marginal notes of this MS : and a similar statement is made in the so-called Opus imperfectum, p. 62 ; but, at the same time, the common explanation is there given : 'Racha quidem dicitur Hebraice vacuum.' Euthymius Zigabenus is dependent on Chrysostom : Τὸ ῥάκᾳ δὲ ἑβραϊκῆ ἐστὶ φωνή, δηλοῦσα τὸ Σὺ. Ἐπεὶ γὰρ ὀργιζόμενος τις κατὰ τινος οὐκ ἀξιοῖ καλεῖσθαι τούτου ἐξ ὀνόματος, ὡς ἀνάξιον ὀνόματος ἀντὶ ὀνόματος δὲ τὸ Σὺ τίθησιν. Augustine speaks of having heard from a Jew, that Raca is vocem non significantem aliquid, sed indignantis animi motum exprimentem. No example, however, has been found as yet of this use in Syriac. It is interesting to note that Maclean's Dictionary of the Dialects of Vernacular Syriac gives the vocalization ῥᾶῖ rēca (or rica) for the present dialect of the Azerbaijani Jews. This want of examples may, however, be due to the fact that a word was avoided, the use of which was denounced in the Gospel. The expression ἄθροσκε κενέ in Ja 2²⁰ may be considered its Greek equivalent, as St. Paul's ἄφρων (1 Co 15³⁶) is the parallel to μωρέ. It may be added that the ἐκῆ in the first part of the verse has been believed by some to be the Greek explanation of this Raca, and to have crept into the text at the wrong place. But this is not likely. The Onomastica sacra (ed. Lagarde) are unanimous in the explanation 'κενέ, κενός, vacuum,' and spell ράκᾳ, ράκκᾳ, Racha, Raca (cod. F). See also art. FOOL. EB. NESTLE.

RACHEL, the wife of Jacob and the mother of Joseph and Benjamin, is mentioned in Mt 2¹⁸, in a quotation from Jer 31¹⁵. The words of Jeremiah are understood in this passage as a prediction of the slaughter of the Innocents, but in their original connexion they refer to a historical incident in the prophet's own life. He accompanied the exiles on their way to Babylon as far as Ramah, 5 miles north of Jerusalem (Jer 40¹), and the impression produced by his last sight of them took the form of a poetic picture of Rachel, the ancestral mother of the Israelites (who according to one tradition—1 S 10²—was buried in the neighbourhood), bewailing the fate of her descendants (Jer 31¹⁵). The application of this passage to the massacre at Bethlehem seems to have been suggested by the fact that another tradition placed Rachel's tomb in the vicinity of that town (Gn 35^{19, 20} 48⁷). The supposed site of this sepulchre has been shown, at least since the 4th cent. A.D., about 4 miles south of Jerusalem, and one mile north of Bethlehem. See RAMAH. JAMES PATRICK.

RAHAB.—The mother of Boaz, and thus an ancestress of our Lord (Mt 1⁵).

'These names [those of Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Bathsheba] are probably introduced as those of women in whose case circumstances were overruled by the Divine providence which, as it might have seemed, should have excluded them from a place in the ancestral line of the Messiah. They were in a sense fore-runners of the Virgin Mary' (W. C. Allen, Com. ad loc.).

The 'faith' of Rahab is extolled in He 11³¹, and her 'works' in Ja 2²⁵.

RAILING.—See REVILING and MOCKERY.

RAIMENT.—See DRESS.

RAIN.—See AGRICULTURE in vol. i. p. 40⁸.

RAM.—A link in our Lord's genealogy, Mt 1³⁴. (AV Aram).

RAMAH (Mt 2¹⁸) was a city of Benjamin (Jos 18²⁵), the site of which has been identified with er-Rām, a small village situated about 5 miles north of Jerusalem, at an elevation of about 2600 feet above the sea. Ramah was the point at which Jeremiah parted from the exiles who were being carried away to Babylon (Jer 40¹), and he associated it with Rachel in the passage (31¹⁵) which is quoted by the First Evangelist. This seems to imply that he considered Rachel's tomb to be in the neighbourhood ; and the existence of such a tradition is supported by the account in 1 S 10², which states that Rachel was buried 'in the border of Benjamin.' The mention of Ramah in the NT quotation is a detail which has no significance in relation to the massacre of the Innocents, since Bethlehem was 10 miles away, on the other side of Jerusalem. See RACHEL. JAMES PATRICK.

RANSOM.—The word 'ransom' occurs twice in the NT, in both cases with reference to Christ's giving of Himself for the redemption of man : (1) in Mt 20²⁸ = Mk 10⁴⁵, where it represents the Gr. λύτρον : 'the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom unto many' ; and (2) in 1 Ti 2⁶, where it stands for ἀντὶ λύτρον : 'For there is one God, one mediator also between God and men, himself man, Christ Jesus (v. 5), who gave himself a ransom for all.' The idea, however, is implicit in the verb (λυτροῦμαι) and nouns (λυτρωτής, λύτρωσις, ἀπολύτρωσις) used to express the thought and fact of redemption (see REDEMPTION). It is probable from its structure that the second of the above passages (1 Ti 2⁶) looks back upon Christ's saying in the first (Mt 20²⁸) ; it has been thought also that the ἐλυτρώθητε in 1 P 1¹⁸ is an echo of the same saying (Denney, Death of Christ, p. 92). The word λύτρον itself is most probably the equivalent of the Heb. word כֶּפֶר (Wendt and others question this, but most admit the connexion), and the attempt to give a closer definition of its meaning in relation to Christ's redemption goes back on the usage of this OT word (cf. the elaborate discussion in Ritschl's Recht. u. Vers. ii. pp. 70–80).

כֶּפֶר, then, the word generally translated 'ransom' in the OT (Ex 21³⁰ 30¹², Nu 35³¹ 32 AV 'satisfaction' ; 1 S 12³ AV 'bribe,' Job 33²³ 24 36¹⁸, Ps 49⁷, Pr 6³⁵ 13⁸ 21¹⁸, Is 43³, Am 5¹²), is derived, like the verb כָּפַר 'to propitiate,' 'to atone,' from a root meaning 'to cover.' It may thus be used, as in 1 S 12³ above, of a bribe given to blind the eyes from seeing what, in justice, they ought to see (cf. Ex 23⁸, Job 9²⁴). This connects itself with the old idea of a gift as 'covering the face' (cf. Gn 32²⁰) of an offended person, i.e. propitiating, appeasing him, or inclining him to favour. As, however, in the case of an offence, there is little difference between covering the eyes of the offended party from beholding the offence, and covering the offence from his sight, it can easily be seen how כָּפַר came to take this second sense of covering the sinful person or his iniquity. This leads to the idea, which is the common one in the OT, of כֶּפֶר as a 'ransom,' in the sense of something given in exchange for another as the price of that other's redemption, or for one's own redemption, or, what is at bottom the same idea, as satisfaction for a life. Thus in Is 43³⁻⁴ Jehovah is metaphorically said to have given Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba as a ransom for ('instead of') Israel. Hofmann, in his Schriftbeweis (ii. p. 234, 2nd ed.), has a different interpretation. He takes the notion of 'covering' in this word to apply to 'covering in value' (one thing covering the worth of another), and so imports into רָשָׁם the idea of strict equivalence. It is true that 'ransom' in the OT usually includes the idea of rendering what may be termed an equivalent; but it is more than doubtful whether this can be read into the etymological signification. The term has, on the other hand, in nearly every case the direct meaning of a redemption-price for another, or for one's own life. (1) In illustration of the latter sense, we have it declared in Nu 35^{31, 32} that in no circumstances is a 'ransom' to be taken for the life of a murderer. Again, in Ex 21³⁰ it is provided that if, through its owner's carelessness, an ox gore a man or a woman, the ox shall be stoned, and the owner shall pay 'for the ransom of his life' what is laid on him (in the case of a slave, 30 shekels, v. 32). So at the taking of a census (Ex 30¹²), each Israelite above twenty years had to pay half a shekel—'atonement-money' (v. 15f.)—as 'a ransom for his soul (or life)'. (2) In illustration of the former sense—redemption-price for another (cf. Is 43³ above)—two instances stand out conspicuously. One is Ps 49⁷ 'None of them [the rich in this life] can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him' (cf. v. 8f.); the other is Job 33²⁴ 'Then he is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom.' רָשָׁם, in both of these passages, has clearly the sense of something given in exchange for a life, which redeems it from death.

In the above cases in the Law, the ransom is a sum of money; in the case of the firstborn, though the word רָשָׁם is not used, it is a sacrifice—a life for a life (cf. Nu 18^{15, 16}). Here the fact is to be noticed—of interest in the NT connexion—that in all this range of meanings the word 'ransom' is never in the OT directly connected with the propitiatory sacrifices. It is connected with propitiatory payments (cf. Ex 30¹² above), and in 2 S 21³⁻⁷ the idea, if not the word, is connected with the propitiatory delivering up of Saul's seven sons to the Gibeonites (after refusal of a money-satisfaction, v. 4). But the victim, even in sin- and trespass-offerings, is never spoken of as 'ransoming' the offerer. Its blood propitiates, atones for his sin, but the term 'ransom' is not employed. Yet it must be held that the connexion between the two ideas of sacrifice offered for the removal of sin (to make propitiation, רָשָׁם) and of 'ransom' (רָשָׁם) is very close; and that, whether the word is used or not, the expiatory sacrifice was also, in its own way, a רָשָׁם for the life of the offerer (the LXX in Ps 49⁸ as in 1 S 12³ renders the word by ἰλιχασμα). Ritschl's generalization of the meaning of the term (applied also to the sacrifice) into 'a means of protection' (Schutzmittel), ignores the essential point of redemption (not simply protection) by the payment of a price, or offering of an expiation.

The way is now clearer for the understanding of the NT passages. There can be little difficulty, when his words are taken in the general connexion of his thought, in apprehending what St. Paul meant when he spoke in 1 Ti 2⁶ of Christ's having given Himself as an ἀντιλutron for all. 'Ransom' has here its true and proper sense of 'a price paid in exchange,' and the ideas of 'ransom' and expiatory sacrifice flow together in the unity of the thought of redemption through Christ's reconciling death (see REDEMPTION). In St. Paul's view, Christ has given Himself up as a sin-offering for the world upon the Cross (Ro 8³, 2 Co 5^{14, 21}, Gal 3¹³ etc.). He has redeemed the world by Himself dying for it (Ro 5^{6, 9, 10}). His death, reconciling us to God (Ro 3^{24, 25}, Eph 2¹⁶, Col 1²⁰ etc.), brings life and salvation to mankind. St. Paul's mind is not troubled by the monetary analogy: it is not of a money price he is thinking, but of a great ethical reparation rendered to God's broken law of righteousness. It is to God the 'ransom' is paid, not to another. The Son of God, in humanity, renders it for the world.

If, therefore, St. Paul knew of the saying of Jesus recorded in Matthew and Mark, there can be little doubt how he would have interpreted it. Alike in his thought and that of St. Peter (cf. 1 P 1^{18, 19}), the idea of a λutron is involved in the conception of ἀπολύτρωσις. Redemption has the two aspects, which can never be separated—redemption by 'ransom,' i.e. from sin's guilt and condemnation; and redemption by power, from sin's bondage and other evil effects. The Apostolic gospel comprehended both. But what of Christ's own thought? The genuineness of the saying in Mt 20²⁸=Mk 10⁴⁵ has been assailed (by Baur, etc.), but surely without the slightest grounds (cf. Ritschl, ii. p. 42 ff.; Denney, p. 36 f.). Its meaning also must be interpreted by the fact that Christ's own mind at the time of uttering it was full of the thought of His death. It is His 'life' He gives, and He startles by saying that He yields it up as a λutron ἀντι πολλῶν. He declares, further, that it was for this very end He came. His death was neither unforeseen, nor simply submitted to. He came to redeem the world by offering Himself as a 'ransom' for it. No doubt it is possible to empty the saying of most of its significance by generalizing it to mean that in some undefined way Christ's death would be of great saving benefit to mankind, and therefore might be spoken of metaphorically as a ransom for the good of many (cf. Wendt, Lehre Jesu, ii. p. 509 ff.). This interpretation fails, if account be taken of the redeeming efficacy which Jesus in other places (as in the words at the Last Supper) undeniably attributes to His death (see REDEMPTION). Ritschl, though he unduly weakens the force of the word λutron, does not fall into any such superficializing. He sees a solemn and weighty import in the words of Jesus, and interprets them to mean that Jesus, by His voluntary and guiltless death, directed to this end, redeems the members of His community from the doom of final annihilation impending over them in the judgment of God, gives death a new character to them, and delivers them from its fear (ii. p. 87). The interpretation cannot be accepted; neither is it explained how the death of Jesus should effect such a result. Yet Jesus assuredly did view the world as lying under condemnation of God, sunk in estrangement and evil, and needing both forgiveness and renewal to righteousness, and redemption from this state He connected with His own Person, and in a peculiar way with His death, which He here speaks of as a λutron, or redemption-price, to that end. Further investigation must be left to other articles (see ATONEMENT, RECONCILIATION, REDEMPTION).

The idea of Christ's death as 'a ransom for all' has ever been a favourite one in the preaching, theology, and hymnology of the Church. In certain circles it early became connected with the fanciful notion that the ransom was paid, not to God, but to the Evil One, who was supposed to have acquired rights over man through sin, which God, in righteousness, could not ignore. Christ's soul, therefore, it was taught, was given up to Satan as the price of the surrender of these assumed rights over mankind. But Satan was deceived in the bargain, for, having obtained possession of the sinless soul of Jesus, he could not hold it. That sinless soul was a torture to him. This theory, connected in the early Church with Origen and Gregory of Nyssa (though Origen, at least, frequently expresses himself in a quite contrary sense), prevailed extensively in the Middle Ages, but never really stood alone, or gained ascendancy over the abler minds. Distinguished Fathers repudiated it, and Anselm reasons against it in his Cur Deus Homo.

READER.—The Gospels frequently refer to private reading of Scripture, and Jesus Christ assumes that His hearers have the sacred books and read them for themselves, e.g. Mk 2²⁵ 12^{10, 26}, Mt 12³, Lk 6³. At Nazareth, Jesus took the place of the public reader in the synagogue (Lk 4¹⁶).

The expression, 'Let him that readeth understand,' in Mt 24¹⁵, cannot refer to the reading of Dn 9²⁷, because, although Daniel is mentioned earlier in this passage of Mt. (i.e. at v. 15), in Mk.'s parallel passage there is no reference to Daniel (see Mk 13¹⁴). Therefore the words cannot be part of our Lord's utterance, and must be taken as a note interjected by the Evangelist, the writer of his source, or a reviser. Taken thus, they appear to point to the function of the reader in the primitive Church. That this function was known in very early times is indicated also by Rev 1³, where public reading is unmistakably indicated, because it is associated with hearing by others; 'Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear,' etc. In this respect, as in many other matters, the order of the Christian assembly was moulded on that of the synagogue. Among the Jews any member of the congregation—even a minor—might be the reader both of the Law and of the Prophets, although if a priest or a Levite were present he should have precedence (Gittin, v. 8). Therefore it was quite in order that Jesus, although neither a scribe nor a synagogue official, should have the Prophet roll handed to Him to read. For this reason we may conclude that the reader in the primitive Church was not a man in any sense 'in orders.' For convenience, the same person might read on every occasion; but there is nothing to show that this was the case. We do not meet with the reader among the Church functionaries referred to by St. Paul. Tertullian is the earliest Patristic writer to mention this official (de Præscr. c. 41). In the 3rd cent. he was included among the minor orders (Cyprian, Epp. 29, 38, etc.). See Schürer, *GJV*³ II. ii. 27; Smith's DCA, vol. i. pp. 79, 80; Harnack, Sources of the Apostolic Canons, pp. 54-92.

READINESS.—The expression γίνεσθε ἔτοιμοι, 'Be ye ready,' is employed by Christ to denote the necessity for constant readiness to receive Him at His Second Coming (Mt 24⁴⁴, Lk 12⁴⁰). Closely akin to it in meaning is the more frequently used γρηγορεῖτε, 'Watch ye,' the word with which Christ demands constant watchfulness for the day of His Parousia (Mt 24⁴² 25¹³, Mk 13³⁴, 37, Lk 21³⁶). The two terms are used almost interchangeably in Mt 24⁴², 44, as is evident from the fact that the illustration of the necessity for watchfulness by the case of the negligent householder who suffers his house to be broken through (Mt 24⁴⁵), is followed by the exhortation to readiness in the next verse; further evidence being found in the parable of the Ten Virgins, where the proper performance of the duty enjoined in Mt 25¹³ ('Watch, therefore') is exhibited in the careful preparation made by the wise virgins, who are described as αἱ ἔτοιμοι, for the coming of the bridegroom.

The duty of being constantly prepared for the return of Christ is rendered urgent by the fact that the time of its occurrence is known only to the Father, and, being concealed even from the Son, cannot be communicated to the disciples (Mk 13³²). It is the ignorance of the disciples as to the day and the hour of the final Advent which lends point and emphasis to Christ's exhortations in prospect of it (Mt 24⁴², 44 25¹³, Mk 13³³, 35, Lk 12⁴⁰).

If, as some (Weiss, Charles) maintain, He foretold that the fall of Jerusalem would be the immediate prelude to the end of the world, thus furnishing the disciples with a certain clue to the date of the latter event (Mt 24^{32f.}), the need for such exhortations is far from obvious, and indeed inexplicable, based as they are on the utter uncertainty that prevailed as to the time of the end. In the case of the earlier event, exhortations to watchfulness are wanting, the signs of its approach being quite unmistakable; in the case of the later event, they are frequent, the date of its arrival being quite unknown. Weiss admits that 'any determination of the day of His return, even if it had been possible, would only have rocked the disciples in false security'

(Life of Christ, iii. 93). The truth is, the question is one on which our Lord declined to dogmatize; and while His confession of nescience regarding the end (Mk 13³²) did not preclude the possibility of its speedy occurrence, neither did it preclude the possibility that it might be long deferred. He undoubtedly favoured the idea that the latter alternative was much the more likely one. 'There are distinct hints in some passages (Mt 24⁴⁸ 25¹⁹, Mk 13³⁵) that the end may be delayed beyond all human anticipation, and that "an indefinitely long night of history" may intervene before the return of the Lord' (Forrest, The Authority of Christ, p. 322).

The parables and parabolic sayings in the Synoptics (Mt 24⁴²-25³⁰, Mk 13³²-37, Lk 12³⁵-48 19¹¹-27), intended to enforce the lesson of constant readiness for the Second Coming, may be described as parting counsels and admonitions to the disciples for the guidance of their conduct during the period, indefinitely prolonged, which must elapse between Christ's departure from the world, then impending, and His return at the close of the present dispensation. They all proceed upon the assumption that membership of the Kingdom during its earthly development does not, ipso facto, guarantee fitness for a place in the perfected Kingdom to be inaugurated at Christ's return. The period of His absence is a period of probation for His disciples, who are to be tested individually, and are expected to prove their individual fitness for the glorious Kingdom of the future. 'Every man' has his own proper sphere and work assigned him (Mt 25^{14f.}, Mk 13³⁴, Lk 19¹³), and the lack of personal preparedness cannot be made up for by connexion with the believing community, animated by the common hope of the Lord's appearing (Mt 25¹⁻², 9).

Preparedness for the last Advent naturally depends on maintenance of the moral and spiritual qualities, and continued performance of the duties, pertaining to members of the Kingdom of God—qualities and duties fully described in the teaching of Christ throughout His ministry. The fact of His departure involves no alteration in His great requirements, which are ever the same; it involves merely a deepened responsibility, an increased sense of gravity on the part of the disciples, whose conduct is to be constantly regulated and controlled henceforward by the thought of its bearing upon future destiny. Wendt remarks that 'since Christ's ideas of the future are comparatively general and indefinite, His admonitions regarding the future always retain a comparatively general character.' Directions in greater detail were not needed. The character and conduct required on the part of the disciples, as outlined in Christ's previous teaching, are calculated to satisfy the most stringent tests. The only difference is that they must now be formed under the altered conditions presented by the withdrawal of Christ's visible presence. The proper attitude of the disciple has to be preserved in face of the difficulties, perils, and temptations incident to (1) Christ's unexpectedly prolonged absence, and (2) His sudden and unexpected return.

(1) It is everywhere implied that Christ's withdrawal from the world affords His disciples the needful opportunity for the free and independent exercise of the gifts and powers entrusted to them. Their spiritual resources are to be developed to the utmost without the consciousness of being constantly overshadowed by His visible authority and supervision, but always in view of the day of reckoning (Mt 24⁴⁵-51 25¹⁴-30, Mk 13³⁴-36, Lk 12⁴²-48 19¹²-26). The proof of readiness for His return is thoroughgoing devotion to the interests of the absent Lord, which are identical with the interests of His Kingdom, displayed in steadfast fidelity and unflinching diligence in the use of the gifts held in trust, under the severe test of indefinitely prolonged absence (Mt 24⁴⁵ 25^{20f.}, Lk 19^{16f.}). But the same situation which creates the opportunity for freely utilizing the entrusted gifts, may lead to the misuse or to the absolute neglect of them. The perils attending a delayed Parousia, which must be guarded against with ceaseless vigilance, arise from a weakened sense of obligation issuing in slackness and lethargy, the sin of 'the untrimmed lamp and the ungirt loin' (Mk 13³⁶, Lk 12^{35f.}), yielding to unbridled self-indulgence and the tyrannical abuse of authority (Mt 24^{48f.}), faithless and inexcusable failure to improve one's trust (Mt 25^{26f.}).

(2) The main strength of the appeal for constant readiness is drawn from the consideration that Christ's return will be sudden and unexpected. The frequent admonition to watch sounds a note of alarm, pointing to the danger of being taken unawares and found in a state of unpreparedness, due to the abrupt and startling manner in which the Parousia breaks in upon and breaks up the established order of things (Mt 24³⁰ 25⁶, Mk 13³⁶, Lk 12³⁶ 21³⁴). Being of a catastrophic character, it leaves no time for the making or completing of preparations previously neglected (Mt 24^{38f.} 43 25¹⁰). The period of probation, and with it the possibility of repairing past negligences and failures, are ended, and future destiny determined by character and achievements, now to come under searching scrutiny.

As the Parousia immediately heralds the Last Judgment (Mt 25³¹⁻³¹), the manner in which the disciples have acquitted themselves during the period of Christ's absence is then passed under review, and appropriate destiny assigned them. Those who have proved their capacity in humbler spheres of service by fidelity to Christ's Person and interests are promoted to loftier spheres of service (Mt 24⁴⁷ 25³⁰⁻²³), raised to equality with Himself (Lk 12³⁷), and participate in the eternal blessedness of the consummated Kingdom (Mt 25^{10, 21, 23}). Those who have failed to reach the required standard are excluded, so far as appears, irrevocably, from such high fellowship (Mt 25^{11f.} 30), and incur penalties varying in degree in proportion to their unfaithfulness (Mt 24⁵¹, Lk 12^{47f.}). READING.—See artt. BOYHOOD in vol. i. p. 222^b, EDUCATION, READER.

REALITY.—That a spirit of clear sincerity and genuine reverence for truth pervades the narratives of the Gospel writers and inspires the central Figure they depict, is an impression irresistibly forced on unprejudiced minds. Everywhere there is evident, in the writers themselves and in the Master about whom they write, a straightforward honesty and singleness of aim, and we find ourselves unmistakably in an atmosphere of reality.

I. In the Gospel writers.—Reality, as manifested by the Gospel writers, may be recognized by several notable features, such as:

1. The absence in them of any straining after effect.—They relate facts as they know them, and always with a certain artless simplicity; and if occasionally they put an interpretation of their own upon the facts, it is still patent that it is an honestly framed interpretation. Invariably, in describing startling events, instead of dwelling on their startling character, they content themselves with such bare statements as that 'fear came upon all' (Lk 1^{6b}), that 'all men did marvel' (Mt 8²⁷, Mk 5²⁰), that men were 'amazed' (Lk 4³⁶ 5²⁶), that 'they glorified God' (Mt 9^{8, 33}, Mk 2¹², Lk 5²⁶), or that 'they were astonished with a great astonishment' (Mk 5⁴²). There is often a graphic force in the description, yet the events themselves are related without any rhetorical elaboration, and no attempt is made to heighten the colours. The narrative is plain, direct, and unadorned.

2. Their frankness in recording incidents which reflect on the leaders of their cause.—Notwithstanding every inducement to save the credit of the disciples first chosen by the Master, far from concealing the faults and perversities of those men, they tell the story of them with simple candour, this being in their view essential to an accurate understanding of the circumstances connected with the early beginnings of the faith. The jealous rivalries of the Twelve, and their disputes as to who should be accounted greatest (Mt 18¹, Mk 9³⁴, Lk 22²⁴), the failure of some of them to meet the duty of the hour (Mt 17¹⁶ 26⁴⁰⁻⁴³, Mk 14^{40, 50}), the intolerant zeal (Lk 9⁵⁴) and ambitious scheming (Mt 20²⁰⁻²³) of the two sons of Zebedee, the rash presumption (14²⁸⁻³⁰ 16^{23, 23}) and weak denial (Mt 26⁶⁹⁻⁷⁴, Mk 14⁶⁶⁻⁷¹) of Peter, the treachery of Judas (Mt 26^{10-16, 47}, Mk 14⁴³, Lk 22⁴⁸)—are all told with an unvarnished plainness which betokens an inward pressure to be strictly faithful to the truth.

3. Their genuine absorption in their subject.—There is evident in these Evangelists a feeling that they are dealing with a theme too sacred to be trifled with. Their attitude towards the Lord whose life and actions they seek to portray is one of profound reverential affection, constraining them to a complete sinking of their own personality, with no other aim than that of presenting a picture worthy of Him who has won their hearts. They write as men who are impelled by a pure devotion to declare what they have learned and know about things which they believe to be precious and true.

II. In Jesus.—Reality, as seen in Jesus Himself, is superlatively arresting. In an age of affectations, formalisms, and general bondage to tradition, He stood out as uncompromisingly sincere, intent on getting close to fact and truth, and keeping resolutely in view the essential and permanent interests of life. He dared to think for Himself, and rose high above all artificiality and make-believe. This spirit of reality in Jesus is convincingly attested by the following points:

1. His thorough naturalness as a religious teacher.—With no demure, sanctimonious airs, and no pretentious tones such as the Rabbis were wont to assume, He spoke straight to the heart and conscience; and common people felt that His utterances came home with an authority they were compelled to own (Mt 7²⁹). There was nothing of the professional about Him. His demeanour was that of unstudied simplicity; and when occasion suited, He could unbend and let joy and cheerfulness have their genial flow,—looking with amused interest on the children at their games (Mt 11^{16, 17}), sharing the gladness of the social gathering (Jn 2¹⁻¹⁰), or lighting up His discourse with flashes of playfulness (Lk 11⁵⁻⁸). While keenly alive to the seriousness of His vocation, He affected none of the Pharisaic rigour which would repress the healthy instincts of humanity—a witness for the highest truth, yet winningly human, and with a manner so gracious and open as to make Him easily accessible to all classes of men.

2. His fearless directness in facing the actual facts of existence.—No one ever looked with more straight and steady gaze than Jesus did on the solemn realities of human life and destiny. The distress and suffering that are in the world (Mt 4²³ 12¹⁵), the mysteries of Providence (Lk 13¹⁻⁴, Jn 9³), the value and needs of the soul (Mt 16^{26, 27}, Lk 12^{20, 21}), the curse of sin (Mt 18^{8, 9}, Lk 13³, Jn 8²⁴), the certainty of retribution (Mt 18⁶ 23³³, Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁸), the necessity of spiritual renewal (Mt 9¹⁷, Jn 3³⁻⁷), the burden of responsibility (Mt 11²⁰⁻²⁴ 23¹⁴, Lk 10¹³⁻¹⁶), the imperative obligations of duty (Jn 9⁴), the supreme authority of God (Mt 19¹⁷, Jn 4³⁴ 10²⁹),—on all these Jesus kept His eye fixed with an intensity of vision and purpose that was never relaxed from the beginning to the end of His career. Clearing His mind of all vague sentiment and easy superficiality, He confronted the grave problems and experiences, the mighty facts and forces, which affect man's well-being now and for ever, and dealt with them in a spirit of unwavering fortitude and sincerity.

3. His steadfast determination to reach, and hold by, the fundamental elements of religion.—Radical in the truest sense, Jesus displayed an incessant anxiety to get at the roots of things, to pierce beneath superficial respectabilities, and find the great eternal principles on which life should be based. This is seen (1) in His teaching. The outward observances of religion, He maintained, are nothing unless prompted by genuine gratitude and reverence (Mt 23²³, Lk 11⁴²). No matter how decorous the worship offered to Jehovah, if the spirit of devoutness does not fill the mind (Mt 15⁸, Jn 4²⁴). The show of goodness may look fair, but it has no value if it be the outcome only of calculating prudence or self-flattering pride (Mt 6²⁻⁵, Lk 16¹⁵). Purity, mercy, clear integrity of motive in the central springs of the life, He insisted on as the essentials of goodness. Everything had to be sterling, from the heart, real [see art. HEART].—(2) In His private life. The demand thus made was severely searching, yet it was fully met by Jesus in His own person. If the faithful application of high spiritual principles to the common, trivial concerns of existence be a sure proof of reality, that proof was given by Him in a superb degree. It is significant that the men who knew Him best and saw most of Him in daily intimacy were also the men who adored and believed in Him most fervently; and even the one who played the traitor was yet constrained to bear testimony to the goodness he had wronged (Mt 27⁴).—(3) In His bearing towards the bigoted exclusiveness of His day. Though threatened with the wreck of His own reputation by any association with the 'publicans and sinners,' Jesus had such profound sympathy with them in their despair of all good, begotten by the harsh ostracism to which they were doomed, that He seized every opportunity of coming into touch with them (Mt 9¹⁰⁻¹³, Mk 2^{15, 16}, Lk 5^{28, 30} 15^{1, 2}). Bent on stirring the hearts of those outcasts of society by some ray of hope, He moved straight on to His gracious object, grappling with the moral necessities of the situation, indifferent to the censures of offended propriety. He even went so far as to choose a publican as one of His immediate disciples. The same superiority to the exclusive temper of His time is evinced also in His relations with the despised Samaritans (Jn 4⁴⁻⁴², Lk 17¹¹⁻¹⁹, cf. 10³²⁻³⁷)—His dominant concern always being to penetrate beneath surface appearances, and to reach and make manifest the capacity for righteousness in the innermost core of every human soul.

4. His unworldly standard of personal worth.—While drawing a sharp distinction between the two kinds of worth,—the material and the spiritual (Mt 6^{19, 20, 25}),—Jesus did not denounce material success, though for Himself He never sought it. What He did denounce was the disposition to take material success as the measure of a man's value (Lk 12¹⁵⁻²¹). It is a false measure, and He refused to be judged by it Himself, or to apply it in judging any man. Content to be estimated by His soul-qualities, He estimated others by the same test, not by their temporal status or means (Lk 16¹⁹⁻²⁶, Mk 12⁴¹⁻⁴⁴).

5. His perfect candour in the bestowal of appreciation or reproof.—Though disdaining to flatter, Jesus was ever ready to recognize good, even when found in unexpected quarters, as we see in His praise of the faith of the centurion at Capernaum (Mt 8¹⁰), and of the offering of the poor widow at the Temple (Mk 12⁴²⁻⁴⁴). Prompt and warm, too, was His approval of the genuine feeling which He found struggling to assert itself in any soul, even when others condemned, as when He threw the shield of His graciousness over Zacchæus of Jericho (Lk 19⁹), the erring woman amid her penitence (7⁴⁴⁻⁴⁸), and Mary of Bethany in the scene of the anointing (Jn 12⁵⁻⁷). On the other hand, while benignly charitable towards natural human frailty, He could not suffer the flagrant follies and misdoings that met His eye to pass without remonstrance. The fault-finders who challenged the piety of His disciples because they did not fast (Mt 9¹⁴⁻¹⁷, Lk 5³³⁻³⁹), the illiberal formalists who sought to convert the Sabbath into a dreary bondage (Mk 2²³⁻²⁸, Lk 13^{15, 16}), the hardened censors who had no mercy on a woman caught in transgression (Jn 8⁷), the scribes and Pharisees who turned religion into a pretentious show (Mt 23¹³⁻³⁵),—were made to feel the baseness of the spirit by which they were animated. There was a clear-purposed directness in the intercourse of Jesus with men; and even the chosen Twelve were not spared when they gave way to presumption, intolerance, or jealousy (Mt 16^{22, 23}, Mk 9³⁴⁻³⁶, Lk 9⁵⁴⁻⁵⁶). At the risk of alienating those men, He shrank not from speaking the straight word when their errors or failings called for rebuke.

6. His downrightness in dealing with popular expectations.—Not even to gain a following would Jesus trifle in the slightest with truth and sincerity. When the multitudes, excited by the fame of His deeds, pressed round, expecting Him to take some step which would lift Israel to new heights of glory, instead of playing on their credulity, as for a while He might have done, He struck directly at their sensuous and extravagant hopes, insisting on their deeper needs and the more vital work which had first to be effected in their hearts (Jn 6^{27ff.}). With His eye on the moral and spiritual regeneration of men, He made it abundantly plain that He had no reliance on any such political and social revolution as they were looking for, unless it were brought about through a change of character. And when the inevitable reaction came, He let the once eager through go their way, rather than accept their allegiance on a false understanding of what He was and sought to accomplish (6⁶⁰⁻⁶⁶).

7. His reverent sobriety amid popular enthusiasm.—Dazzling as the outbursts of such enthusiasm were, Jesus would never permit Himself to indulge in the luxury of self-gratulation, but, anxious to preserve the purity of His high spiritual aims, He deliberately seized the earliest opportunity of escaping to the mountains or the wilderness for solitary communion with the Father (Mt 14²³, Mk 3¹³ 6³¹). Even during the triumphal entry into Jerusalem He detached His mind from the ringing hosannas, and thought of the sins of the nation and the threatening doom (Lk 19⁴¹); and when the ovation was over He withdrew to the quiet of Bethany (Mt 21¹⁷), maintaining His spirit clear and true.

8. His scrupulous honesty with regard to the risks of discipleship.—That none might be misled by too sanguine expectations, Jesus took pains to give warning of the hardship and sacrifice which the adoption of His cause would involve. He told those willing to rally round Him to count the cost (Lk 14²⁸⁻³³), to be prepared for the endurance of privation and the rupture of old ties (Mt 10³⁷, Lk 9⁵⁷⁻⁶²), the severities of the world's disfavour (Mt 5¹¹), the cross of self-denial (Mt 16²⁴, Mk 8³⁴). Standing on the clear ground of truth, He spoke without evasion or concealment, and shrank from any homage that was not founded on a heartfelt sense of His spiritual worth.

9. His consistent devotion to an unselfish purpose.—The freedom of Jesus from strictly personal aims is 'writ large' on every page of the Gospel narratives. Even when constrained to assert His high claim as the bearer of a special Divine commission, there is not the slightest trace of His having any end to serve but the will of God and the good of men; and from that end the world had no bribes by which He could be tempted aside (Jn 14³⁰).

10. His calm resoluteness in facing the consequences of His teaching and work.—Though fully alive to the deadly hostility which His teaching and general line of conduct would inevitably arouse, Jesus refused to make His path smoother by any prudential concessions to conventional taste. The policy of concession was urged upon Him at various stages, from the Temptation in the wilderness to the Agony in Gethsemane, but was always energetically repelled. When Peter at Cæsarea Philippi ventured to dissuade Him from carrying His principles to the point of personal danger, He treated the suggestion as a voice from the realm of darkness (Mt 16^{22f.}). Conscious of a testimony to bear for God to which He could not be untrue, and intent on disseminating ideas which He felt to be essential to the spiritual well-being of humanity, He confronted the malice of priests, Pharisees, and scribes, and amid gathering troubles 'steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem' (Lk 9⁵¹), where that malice at its fiercest had to be encountered. Knowing that a baptism of suffering awaited Him as the result of the work He had undertaken, He was 'straitened till it should be accomplished' (Lk 12⁵⁰), and with serene inflexibility of purpose He moved on towards the tragic climax, and braved the death which had cast its shadow over Him for many a day. REBUKE.—1. In restoring the man with the unclean spirit in the synagogue at Capernaum (Mk 1²⁵, Lk 4³⁵), and the demoniac boy at the foot of the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt 17¹⁸, Mk 9²⁵, Lk 9⁴²), Jesus is said to have rebuked (ἐπετιμήσεν) the unclean spirit. The rebuke would help to calm the nerves and strengthen the will of the sufferer. But that was only incidental. It is clear to the present writer that Jesus recognized, in such cases, the presence of a personal evil spirit (cf. Mt 12²⁵⁻²⁸, Lk 11¹⁷⁻²⁰). He rebuked the spirit (1) because, being personal, he was susceptible of rebuke; and (2) because of his malevolence in torturing the human patient (Mt 17¹⁵), or because of his testimony to Him as Messiah, which testimony, seeing it tended towards a faith founded upon marvels and not upon a simple love of goodness and joy in His revelation of the Father, really opposed His work (Mk 1^{24, 25, 34}, Lk 4⁴¹). St. Luke also says that Jesus, when healing Peter's wife's mother, rebuked the fever (4³⁹). This may be more figurative. Sickness was, undoubtedly, regarded as due in most cases to evil agencies (Lk 13¹⁶); but even popular opinion then did not class fevers with cases of demoniacal possession. Neither St. Matthew nor St. Mark speaks of any rebuke here; it is therefore most probable that this is only the Evan-gelist's vivid description of Jesus' authoritative tone and manner of healing. On the sea of Galilee, Jesus is said to have rebuked the wind (Mt 8²⁶, Mk 4³⁹, Lk 8³⁴). It is a needless literalism to infer that He believed that the wind was demonic. It is a poetic account of His attitude (cf. Ps 106⁹, Nah 1⁴). His faith that God would guard Him till His work was done, was absolute; and on His rising up in the dignity and calm of such a faith and bidding sea and wind be still, the disciples beheld the threatening wind die down as if rebuked.

2. Jesus had frequent need to reprove His disciples; but only on two occasions were His reproofs so severe that it is written that He rebuked them. These were in the case of Peter (Mk 8³³), and James and John (Lk 9⁵⁵). The severity of His rebuke of Peter, 'Get thee behind me, Satan,' was not because Peter was, though unconsciously, acting the part of a tempter to Him. That would be contrary to the spirit of Jesus, who always forgot His own things in the presence of others' needs. It was His disciple's danger that moved Him. The test of a leader's sympathy and insight is his rebukes, whether they are addressed to mere casual faults or to those tendencies which spring from the roots of character. In these two cases, Jesus rebuked the most fatal tendencies of the two types of saintliness. 'St. John is the saint of purity, and St. Peter is the saint of love' (Newman's Sermon on 'Purity and Love' in Discourses to Mixed Congregations). The most dangerous temptation to loving souls is to smooth the path for those they love and reverence even at the cost of duty or of loyalty to their highest vision. Jesus here rebuked in Peter, this, love's subtlest disloyalty to righteousness. In the case of James and John, types of intensest purity, Jesus condemned that severity of judgment which is the temptation of men of integrity, and by which they may make shipwreck of their spirits, becoming narrow-minded and unbrotherly.

3. Various instances of rebukes by other persons are reported, whose value lies in their revealing by contrast the mind of Jesus. (1) The disciples' rebuke of those who brought little children to Jesus, serves to contrast their thought of the parents as inconsiderate and selfish, and of the children as beneath His notice because of their incapacity to understand His words, with His sympathy with the parents' desire to give their children a prophet's blessing, His warm love for the children simply as children (Mk 9³⁶), and His delight in the child-spirit as manifesting the true heavenly temper (10¹⁴). (2) The crowd's rebuke of Bartimæus brings into stronger relief the simplicity and brotherliness of Jesus' helpfulness (Mt 20³¹). (3) The repentant thief rightly rebuking his comrade for railing on Jesus (Lk 23⁴⁰), brings out strongly Jesus' silent endurance of contumely. It sets in a clearer light His prayer, 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do.' (4) The Pharisees' request that Jesus would rebuke His followers for hailing Him as Messiah, only served to make more clear and definite His acceptance of that homage with all it meant (19³⁹).

4. Jesus bids His disciples rebuke a brother who sins (17³). The following verse shows that the sin to be rebuked is a personal wrong. This resentment of wrong seems opposed to His blessing on the meek (Mt 5⁵) and His exhortation to turn the other cheek to the smiter (vv. 39-44). The context, however, shows that this rebuke is regarded only as the first step to forgiveness and reconciliation (Lk 17⁴). Repentance is necessary before forgiveness and reconciliation can be perfected; and the rebuke is to be the act of brotherly love, showing the wrongdoer his fault to win him to that repentance.

RECEIPT OF CUSTOM (AV; 'place of toll,' RV; 'tolbothe,' Wyclif) occurs in the parallel accounts of the call of the publican Matthew or Levi to discipleship (Mt 9⁹, Mk 2¹⁴, Lk 5²⁷), which took place as Jesus passed forth from His own city, i.e. Capernaum. The custom or toll referred to consisted of export dues on merchandise, and at Capernaum would pass into the treasury of Herod Antipas, the ruler of Galilee in the time of our Lord. Capernaum was close to the junction of the great north road to Damascus with the road that led eastwards round the northern end of the Lake of Galilee, and the important revenue station situated at this point is what we are to understand by the 'place of toll' in the Gospel story. RECONCILIATION.—The gospel, in the Pauline acceptance, is peculiarly a message of reconciliation (καταλλαγή). The ministry of the gospel is a 'ministry of reconciliation.' Its preaching is a 'word of reconciliation.' Its design is that those who receive the message should 'be reconciled to God' (2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²¹). The word 'reconcile' is not found in this connexion in either the Gospels or the other writings of the NT. It is a distinctively Pauline term. The fact is one worth remembering by those who insist so much on the absence of certain other aspects of St. Paul's doctrine from the Gospels, yet see in 'reconciliation,' at least as relates to man, the truest expression for the end of Christ's mission. If, however, the word is absent from the Gospels, assuredly the reality is there. It is implied, on its Godward side, in Christ's doctrine of forgiveness of sins as a primary blessing of His Kingdom (Mt 6^{12, 14, 15}). It is the presupposition of Christ's whole ministry as directed to the salvation of the lost (Mt 18¹⁰⁻¹⁴, Lk 19¹⁰); is exhibited in His own gracious and merciful attitude to the sinful and burdened (Mt 11²⁸⁻³⁰, Lk 4¹⁷⁻²¹); in His mercy, especially to those whom society regarded as outcasts (Lk 7³⁶⁻⁵⁰ 'friend of publicans and sinners'; Mt 11¹⁹, Lk 15¹⁻²); is involved in His whole revelation of the Father. On the manward side, as necessity, duty, and privilege, it is not less clearly implied in the invitation to come to Him (Mt 11²⁸); in the demand for 'repentance'—a changed mind and life (Mt 4¹⁷, Mk 1¹⁵ etc.); in the call to sonship in His Kingdom (Mt 5^{9, 48}, Lk 6^{35, 36} etc.), and to complete surrender of self, and trust in the Father (Mt 6^{24ff.}); in the requirement of a habitual doing of the will of the Father (Mt 5⁴⁸ 7^{21ff.} etc.). The parable of the Prodigal Son is a typical parable of reconciliation (Lk 15^{11ff.}). If, in St. Paul's gospel, reconciliation is made dependent on Christ's Person and redeeming death, it is certain that in the Gospels also Jesus views the whole Messianic salvation as depending on Himself, and on repeated occasions connects it with His death (Jn 3^{14, 15}, Mt 20²⁸ 26²⁸, Lk 24^{46, 47}; see REDEMPTION). This circle of conceptions involved in 'reconciliation' is now to be more closely investigated.

In the OT the word 'reconcile' occurs several times in the AV in Leviticus and Ezekiel as the tr. of the verb נָסַח, usually rendered 'to make atonement' (Lv 6³⁰ 8¹⁵ 16²⁰, Ezk 45^{15, 17, 20} [RV tr., as elsewhere, 'to make atonement,' 'atoning']). The idea here conveyed is that of forgiveness and restoration to Divine fellowship on the ground of a propitiation. Similarly, in the NT, AV reads in He 2¹⁷ 'to make reconciliation for the sins of the people,' where the word is διασκεσθαι, and RV renders, 'to make propitiation.' In Dn 9²⁴, while the same Heb. word (נָסַח) occurs (with direct object), RV retains the rendering 'to make reconciliation,' and puts in the margin, 'purge away.' In 2 Ch 29²⁴, again, where AV has 'made reconciliation,' RV renders more accurately 'made a sin-offering.' These OT examples have only an indirect bearing on the NT word, the idea of which is not propitiation but change from variance into a state of friendship. Propitiation, in the OT, no doubt, effected a reconciliation, and, in the NT, reconciliation is made by atonement; but the ideas expressed by the words are nevertheless distinct. The NT term for 'reconciliation,' as already indicated, is καταλλαγή (Ro 5¹¹ [not 'atonement,' as AV] 11¹⁵, 2 Co 5^{18, 19}). With this are connected the verbs καταλλάσσω (Ro 5¹⁰, 1 Co 5²⁰; cf. of a wife, 1 Co 7¹¹), and ἀποκαταλλάσσω (Eph 2¹⁶, Col 1^{20, 21}). A related form, διαλλάσσω, is used in Mt 5²⁴ (pass.) of reconciliation with a brother. But besides these terms, there is in St. Paul, as in other NT writers, a considerable range of words and phrases which express the same idea, e.g. 'made peace' (Col 1²⁰; cf. 'preached peace,' Ac 10³⁶, Eph 2¹⁷; 'have peace,' Ro 5¹); 'made nigh' (Eph 2¹³); 'turned unto God' (1 Th 1^{9, 10}), etc. The general meaning of the Pauline expressions is well brought out in such a passage as Ro 5¹⁰ 'If, when we were enemies (ἐχθροί), we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son,' etc.; or in such a declaration (addressed to Gentiles) as that in Col 1²¹ 'You, being in time past alienated, and enemies in your mind in your evil works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh through death.'

There is no dispute, then, that, in St. Paul's use, and generally, the word καταλλαγή denotes a change from enmity to friendship. The differences in regard to reconciliation in the gospel relate to two other points. (1) On whose side does the change from variance to friendship take place—on God's side as well as man's, or on man's only? Is God as well as man the subject of the reconciliation, or is man only reconciled? (2) By what means is the reconciliation effected? On the first point, the view is very widely held that the reconciliation is on the part of man only (Ritschl, Kaftan, Cambridge Theol. Essays, pp. 206, 217, etc.); God needs no reconciliation. God is eternally propitious to the sinner: it needs only that the sinner change his thoughts and his dispositions towards God. Yet it is very doubtful if, on exegetical grounds, even in regard to the use of the word, this can be sustained. God, indeed, is represented by St. Paul as already reconciled in Christ, i.e. everything is done on His side which is necessary for the restoration of the ungodly to favour. All that is needed now is the reciprocal reconciliation of men to God (Ro 5^{6, 8}, 2 Co 5¹⁸⁻²¹). But it is still implied that a reconciliation was needed on God's side as well as on man's, and it is declared that this has been accomplished once for all in Christ's Cross (Col 1^{21, 22}). It is on the basis of God's reconciliation to the world in Christ, that the world is now entreated to be reconciled to God (2 Co 5²⁰). This, which is the view taken of the meaning of St. Paul's expressions by the majority of exegetes, is the only one which fully satisfies the connexion of the Apostle's thought. Sinners, it is implied throughout, are, on account of their sins, the objects of God's judicial wrath. They are ἐχθροί, a word which, both in Ro 5¹⁰ and 11²⁸, is used in the passive sense of objects of wrath (cf., in latter passage, the contrast with ἀγαπητοί, 'beloved'). As Prof. Stevens, who disagrees with St. Paul, explains it: 'Between God and sinful man there is a mutual hostility. Sinners are the objects of God's enmity (Ro 5¹⁰ 11²⁸), and they, in turn, are hostile to God (Ro 8⁷, Col 1²¹). Hence any reconciliation (καταλλαγή) which is accomplished between them must be two-sided' (Christ. Doct. of Salv. p. 59, cf. his Theol. of the NT, p. 414). Quite similar is the view taken by Weiss, in his Bib. Theol. of the NT, i. p. 428 ff. (Eng. tr.);

by Denney, in his Romans, on 5^{9ff.}, and Death of Christ, p. 143 ff.; in art. 'Reconciliation' in Hastings' DB, etc. St. Paul's own explanation of his words, 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself,' by the clause, 'not reckoning unto them their trespasses' (2 Co 5¹⁹), makes it clear that the reconciliation intended is on God's side. If this is granted, the second question is already answered—By what means is the reconciliation effected? For the Apostle's consistent doctrine is that it was by Christ's death for our sins that God was reconciled to the world (see REDEMPTION).

The objection, however, will not unfairly be urged—Does it not conflict with a worthy view of God's character, and detract from the grace of salvation, to think of God as at 'enmity' with any of His creatures, and needing to be propitiated or reconciled? Can such a thought have any real place in a gospel of Christ? It may be observed, first, that St. Paul did not regard his doctrine as casting any shadow on the love of God; rather, it is to this love he traces the inception and carrying through of the whole work of man's salvation. The crowning proof of God's love is just this fact, that Christ died for us (Ro 5⁹). If this seems a paradox, it is to be remembered, next, that displeasure against sin, and even the assertion of holiness against it in the form of wrath, are not incompatible with love to the sinner, and with the most earnest desire to save him. In human relations also there are cases in which a very genuine displeasure requires to be removed before relations of friendship can be restored (cf. Mt 5^{23, 24}). If God cherishes displeasure at sin at all—and would He be God if He did not?—then there must be a measure of reconciliation on His side, as well as on man's, even if it be conceived that repentance on man's part is sufficient to bring it about. But this is the whole point—Does repentance suffice to repair the broken relations of the sinner with a Holy God? And does repentance of the kind required spring up spontaneously in man, or is it not called forth by God first meeting man with a display of His own reconciling love? That this is the truer and more scriptural view cannot be doubted, and it throws us back on what it may be necessary for God to do in approaching a world yet ungodly with the message of His grace. That God has come to the world in the way of a reconciling work by His Son, is certainly no abatement from the love on which depends the possibility of a salvation for the world at all.

The other, or manward, side of reconciliation is one on which a few words will suffice. Its necessity and importance are admitted by all. Estranged from God by his sense of guilt, and alienated in the spirit of his mind, the sinner needs, as the first condition of his salvation, to have this enmity of his heart broken down, and new dispositions of penitence and trust awakened. He needs to be moved to say, 'I will arise, and go to my Father' (Lk 15¹⁸). The great dynamic in producing such a change is again the spectacle of God's reconciling love in Christ. 'I, if I be lifted up from the earth,' said Jesus, 'will draw all men unto me' (Jn 12³²). Along both lines, therefore, the Godward and the manward, we come to the Cross of Christ as the centre of the reconciling power of the gospel. By it we are redeemed from the curse (Gal 2²⁰ 3¹³); by it the world is crucified to us, and we unto the world (6¹⁴). The man who truly realizes his redemption lives no more unto himself, but unto Him who died for him, and rose again (2 Co 5¹⁵).

REDEMPTION.—An Apostle writes of Christ—'in whom we have our redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses' (Eph 1⁷). It is proposed in this article to inquire what redemption in Christ means, how Christ's redemption is effected, and what blessings are included in it.

i. THE BIBLICAL DOCTRINE.—

1. The vocabulary.—In the OT the idea of redemption is distinctively expressed by the two verbs לָקַח and קָנָה , with their derivatives. The former term is used technically, in the Mosaic law, of the redemption by price of an inheritance (by a kinsman or the man himself, Lv 25^{25ff.}, Ru 4⁷, Jer 32^{7, 8}), or of things vowed (Lv 27^{14ff.}, or of tithes (v. 31^{ff.}); the latter of redeeming the firstborn of animals or of children (Ex 13^{13, 15} 34²⁰, Nu 18^{15ff.}). Outside the Law, and in relation to Jehovah, both terms are used of simple salvation or deliverance, especially when attended by impressive displays of power, or the assertion or vindication of righteousness, or vengeance upon enemies. לָקַח appears in this sense in Gn 48¹⁶, Ex 6^{15, 13}; repeatedly in the Psalms (69¹⁸ 72¹⁴ 74² 103⁴ 106¹⁰ 107²) and in Deutero-Isaiah (43¹ 44^{22, 23} 45²⁰ etc.), and occasionally in other prophets. קָנָה , on the other hand, is the favourite term in Deut. (78^{9, 26} etc.), is frequent in the earlier Psalms (25²² 31⁵ etc.), but occurs only rarely in Isaiah (12⁷ 29²² 51¹¹). The person who has the right to redeem, or who undertakes the duty, is a לֹקֵחַ , or 'redeemer' (Nu 5⁸, Ru 2²⁰ etc. EV 'kinsman'); the term is used also to denote the 'avenger of blood' (Nu 35¹², Dt 19⁶ etc.); and elsewhere, as in the famous passage Job 19²⁵, in Ps 19¹⁴ 78³⁵, and Pr 23¹, but specially in Deutero-Isaiah (41¹⁴ 43¹⁴ etc.), is applied to Jehovah as the all-powerful, holy, and merciful vindicator, deliverer, and avenger of His people. A term related in idea to 'redemption' is רָשָׁו 'ransom.' (See RANSOM).

In the NT the terms by which the idea is directly expressed are ἀγοράζω , 'to buy' or 'purchase' (1 Co 6²⁰ 7²³, 2 P 21, Rev 5⁹ 14^{3, 4}—the last tr. in AV, 'redeem'), and its compound ἐξαγοράζω , used by St. Paul in Gal 3¹³ 4⁵; but specially λυτροῦμαι (from λύτρον , 'a ransom'), and its derivatives (Lk 24²¹, Ti 2¹⁴, 1 P 1¹⁸). The special Pauline word for 'redemption' is ἀπολύτρωσις (Ro 3²⁴ 8²³, 1 Co 1³⁰, Eph 1⁷ etc.,—found also in Lk 21²⁸, He 9¹⁵). The simple form λύτρωσις occurs in Lk 23⁸, He 9¹². The meaning of these expressions is more precisely considered below.

2. The OT preparation.—The foundations of the NT doctrine of redemption are laid in the OT conceptions of the holiness, righteousness, and grace of Jehovah, and of sin as something abhorrent to Jehovah's holiness, which He must needs condemn and punish, but from which He desires to save. He is the Holy One, who abhors iniquity. Sinners shall not stand in His sight. He visits with severest penalties those who disregard His counsels and persist in their wickedness. Yet He is the Lord God, merciful and gracious, full of compassion and ready to forgive (Ex 34^{6, 7}, Ps 103^{9ff.}); He desires not the death of any sinner, but that he should turn from his wickedness and live (Ezk 18²² 33¹²). More specially, He is the covenant-keeping God, who does not allow His promises to fail, but, even when the nation in the mass is rejected, fulfils His word in due season to the faithful remnant, or to the whole people when brought to repentance (Ps 103^{8, 9}, Is 8^{16, 17}, Jer 32^{37ff.}, Hos 1^{10, 11} 2^{14ff.} etc.). In this it is already implied that Jehovah will manifest His power, righteousness, and love in helping and saving His people, in vindicating their cause when oppressed, in visiting their adversaries with judgments, and in working out great and astonishing deliverances for them when the hour comes for the fulfilment of His promises. It follows that His relation to them, and His concern for their good, will be seen in the course of their history in a succession of acts of redemption.

It has been seen, accordingly, that while, in their legal usage, the OT terms for 'redeem' and 'redemption' imply payment of a price, or, in the case of the firstborn, substitution of a life, or a monetary ransom, these terms are often used in the more general sense of simple deliverance or salvation. The great historic instance of Jehovah's redemption of His people was their deliverance from the bondage of Egypt (Ex 6⁶ 15¹³, Dt 7⁸ etc.). That held in it already the pledge of every other deliverance which the nation or godly individuals in it might need. Prayers, therefore, are frequent that Jehovah would redeem from oppression, from violence, from sickness, from death, from captivity, etc. (e.g. Ps 25²² 49¹⁵ 72¹⁴ 103⁴), and thanksgivings for deliverance refer usually to the same things (e.g. Pss 116. 124. 126, Zec 10^{8ff.}). Redemption in such passages is commonly from temporal calamities or ills, endured or feared. Only in one place is direct mention made of redemption from iniquities (Ps 130⁸). This last fact, however, must not mislead us. As, in the OT, outward calamities are usually connected with Jehovah's anger, or with the hiding of His face, so, it is everywhere implied, the first condition of the removal of these evils is return to God and the forsaking of iniquity; if the individual is righteous, this is the ground on which he looks to God for vindication against the ungodly oppressor (Pss 3. 4. 5 etc.). We must beware here, and throughout this whole discussion, of building too much on the mere occurrence of a term. The fact of redemption is often present, where the word is not directly used. Behind all interpositions for deliverance and help, whatever the words employed, stand Jehovah's unchanging character, His pledged word, His inflexible will to uphold the right, His compassion for the afflicted and oppressed. Righteousness, in His deliverances, always counts for more than the deliverance itself, which is conditioned by His unerring knowledge of the moral state. Where sin has been the cause of judgments on the individual or nation, redemption includes, in the removal of these evils, forgiveness and restoration to the Divine favour and to righteousness (cf. Ps 85, Is 1^{8ff.}, Hos 14, etc.).

The Deliverer of His people in the OT is Jehovah Himself. Hence the affection with which Deutero-Isaiah dwells on the idea of Jehovah as the לֹדֶם, or 'Redeemer' of Israel. It is noteworthy, however, that in two passages redemption is attributed to the 'angel' of Jehovah—that mysterious personality, one with Jehovah, yet again distinct from Him, who figures so prominently, particularly in the earlier stages of revelation. 'The angel which hath redeemed me from all evil,' says Jacob, in the earliest instance of the use of the word לֹדֶם, in Gn 48¹⁶; and again in Is 63⁹ we have, with the use of the same word, the like idea: 'In all their affliction he was afflicted, and the angel of his presence saved them; in his love and in his pity he redeemed them,' etc. That is, Jehovah's interposition in redemption is by means of His angel (cf. Ps 34⁷). There is a foregleam here of what comes more clearly to light in the NT.

It may appear a point of contrast between the OT and the NT conceptions of redemption, that in the OT the word is never brought directly into association with sacrifice, or the ritual of atonement. The use of 'redeem' in connexion with the firstborn (the substitution, e.g., of a lamb for the firstborn of an ass) does not affect this statement, for these substitutions have not the character of atonement for sin. Here again, however, it is important to keep in memory the distinction between words and things. Apart from the use of terms, it is the case that the sacrificial ritual—so far as expiatory—was, in its own way, a means of deliverance from guilt, and, in that sense, of redemption. A direct connexion between the sacrifices of the Law and the forgiveness of sin is expressly affirmed (e.g. Lv 4^{20, 26, 35}; cf. Is 67); a fact irrespective of any theory of efficacy. Even in regard to words, there is the important point of connexion in the word רָסַם 'ransom.' (See RANSOM).

But there is a yet closer link. There can be no question that a peculiar line of preparation for the NT doctrine lay in the development by Psalmists and Prophets of the idea of the Righteous Sufferer. The culmination of that development is reached in the matchless representation of Is 53, where the Servant of Jehovah is pictured as making expiation by His sufferings and death for the sins of the people. Here at length Prophetic and sacrificial teaching touch, for the language and whole idea of the sacrificial ritual are taken over upon the Suffering Servant. The iniquity of His fellows is laid upon One who is without sin; His soul is made a guilt-offering; He bears the iniquities of the people; He pours out His soul unto death; He bears the sin of many, and makes intercession for the transgressors (Is 53^{6, 10, 11, 12}). The later Prophetic teaching is not without refrains of the same ideas (Zec 13, Dn 9^{24ff.}). Malachi brings to a close the long preparation of the OT with his prediction of the Angel of the Covenant soon to come to His temple, whose work would be at once judging and saving (3⁴).

3. Redemption in the Gospels.—With respect to the sources, it is acknowledged that a distinction is to be made between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel. The last, however, is accepted in the present article as a genuine work of the Apostle John, embodying, if with a certain colouring from his own personality and interpretative comment, that Apostle's reminiscences of the sayings and doings of Jesus, especially those of the Judaean ministry. Comparison will show that, fundamentally, the teachings of the four Gospels on our immediate subject coincide.

St. Luke's Gospel begins by introducing us to the circle of those who 'were looking for the redemption (λύτρωσις) of Jerusalem' (2³⁸), or, as an earlier verse has it, were 'looking for the consolation of Israel' (v. 25). Of these there were not a few. Zacharias and Elisabeth, Simeon and the prophetess Anna, were among the number. From the hymn of Zacharias in 1^{8ff.} we see how far the idea of 'redemption' was from being confined to temporal deliverance from enemies. Such deliverance was only a means towards serving the God who had redeemed His people in holiness and righteousness (1⁷⁵). Redemption included the knowledge of (spiritual) salvation by the remission of sins (v. 77). This salvation was to be brought in by one from the house of David, in fulfilment of the promises made to the fathers (vv. 69-73). John the Baptist was to prepare the way for the Redeemer's coming (v. 76, cf. 3^{8ff.}). We are here, in short, on the threshold of the introduction of the Messianic salvation. In three of the Gospels, accordingly, we have preparatory notes struck, which show in what sense we are to understand this wonderful redemption of the Christ. The shepherds in Lk. are apprised of the birth in the city of David of 'a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord' (2¹¹). In Mt. the child is called Jesus, 'for it is he that shall save his people from their sins' (1²¹). In St. John's Gospel the Baptist points out Jesus to his disciples as 'the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (1^{29, 36}). All the Gospels give prominence to the Baptism of Jesus, with its consecration of Himself 'to fulfil all righteousness' (in Mt.), its acknowledgment of Him as 'the Son of God,' and the descent upon Him of the Holy Spirit (Mt 3¹³⁻¹⁷, Mk 1⁹⁻¹¹, Lk 3^{21, 22}, Jn 1³¹⁻³⁴); and the Synoptics relate His Temptation, in which false ideals of Messiahship were rejected, and His true vocation was definitely grasped and chosen (Mt 4¹⁻¹¹ ||).

The important question now arises, How did

Jesus Himself conceive of the work of redemption which belonged to Him as Messiah? The word itself is only once attributed to Him, and that in an eschatological connexion (Lk 21²⁶); it affords us, therefore, little help. His conception must be sought in a less direct way, by consideration of the aspects in which His saving activity is presented in the Gospels, and of the sayings and doings in which He connects the salvation of men with Himself. An error to be sedulously guarded against here is that of fastening on one or two isolated sayings of Jesus, for instance, on the passages about His death, and giving these an interpretation as if they were without any context in Jesus' own thought, or in His general Messianic claim, or in earlier Prophetic revelation, or in the events which succeeded them, and threw light on them. A broader method must be followed if Christ's idea of redemption is to be satisfactorily grasped.

It must impress us, then, that, in the idea of redemption, or what corresponds to it, in the Gospels, the spiritual elements are prominent as they were not in the OT. This was to be expected from the spiritual nature of the teaching of Jesus, and from the larger place given to the hope of the future life. The political aspect of redemption disappears altogether. The Kingdom Jesus came to found was not of this world (cf. Mt 18¹⁻⁵ 19²⁷⁻³⁰ 20²⁵⁻²⁸ 26⁵¹⁻⁵³, Lk 17²¹, Jn 6¹⁵ 18³⁰ etc.). Salvation from bodily ills, indeed, appears as an important part of Christ's ministry, as in the healing of disease, the casting out of demons, the raising of the dead, the feeding of the multitudes (Mt 4^{23, 24} 11^{4, 5} etc.). In these works of mercy Jesus revealed Himself as the Saviour of the body as well as of the soul. But the physical benefit was never an end in itself; it pointed up to, and prepared the way for the reception of, the spiritual blessing (Mt 9²⁻⁵, Jn 6^{26ff.}). It was conditioned by faith (Mt 8¹⁰ 9^{2, 22, 28} etc.). The real evils from which Jesus came to redeem were spiritual evils; the priceless good He came to bestow was a spiritual good. Spiritual evil had its root and origin in sin; salvation takes its spring in the grace and mercy of God, and begins with forgiveness.

(1) We have first, then, to look at sin and its consequences as the evil to be redeemed from. The teaching of Jesus on the love and mercy of the Father should not blind us to the depth of His realization of the awful evil of sin, of the wrath of God against it, and of the peril of eternal death which overhung the sinner. Rather, in His view, is the Father's mercy to be measured by the depth of the sinner's lostness, the heinousness of his state in the light of the Divine holiness, and his inability to deliver himself from that state or its consequences. The sternness of Christ's teaching in this relation is sometimes very terrible. As the Baptist warned his hearers to flee from 'the wrath to come,' so Jesus has ever in the background of His most gracious teaching the thought of an awful Divine judgment, which surely one day will descend on the impenitent. He does not hesitate to speak of the fire of Gehenna (Mt 5^{22, 29, 30}), and of God, who is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna (10²⁸); of the worm that dieth not, and the fire that is not quenched (Mk 9^{44, 46, 48}); of the judgment, less tolerable than that upon Tyre and Sidon, or even Sodom, which awaits cities like Capernaum (Mt 11²⁰⁻²⁴); of a blasphemy against the Holy Spirit which shall not be forgiven, either in this world, or in that to come (12^{31, 32} ||). His denunciations of the Pharisees are merciless in their severity (23^{14, 15, 32, 33}); the language of judgment in many of the parables is hardly less strong (13^{42, 50} 18³⁴ 21⁴⁴ 22^{7, 13} etc.). Those who speak of supposed judgments on others are warned: 'Nay, but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish'

(Lk 13³⁻⁵); of a Judas it is declared, 'Good were it for that man if he had not been born' (Mt 26²⁴, Mk 14²¹); the parable of the Final Judgment has such a sentence as, 'Depart from me, ye cursed,' etc. (Mt 25^{41, 46}). The Synoptic teaching on this point is identical with that of St. John, who declares that the wrath of God 'abideth' on him who believes (or obeys) not the Son of God (Jn 3³⁶), and habitually speaks of the world as perishing in its sin (3^{16, 17} 5²⁹ 6⁵³ 8²⁴ etc.).

Exposure to the wrath of God, therefore, is one result of sin, from which, undeniably, redemption is needed; but this, in Christ's view, is not the worst evil, but rather flows from the infinitely heinous and hateful nature of sin itself. Sin, considered in itself, is the real evil from which men need to be delivered. It is a fountain of pollution in the heart, defiling the whole nature (Mt 15¹⁸⁻²⁰ ||; cf. 23²⁷); evolves itself in corrupt words and deeds (7¹⁶⁻²⁰ 12³³⁻³⁷); brings under subjection to Satan (6¹³ 12^{29, 43-45}); is the loss of the soul's true life (16²⁴⁻²⁶); entails misery and ruin (Lk 15¹¹⁻¹⁶, Mt 23^{37, 38}); ripens into hateful vices (impurity, covetousness, pride, hypocrisy, mercilessness, etc.), and culminates in blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Mt 12^{31, 32} etc.). Souls in this condition are 'lost'; need to be, in their helplessness and misery, sought after and saved (Lk 15^{3ff.} 19¹⁰). The teaching of Jesus in Jn. is here again in accord with that in the Synoptics; only that in some respects St. John's Gospel goes deeper, in explicitly affirming the need of regeneration (3³⁻⁵), in laying more stress on the element of bondage in sin (8^{33, 34}), and in giving greater prominence to the idea of Satan as 'the prince of this world,' whose power over men has to be broken (8⁴⁴ 12³¹ 14³⁰ 16¹¹; cf. Lk 10^{17, 18}).

One thing still requires to be said to exhibit in its full extent man's need of redemption. The deepest and most condemnable aspect of sin is that it is alienation from God Himself. The first requirement of the Law is love to God (Mt 22^{37, 38}); the proper attitude of the soul to God is that of humble dependence and trust (4^{4, 7, 10} 7^{25ff.}, Mk 11^{22, 24, 25} etc.). But sin is the negation of this right religious relation. 'I know you,' said Jesus to the Jews, 'that ye have not the love of God in you' (Jn 5⁴²). Other and contrary principles—pride, self-sufficiency, self-will, the love of the honour that comes from men (Jn 5⁴⁴; cf. Mt 6^{2ff.})—had taken the place of love to God; hence estrangement from God, antagonism to His will and spirit, enmity to Him and to His messengers (Mt 23^{29ff.}). Redemption means here the effecting of a change of disposition towards God, and the restoration of a spirit of love and trust—of the filial spirit (e.g. Lk 15^{17ff.}). It is synonymous with reconciliation (see RECONCILIATION).

(2) This description of the evil to be redeemed from already determines the positive character of the redemption. The preaching of Jesus is described as the preaching of a 'gospel' (1k 4^{18, 19})—'the gospel of God' (Mk 1⁴)—and the 'salvation' (Lk 19^{9, 10}) proclaimed in this gospel included deliverance from the whole range of evil covered by the word 'sin,' with introduction into the whole sphere of privilege and blessedness embraced in the term 'Kingdom of God.' Jesus in His teaching has much to say on the condition of mind necessary for the reception of this blessing. There is naturally the initial demand for repentance (Mt 9¹³ 11^{20, 21}, Mk 1¹⁵ 6¹², Lk 13³⁻⁵ etc.), which has the full weight of meaning involved in the etymology of the word μετάνοια, 'change of mind.' There is implied in this change of disposition a parting with all pride, sufficiency, and sense of merit (Lk 17¹⁰); a coming to be humble, simple, trustful as a little child (Mt 18¹⁻⁴); in a pregnant phrase, becoming 'poor in spirit' (Mt 5³, Lk 4¹⁸). To those in this humble, trustful, self-renouncing state of mind every satisfaction and spiritual blessing are promised (e.g. Mt 5^{3ff.}; see Iverach, The Other Side of Greatness, p. 1 ff.). This blessing is always represented as mediated through Jesus Himself. It is only through the Son that men can receive the knowledge of the Father (11²⁷); it is through coming to Him, learning of Him, taking His yoke upon them, that they obtain rest to their souls (vv. 28-30); men are called to follow Him, to become His disciples, to acknowledge Him as their Lord and Master (7²¹⁻²³ 8¹⁹⁻²² 23⁸ etc.). He requires from His disciples the most absolute surrender to Himself (10³⁷⁻³⁹ 16^{24, 25}); it is by relation to Him that men are judged at last (25^{40, 45}). As King, He dispenses the awards of service (16²⁷ 19²⁸ 25^{34ff.}). Of the dependence of salvation on His sufferings and death, more is said below. Those who stand in the above relation to Christ are 'the children of the kingdom' (13²⁸), sons of God, and heirs of eternal life. Received into the Kingdom, they have the blessedness of knowing that their sins are forgiven them (6¹² 9² etc.), though, reciprocally, there is laid on those who are thus forgiven the duty of forgiving others (6^{14, 15} 18³⁵, Mk 11²⁵ etc.). They have the privilege of calling God their Father, of trusting Him for all their need (Mt 6^{25ff.}), of free access to Him in prayer (7⁷⁻¹¹ etc.). They are acknowledged by Christ as His brethren (12^{49, 50} 25⁴⁰). From the Father they receive mercy, and the satisfaction of their hunger and thirst for righteousness (5^{6, 7}); they are sustained in persecution and sacrifice by the promise of a thousand-fold reward (5¹² 19²⁹, Mk 10^{29, 30}); it is theirs to share in the resurrection of the just (Lk 14¹⁴); and as sons and heirs of God, they have the sure hope of 'eternal life,' in which is included blessedness and glory (Mt 13⁴³) and the perfect vision of God (5⁸). These unspeakably lofty privileges and hopes imply corresponding responsibilities. It is constantly assumed that there cannot be true repentance, or genuine membership in the Kingdom, which does not manifest itself in 'good works' (5¹⁹), or in the doing of the will of the Father (6¹⁰). Only the doers of the Father's will can be received into the Kingdom of heaven (7²¹ 18⁴ 25^{34ff.}). The disciple is to have for his aim to be perfect as his Father in heaven is perfect (5⁴⁸).

Not a great deal, comparatively, is said in the Synoptic Gospels of the work of the Spirit in imparting these spiritual blessings. But the Spirit's presence and agency are nevertheless constantly assumed. Jesus was 'full of the Holy Spirit' after His baptism (Lk 4¹), and it was the Spirit of the Lord upon Him who fitted Him for His saving work (v. 18). 'The spirit of the Father' speaks in the disciples (Mt 10²⁰). He is, in Lk., the supreme gift of the Father (11¹³). Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is the last and highest crime (Mt 12³² ||). The Baptist announced Jesus as the One who should baptize with the Spirit (3¹¹ ||), and the promise of the Spirit is Christ's final word to His disciples (Lk 24⁴⁹). In the Synoptics, as in Jn., it is assumed that the Spirit was not yet given in His fulness, because Jesus was not yet glorified (Jn 7³⁹).

The Johannine teaching on salvation is once more, in all essential features, identical with that of the Synoptics. The change of mind insisted on by the latter is, in St. John's Gospel, directly traced to a regenerating work of the Spirit (3^{3, 5}), and the doctrine of the Spirit altogether is more developed (14²⁶ 15²⁶ 16^{7ff.}); the condition of salvation is expressed generally by the term 'believing' (which includes in it the idea of 'obeying,' cf. 3^{18, 36}); sonship, as the fruit of regeneration, is viewed as a special supernatural gift, the prerogative of believers (11²); salvation is connected with Christ's being lifted up (3¹⁴⁻¹⁷ 12^{32, 33}); 'eternal life' is regarded as already begun in the experience of the believer (3³⁶ 4¹⁴ 6⁴⁷ 17³ etc.). But the necessity of union with Christ (cf. 15¹⁻⁸), the salvation from wrath through Him (3^{16-18, 36} 5²⁴), the dispositions to be laid aside in entering the Kingdom of heaven (5⁴⁴), and the essentials of character to be acquired by its members (humility, love, self-sacrifice, etc., 13⁴⁻¹⁷ 15¹² 12²⁵ etc.), the hope of the resurrection (5^{28, 29} 6⁴⁰ 11²⁴⁻²⁶), and the prospect of ultimately sharing Christ's glory in the Father's house (14^{2, 3} 17²⁴), are outstanding features in St. John's teaching as they are in that of the earlier Gospels.

(3) The question now recurs as to the connexion of Christ's own Person, and especially His sufferings and death, with this redemption, the message of which constitutes His gospel. Certain obvious aspects of that connexion have already been indicated. Christ's ministry of teaching and healing was itself a means of redemption—of bringing men to the knowledge of it, of awakening in them the desire for it, of drawing them to the acceptance of it, of putting them in possession of part of its blessing. But in its substance also, as we have seen, Christ and His gospel could not be separated. He alone could reveal the Father, and give the world assurance of His grace; He already, as the Son of Man, exhibited in its perfect form what Divine sonship in the Kingdom of God meant; it was by coming to Him, and learning of Him, that men were initiated into His mind and spirit, which itself was salvation. His purity, conjoined with His sympathy and grace, acted as mighty moral motives in breaking down the enmity of the heart to God and in winning sinners to repentance. These also are the aspects of Christ's connexion with redemption,—these, and not declarations about atonement,—which meet us on the surface of the Gospels. Christ is the Good Shepherd, seeking and finding the lost sheep (Mt 10⁶ 15²⁴ 18¹²⁻¹⁴, Lk 15³⁻⁷). All-compassionating, forgiving love is the power He relies on to draw out love (Lk 8⁴⁷⁻⁵⁰). The very majesty of His claims and the manifest authority with which He spoke gave an added power to His gentleness and grace (Mt 11²⁷⁻³⁰).

We have still to ask, however, Is this the whole? Is this the only way in which redemption depends on Christ? If it is, what remains as the foundation of the Apostolic gospel, which undeniably connects redemption in a peculiar way, not with Christ's life and teaching, but with His sacrificial sufferings and death? The question is further pressed upon us by particular utterances of Jesus, which likewise appear to point to such connexion. Is this aspect of redemption, as some think; to be excluded from Christ's gospel? To find an answer we are driven back upon the wider question of how Jesus Himself viewed His sufferings and death. On this topic, it was remarked above that it is a very misleading method to confine ourselves to the exposition of isolated texts, without taking into account the whole context of Christ's thought, and the ideas of OT revelation in which His thought was grounded. It will be necessary to begin at this point in order to reach a satisfactory conclusion.

A sure datum to start with here is the indubitable consciousness of Jesus—attested by the two names 'Son of God' and 'Son of Man'—of His Messianic vocation, and consequently of the connexion of the Messianic salvation with His Person. It was He, as the whole Jewish hope implied, who was to bring in that 'redemption' for which Israel waited (Lk 2³⁸). That Jesus knew Himself to be the Christ, at least from the time of the Baptism, is implied in all the Gospels, though it was only to favoured individuals that the disclosure was directly made (in Jn. to Nathanael, 1⁴⁷⁻⁵¹; to Nicodemus, 3^{13ff.}; to the Samaritan woman, 4²⁸ etc.).

It is to misinterpret Peter's great confession in Mt 16¹⁶ to take it to mean that up to that time the disciples had no knowledge that Jesus was the Christ. Apart from what is narrated by St. John (1^{41ff.}), the whole ministry of Jesus, as recorded by the Synoptics—the claims He made, the authority He exercised—was by implication an assertion of that dignity; while to the direct testimony borne by the forerunner (Mt 3^{11, 12} ||) was added afterwards the answer given to the Baptist's doubts (11^{2ff.}). What was new in Peter's confession was the inburst of new illumination, and unshakable strength of conviction, with which the confession was made (16^{17, 18}).

On the other hand, if Jesus knew Himself to be the Messiah of OT prophecy and hope, it is not less certain that He apprehended this great vocation, and the salvation with which it was connected, in a quite different way from most of His contemporaries. Messiahship for Him, as the account of the Temptation shows, meant the definite renunciation of all self-seeking motives, the rejection of all political and worldly ideals, the repudiation of all swerving from the sole end of seeking His Father's glory. Holding such a conception of His mission, and rooted in His consciousness, as His habitual use of Scripture and manner of deducing deep principles from its simplest words show Him to be, in OT and specially Prophetic teaching, it is impossible that, from the first, He should not have clearly perceived the collision that must ensue between Himself and the ruling classes, and the persecution, and ultimately death, which their enmity must bring upon Him. With so clear a vision of the persecutions, scornings, and death that awaited His disciples (Mt 10^{16ff.} ||), He could not be ignorant of His own future. If, however, He saw thus far, it must be that He saw further. The path of self-renunciation and suffering that lay before Him must have presented itself, as we know it did, as part of His Father's ordainment in the accomplishment of His vocation; not as a fate merely, or even as a martyrdom, but as a necessary step to the founding of His Kingdom, and procurement of the great end of His Coming—the end of salvation. If this, in turn, presented itself as a problem to His thought,—we speak, perhaps, too humanly of the way in which Jesus arrived at His convictions,—the light was near at hand for its solution in the Prophetic Scriptures, especially in the picture of the Suffering Servant of Is 53. His sufferings were expiatory. No one who reads the Gospels with care can doubt the familiarity of the mind of Jesus with this portion of Prophetic testimony. It is probably this prophecy that was in view in the Baptist's announcement to his disciples (Jn 1^{29, 36}); it is contained in the section of Isaiah on the Servant of Jehovah which Jesus cited in the opening of His public ministry as fulfilled in Himself (Lk 4^{17ff.}); one interesting passage shows that it was directly before His mind in His last sufferings—'For I say unto you, that this which is written must be fulfilled in me, And he was numbered with transgressors; for that which concerneth me hath fulfilled' (22³⁷). It cannot have been absent from the numerous prophecies which Jesus declared were fulfilled in His death (Mk 9¹² 14^{21, 27}, Lk 13³¹ 24^{26, 27, 46}). But, indeed, the same strain of thought, sacrificial and Prophetic, which inspired the representation of Jehovah's Servant as One who must and would take upon Himself the burden of the people's sins, and, in substitutionary love, offer Himself in atonement for them, must have wrought as powerfully in the mind of Jesus, conscious as He was of His peculiar relation to both God and man, and fully aware of what sin was, and of what the forgiveness of sin meant to a holy God. If atonement for the world's sin was possible, and Jesus in His representative capacity, and Himself sinless, could offer such atonement, it cannot be doubted that He would desire to do so.

This point of the connexion of the sufferings and death of Jesus with redemption will receive elucidation afterwards; but already, perhaps, it is possible to see how, during His ministry, a relation of His sufferings to His saving mission might be present to His own mind, though He said little of it publicly, and only toward the end of His life spoke freely to His disciples of His approaching death. His reticence on His death would then be paralleled by His reticence on His Messiahship, which yet was present to His consciousness throughout. On such a view it may be found that the phenomena of the Gospels, as we have them, fall naturally into place,—His general silence on His death in His public teaching, the occasional disclosures in Jn. and the Synoptics, the connexion of the later announcements of His death with His resurrection, and, after His resurrection, of both with the preaching of remission of sins, and the promise of the Spirit; the coherence of this teaching with the Apostolic gospel.

For now it is to be observed that this silence of Jesus on the connexion of His sufferings and death with His saving work is far from absolute; on the contrary, the intimations of such connexion, when brought together, and read with the help of such a key as Is 53 affords, are neither few nor ambiguous. It is not, indeed, till late in the ministry, after Peter's confession, that Jesus begins to speak plainly of His approaching death, and then of that death as Divinely ordained and foretold, and to be followed by resurrection (Mt 16²¹ 17^{9, 22, 23} 20^{18, 19} ||, see above). Thenceforth His death had an absorbing place in His thoughts. It was a 'cup' He had to drink, a 'baptism' He had to be baptized with. He was 'straitened' till it was accomplished (Mt 20²², Mk 10^{32, 38}, Lk 12⁵⁰; cf. Lk 9⁵¹). At the Transfiguration it was, according to St. Luke, the 'decease (ἔξοδος) which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem' which was the subject of His converse with Moses and Elijah (9³¹). But the very decision and circumstantiality of these first announcements to His disciples imply that the subject had long been before His own thoughts; and that, in conformity with what has already been said, this was really the case, we gather from such a passage as Mt 9¹⁵ ('When the bridegroom shall be taken away from them'), but much more clearly from the sayings preserved to us by St. John from the Judean and Capernaum ministries. Here, in the line of the Baptist's opening announcement (1²⁹), the connexion between Christ's death and the salvation of the world is unmistakably declared. Thus, in the conversation with Nicodemus, 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up,' etc. (3¹⁴⁻¹⁶; cf. on the lifting up, 12³³), and in the remarkable discourse at Capernaum, in which Jesus dilates on His flesh as given for the life of the world, and on His blood as shed (we must presume) for the same end (6⁵¹⁻⁵⁶). In the light of these sayings we must, in consistency, interpret others more general in character (e.g. 10^{11, 15, 17, 18} 12^{24, 23}).

When we return to the Synoptics, we have again, in the closing period, more than one significant utterance. There is first the well-known passage preserved in both Mt. and Mk.: 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom (λύτρον) for many (ἀντι πᾶσιν)' (Mt 20²⁸, Mk 10⁴⁵).

It does not rob this passage of its force that it occurs in impressing on the disciples the lesson that the true greatness lies in service. No one will suppose that Jesus could have used language such as He here employs about the disciples, or about any other than Himself. The incidental occurrence of the saying may rather suggest that there must have been other teaching on the subject, and that Jesus here assumes the saving purpose of His death as known to the disciples.

The significance of the word λύτρον is investigated in art. RANSOM; it is enough now to say that the word is most naturally taken as the equivalent of the Hebrew קָנָה (allied to כָּפַר 'to atone'), used of that which is given in exchange for a life, whether money or another life. The thought in Jesus' mind may well have been that of Is 53. The meaning would then be that His death is the redemption-price by which the many are delivered from the ruin entailed by sin (including both the guilt and the power of sin). There is, again, the passage already cited, Lk 22²⁷, directly glancing at Is 53, and declaring it to be fulfilled in Christ's death. There are, finally, the words at the Supper, which, amidst the variations in the four accounts we have of them (Mt 26²⁶⁻²⁸, Mk 14²²⁻²⁵, Lk 22^{19, 20}, 1 Co 11²³⁻²⁵), present certain very distinguishable ideas. The bread is Christ's body, the cup is Christ's blood. The body is given or broken and the blood is shed for the disciples (in Mt. and Mk. 'for many'). The very variations support the general meaning put upon the act. If Mt. and Mk. have not the words 'given' or 'broken' spoken of the body (Luke, Paul?), both have 'shed for many' of the blood. Lk. has both 'given for you' and 'poured out for you'; St. Paul, on the other hand, has 'My body, which is [broken?] for you,' but not the corresponding 'shed for you.' All agree in the leading feature, that Jesus said: 'This is my blood of the covenant' (Mt., Mk.), or 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood' (Luke, Paul). Mt. adds: 'which is shed for many unto the remission of sins.' Even if it were conceded, what there is no necessity for conceding, that this logion is less original than the others [there is probably a reminiscence of Jer 31³⁴], it has at least the value that it shows the sense in which Christ's words were understood in the Apostolic age. That Jesus, therefore, in the words at the Supper, represents His death as a sacrifice for the salvation of many, and definitely connects the shedding of His blood with the remission of sins and the making of a New Covenant, is nearly as certain as anything in exegesis can be. The question that remains is—With what special sacrifice does Jesus regard His death as connected (Passover, ratificatory sacrifices at Sinai)? Probably it is not necessary to decide between different views. Jesus may well have regarded His death as fulfilling the truth of all propitiatory sacrifice.

There is yet one other fact to which attention needs to be directed in this connexion. The death of Jesus is evidently dwelt upon by the Evangelists with a special sense of solemnity and mystery, and there are features in the story of His Passion which deepen this feeling of mystery, and compel us to seek some special explanation. Such features are the mental perturbation which the thought of His death awoke in Jesus ('Now is my soul troubled,' etc., Jn 12²⁷); the sore amazement and sorrow even unto death in the Garden (Mk 14^{33, 34}); the sweat as of drops of blood, and words about the Cup (Lk 22⁴²⁻⁴⁴, Mt 26³⁹); the awful words upon the Cross, speaking to a loss of the sense and comfort of God's presence (Mt 27⁴⁶, Mk 15³⁴). We recall M'Leod Campbell's words: 'When I think of our Lord as tasting death, it seems to me as if He alone ever truly tasted death' (Atonement, ch. vii.). Is there nothing which connects itself with Christ's position as sin-bearer here? It is not thus martyrs are wont to die; not thus did Stephen, or Paul, or Ignatius die. Why, then, so strange a contrast in the Lord and Master of them all? On any hypothesis, must we not say that we have here something which takes this death out of the rank of simple martyrdom? Let us now take with this Christ's last cry upon the cross, 'It is finished' (τετέλεσται, Jn 19³⁰), and mark how this most unusual death is followed by a resurrection, and, after the resurrection, by an apparently changed relation of Christ to both God and man; by commissions and promises which imply that this death has been a turning-point in the history of salvation, the opening of a new dispensation of the Spirit, and of the preaching to mankind of the remission of sins in Christ's name (Mt 28¹⁶⁻²⁰, Lk 24⁴⁵⁻⁴⁹, Jn 20²¹⁻²³, Ac 1⁴⁻⁸), and it may be found difficult to deny that, even within the limits of the Gospels, a saving significance is attributed to Christ's death, in perfect consonance with that ascribed to it in the Apostolic gospel.

4. The Apostolic doctrine (Acts, the Epistles, the Book of Revelation).—(a) It is told by St. Luke that Jesus opened the minds of His disciples to understand from the Scriptures that the Christ should suffer, and rise again from the dead the third day, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name unto all the nations (24^{46, 47}). From the first, therefore, we find the Apostles giving prominence to the death and resurrection of Christ as Divinely ordained events, with which salvation was connected (Ac 2^{23-33, 36, 38, 39}, 3¹³⁻¹⁸, 4¹⁰⁻¹²). It would be unreasonable to look for theology in addresses which had for their primary object to bring home to the consciences of the hearers their crime in crucifying 'the Holy and Righteous One' (Ac 3¹⁴). We need not wonder, therefore, that we do not find it in these early discourses in the Acts. Yet the conviction was plainly there that, in some sense, Christ, as St. Paul says, had 'died for our sins' (1 Co 15³), and had been exalted to bestow salvation, and that through faith in Him, and only through faith in His name (Ac 3¹²), was the wrath of God averted (2²¹), remission of sins obtained (2³⁸, 3¹⁹, 10⁴³, 13^{38, 39}, etc.), the gift of the Holy Ghost received (2³⁸, 11^{16, 17} etc.), and the way prepared for 'seasons of refreshing' and 'the times of restoration of all things' (3¹⁹⁻²¹). Very early, however, through deeper reflexion and the growing illumination of the Spirit, there necessarily came to be given a more definite interpretation of this connexion of Christ's death with human salvation. Sacrificial and expiatory ideas were freely taken over upon it (cf. Ac 20²⁸); a new vocabulary sprang up; there was speech, as in the common doctrine of the Epistles (cf. 1 Co 15³ 'that which also I received'), of Christ 'bearing our sins' (1 P 2²⁴, He 9²⁸, cf. 2 Co 5²¹), 'suffering for sins, the righteous for the unrighteous' (1 P 3¹⁸, cf. Ro 5^{6, 8}), 'redeeming us by his blood' (Eph 1⁷, 1 P 1^{18, 19}, Rev 5⁹); 'offering' Himself as 'a sacrifice for sins' (He 10¹²), 'giving himself a ransom for us' (1 Ti 2⁶), becoming a 'propitiation' (1 Jn 2², 4¹⁰), etc. This more definite mode of conceiving of everything in salvation as depending on the redeeming death of Christ led, in turn, to a change in the form of presenting the gospel. Instead of attention being directed primarily, as in the Gospels, to the nature of salvation, as flowing from the mercy of God, the mind is now turned, above all, to the Person by whom redemption is effected, to His sacrifice as the means of redemption, and to the necessity of faith in Him as the condition of salvation. In this new perspective, the whole state of salvation and every blessing included in it are viewed as the fruit of Christ's redeeming death. An immediate effect is forgiveness (Ac 2³⁸, 13³⁸, Ro 4⁶⁻⁸, Eph 1⁷, Col 1¹⁴, 1 Jn 1⁹, 2¹², Rev 1⁵ etc.). But Christ redeems also 'out of this present evil world' ('delivers,' Gal 1⁴), 'from all iniquity' (Tit 2¹⁴), 'from your vain manner of life handed down from your fathers,' etc. (1 P 1¹⁸). St. Paul's special conceptions are referred to below. The efficacy of this redemption is placed by all NT writers, after the sacrificial analogy, in the 'blood' (Ac 20²⁸, Ro 3²⁵, Eph 1⁷, He 9¹² and passim, 1 P 1²⁻¹⁹, 1 Jn 1⁷, Rev 1⁵ 5⁹ etc.), which here is the symbol of a sacrifice that culminates in death. This strain of teaching is so inwrought into the texture of Apostolic teaching, that it is impossible by any ingenuity of exegesis to get rid of it, or make it mean essentially anything else than what the words naturally convey, viz. that the death of Jesus had a direct and indispensable redeeming efficacy, arising from its character as an expiation for sin.

(b) The NT writer who has given this redeeming character of Christ's death its most complete theological elucidation, it will be universally conceded, is St. Paul. A full exposition of the concatenation of his ideas hardly falls within the scope of this article, but the general import of the Apostle's teaching on redemption is not difficult to grasp. Starting with the fact of sin as bringing the world, both Gentile and Jewish, under the condemnation (κατάκριμα) of God (Ro 1-3, 5¹⁶⁻¹⁸ 8¹ etc.), he proceeds to the exhibition of God's method of salvation, in bringing to mankind a new righteousness ('the righteousness of God'), to be received by faith (Ro 1⁷ 3²¹, 2²⁶ 5¹⁷⁻²¹, 2 Co 5²¹, Ph 3⁹ etc.). This righteousness comes through the propitiatory death of Christ (Ro 3²⁵); is initially realized in Christ's sacrificial death, which is at the same time the culmination of His obedience (Ro 5¹⁹, Ph 2⁸); proceeds from His Cross, and is applied in God's justifying act to the salvation of the individual believer (Ro 3²⁴⁻²⁶ 5¹ 8¹⁻³³), who thereby is constituted 'the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5²¹, Ph 3⁹), or is 'justified' (Ro 3²⁴ 5¹), i.e. pronounced righteous. The salvation thus provided in Christ is a 'redemption' (Ro 3²⁴, Eph 1⁷, Col 1¹⁴). The connexion of it with Christ's death is, that Christ honours the righteousness of God in Himself consenting to be 'made sin' for us (2 Co 5²¹), or endure sin's condemnation in His own Person, that sinners may be saved. He redeems from the curse of the Law by being made a curse for us (Gal 3¹³ 4⁵). How such vicarious endurance of another's κατάκριμα was possible, St. Paul does not explain; but we may gather from the context of his thought that he would find the explanation in the peculiarity of the representative relation which Christ sustained to our race (Ro 5¹²⁻²¹, 2 Co 5¹⁴⁻¹⁵); in the perfection of His identification with the world in sympathy and love (Gal 1⁴ 2²⁰ 5² etc.); and in the fact that a vital union is constituted between the believer and Christ by faith, so that the acts of the Head are participated in by the members (Ro 6^{3ff.}). St. Paul attaches great importance to the corporate idea (Ro 14⁷⁻⁹, 1 Co 12^{12ff.}), and to the representative principle involved in it (Ro 5^{12ff.}). Christ, in His complete identification with the race He came to save, took part in its responsibilities as under a broken law, and magnified the righteousness of God (Ro 3²⁵, 3¹) in His endurance of death, which is the wages of sin (6²³). Sinless Himself, the sin of the world met in Him, and was atoned for in His perfect response to the mind of God in His judgment on that sin.

The attempt has been made to explain St. Paul's doctrine of the atoning character of Christ's death as a survival of his older Rabbinical notions, as well as to make out an inconsistency between this side of his teaching and his other doctrine of mystical union with Christ. But to the Apostle's own mind there was no inconsistency. St. Paul's conceptions of law, of righteousness, of sin and its desert, had their roots in something far deeper than Rabbinism—even in the OT; and there was to His thought no contradiction in setting forth Christ's death as the objective ground of man's acceptance with God, and at the same time in teaching that the end of salvation was holiness—a holiness which could be realized only through dying to sin with Christ, and rising again with Him to life in the Spirit; in other words, through personal, vital union with the Risen Lord.

(c) In the remaining writings of the NT, while the ideas are less developed theologically, and the distinctive nomenclature of St. Paul is not used, emphasis is not less strongly laid on Christ's death as a propitiatory and redeeming sacrifice (1 P 1¹⁸⁻¹⁹, 2 P 2¹, He 9¹²⁻¹⁵, cf. Ro 3²⁵), cleansing from the guilt and power of sin (1 Jn 1⁷⁻⁹, He 2¹⁷ 9¹⁴ etc.), saving from wrath (He 2³ 9^{26ff.}, 1 P 4¹⁷⁻¹⁸, Rev 5⁹, cf. 7¹⁴ 14^{1ff.} etc.), rescuing from the power of the world and the devil (He 2¹⁴⁻¹⁵, 1 P 1¹⁸ 5³ etc.), giving access to God (1 P 3¹⁸, He 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 10¹⁹⁻²² etc.), introducing into a new state of unspeakable privilege and felicity (1 P 1⁹, 10²⁹⁻³⁰, 2 P 1¹¹, 1 Jn 3¹⁻³ etc.). Occasionally there seem links of connexion between the Epistles and the teaching of the Gospels. It is difficult, e.g., not to see in St. John's 'He was manifested to take away sins (ἵνα τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἀρῆῃ); and in him is no sin' (1 Jn 3⁵), a reminiscence of the Baptist's similar saying in Jn 1²⁹ (ὁ ἀμὼν τοῦ θεοῦ, ὁ ἀρῶν τὴν ἀμαρτίαν τοῦ κόσμου); or in St. Paul's, 'Who gave himself a ransom for all' (ὁ δούς ἑαυτόν ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων 1 Ti 2⁶), an echo of the words of Jesus in Mk 10⁴⁵ (καὶ δοῦναι τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν). In 1 Peter there is a blending of both sacrificial and Prophetic language. Jesus redeems with His 'precious blood' (τιμίῳ αἵματι)—the blood of the Sinless One (1¹⁹ 2²²); but in other places we have a clear falling back upon the ideas and language of Is 53 (e.g. 2²³⁻²⁵). Christ's death did for believers all that the suffering of the Servant of the Lord in Is 53 was to do for the people, and all that redeeming sacrifices did under the OT, only now in a grander and more effectual way. And St. Peter says that his readers knew this (1¹⁸)—it was the familiar doctrine of the Church. In 1 John we have prominence given to the idea of 'propitiation' (ἰλασμός, 2² 4¹⁰). The term points to the effect of Christ's sacrifice, not on men, but on God, in averting His wrath or displeasure against sin (cf. Is 12¹). The Book of Revelation, again, moves in the distinctively sacrificial circle of ideas. The centre of worship is the Lamb that was 'slain' (5⁸⁻⁹, 12), who, loving us, 'loosed (λύσαντι) us from our sins by his blood' (1⁵), and 'purchased (ἡγόρασας) unto God' with His blood men of every nation (5⁹, 10)—those described after (7¹⁴), in strong paradox, as 'having washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.' If the design was to ascribe an expiatory and redeeming efficacy to the death of Christ, it is difficult to see in what stronger way it could have been done.

It is in the Epistle to the Hebrews, however, that the relation between Christ's redemption and the sacrificial ritual of the OT is most fully wrought out. The writer of the Epistle evidently proceeds upon the view which regards the Levitical sacrifices as having a propitiatory value through the vicarious shedding of the blood (9²² and passim)—the victim 'bearing the sins' of the transgressor, and atoning for them by its death. Yet he is as clearly conscious of the typical and shadowy character of the sacrificial system (10¹), and of its inability to effect a real redemption. He lays it down as a self-evident principle that 'it is impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins' (10⁴). The inadequacy of the OT sacrifices is seen in their number and their continual repetition (10¹⁻³); while the imperfection in the reconciliation wrought by them was signified by the barriers still interposed to complete approach to God (9⁸⁻¹⁰). But now, once for all (ἀπαξ), Christ has offered the perfect sacrifice which the Law could not provide, and has obtained 'eternal redemption' for us (9¹¹, 26). He is at once high priest and victim, for the sacrifice He offers is the sacrifice of Himself (9²⁶). It is a true sacrifice for sins He offers. He is a high priest to make propitiation for the sins of the people (eis τὸ ἰλάσκεισθαι τὰς ἁμαρτίας τοῦ λαοῦ, Heb. idiom, 2¹⁷). He was 'once offered to bear the sins of many' (9²⁶); He has 'offered one sacrifice for sins for ever' (10¹²). It was appointed unto men once to die (9²⁷); and Christ has died once for men. His sacrifice avails for 'the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant,' sins which the sacrifices of the Law could not remove (9¹⁵). To the question, Wherein lay the superior virtue of this sacrifice of Christ as contrasted with the typical sacrifices? the writer of the Epistle would answer, in the Divine dignity of the Offerer (the 'Son,' 1¹⁻³ etc.), in the true humanity He has assumed (2¹⁴⁻¹⁶), in the perfect sympathy and love with which He identifies Himself with His brethren (Himself being tempted and having suffered, 2^{10, 17, 18} 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶ 7²⁶⁻²⁸), above all in the obedient will in the offering itself. His sacrifice had in it this ethical element of surrender to God. The principal passage here is 10⁵⁻⁹. It is not meant in this passage that the simple doing of the will of God is itself the sacrifice, or takes the place of it; but it is the ethical quality of the sacrifice; it is the fact that it is an act of holy, intelligent obedience which gives the sacrifice its value: 'by the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all' (10¹⁰). The sacrifice of Jesus, the Epistle teaches, at once redeems and consecrates.

5. Reasonableness of the Biblical doctrine.—The reasonableness of the Biblical doctrine of redemption, peculiarly of the NT connexion of redemption with the suffering and death of Jesus as a sacrifice for sins, can be rightly appreciated only in the light of the Bible's own presuppositions on the character of God, on the infinite demerit of sin, on the necessity of a vindication of the righteousness of God in the forgiveness of sin, on the peculiar relation of Christ to God and man, qualifying Him to make atonement for sin, and effect a perfect reconciliation between God and humanity. More definitely, among the presuppositions of the doctrine are to be noted the following:—(1) The Biblical doctrine of the righteousness of God. By righteousness is meant that in God which grounds the moral order of the world, and pledges Him to uphold that order. While, in its connexion with mercy, righteousness is frequently represented as a saving, redeeming attribute, it cannot be merged wholly, as some (e.g. Ritschl) would have it, in either love or Fatherhood. There is an essential 'right' for God as well as for men, and righteousness is that attribute of His character which leads Him to establish, uphold, and vindicate that right in all His dealings and relations with moral beings.—(2) The Biblical recognition of the organic constitution of mankind. Humanity has a unity as a 'race' (cf. A 17²⁶), a corporate life and responsibilities, a 'solidarity,' in virtue of which 'none of us liveth to himself, and none dieth to himself' (Ro 14⁷). There is personal responsibility, but there is also a measure of responsibility which every one is called to assume for others. Good acts do not end with the doer, but their benefits overflow to others. Similarly, the penalties of transgression are never confined to the transgressor, but overflow on all connected with him, and on society. One illustration of this principle is seen in heredity. As, however, through this principle it is possible for one to injure others, and for the penalties of evil-doing to be entailed on the innocent, so it is possible for one to act and suffer for the benefit and redemption of others. Scripture doctrine knows nothing of pure individualism. One is blessed in another; one is helped by the intercession of another; one would willingly, if he could, atone—sometimes, in a relative way, does seek to atone—for the sin of another. (On the application to redemption, cf. Ro 5^{12ff.}).—(3) The Biblical view of the infinite evil and hatefulness of sin. Sin is direct contrariety to the holiness of God. Eternally, therefore, holiness must react against it in condemnation and punishment (cf. Ro 1¹⁸). It follows that, even in forgiving sin, God cannot tamper with the condemning testimony of His law against it, but must provide for the vindication of His righteousness in the passing of it by (cf. Ro 3²⁵, He 9¹⁵).—(4) The Biblical truth of Christ's essential and peculiar relation to our race. This lies at the foundation of everything that is declared of Christ's redeeming activity. He is the 'Son of God,' standing in a quite peculiar relation to both God and humanity. That relation to our race is grounded (a) in His general relation to creation (Jn 1²⁻⁴, 1 Co 8⁶, Col 1¹⁵⁻¹⁷ etc.), and (b) in His condescending grace in becoming man—in His incarnation (Ph 2^{5ff.}, He 2¹⁴ etc.).—(5) In this relation also account is to be taken of Christ's perfect sinlessness (2 Co 5²¹, 1 P 2²², 1 Jn 3⁵ etc.), and of His complete identification of Himself with our race in sympathy and love. Here already the substitutionary forces of love come into fullest play.—(6) The Biblical assertion that, in this identification, Christ made Himself one with us in our whole position of responsibility and ruin under the broken and dishonoured law of God (Ro 8³, Gal 4⁴ etc.). In this position it is impossible but that Christ should take cognizance of the relation in which sin has placed the world, not only to the commanding, but also to the condemning and punishing, will of God, and should desire, as man's Redeemer, to do the highest honour to that, as to all else in God's relation to sin.—(7) Historically, it is certain that Jesus did enter, in the fullest way possible to a sinless being, into what may be called the penal evil of our state; into the experience of the deepest meaning of that evil; above all, into death, the culminating form of that evil. When even a Bushnell can speak of Jesus as 'incarnated into the curse' of our condition (cf. Forgiveness and Law, pp. 150, 155, 158); can describe Him as 'doing all that He does and suffers, in a way to honour the precept, enforce the penalty, and sanctify the justice of law; the precept as right, the penalty as righteous, the justice as the fit vindication of the righteousness of God'; and declares that 'no moral account of His gospel, separated from this, can be anything but a feeble abortion' (Vic. Sac. pt. iii. ch. vi.), it may be felt that there is no supreme difficulty in believing that Christ, in our name and nature, may, in His acceptance of suffering and death, have rendered that acknowledgement of the righteousness of God in His condemnation of sin, which holiness demands, in order that sin may be righteously forgiven.

ii. ECCLESIASTICAL DEVELOPMENT.—In a brief sketch of the ideas and theories which have prevailed in the Church on the subject of redemption, only leading points can be indicated. It was only to be expected that, in the multitude of aspects under which redemption is represented in Scripture, much diversity would appear in the manner in which the doctrine was apprehended by different minds in the Church. And this is what we find.

1. In the immediately post-Apostolic age, little was done to elucidate the connexion of Christ's suffering and death with redemption. The Fathers of that age, while profuse in their allusions to redemption through the blood of Christ, content themselves, mostly, with the repetition of the Apostolic phrases, and offer no theological interpretation. The age of the Apologists which succeeded was, if possible, even more barren in this direction. Still, even in this earliest period, it would not be difficult to show that the essential fact of redemption by Christ was never lost sight of. Clement of Rome (Ep. 49), as later Irenæus (v. xvii. 3), lays stress on Christ's giving His flesh for our flesh, and His soul for our souls; and sometimes, as in Polycarp and the Epistle to Diognetus, a remarkably clear and evangelical note is struck. Reflexion on the mode of redemption may be said properly to begin with the old Catholic Fathers—Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, etc. A leading idea in Irenæus is that of the recapitulation of the whole of humanity in Jesus Christ. That is, Jesus sums up all history, all stages and experiences of human life, in Himself, and so can represent humanity as its Redeemer. He enters as a new Head into our race; retracts the disobedience of the Fall by His own obedience; gains a complete victory over Satan; and honours the justice of God by His submission to death for our sins (II. xxii. 4, III. xviii. 6, xxi. 10, v. ii. 1, etc.). This Father is sometimes credited with the idea of a ransom paid to Satan, but any allusion of this kind in him hardly gets beyond a rhetorical figure (v. i. 1). He teaches explicitly that Christ by His death has reconciled us to God, and procured for us forgiveness (III. xvi. 9, v. xvi. 3, etc.). Origen, as Harnack (Hist. Dogm. ii. 367) observes, regarded Christ's redemption from many points of view (victory over Satan, expiation offered to God, ransom paid to Satan). The grotesque theory of a ransom paid to Satan—the devil, however, being deceived in the transaction, as he found he could not hold the soul of Jesus—is, in Origen also, hardly more than rhetoric (on Mt 16²³); but the idea took hold, and, sometimes alone, sometimes along with other conceptions, was propounded by subsequent theologians, and in the Middle Ages, as far down as Bernard and the Schoolmen, as a serious theory of redemption. Other prominent teachers, however, as Gregory of Nazianzus, Athanasius, Anselm, would have nothing to do with it (see RANSOM). Athanasius takes a further step, and in his treatise on The Incarnation of the Word makes a brief, reasoned attempt at the rationale of salvation. God had ordained death as the penalty of sin, and, as it was impossible for God to lie, it was necessary that this penalty should be inflicted (Incar. 6, 8, 9, etc.). But it was not fitting that God should allow His creation to perish; the Logos, therefore, Creator of the world, having assumed our nature, endured this penalty in our stead, and brought into our race anew a principle of incorruption (ib. 8, 9). The Latin Church naturally (Hilary, Ambrose, Augustine) gave more prominence than the Greek Church to the idea of satisfaction to law or justice, but in Greek writers also (Cyril, Chrysostom, etc.) this idea is not wanting. It is important to observe that Augustine, and the Fathers generally, never lose sight of the fact that it is God's love which is the cause of Christ's reconciliation; not Christ's death, as an appeasement of justice, which is the cause of the love (Aug. on Jn 17²¹⁻²³; Calvin endorses this view, Instit. II. xvi. 3, 4).

2. A new period in the history of this doctrine begins with Anselm in his Cur Deus Homo. Anselm's theory turns on the necessity of a 'satisfaction' to God's violated honour; but it is noteworthy that he does not find this satisfaction in the penal endurance of our curse. His theory moves rather in the circle of the Catholic ideas of supererogatory merit. Christ, as man, was bound to obey God's law, but, as sinless man, He was not bound to die. His voluntary submission to a shameful death, therefore, for the glory of His Father, was an act of such transcendent merit as infinitely to outweigh all the dishonour done to God by humanity. Anselm is strong in basing the necessity for satisfaction in God's nature; but his theory is faulty in the idea of merit on which it turns, in its ignoring of the penal aspect, and in its too external character. Abelard represented the opposite pole of doctrine—the purely moral view of the effect of Christ's death. Bernard opposed Abelard, and gave prominence to the important thought of the vicarious suffering of the Head for the members (vers. Abel. vi. 15). Aquinas sought, but without real logical cohesion, to combine all these points of view in a comprehensive scheme. Meanwhile, in accordance with the scholastic tendency to exalt the will of God at the expense of His other attributes, atonement was removed from the ground of necessity in the Divine nature on which Anselm had placed it, and was rested on the mere fiat of the Divine sovereignty (Duns Scotus). To this tendency the whole body of the Reformers, in the great religious upheaval of the 16th cent., strenuously opposed themselves, and, with their clearer views of what was needed as the basis of the sinner's justification, definitely placed the atonement on the ground of a satisfaction to eternal law. Sin they regarded as 'a violation of the order of public law that is upheld by God's authority, a violation of the law that is correlate with the eternal being of God Himself'; they 'estimated the atoning work of Christ by reference to that justice of God which finds its expression in the eternal law' (Ritschl). It is this view that it embodied in the Protestant creeds. Socinianism denied the necessity of all satisfaction for sin, and explained Christ's work, as man, in terms of His prophetic office. The later Governmental theory of Grotius likewise denied the need of satisfaction to essential justice, and sought a basis for the atonement in 'rectoral' considerations. Christ's death was a 'penal example' for the upholding of public law, and the deterring from future sin. The 'Covenant' theology viewed redemption as flowing from a compact between the Divine Persons, in which Christ became surety for the elect, and purchased their salvation by His death in their room.

3. The increasingly mechanical and narrowly legal character which thus tended to be stamped on redemption led, as it was bound to do, to a reaction. Modern theology has been marked, accordingly, by a considerable revolt against every form of satisfaction theory, and by a return, in one form or another, to views more purely ethical.

(1) In certain of these theories Christ's redeeming work is brought mainly under the head of 'revelation.' Its essence lies in His revelation of the character and will of grace of the Father. His death is the culminating point in this revelation, and the supreme test of His fidelity to God in His vocation (thus, e.g., Ritschl).—(2) Bushnell's theory attaches itself specially to the idea of 'sympathy' in Christ, and finds in this the key to His vicarious sufferings. The redeeming quality of Christ's sufferings lies wholly in their moral efficacy. Christ 'simply engages, at the expense of great suffering and even of death itself, to bring us out of our sins themselves, and so out of their penalties' (Vic. Sac. pt. i. ch. 1). Later, Bushnell felt the need of doing more justice to the idea of 'propitiation'; but, while allowing that Christ came under the 'penal sanctions' of sin, he still held that these sanctions were 'never punitive, but only coercive and corrective' (Forg. and Law, p. 132). But what does 'penal' mean, if not 'punitive'?—(3) A third class of theories lays main emphasis on the surrender to the Father of the 'holy will' of Christ. In this lies the essence of His redeeming sacrifice for humanity (Maurice, F. W. Robertson, Erskine of Linlathen, etc.).—(4) A profounder view, in some respects, is that of M'Leod Campbell, whose ideas have considerably influenced later theology both at home (Moberly) and on the Continent (e.g. Häring). Campbell finds the essence of Christ's atonement in what he calls a 'vicarious repentance' for sin. The language is unfortunate, for, in strictness, no one can 'repent' for another, though he may 'confess' the sin of another, and 'intercede' for that other. The real value of Campbell's theory lies in its attempt to give an ethical and inward character to Christ's dealing with the wrath of God against sin. He recognizes that sin's guilt, and the reality of the Divine condemnation of sin, cannot be ignored. There is but one way, he holds, in which that condemnation can be met, namely, by entering fully into God's mind regarding sin, and rendering to His judgment upon it a perfect response. In his own words, there goes up an "Amen" from the depths of the humanity of Christ to the Divine condemnation of sin' (Atonement, pp. 117-118). This 'Amen,' in Christ's case, is viewed by him as rendered, not 'in naked existence' (i.e. in purely mental realization), but under actual experience of the power of evil, and of death, viewed as including 'the sentence of the law against sin' (ib. pp. 259-262). A note is touched here which perhaps takes us very near the heart of the matter.—(5) Moberly's view in his Atonement and Personality has affinity with Campbell's, but differs from it in viewing punishment in this life as only disciplinary—chastisement inflicted for the good of the transgressor—and never retributive. [Punishment, however, must be felt to be one's due, or it has no good effect]. Punishment in itself does not atone; atonement arises only when the punishment is met by a spirit of perfect contrition. The essence of atonement is 'penitential holiness.' This, it is held with Campbell, is perfectly realized in Christ alone. In Christ is offered a perfect contrition for the sins of the world. But it is offered in Christ only that it may be reproduced in the believer. Great difficulty, on this theory, must be felt to attach to the idea of 'penitence' as an element in Christ's consciousness; besides, it is after all, not Christ's perfect penitence that is held to be the ground of forgiveness, but the spirit of contrition awakened in the believer himself. Christ's work has its value as producing that. Forgiveness, it is further taught, is not complete at once, but is proportioned to the degree of penitence; surely not a Scriptural notion.

The result of the total survey will probably be to impress upon us: (a) how defective the best of human theories are to express the whole truth on this great subject; (b) the fact that elements of truth are embraced in nearly all the theories, which a more complete view must endeavour to conserve; and (c) the need of continually reverting from human theories to the original statements in Scripture itself, which, in their breadth, variety, and fulness, refresh and satisfy as further else can.

REDNESS OF THE SKY.—When the Pharisees and Sadducees (Mt 16¹⁴) demanded of Christ a sign from heaven (ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ), He replied by reminding them how, when the sky (οὐρανός, RV 'heaven') was red at morning or evening, they were able to foretell foul or fair weather, and so showed that they themselves could discern the face of the sky (or the heaven). There is here an insistence on the various meanings of οὐρανός that is lost in the AV by the introduction of a second word to construe it (see SKY). The 'redness' of the sky is denoted by the verb πυρράζω, to glow, literally, 'to become fire.' The colour of fire (πυρρός) is used for 'red' in Rev 6¹ 12³. In the LXX it stands for the Hebrew אָרָא. The consequences of a fiery hue in the sky at morning or evening, due to the condition of the atmospheric medium, is one of the commonest of weather maxims. It is familiarized in various old couplets.

REED (κάλαμος).—This represents the Heb. kaneh, probably Arundo donax, a plant which grows in great abundance in the marshes of the Jordan Valley and along the river sides. The stem is tall and straight, and the head bends gracefully with a great feathery brush, sensitive to the slightest breath of air (Mt 11⁷, Lk 7²⁴). The wood is put to many uses. It forms the frames of the rush mats with which the Arabs of el-Hüleh make their slender houses. It serves as a walking-stick. When bruised, it is not only useless but dangerous; because, giving way when one leans upon it, the splinters are apt to pierce the hand (Mt 12²⁰). As a mock-sceptre, a reed was put into Christ's hand (Mt 27²⁹), and with this He was smitten (27³⁰). On a reed the sponge with vinegar was raised to His lips on the cross (27⁴⁸). Pens are made from the smaller stems, the Gr. κάλαμος (3 Jn 13) again corresponding to the Arab. kalām and the Lat. calamus. The ancients made the shafts of their arrows from the κάλαμος, and the divining-arrow of the Arab is also kalām. The flute and pipes played on all occasions of festivity are made from the reed (Mt 11²⁷, Lk 7³²). Measuring-rods were so uniformly of reed that they came to be known generally by this term (Ezk 40³, Rev 21¹⁵ etc.).

REFLECTIVENESS.—This is the habit of bending back the attention of the mind from action and experience to scrutinize and contemplate the nature and meaning of self and the world. Deep, steady reflectiveness is rare amid the extraordinary preoccupation in business of the modern world which, like briars, chokes the word. The parable of the Sower should help to restore the reflective habit to its high place among the duties and privileges of life (Mt 13^{19, 22}). The refrain, 'Who hath ears to hear, let him hear,' is a direct appeal to the reflective man. The good scribe has thoughts new and old to reflect upon and dilate upon (Mt 13⁵²). It is the reflective mind that appreciates the absolute truth and varied applicability of the reciprocal principle involved in Mt 7¹² or even Mt 7⁴. Nature and experience are full of suggestive facts to reflect upon (Mt 6²⁶⁻³⁰ 12²⁵), God's care for men being greater than for flowers, and His loving-kindness to men exceeding any shepherd's anxiety for his sheep. John the Baptist is told to reflect upon the beneficence of his successor's ministry (Mt 11^{4, 5}). Martha was 'anxious and troubled about many things' from which her more reflective sister Mary was privileged to be free (Lk 10⁴¹). The Virgin Mary herself is a beautiful and pathetic example of fruitful reflectiveness (Lk 21^{9, 31}). Without reflectiveness the Holy Spirit's work of illumination and guidance could scarcely have its full and due fruit (Jn 14²⁶ 16¹³). Reflectiveness is necessary to grasp the lessons of truth as well as to sift error therefrom.

REFORM.—There is no mention of this word in the Gospels; the only use of it in the NT is He 9¹⁰ 'until the time of reformation' (Gr. διόρθωσις). It may be well to note in what sense Jesus may be said to have approved of 'reform.' There was much about the State that needed reform. Did He step forward to help it on? The answer must be in the negative. He made no attempt to reform the political abuses of His time, yet by the general strain and spirit of His teaching He assuredly did much to help on society towards such reformation. In His own conduct, we find Jesus submitting to the civil authorities under whom He lived. He refused to be made a king, or a governor, or a judge, or to be involved in any way, however remotely, in political revolution. He was ready rather to die than to be engaged in any such work. When asked about the lawfulness of tribute, He said, 'Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's' (Mt 22²¹). Although the words may not be pressed to support a doctrine of passive obedience, nor, on the other hand, taken as an incentive to revolution, He probably meant to remind His countrymen that, in return for the benefits of Roman government under which they lived, they might well be expected to share the expense by paying taxes. Again, in Mt 17²⁷, we find Him providing for the payment of the Temple-tax for Himself and His disciples. He thus submitted to the ordinary ecclesiastical authority, with only a mild protest. Before Pilate, He said, 'Thou wouldest have no authority against me, except it were given thee from above' (Jn 19¹¹). This surely means that all human authority is subject to the higher power of God, who regulates all by His Providence; though it has sometimes been supposed that Jesus thus acknowledged the legitimacy of Pilate's power.

Jesus cannot be claimed with any justice as a victim on the altar of political reform. Yet it may well be affirmed that His teachings, if carried out by men, would certainly produce a reformed society. His disciples, being good men, would also be good citizens. He gave to the world principles, which have been the fruitful seed of true reform.

As to Christ's relation to the law of Moses, it may be asked, Did He become a reformer? While declaring that 'he came not to destroy but to fulfil' (Mt 5¹⁷), we must believe that, at least, He desired some reform of abuses, which had grown up through the interpretations and applications of the Law, made by scribes and lawyers of the past. Even in regard to the law of divorce, He calls attention to the right spirit of the Mosaic legislation, rather than to the exact letter of the Law (Mt 5^{31, 32} 19³¹, Mk 10²¹). And He treats with indignant scorn those evasions of filial duty, as in the case of the Corban, which had so long been sanctioned by the practice of Jewish society (Mt 15³¹, Mk 7⁹). In regard to such traditional abuses, as well as in regard to the State and general social arrangements, we may say that Jesus rather gave an impulse to reform than engaged actively in any attempt to bring the Law, as understood and practised in His day, into accordance with the eternal law of God.

When asked to consider a question about a disputed inheritance, He refused to be drawn into such quarrels, and bade men beware of a covetous spirit, remembering that man's life does not consist in the abundance of the things he possesses (Lk 12³³). He believed that by interfering with the Law, even to have justice done, His disciples might do their spiritual life more harm than such action would do good in a temporal aspect. 'Jesus' disciple ought to be able to renounce the pursuit of his rights, and ought to co-operate in forming a nation of brothers, in which justice is done, no longer by the aid of force, but by free obedience to the good, and which is united, not by legal regulations, but by the ministry of love' (Harnack, What is Christianity? p. 112). REGENERATION.—Of all theological ideas, regeneration is probably that which has had the most unfortunate history. The figure is an apt and obvious one to express the completeness of the change which takes place when the non-Christian becomes a Christian; but it is tempting to press it, and it has been pressed in the most inconsiderate fashion. As the beginning of Christian life (it is argued), it must be antecedent to every Christian experience; faith, justification, conversion are, strictly speaking, its fruits. As a new birth, man can no more contribute to it than to his first birth, and hence must be regarded in it as purely passive, not acting or co-operating with God. As there is no middle state between being dead and being alive, it must be conceived as instantaneous; and so on. We can see the motives in such a mode of thought, but it is full of delusions. Perhaps they have influenced Reformed theology more than Lutheran; yet, while the Lutherans were more conscious of the figure in regeneration, the Reformed were guided by the justifiable desire to give faith a real basis in the believer,—to lay an act of God, as the only sure foundation, at the basis of the whole experience of salvation.

The word 'regeneration' occurs in AV only in Mt 19²⁸, Tit 3⁵ (παλιγγενεσία), and the figure of a new or second birth is most distinctly expressed in our Lord's conversation with Nicodemus, Jn 3 (γεννηθῆναι ἄνωθεν). But as the first of these passages is eschatological, and refers to the new world which is introduced with the παρουσία of the Son of Man, while the two others belong to the latest in the NT, it is not convenient to start with them. To see the real basis for the figure of the new birth, it is necessary to go back to the teaching of Jesus in the Synoptics, and to look at it in its substance and not merely in its formal expression. What the figure conveys, vividly and truly, is the idea that somehow a man has become another man: he has entered into a new order of being; things once real to him have lost reality; things once unknown are now alone real. If we find this idea in the teaching of Jesus, we find what is meant by regeneration, even though that figure should not expressly appear.

1. Our Lord's teaching.—It cannot be questioned that the idea of the newness or originality of His work, and of all that depended upon it, was familiar to Jesus. Without accepting the doctrine that the Kingdom of God, as He conceived it, was purely transcendent,—a new world not spiritually evolved from the present, but supernaturally descending upon it,—we must believe that however it came, and however it was related to the present, the Kingdom introduced an order of things which was entirely new. It was itself, in a comprehensive sense, a παλιγγενεσία (Mt 19²⁸). (On this word see the excellent article on 'Regeneration' in Hastings' DB, by Dr. Vernon Bartlet.) But everything connected with it, involved in it, or leading up to it, awoke in the mind the same sense of newness. In spite, for example, of our Lord's feeling of the continuity of His work with the OT ('I came not to destroy, but to fulfil,' Mt 5¹⁷), He has the equally strong feeling that with the time of fulfilment a new era has dawned ('The law and the prophets were until John: from that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every one presses into it,' Lk 16¹⁶). The newness is so complete, the distinction is so great, that the least in the Kingdom of God is greater than the greatest in the old dispensation (Mt 11¹¹). The same truth underlies all the passages in which Jesus claims for Himself absolute significance in determining the relations of God and man. Of these the most explicit is Mt 11²⁷. Jesus alone reveals the Father, and the man who knows the Father is no longer the same man. No words could be too strong to tell how completely he is another. This absolute significance of Jesus is the sum and substance of His self-revelation (cf. Mt 16^{13ff.}), and the truth of 'regeneration' is an immediate inference from it. Further, though it is not put expressly in this form in the Synoptics, the 'newness,' which is the point to be emphasized, does break through in various ways. We see it in the parables of the New Patch on the Old Garment and the New Wine in the Old Bottles (Mk 2^{21ff.} ||). We see it in the new spiritual liberty which Jesus in Mt 17²⁴⁻²⁷ claims for Himself and those who through Him become children of the Kingdom. We see it especially in the words at the Supper; for there is no doubt that Mt. and Lk. give at least the thought that was in His mind when they speak of the new covenant based on His blood (Mt 26²⁸ D, Lk 22²⁰). It deserves special mention, too, that in all the Synoptics (Mk 14²⁵, Mt 26²⁹, Lk 22¹⁶⁻¹⁸) the thought of the new covenant carries the mind forward to the new world in which it is to be consummated; the new religious relation to God, determined by Christ and His death, cannot be fully realized apart from immortality. The inward regeneration of the soul (so to speak) is part of the ἀποκατάστασις πάντων, or of the παλιγγενεσία in the sense of Mt 19²⁸. But to use the term 'regeneration' here is to anticipate. We have not found any suggestion of it in the words of Jesus, and, in point of fact, the only such suggestion to be found in the Synoptics is Mt 18³ 'Verily I say unto you, Except ye turn (ἐὰν μὴ στραφῆτε), and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (cf. Mk 10¹⁵). To become as a little child is really to be born again; it is what this figure of a new birth properly means, and it is the only key to it which the words of Jesus yield. In the words of Jesus, evidently, it describes a moral requirement; it is something He demands from those who would be His disciples and enter the Kingdom, and it is achieved through 'turning.' The context defines what 'turning' means. It means giving up ambition, pride, self-seeking, by-ends in religion, and other unchildlike tempers; it is, in short, identical with what is elsewhere in the Synoptics called μετάνοια, or repentance. It is through this moral change, the responsibility for which is laid upon man, that he becomes as a little child, that is, is born again.

It should be remarked, in passing, that John never uses μετάνοια or σφρισισθῆναι in the moral sense (except in the quotation from LXX at 12⁴⁰), and that the Synoptists never use 'regeneration' of the individual, or speak of a new birth (except by the allusion in Mt 18³); but it is one and the same experience which they respectively describe by these terms. When that experience is regarded from the side of God, as something due to His grace or Spirit, it is called regeneration, a being born again, from above, of God; when it is regarded from the side of man, as an experience the responsibility for which lies with him, it is called repentance. But we have no meaning or substance to put into either of these terms which does not equally belong to the other.

Perhaps another approach to the figure of regeneration (though that of resurrection is equally obvious) may be recognized in the passages in which Jesus speaks of the sinful life as death, and of recovery from it as a return to or entrance into life. There are two of these in the Synoptics (Mt 8²² || Lk 15^{24, 32}); obviously the emphasis in both is moral, not metaphysical. A change of character is in view, which, however deep and far-reaching, raises none but moral problems. More important, however, than these are the passages in which our Lord teaches that the new or higher life—the regenerate life, to call it so—can be won only through the sacrifice of a lower life. In other words, to have the life which is life indeed, we must surrender the other; we must die to nature in order to live to God. We must renounce self (ἀπαρνῆσθαι ἑαυτόν: a new and radical idea, without formal analogy in the OT) if we are to share in the life of the Kingdom. The man who refuses to do so, who cannot find it in him to do violence to nature, is incapable of discipleship and of the life which is life indeed. This is the burden of our Lord's teaching in such passages as Mt 16^{24ff.} || 10³⁹ 18^{3ff.} ||, Lk 14^{25ff.}. It contains all that is meant by regeneration, but it does not use that figure to express it. And again it is all within ethical limits.

2. Pauline Epistles.—The Book of Acts is a picture of the regenerate life in its workings in the Church, but it is not specially so conceived. At Pentecost what we see is rather a new birth than the new birth of the Apostles. The Spirit is not so much the author of regeneration as the source of the peculiar gifts and powers of believers. But the newness of Christianity is nowhere more strongly felt and expressed than in this book. It brings us directly to St. Paul. The Apostle of the Gentiles became a Christian in a way which must have impressed him profoundly with the difference between the Christian life and that of the pre-Christian state. No one could say with greater truth than he, 'I am now another man.' But in him the change took place in a way which was in the highest degree startling and abnormal; it could not possibly suggest to him anything so natural as being born; and it agrees with this that, though no one has a more adequate sense than St. Paul of the absolute newness of the Christian life, he never uses the figure of regeneration to convey this. He speaks of the new covenant of which he is a minister (2 Co 3⁶), of the new creature (καυή κτίσις, 2 Co 5¹⁷, Gal 6¹⁵) which he has become, of the new world in which he lives (2 Co 5¹⁷), of the new man who has been created according to God in righteousness and holiness of truth (Eph 4²⁴), and who is being renewed unto knowledge after the image of Him that created him (Col 3¹⁰); he speaks also of being transformed by renewal of the mind (Ro 12²), and (if Tit 3⁵ be his) of a renewal wrought by the Holy Spirit at baptism; of walking in newness of life (Ro 6⁴), and serving God in newness of spirit (Ro 7⁶); but he never speaks formally of being born again. Even when he contrasts the past and the present as death and life, the life is not conceived as coming by birth, but either by a creative act of God analogous to that by which at first He commanded light into being out of darkness (2 Co 4⁶), or by an exercise of the same almighty power with which God wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places (Eph 1^{20ff.} 21⁵): when we were dead in trespasses He quickened us together with Him. It is essentially the same change which Paul represents elsewhere as translation from the tyranny of darkness to the Kingdom of God's dear Son (Col 1¹³), or from the state of condemnation to that of justification, or from life after the flesh to life after the Spirit (Ro. Gal. passim), or, in more mystical or metaphysical fashion, from being in Adam to being in Christ: see esp. Ro 5¹²⁻²¹, 1 Co 15^{45f}. It is not necessary here to discuss what is called Paul's psychology, as though he had such a thing in the sense of modern mental philosophy; he has really no psychology; he knows what he was, and he knows what he is, in the way of moral experiences, and he generalizes his past and his present into the conceptions of the natural and the spiritual man, the ψυχικός and the πνευματικός. Every man in himself is ψυχικός, a descendant and representative of Adam; every man has through the gospel the opportunity of becoming πνευματικός, a child of God and representative of Christ. But, as has been already pointed out, Paul never uses the figure of a birth to elucidate or make intelligible the process of this change. He approaches the figure indeed in two different ways. On the one hand, he speaks of himself as the father of those who receive the new life of the gospel through his ministry: 'in Christ Jesus have I begotten you through the gospel' (1 Co 4¹⁵; cf. Gal 4¹⁹, 1 Ti 1² 'my true child in the faith'). On the other, he speaks of the spirit in virtue of which men are πνευματικοί, and walk in newness of life, as specifically the spirit of sonship (υιοθεσία), by which men are made to be, and are identified as, children of God. It is usually the dignity and privileges of this relation to God on which Paul lays stress, and these are suggested by υἱός; but he has also the sense of the kinship to God which it involves, and this is expressed by τέκνον. The latter, though relatively infrequent, occurs in passages so characteristic that we can say that Paul was no stranger to that intimate sense of kinship to God which is so notable in the Johannine type of Christianity (Ro 8¹⁶⁻²¹, Eph 5¹).

There are two points of contact between the Pauline presentation of truth on this subject, and that which we have found in our Lord's teaching, which require to be emphasized. (1) There is in both the same outlook to immortality; the Spirit in Paul which makes men children of God is also the earnest of a life which vanquishes death (Ro 8¹¹, 2 Co 5^{4f}, Eph 1^{13f}). Indeed, the new life is often identified with the resurrection life of Jesus in such a way that the present spiritual experience of it seems rather a deduction from that transcendent possession than something having an independent existence of its own. This applies, e.g., to Ro 6¹⁻¹¹, Eph 2¹⁻⁵. In the gospel, and in the experience of the Christian, there is the revelation at once of ζωή and ἀθάνατος (2 Ti 1¹⁰). (2) There is in both our Lord and St. Paul the same idea that the new life is entered on through a death. 'Our old man was crucified with Christ' (Ro 6⁶), and it is through that crucifixion that the new man comes into being (compare what is said above, § 1 ad fin.). It is one process, one experience, in man, in which the Adam dies and the Christ comes to be. In Paul the process is normally connected with baptism, and in view of Ro 6^{2ff}, Col 2¹¹⁻¹³ it is not easy to maintain that Paul could not have written 'the laver of regeneration, and of renewing wrought by the Holy Spirit' (Tit 3⁵). No doubt it is against the Pauline origin of the last phrase that it introduces the figure of regeneration which is so conspicuously wanting in the undoubted Epistles. When St. Paul spoke of baptism, however, as involving men in the death and resurrection of Jesus, —making them mysteriously participant in all that was meant by both, a death to sin and a life to God, with the assurance of immortality at the heart of it,—he was not thinking of baptism as a sacrament which produced these effects as an opus operatum. He could think of it only as he knew it, that is, as an ordinance administered to people confessing their sins and accepting the love of God in Christ,—an ordinance that gathered into it the whole meaning of Christianity, and in a high and solemn hour raised to its height the Christian's sense of what it is to be a Christian. He says expressly in Col 2¹² that in this ordinance we are raised with Christ 'through faith in the working of God who raised him from the dead.' The same holds of Ro 6^{2ff}. Baptism there is a picture of what is meant by the faith which looks to a dead, buried, and risen Saviour as its one object; in faith we identify ourselves with Christ in all these aspects, and so are taken out of the region to which sin belongs: this is what baptism shows even to the malignant or unintelligent persons who carped at Paul's gospel of salvation by faith alone. The sacrament, as St. Paul was accustomed to it, shut the mouth of anybody who denied that the Christian life rested on a death to sin; and in guarding this fundamental truth it guarded (as we have seen) one of the primary teachings of Jesus. It is an immediate inference from all this that when we ask whether any particular passage in Paul—say Ro 7¹⁴⁻²⁵—applies to the regenerate or the unregenerate man, we are asking a question which the Apostle himself does not formally enable us to answer. He does not think of his experience in terms of regenerate and unregenerate. He can speak of the old man and the new, of the natural and the spiritual, of being under law and under grace, in Adam and in Christ, dead to sin and alive to God, and so on; but the distinction between the states is moral rather than metaphysical, and it is in doctrine rather than experience that it is absolute. One personality subsists through all experiences, all changes of state; nature, or the old man, is not extinct even in those who are in Christ and have the earnest of the Spirit; and though St. Paul, like all religious teachers, often speaks absolutely, not telling his converts to be what they should be, but to be what as Christians they are, he does not allow the religious interest to engulf the moral. It is to men dead in Christ, whose old man has been crucified with Him, that he says, 'Put to death your members that are on the earth' (Col 3⁵), 'Reckon yourselves to be dead unto sin' (Ro 6¹¹). Experience is not a quantum but a process, and in the life of a spiritual being it cannot be dated; the things that in a sense happened twenty years ago are also present experiences, and it may be only now that we are discovering their real meaning. This holds especially of such generalized experiences as are embodied in the passage referred to. Only the new man, who by becoming such has learned what the life of the old man meant, could have written it, but it is unreal to say that it is the experience of either, to the exclusion of the other. The new man understands it better than anybody, but the fact that everybody understands it in some degree is the evidence that all men are capable of the experience it describes.

3. Catholic Epistles.—We find the idea of regeneration both in James and 1 Peter. In Ja. (1¹⁸) God is the author of it, Christians its subjects, and 'the word of truth' the instrument. We are reminded here of the parables in which the word of God—that is, the gospel—is spoken of as a seed, and of 1 Co 4¹³, though in James it is the will of God and not the ministry of an Apostle to which the new birth is referred. When James contemplates Christians thus begotten as a kind of first-fruits of God's creatures, he has apparently in view the universal παλιγγενεσία of Mt 19²⁸. The regeneration of individual men has the promise in it of new heavens and a new earth. There is a similar connexion of ideas in Ro 8^{21ff}. Peter, who uses twice (1^{3, 23}) the word which is exactly rendered by regenerate (ἀναγεννᾶν), connects the experience which he so describes first with the resurrection of Christ, and then with the incorruptible seed which he identifies with the word of God—the gospel message which has been delivered to his hearers. The first brings him closely into line with Paul: the new life is distinctively life in the power of Christ's resurrection, a living hope which has an incorruptible inheritance in view (cf. 1 P 1³ and Ro 6⁴). This resurrection life is, of course, ethical, because it is Divine, but its ethical character is more explicitly secured by reference to the incorruptible seed from which it springs. 'Love one another from the heart fervently, having been born again,' etc. (1 P 1²²). The figure is continued in 2¹¹, where the readers are exhorted (precisely as in Eph 4²²) to 'put off' all that was characteristic of their former life, and as 'newborn babes' to desire the spiritual milk which is without guile. Another parallel to Paul (and to our Lord) in making the new life rest on death to the old is found in 4¹⁴; but though the reality is the same, the figure differs.

4. Johannine writings.—It is in the Fourth Gospel and 1 Jn. that the figure of a new birth is most frequent and explicit. John does not indeed use ἀναγεννάω, but he says γεννηθῆναι ἄνωθεν (Jn 3³⁻⁷); he speaks nine times in the 1st Ep. of being born of God (ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ), and twice in the Gospel and four times in the 1st Ep. of children of God (τέκνα θεοῦ). The fundamental passage here is that in Jn 3, in which Jesus explains the new birth to Nicodemus. No experience is described or demanded in it which has not already come before us independently; the new birth is only a new figure which gives vivid and suggestive expression to a truth which Jesus Himself in the Synoptic record, and the Apostles in their writings, have already expressed in other forms. It may fairly be argued, when we look to the general relation of the discourses in the Fourth Gospel to the indisputable words of Jesus, that the real text of this discourse is Mt 18³. The Evangelist is guided by the Spirit of truth into all the truth of this apparently simple saying (Jn 16¹³); he universalizes it, and sets it in the various relations which bring out its meaning; he shows the necessity of the new birth, the method of it (so far as experience enabled him to do so), and the seat of the power which produced it. But he gives no description of its contents—no analysis of it as an experience—which enables us to put more into it than we put into 'turning and becoming as little children,' or into 'dying to sin and living to God,' or into 'putting off the old man and putting on the new.' He does indeed put in the most general form the necessity for the new birth when he says, 'that which is born of the flesh is flesh.' This does not mean that human nature is essentially or totally depraved; it means that that which is natural is not ipso facto spiritual; it is not what we get from our fathers and mothers which enables us to appreciate Christ, or to enter God's Kingdom; it is something which we can get only from God. This is the same truth as St. Paul teaches in 1 Co 15⁴⁵. 'That is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual.' The birth by which man enters into relations with the natural world has an analogue in the experience by which he enters into relations with the spiritual world. It, too, is a birth—which is variously described as a second birth, or a birth from above, a being born of God, or of the Spirit, or of water and spirit. It cannot be denied that in generalizing the necessity for the second birth, the Evangelist passes from the safe and intelligible moral ground of Mt 18³ into a more metaphysical region (as St. Paul also does in 1 Co 15⁴⁵); but in the circumstances this is not of much consequence. What St. Paul means by τὸ ψυχικόν and St. John by τὸ γεγεννημένον ἐκ τῆς σαρκός is not any metaphysical abstraction, but human beings as they are encountered in the world; and it needs no argument that they must become other than they are, through and through, if they are to dwell with God. It needs no argument, either, that they cannot make themselves other than they are. To be born again they must be born of a power which comes from above, and that power—as the whole experience of his life taught St. John, and had taught St. Paul before him—was the power of the Spirit. To be born again is to be born of God. When the truth is put in this way—in what we may call without offence the onesidedly religious way—its mysteriousness is apparent. The action of God through which the new life emerges in men cannot be prescribed or calculated; it is as unquestionable in its effects as His action in nature, but there is something in it which eludes control. The sense of this underlies all the predestinarian passages in both St. John and St. Paul, but, of course, these are not to be read alone. We should completely misrepresent both Apostles if we supposed that their sense of dependence upon God for being the new men they were impaired their sense of responsibility in this relation. The mind is apt, and perhaps the feeble or insincere mind is glad, to escape from the moral to the metaphysical, from Mt 18³ to Jn 3⁶; there is more to talk about and less to do; but there is no ground for bringing this charge against the Apostles. St. John's interest in this passage is not in the earthly truth (v. 12) of the necessity of regeneration—it needs no revelation from above to make that plain; bitter experience teaches it to all men; his interest is in the possibility and the method of regeneration, the heavenly truths which only Jesus can reveal. The new birth is a birth of water and spirit (v. 5): in other words, it is a birth which is realized through Christian baptism. That the Spirit is the important matter appears from the fact that the water is mentioned only once, and then the Spirit alone (vv. 6, 8). Here, as in the case of St. Paul (see above), baptism must be taken in the whole circumstances and conditions in which it was familiar to the Evangelist. It was not the baptism of unconscious infants, but that of penitent and confessing believers. The importance of it in this passage is seen when we look on to v. 14. The heavenly truth (v. 12) of the passage is that the power through which men are born again is lodged in the Son of Man lifted up as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness. The baptism through which the new birth comes is baptism in His name—baptism, as in Ro 6, into His death and resurrection—baptism which means the believing abandonment of the soul to the love of God revealed in that strange 'uplifting' which includes both the cross and the throne, a believing abandonment for which man's responsibility is complete, and the refusal of which is the only fatal sin (3³⁶). When we realize that this is the connexion of ideas in the conversation with Nicodemus, we see that it falls into line with the teaching of St. Paul, entirely so far as its substance is concerned, and even in form more nearly than is at first apparent; while the teaching of both Apostles is securely based at once on their experience as Christians and on thoroughly attested words of Jesus.

It is as easy with regard to St. John as with regard to St. Paul to ask questions connected with his doctrine of regeneration to which he himself does not afford any answer. Thus the new birth is made dependent somehow on baptism; but it has been argued that in 1²¹, 'children of God' are spoken of, who were 'born of God,' before the Incarnation, and that in 11⁹² 'children of God' are spoken of as 'scattered throughout the world' who are to be gathered into one by the death of Jesus. As to the first of these passages, the interpretation which refers it to the ages before the Incarnation seems to the writer more than doubtful, but in any case the Logos doctrine is a way of expressing the truth that the meaning and power of the Incarnation and Passion are independent of time. In the second passage 'children of God' is probably prophetic; there are men everywhere who will yet gather round the cross of Jesus, and by the power which descends from it into their souls be born again as τέκνα θεοῦ. Another kind of question with regard to those who are born of God is raised by some passages in the 1st Epistle. In 1⁸ it is said of Christians, 'If we say that we have not sinned, we deceive ourselves,' and in v.¹⁰ 'If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar.' But in 3⁹ we read, 'Every one that is born of God doth not sin, for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he has been born of God.' This is in another form the same difficulty as we encounter in St. Paul when he says in one breath, 'Ye are dead,' and in the next, 'Put to death, therefore'; or when we try to tell whether any given spiritual experience is that of the regenerate or the unregenerate man. The regenerate and the unregenerate man, for better or worse, cannot be separated in this summary way. The practical interest of the Apostles compels us to interpret them everywhere through experiences that we can understand; hence it is vain to seek in them any suggestion of what regeneration can mean in the case of baptized infants. There is no indication in the NT that they ever contemplated any such case. Regeneration is a moral experience regarded as the work of God, and repentance is the same moral experience regarded from the side of man; but in neither the one aspect nor the other can we speak of it in the case of beings who have as yet no moral experience at all.

Regeneration is not an exclusively NT idea, and those who regard NT Christianity as a kind of religious syncretism have sought the key to some of its ideas, its terminology, and its rites, especially where this doctrine and its sacramental connexions are concerned, in the Greek and Oriental mysteries which were so popular in the Roman Empire during the first two or three centuries of our era. That powerful influences from these sources—especially, perhaps, from the religion of Mithras—did at a certain period tell upon popular Christianity, cannot be questioned; but the period was not the creative one for Christianity, and the channel of these influences was not Jewish Apostles who held every kind of pagan religion in horror. The writer is convinced that there is nothing in the NT, either about the new birth or about baptism, which cannot be explained from experiences specifically and exclusively Christian; and that to drag in the Taurobolium, and the renatus in aeternum of Mithraic monumental inscriptions, to explain NT ideas, while ignoring the historical connexions which these ideas assert for themselves, is mere wantonness.

REJECTION.—The word 'rejection' does not occur in the Gospels, but the idea of 'casting-off, despising, rejecting' is familiar to the writers of the NT. Mt 21⁴², under the figure of the cornerstone, refers to the rejection of Jesus by the Jews; and in Mk 12¹⁰ and Lk 20¹⁷ the same reference occurs. Jesus knew that He would be rejected, and anticipated the result to Himself (Mk 8³¹, Lk 9²² 17²³), to the Jewish nation (Lk 19⁴³), and to the world (Jn 12⁴⁸). Regarding Himself as a prophet, He expected a prophet's treatment (Lk 13³³ 34, Mt 23³⁷). Jesus regarded Himself as the test applied to nations and individuals, and according to their acceptance or rejection of Him would be their progress or decay. When the Jews rejected Jesus, they wrote their own sentence of doom, while the Gentiles who have accepted Jesus have secured the leadership of the world. As the national rejection of Jesus was attended by national disaster, so the individual rejection is marked by loss of character. See also art. DESPISE.

RELIGION.—The Lat. word religio did not come into Christian usage until in the 4th cent. Lactantius (Instit. iv. 28) wrote, 'Religion is the link which unites man to God.' The reason was that the implications of the word were altogether external, and, in accordance with the Roman genius, almost administrative. But the Greeks were equally unable to supply a word which would correspond with the Christian faith and its fruits. θρησκεία, tr. 'religion' in Ac 26⁵ and Ja 1^{26f.}, was also spiritually threadbare, and suggested nothing more than the ceremonial side of public worship. With this history behind the word, religion has come to be a complex conception; but for the present purpose it may perhaps be defined as the soul's response to the spiritual revelation by which it is illumined, kindled, and moved. With some the revelation does not pass beyond the mind, with others it calls for little more than an indulgence of feeling, with others, again, it brings out only a discipline of obedience. But in true religion all three elements are present. 'It includes the whole energy of man as reasonable spirit' (Fairbairn, Phil. of Religion, p. 201). The key-words of religion then are: (1) revelation, (2) response.

1. Religion as revelation.—The quality of the response depends on the character of the revelation. Religion must always mean something different from what it was before the revelation of grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ. Of what that consisted will appear later. Meantime it might be noted that the factor of revelation has been minimized in the workings of thought during the last two centuries, in reaction, no doubt, from the emphasis on external authority, not only in the Catholic Church, but in older theology generally. On the one hand, in the 18th cent. there was, if one may say so, an artificial construction of 'natural' religion, in which Christ was put out of court. On the other hand, in the 19th cent. the rise of psychological and humanitarian interests has created a tendency to lose the revelation in the response. Thus Schleiermacher in his Reden über die Religion has nothing to say on religious authority, and in a chapter on the nature of religion practically identifies revelation with intuition and original feeling (p. 89). Ritschl, again, in his theory of value-judgments, throws the weight of authority on the soul's response; while Sabatier, in his beautiful study of the genesis of religion, speaks of the spirit attaching itself to its principle, and seems also liable to the dangers of subjectivity (Outlines of Phil. of Rel. p. 28). The alteration of standpoint is thus expressed by F. D. Maurice (Life, i. p. 340):

'The difficulty in our day is to believe in a revelation as our fathers did. . . . Our minds bear a stronger witness than the minds of our forefathers did to the idea of a revelation: so strong a witness, that we think it must have originated in them. We cannot think it possible that God has actually manifested Himself to us, because the sense of a manifestation is so near to us that we think it is only our sense, and has no reality corresponding to it.*

But no good end is served by minimizing that side of religion that is 'not ourselves.' For although, as Oman so well shows (Vision and Authority, p. 81), 'the supreme religious fact is the individual whose capacity of vision is the channel of authority,' yet if truth is ultimately one, it must proceed by way of revelation from some objective source. 'Faith,' says Dorner (Syst. of Chr. Doctrine, i. p. 133), 'does not wish to become a mere relation to itself, or to its representation and thought. That would be simply a monologue: faith desires a dialogue.' See, further, art. FACT AND THEORY.

Now, revelation finds its way to the soul both mediately and immediately. And it is essential to give due consideration to both these channels of religious authority. Jesus Christ, who is the norm of religion as well as the focus of revelation, made use of both. It must not be overlooked that He took over without hesitation the general conception of God's nature, kingdom, and law which He inherited from the teaching of home (Lk 2²¹), synagogue (Lk 4¹⁶), and Scriptures. The OT provided Him not only with illustrations of His own original thought (Mt 12³⁰⁻⁴², Lk 4²⁵⁻²⁷), but with canons of judgment and standards of authority (Mt 5¹⁸), and even with personal assurance in the time of moral temptation (Mt 4⁷⁻¹⁰) and of mortal weakness (27⁴⁶, Lk 23⁴⁶). But this attitude of our Lord must not be misunderstood. In leaning on the Word of God in the Scriptures of His people, He was not compromising the Church on critical questions. Moreover, it cannot be affirmed that He gave any guarantee of an infallible book. On the contrary, He handled it with perfect freedom, treating it as a guide but not as a goal (Mt 5^{21ff.}). Its validity for Him, as for us, lay in its being the chosen testimony of those who gave the best response that was in them to the revelation they received, and so became witnesses of the truth.*

So far our Lord behaved Himself as the 'root and offspring of David.' But He was also 'the bright and morning star.' And religion was His by a revelation that was immediate, as well as by that which was mediated. Into the secrets of His sublime self-consciousness as the beloved Son of God and one with the Father we cannot penetrate. But His words are before us, with all their august claim: 'It was said by them of old, . . . but I say unto you' (Mt 5^{21f.} etc.); 'Ye search the Scriptures, . . . but ye will not come to me,' etc. (Jn 5^{39f.}). The immediacy of revelation to Him is fully declared in Mt 11²⁷ 'All things are delivered unto me of my Father, and no one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' None has ever challenged that solitary claim. Yet it is notable that our Lord did not shut up His followers to a revelation that is mediated even through His own blessed words.

* Christ found men everywhere ready to receive Him as a Rabbi. On the authority of other people they would accept anything. But He insisted on basing what He taught on the authority of their own hearts and consciences. To this end He spoke in parables that they might not understand on any other conditions' (Oman, Vision and Authority, p. 104).

And it is for us to remember that Christ has not left us His revelation, as it were, on deposit. The partial records of His life, first in the flesh and then in the spirit, which are ours through the NT, are certainly means whereby the Divine grace and truth are mediated to us, providing, indeed, our canon of spiritual judgment. But we are to trust also to the immediacy of Divine access to our minds, knowing that there is a Spirit to lead us into all the truth, enabling us to judge all things and approve those that are excellent (Jn 16¹³, 1 Co 2¹⁵, Ph 1¹⁰).^{*} Thus Christianity is like an ever new commandment, being true in Him and in us (1 Jn 2⁸). See, further, art. REVELATION.

2. Religion as response.—The primary response to the revelation of God may be said to run on three lines, the sense of (a) dependence, (b) estrangement, (c) obligation.

(a) The soul's response in a sense of dependence. The soul, when it comes to itself, finds itself solitary and orphaned. The issues of life run up into eternity, and the soul first proves it is awakened by crying out for the living God. The fact that man is a spiritual being soon asserts itself in the life that is not wholly preoccupied with things temporal. In the words of St. Augustine (Confess.), 'Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our heart is restless until it find its rest in Thee.' Thus begins a 'commerce, a conscious and willed relation, into which the soul in distress enters with the mysterious power on which it feels that it and its destiny depend' (Sabatier, Outlines, p. 27). This need of security and rest is perfectly met by Christ. He satisfies the soul's sense of dependence by drawing it to Himself. In His Divine Personality men find their long-sought God. To the soul once awakened there is no resting-place except in the eternal Christ, 'the same yesterday and to-day and for ever.'

'Holding His hand, my steadied feet
May walk the air, the seas;
On life and death His smile falls sweet,
Lights up all mysteries.
Stranger nor exile can I be
In new worlds where He leadeeth me.'

(b) A second primary response of the soul in religion is a sense of sin, or separation. Religion has found expression in sacrifices on account of the well-nigh universal instinct that something must be offered in order to avert the wrath or unkindness of the Deity, or at least to restore happy relations between the worshipper and the world that is beyond his control. Whether they were originally offered in fear of malevolent deities, or in commemoration of the ghosts of the departed, or to renew the covenant of a tribe with its proper deity, does not greatly matter. Suffice it that the sacrifice is intended to restore communion with God in such a way that in the place of guilt and fear there may come a sense of favour through prosperity and peace.

This strong sense of a separateness that may be bridged is more or less efficient in all human response to the Unseen, and is the basis on which the higher religions rest. The danger is that the interest may run out towards the material sacrifice and its attendant rites in such a way that the end is forgotten in the means. But here Christ meets the supreme need of reconciliation in the only worthy way conceivable. On the cross the soul's reliance can be securely planted. It so suffices that all other sacrifices can only be put aside as mistaken, superfluous, and vain (He 13¹⁵), unless they are the sacrifices of empty hands and a full heart.

(c) There is a third primary strand of religion in the sense of obligation, by which the soul is brought under a supreme law and purpose. There is a con-

* 'Not every person has religion who believes in a sacred writing, but only the man who has a lively and immediate understanding of it, and who therefore, so far as he himself is concerned, could most easily do without it' (Schleiermacher, op. cit. p. 91).

straining influence in all religion, in addition to the feeling of dependence and the sense of estrangement. Religion really begins for us, says Lotze, 'with a feeling of duty' (Phil. of Religion, p. 150). It involves a committal of the life, the framing of its career on lines that often lie athwart the obvious advantages of life. The Indian fakir or Buddhist monk is moved strongly by this sense of obligation, and observes conditions of consecration even to the crippling of his life. But here, again, the faith of Jesus Christ fulfils this need of the soul in a way that liberates and enlarges it. He made that absolute claim on the soul's affection and the life's service to which so many have thankfully responded. He knew human nature too well to ask for a partial surrender, and an obedience in outward things which is hard and toilsome. But His yoke is easy, because it brings the whole life, love, and strength under contribution to a reasonable service; so that 'I ought' is transmuted into 'I must,' and the struggling life of division becomes the soaring life of dedication. And as prayer is the expression of the sense of dependence, and sacrifice of the consciousness of estrangement, so the sacrament is the symbol of the sense of obligation.

3. True religion embodied in Jesus Christ.—It is evident from this brief analysis of religion on its responsive side, that Christ has the key to all its intimacies, because the meanings of religion are consummated in Himself. The religion which we believe to be universal and everlasting in its character is just the fuller knowledge and obedience of Christ. He is His own religion, and therefore He not only harmonizes the various feelings of religion, as we have just seen, by satisfying the desire for security, for reconciliation, and for authority, but He also brings into unity its various forms. There are three chief forms which religion has taken, corresponding to the emotional, intellectual, and volitional elements in human nature: (a) the ritual side of religion, presided over by the priests, (b) the speculative side, represented by the theologians and philosophers, and (c) the legal or customary side, typified by the office of the scribes. All these departments are resolved in the NT into the headship and hegemony of Christ. He did not incorporate His religion in a hierarchic order (as with the Buddhists), or in philosophical books (as with the Brahmans), or in codes and customs (as with the Confucians and Muhammadans). He is Himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life (Jn 14⁶) for all humanity.

(a) Christ is the perfect expression of the Temple symbolism (He 9¹¹). His name is the shrine (Mt 18²⁰, cf. 2 Co 5¹⁷); His will is the altar (Mt 25¹⁰, cf. 2 Co 8²). In His self-surrender He is the sacrifice (Mt 26³⁶, cf. He 10¹⁰); in His self-manifestation He is the priest (Mt 11²⁷, Jn 14⁶). 'Having then a great high priest, who hath passed through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our confession . . . let us draw near with boldness unto the throne of grace' (He 4¹⁴⁻¹⁶). (b) Christ is also the final secret of revelation. The Spirit's work was to be focussed on Himself (Jn 16¹⁴), for to know Him is to know the Father (Jn 14⁹), and that is life eternal (Jn 17³). This is a wisdom that the rulers of this world never knew (1 Co 2⁶), though prophets and kings have desired to look into it (Lk 10²³). For the mystery of God is Christ, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col 2³). (c) Christ is, moreover, 'the end of the law unto righteousness to everyone that believeth' (Ro 10⁴). His spirit of love is a law of liberty to His disciples (Jn 13¹⁷ 15¹⁴, cf. Ja 1²³). Keeping the commandments is consummated in following Him (Mk 10²¹), i.e. walking in love (Eph 5¹⁴); for love is the fulfilling

The three provinces of religious manifestation correspond with the three primary sensibilities of the religious life. The religious philosopher seeks to rationalize the consciousness of dependence on some theistic basis. The priest comes into being through the urgent need of reconciliation. The scribe meets the desire for some authority amid the tangled questions of practical life. Thus Christianity, which is essentially a life hid with Christ in God, is always in danger of being drawn down to the level of those who would reduce religion to a ritual of worship, a system of thought, or a fashion of life. But the fact that Jesus Christ is His own religion is the one guarantee of religion arriving at perfection. For it may truly be said that religion is in its essence the consciousness of personal being under the eye of the eternal Personality. It is surely too vague to define it, with Max Müller, as a 'perception of the infinite,' or, with Schleiermacher, as the 'immediate consciousness of the eternal in the temporal.' Lotze gives the following propositions as the characteristic convictions of the religious mind: (1) Moral laws embody the will of God; (2) individual finite spirits are not products of nature, but are children of God; (3) reality is more and other than the mere course of nature, it is a Kingdom of God. In each of these propositions the note of personality is sounded, both subjectively and objectively. And Ritschl states one side of this truth strongly when he explains religion out of 'the necessity which man feels of maintaining his personality and spiritual independence against the limitations of Nature.' But surely the religious man is at equal pains to assure himself of an all-embracing Personality at the heart of things, to which his own soul can return and be at rest (Ps 116⁷). That being so, we can see that only through Christ, the God-man, can this twofold consciousness be securely maintained, and the balance kept true between the objective and subjective elements in religion.

In Christ is perfected both the revelation and the response. He is the focus of revelation and the norm of religion. In fact, 'He reveals most because He awakens most' (Matheson, Growth of Spirit of Christianity, p. 8). He enables us to see in God our Father, because He quickens in us a filial consciousness and behaviour. As for His revelation of Godhead, men have seen in Him that interwoven authority of love and law, of truth and grace, which gives fulness of meaning to the conceptions of a Father in heaven, free-will and human immortality. As for the response which He has awakened in men, they have been won to His ideal through His fulfilment of filial and fraternal obligations in His sacrificial life. The authority and the obedience were alike pre-eminent in the Cross. Thence came the kindling spark which made the Person of Christ a vital religious fact for humanity. Man had thought of himself as being in some sense on a cross because of the presence of suffering, sin, and death; and, so far as he was religious, tried by ritual to propitiate the Almighty, by philosophy to vindicate His ways, by methods of conduct to reduce the mischief of evil. But in Christ crucified man has found God Himself on the cross; and with Him there, there can be no injustice in suffering, no victory for sin, no sting in death.

4. Characteristics of Christ's religion.—Having set this corner-stone, it only remains to mention seven characteristics of the religion which is derived from Jesus Christ and lives upon Him still.

(1) Christ has made religion personal in its authority. He is the only and absolute Lord. His spirit has broken and broken again the bands of ecclesiastical systems which multiply the scruples of conscience. The authority which is not as that of the scribes has been in more or less effectual operation through all the history of Christendom. Unlearned men, the weak and foolish of this world, have more than held their own in the name of Jesus of Nazareth (Ac 4, cf. 1 Co 1²⁶). His people have gone forth, indifferent to praise or blame, favour or persecution, and even suspending their judgment of one another on the ground that to their own Master they stand or fall, before whose judgment-seat all must appear (Ro 14¹⁰). Heroic exploits have been undertaken and meanest duties performed by those whose one desire is to be well-pleasing unto Him (He 13²¹) whom not having seen they love (1 P1⁸). Christianity loses its secret when it forgets the glorious egotism of the Master, who not only made Himself a law to the disciples who accompanied His ministry (Mt 23¹⁰), but gave Himself back to them as more than ever theirs after death (Mt 28²⁰, Jn 20. 21). Christian mysticism is not only in place, it is imperative for the believer. Though he may not rise to the full height of St. Paul's 'Not I, but Christ' (Gal 2²⁰), he must be in conscious touch with his Lord.

(2) Christ made religion human in its sympathy. It was stamped upon the remembrance of His disciples that He went about doing good. Jesus presented to a world much given to religiosity the problem of One who reserved His devotions for the solitude of night, and filled His days, including the Sabbaths, with helping the needy and the outcast. True, He went up to the national Feasts (Jn 2¹³ etc.), but He was most Himself when He provided a miraculous meal of His own (Mk 6^{35ff.}||). True, He revered the Temple; but the occasions of His triumphs, and the moment of His transfiguration, were in secular places (Mt 17^{1ff.}||). True, He was subject unto the Law; but He made its requirements a secondary consideration when the cause of humanity was at stake (Mk 2^{23ff.} 3^{1ff.}). These incidents are typical of the attitude of Jesus towards religious duty. He denounced the advocates of 'Corban,' and those who 'devoured widows' houses and for a pretence made long prayers'; demanded 'mercy instead of sacrifice, and reconciliation rather than ritual' (Mt 9¹³ 5^{23ff.}); and declared that the service of the 'little ones,' the least of His brethren, was the true way of honouring the Father in heaven (Mt 10⁴⁰ 25⁴⁰, Jn 13¹⁴). Slowly the disciples were weaned from their contempt for the multitude, their disparagement of women and children (Mk 10^{13ff.}), their vexation with men like Bartimæus and Zacchæus who interfered with their religious plans (v. 48, Lk 19⁷). At last they deserved the name of 'League of Pity.' Their first social experiment was to have all things in common (Ac 4³⁴). Their first economic problem was how to distribute alms most wisely to the widows (Ac 6¹). They invented a new virtue called 'brotherly love,' in which all shared who were of the faith, whatever their status or nationality. The revolution which Christ effected in humanizing the conception of religion may be clearly seen in a study of words. There were three Greek words for service: διακονία, which was used for service from man to man, chiefly reserved for slaves; λειτουργία, which was used for the service of a man to the commonwealth; and λατρεία, for the service rendered to the gods.

The Christian consciousness rejected the last word; but adopted and hallowed the other two, which stood for human, not Divine service. They appear in 'deacon' and 'liturgy' respectively: the third word is left embedded in idolatry.—See, further, below, § 5.

(3) Christ has made religion moral in its character, because He is pre-eminently the Saviour from sin. Religion under other auspices may mean almost anything but a moral conflict and victory. It may even, as in various Asiatic beliefs, spread its sanction over immorality. And even where there is a high ethical standard, as in Confucianism, goodness is rather a codified substitute for religion than the vital substance of it. Nowhere but in Christianity is love for God identified with a passion for real righteousness and inmost cleansing. Not that there is no teaching to this end in the OT. On the contrary, it is the main burden of the prophets. And John the Baptist stood in the true succession when he turned religion into the terms of a repentant and reconstructed life. But it too easily became a means to an end, so that personal righteousness became subsidiary to national rights. And goodness became so degenerate in the chair of the scribes that their ideal was not so much rectitude as correctitude.

But the religion of the Sermon on the Mount breathes out a holiness which consumes every lesser thing, and carries the moral imperative into the inmost recesses of the soul. It is a remarkable thing that Jesus brought so few charges of sin against the irreligious people. If one might venture on a reason, it is that sin itself, i.e. the enthronement of self against God, meant so much to Him that He let other things pass in order to strike at the Prince of this world (Jn 12³¹ 16¹¹). His life and spiritual presence have made men conscious of sin without the aid of any catalogue of transgressions. On the other hand, Christ's conception of morality was always warm and positive, on the ground that 'no virtue is safe that is not enthusiastic' (Seeley, Ecce Homo, ch. i.). Every token of self-abandonment in humility, faith, and love drew forth His admiration, whether it was the quiet confidence of the centurion (Mt 8^{5ff.}, Lk 17^{2ff.}), the moral enthusiasm of the young ruler (Mk 10^{17ff.}||), the sacrificial giving of the poor widow (12^{42ff.}||), or the overflowing repentance of the woman who wept at His feet (Lk 7^{36ff.}). Every human trait that escaped the imprisonment of self was in the eyes of Jesus the material of true religion. And it was a radiant goodness, unconscious and unlaboured, in the early Christians that chiefly arrested the attention of the world.

(4) Christ has made religion individual in its responsibility, because He is the Lord of all. Religion always tends to congeal into a system. There is, of course, a solidarity of mankind, of which religion must take note, of which indeed it is an expression. Sin is a common inheritance, and redemption, too, is a universal fact. It is on this truth that the gospel of Jesus rests. But starting from this truth the gospel lays a test and an obligation on individuals as such. There is no safeguard in being a son of Abraham or a disciple of Moses without giving personal credence, allegiance, and service. μόνον πιστεuei is the keyword by which the individual escapes from 'an evil and adulterous generation,' and all that threatens the full exercise of personality. From the beginning Jesus kept the multitude at the distance of a strait gate and a narrow way, which can be traversed only by one at a time, by the giving of the will, and the crucifying of the self. And what is true of entrance to the Kingdom holds good of its final appointments. Punishment will be proportioned to knowledge and reward to fidelity. With all that He Himself brought, Jesus did not allow men to take anything for granted, but bade them 'watch, as if on that alone hung the issue of the day.'

(5) Christ has made religion spiritual in its essence, because 'the Lord is the Spirit' (2 Co 3¹⁷) as God is Spirit (Jn 4²⁴). Religion is apt to become a mere sediment of observance, a shell from which the life has departed. It certainly was so in the days of our Lord; it threatens to be so still. The words in vogue among the Greeks were λατρεία and θρησκεία, the latter word being translated 'religion' in Ac 26⁵ and Ja 1^{26ff.}, the former 'service' in Jn 16², Ro 9⁴ 12¹, He 9¹⁶. But they only connoted rites of worship and sacrifice: they were old bottles which could not be entrusted with the new spirit of Christianity. St. James uses θρησκεία almost ironically when he says that 'pure religion and undefiled is visiting widows in their affliction and keeping one's self unspotted from the world.' St. Paul (Ro 12¹) takes up λατρεία and θυσία with equal scorn, qualifying the former word with λογική and the latter with ζῶσα, before allowing them to be applicable to Christianity.

It was in this way that Christ Himself had dealt with the prayers and almsgiving of pious Jews (Mt 6¹⁻⁸); and the whole tendency of professional separatism among the Pharisees (cf. Pro Christo et Ecclesia). His Father 'sees in secret,' and 'seeks those to be his worshippers who worship in spirit and in truth' (Mt 6⁴, Jn 4²⁴). By resting religion on spirituality, and giving free access by the Spirit to the Father (Ro 5², Eph 2¹⁸), the whole basis of the sacrificial system was undermined and sacerdotalism became an anachronism.

'The society as founded by Christ has in its collective being a priestly character, but is without an official priesthood. It has no temple save the living man; no sacrifices save those of the spirit and the life' (Fairbairn, Christ in Modern Theology, p. 49).

(6) Christ made religion independent in its action, because, as He once said, 'My kingdom is not of this world' (Jn 18³⁶). Being the expression of His eternal Spirit, Christianity has never been stamped or cramped by the language of a given period or the fashion of a particular people. His gospel, being a secret of personal experience, has received a most varied witness even within the NT. It has continually broken through language and escaped. And while the Christian religion in its purity has always been able to shake itself free from the encumbrance of a theological system, it has been no less an independent spirit in regard to other departments of human activity. It has been free to enter and often able to renew them without being itself captured in the process. Political movements, new departures in art, and even advances in science, have as often as not received guidance and support from the Christian spirit. But to none of them has it remained captive, because it moves by right in a higher realm. Thus 'age cannot stale its infinite variety.' It exercises the royal prerogative of lending to all, but borrowing nothing in return, and so is free for every emergency which history unfolds in the whole compass of humanity.

(7) Christ has made religion missionary in its outlook, because He is the Saviour of the world. Christianity is not equipped like, e.g., Muhammadanism, for capturing whole tribes at once, for it is not, properly speaking, nationalist in its range. But it stands alone among all other religions in its power to emancipate individuals, and ultimately to regenerate society in every race under the sun. It takes secure root in the universal soil of human needs and possibilities, and with such a grip it is in command of the future. All it waits for is that its professors should realize that it increases in proportion as it is given away, and is truly known only by those who try to make it known.

Christ always believed in small beginnings, but His hope was ever set on great and triumphant conclusions. That He was alone, with nowhere to lay His head, did not trouble Him, for He knew that when He was lifted up from the earth He would draw all men unto Him (Jn 12³²). That His disciples were not wise and learned satisfied Him perfectly, because He saw them (metaphorically speaking) seated on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. That none of the rulers believed on Him did not perturb Him greatly; for He foresaw the time when they would come from the east and the west, the north and the south, to sit down in the Kingdom of God (Lk 13²⁹). His parables suggested His confidence in the irresistible contagion of the lives of men who had once been won for the Kingdom. He likened His word to a fire (Lk 12⁴⁹), to leaven (Mt 13³³), to a seed (v.¹⁹), so potent is its influence on life and on society. And because the needs of the world are so great and deep, and the fields white unto harvest, He gave Himself up wholly to the ingathering work of the Father, and, more than that, He laid it as a last charge and responsibility upon His disciples that they should go out into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature (Mt 28¹⁹).

RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. — 1. Evidential value of religious experience.—Experience is the ultimate test of truth. All knowledge comes from within. World-knowledge, self-knowledge, God-knowledge, all equally depend upon the trustworthiness of this inner organ of information. A universal experience, or an intuitive consciousness, gives us knowledge lifted to the highest power. That which is most universal and most enduring is vouched for by the nature of things. The religious consciousness is as clear and universal as the world-conscience. It is as natural to man as volition or mathematics. Every baby is born blind and dumb and without the power to will, and there may be some tribes with poor eyes and slow tongues and no theology; but in normal humanity there is a latent capacity for sight and speech and volition, and at least a hope that the soul has relations with the supernatural. Religion is not something miraculous. It is as natural to man as eyesight and star-gazing. It is as normal as any physiologic function. Modern psychology has indisputably proved that religious experience is as closely related to the nerves and blood as puberty; the vital organs and psychic mechanism are built with reference to it. Its importance and value to the race are doubly starred, for 'its best fruits are the best things history has to show' (James, Varieties of Religious Experience, p. 259). To doubt its veracity would be an insolence to the Providence of the universe. Modern psychology has only emphasized Augustine's decision: 'Lord, if we are deceived, we are deceived by Thee.*' It is because the NT grew out of, and is the record of, genuine first-hand religious experience that it has the gift of tongues, and can speak to every man in the language wherein he was born.

2. Pre-requisites of religious experience.—The great fundamental pre-requisites of religious experience the Gospels take for granted. There is no more of an attempt to prove God's existence than man's existence, or God's power of speech than man's. God loves to speak to man, and man can understand. God is the imperative preliminary to all religious life; He is the chief factor in its continuance and perfecting. Each soul possesses as its birthright a knowledge of moral distinctions, a sense of moral obligation, a conscious power of obedience or disobedience to such law as the soul knows. All this, where not affirmed, is assumed by all the Gospel writers.

3. Pre-Christian religious experience.—Much of the religious experience described in the Gospels is pre-Christian. Primitive Christianity never imagined that a rich religious experience was not possible outside the Christian community. The Divine Shepherd has 'other sheep' besides the Israelites (Jn 10⁶). Jesus Himself expressly affirms

* Professor James, from a study perhaps too largely devoted to abnormal developments of the religious emotions, reaches nevertheless the significant conclusion that, 'if intercourse between man and God is not a fact, then religion does not simply contain elements of delusion, but is rooted in delusion altogether' (op. cit. p. 465, cf. p. 547).

this, and refers to Naaman the Syrian, the widow of Zidon, the Roman centurion, and the Syro-Phœnician woman as possessing better religious experience than their Jewish neighbours, and definitely announces that 'many' shall come from the heathen nations and enter the future Kingdom in peace (Jn 1^{20, 23}, Lk 4²⁵⁻²⁸, Mk 7²⁴, Mt 8¹⁰ 15²⁸). So, the Samaritans were at various times praised by Jesus, and one of them was selected as the ideal type of brotherhood (Lk 7^{11, 19} 10²⁵⁻³⁷). Yet, while Jesus proclaimed faith and gratitude and compassion to be religious virtues wherever found, and evidently preferred honest heresy to thoughtless orthodoxy, He nevertheless regarded Gentiles and Samaritans as heretics, and the Jews as the natural 'children of the kingdom' (Mt 8¹²; cf. 18¹⁷, Jn 4²²). The Apostles were all Jews, and the holy men and women whose prayers and hymns filled the earth with prophetic hope at the birth of John and Jesus were representative OT saints. They had been 'prepared for the Lord' (Mk 1¹⁷), and were 'prayerful,' 'devout,' and 'righteous' people who 'rejoiced in God,' being 'filled with the Holy Ghost,' and could depart this world 'in peace' (Lk 1^{6, 47, 67} 2²⁵⁻²⁹, cf. Jn 1⁴⁷). Such religious fruit does not grow on a tree with a rotten root.

4. Christian experience contrasted with all other religious experience.—Nevertheless, as compared even with the best religious experiences of the Old Covenant, those of the New seemed like 'new wine' (Mk 2²²), like newly discovered treasure (Mt 13³⁴), like a wedding day (Mt 9¹⁵), like the 'one pearl of great price' (Mt 13⁴⁶), like a king's banquet (Mt 2²²), like the rising of the sun (Lk 1⁷⁹, cf. Jn 1¹⁷). The religious knowledge and outlook even of that holy prophet and herald of whom Jesus Himself said that there had been 'none greater born of women,' were to be so eclipsed that he who was 'little' in the New Kingdom should be greater than he (Mt 11¹¹). New standards, new ideals, new spiritual magnitudes, above all, a new spiritual dynamic had appeared, and with these a totally new spiritual experience. The new things introduced by the gospel have often been catalogued, but Jesus was the supremely new thing in the new religion. Much of the teaching, even its central Golden Rule, was old, but He was new. He, not His teaching, was the centre of the new gospel. He was the gospel; Himself the glad tidings of great joy. His coming brought a new morning to the world (Lk 1⁷⁸), and originated a new vision of righteousness and a new sunrise type of religious experience in the souls of men.

5. Religious experience of Jesus.—But although Jesus created a new religion characterized by strangely new religious dispositions, it is a difficult task to discover from the records the facts concerning His own soul life. That He prayed and had the inner certainty of reply; that He was tempted; accepted the Father's will even when unexplained to Him; that He had great confidence in God, and felt a peculiar harmony between Himself and the Infinite Goodness,—all this, and much more, is known. But did the self-identity with the moral law which He claimed (Jn 1⁴⁶, cf. Mk 8³⁴ 10²¹ 13³¹, Mt 5¹⁷) involve the consciousness of self-identity with Jehovah? So St. John's Gospel certainly teaches. According to all the Gospels, He claimed a jurisdiction here and hereafter which no other sane man has ever ventured to claim. He showed no hesitancy in calling Himself 'meek and lowly,' while in almost the same breath He demanded absolute submission of intellect and will from all who expected to remain His 'friends,' or hoped to be at peace with God hereafter (e.g. Mt 7^{21a, 11} 28^{a, c}, Lk 6⁴⁶, Jn 15¹⁴). Even in Mk. He is represented as claiming, without misgiving, to be the expected Messiah and Judge of the world (8²⁹), who has power to forgive sins (2¹⁰), and to whom all men owe absolute spiritual allegiance (8^{34, 38}). The other Synoptics, as well as Jn., specifically represent Him as claiming to be superior to the wisest lawgivers and prophets of the past (Mt 12⁴² 19⁸, Lk 11³¹, Jn 1¹⁷)—One whose mission in the world was to give His life a ransom for the race (Jn 3¹⁶, cf. Mk 10⁴⁵), Himself the centre and object of the devotion of all men loyal to the inner light (Lk 19¹⁴ 20¹⁸, Jn 5⁴⁰ 7¹⁷), the only Being who knew God (Mt 11²⁷), a Saviour and Judge whose 'Depart from me' was the severest penalty which could be pronounced on guilty man (Mt 1²¹ 7²³). Yet, notwithstanding all this, He is represented in every Gospel as being peculiarly calm, sincere, humble, and self-forgetful, possessing a heart of singular purity, having not the slightest doubt of His own right relationship to God, trusting the inner witness perfectly, and constantly possessing a peace 'deep as the unfathomed sea,' which peace He believed He could impart to others. The self-consciousness of Jesus was the spring underneath the Temple-altar, out of which flowed the healing waters of Christianity.

6. Christ's relation to Christian experience.—Whatever we think, who never ate at the same table with Him, there is not the slightest doubt as to what the earliest Christians thought of Jesus. They never attempted to analyze His states of consciousness,—He was to them the object rather than the subject of religion,—but of one thing they were absolutely sure, it was He who had worked the mighty change in them. Whereas they had been blind, they could now see; whereas they had been helpless, they now had conscious victory over sin; and new powers in many directions were theirs. These new experiences came through Him. In coming to Him they had found God, and a new type of thought and life had appeared within themselves. Jesus Christ was the source of this change of personality. All the NT writers agree as to this.

A writer in the JE (art. 'Jesus'), though believing that Jesus never claimed to be the Messiah, at the same time acknowledges that 'his most striking characteristic was his claim that spiritual peace and salvation were to be found in the mere acceptance of his leadership.' Nathaniel Schmidt (Prophet of Nazareth, 1905) also makes a suggestive admission when he says that, while Jesus never claimed to be the Messiah, yet all the hopes of OT prophets embodied in King, Redeemer, and Divine Manifestation were more than fulfilled in Him; and although He never, probably, claimed to forgive sins, yet He could forgive them, and historically He has actually been the Saviour of the world, and is saving men yet (pp. 8, 203, 317).

That Jesus Christ was the Saviour every man needed, One who could save up to and beyond the limit of the man's best hope, was the common thought of those who most thoughtfully observed His influence and reported His words. It is constantly assumed as a fact of consciousness, and often declared in unequivocal language, that every man has so flagrantly sinned against light and become such a slave to sin that he needs the very power of the Almighty to enable him to fulfil his moral duty and reach his spiritual ideal. He needs more than one act of omnipotence. He needs a God who will come and stay close to him, ruling the life, not from without but from within (Mk 7¹⁵, Mt 15⁸, Lk 17²¹, Jn 4²¹ 15¹⁻⁶). The earliest Christians are unanimous in the declaration that in coming to Jesus Christ they had found the Father, and that He was not afar off but within; and after Pentecost they speak of the inward Presence either as 'God,' 'Spirit of God,' 'Holy Spirit,' or 'Spirit of Christ.'

7. Origin of Christian experience.—Herein lies the explanation of the earliest typical Christian experience. The new religion was rooted in a new conception of the Holy Ghost. A perfected Christian experience was not possible until after Pentecost. There is no emphasis in the Gospels upon personal experience. They have to do with 'Jesus only.' His statements as to truth and His promise of future blessedness were sufficient grounds of certainty without any 'experiences' to corroborate them. Salvation, according to the earliest Christian Gospel, is proved not by personal experience but by practical morality, a compassionate spirit, and obedience to the inner law—this inner law being objectified in Jesus Christ when He is known (Mt 25¹⁴⁻⁴⁵). The proper use of talents, helpfulness, mercifulness, prayerfulness, and love for brother man—these are the marks of a Christian. To be humble and self-forgetful, to care for the poor, and the sick, and the sinful—this is to 'inherit the kingdom' (Mt 6¹⁴). A man may be a member of Christ's Kingdom even though he has not consciously been serving Him (Mt 25³⁷⁻³⁹). He who forgives shall be forgiven (Mt 6¹⁴). To be a Christian is not to 'accept the word with joy,' but to live, bearing fruit (Mt 13²⁰⁻²³, Lk 8¹³). In Mk. it is not even remembered that Jesus ever promised 'joy,' or 'peace,' or 'rest.' These words do not meet us in this earliest Gospel. Jesus was the sole object of thought. How a disciple felt was of too little importance to be noticed. In Mt. the transforming principle is the word spoken by Jesus, and the result is 'rest' (e.g. 7²⁸ 11²⁹ 13²⁸). In Jn. the transforming principle is Jesus, who is 'the Word' and 'the Life,' and the result is 'peace' (3⁴ 6³³ 14²⁷ 17⁵). With St. Paul the transforming principle is the Holy Ghost applying the redemption purchased by the blood of the cross, and the result is 'joy' and 'glory.' In the Synoptics the command is 'Come,' and if you endure to the end you 'shall be saved.' In Jn. the command is 'Believe,' and he that believeth 'hath everlasting life.' With St. Paul the central interrogation is, 'Have you received the Holy Ghost?'—if so, you 'have been saved' (cf. Eph 2⁵). In the Synoptics it is following Jesus that is emphasized; in Jn. it is being one with Jesus; in St. Paul's letters it is being united with Him in His death. In the Synoptics salvation is educational; in Jn. it is biological; in St. Paul's letters it is sacrificial. The first type of thought emphasized the fact of salvation, the second its psychology, the third its philosophy. In their deepest meaning these three are one; but they represent three types of Christian thought, from which resulted three types of Christian doctrine and Christian experience. Each type finds its root in the Gospel teaching; but the appeal to the 'inner witness,' the making prominent of Christian experience, and the rise of what may be called the emotional type of Christianity, are all post-Pentecostal developments. So long as Jesus remained with them, the disciples did not think it worth while to talk of themselves, or notice their own inward emotions or mental experiences. But Jesus left them, and in utter loneliness and sorrow they stood gazing into the heavens which had received Him. But at Pentecost they began to awaken to the fact that He was still alive, still near them, still able to talk with them, and make their hearts burn as He talked. Then their eyes were turned within, and Christian experience began to be of vital theological importance. It was the new Christian thought of the Holy Ghost which gave birth both to the Johannine and to the Pauline theologies and experiences. The Holy Spirit represented Christ in the believer's heart. It spake with the authority of God Himself, and in the very accents of the One now gone. Christ was with them again. He had promised to come, and to abide with them always (Jn 6⁵⁶ 14¹⁸). He had kept His promise. The Word was again incarnate, and was in each one of them. The believer's flesh was His flesh (cf. Eph 5³⁰, and especially the startling words of 2 Co 3¹⁷ ὁ δὲ κίριος τὸ πνεῦμά ἐστιν). This discovery, that it was the Lord Jesus Himself who was speaking within them in the Person of the Holy Ghost, brought the experiences of the soul into new importance. It was this consciousness of the indwelling Christ which filled the hearts of the early Christians with joy, and made them a wonder to the heathen world. Typical Christian experience did not begin until Pentecost (Jn 7³⁹, Ac 2¹⁷ 19²); yet the Synoptic Gospels contain all the roots of the beautiful rod which budded in those later ecstatic experiences. Although, when a sinner repented and was forgiven, it was only the joy of God and the angels which the Synoptics thought important enough to mention (Lk 15^{7, 10}), incidentally we learn that the return to God brings a kiss to the soul and a song to the lips (Lk 15^{20, 24}). It was a home-coming. There can be no doubt that 'praising God,' and 'gladness of heart,' and an exhilaration which was like the exhilaration of wine, were characteristic of the earliest Christian experiences (Ac 2^{15, 46, 47}). Every later Apostolic experience, however jubilant, appears prophetically in Jn. (e.g. 4³⁰ 15¹¹ 16^{20, 22, 24} 17¹³).

8. Range and content of Christian experience.

—No part of human nature is excluded from the influence of saving grace. Schleiermacher centred religion in the feelings, Hegel in the intellect, Kant in the will; but Jesus Christ centred it in the man. The Torah of Jesus brought into loftiest prominence the fact that all man's faculties of sensibility, intellect, and volition must be brought to focus in the act and state of loving self-surrender to God (Mk 12³⁰). Christian experience, as depicted in the NT, includes a new intellectual vision, a radical shifting of the emotional centre, and a rectification and strengthening of the will.

The first step in a typical Christian experience is the recognition of a new horror in sin. Sin is a more hateful and deadly thing to the Christian than to the Hebrew or the Babylonian. It is not only an epidemic universal and fatal (Jn 1²⁹), a blood-poisoning (9⁴¹ 15^{22, 24}), worse than a lifelong paralysis (5¹⁴), which may be eternal (Mk 3²⁹), a slavery (Jn 8³⁴), and an insanity (Lk 15¹⁷); it is ungrateful (16⁶), traitorous (Mk 22⁵), unfilial (Lk 15¹¹); the assassination of one's higher self (9²⁵), and a fratricidal blow at Jesus Christ (Mt 21³⁸, Lk 9²²). The cross shows God's thought of sin, and those who have seen the cross get a totally new view of the guilt of sin. Jesus can never be seen as a Saviour, in the Gospel sense, until a man sees himself to be a lost sinner having no hope of help except from God (Lk 7⁴² 15⁴⁻³² 19¹⁰). It is no sign of 'healthy-mindedness' to feel no terror of sin. The 'neurotic state' is not one of keen sorrow for sin, but a state of hardness and callousness (e.g. Lk 15¹⁷, cf. Eph 2¹). Repentance is not a 'pathological condition of melancholia,' which is to be avoided; it is the sinner's only hope. It is the goodness of God which leadeth him to repentance. To be 'pricked to the heart' when one faces the cross is characteristic of a genuine Christian experience. When one reaches a state where he cannot feel these sharp goads of pain, then even God Himself cannot help him (Mt 12^{31, 41}, cf. He 6⁶). Sackcloth and ashes are the appropriate clothing for the penitent (Mt 11²¹). Yet it is not the emotional drapery, but the decisive action of the soul away from the wrong and towards the right (i.e. Christ) which is made emphatic (Jn 14⁶). The first call is to repentance (Mk 1¹⁵). This is the first thing commanded, for it is the first possible active effort of the man co-operating with the constant effort of God—without whom he could neither will nor act aright—in his own salvation. It is the first active human preliminary to a conscious Christian experience. It is a radical change of mind (μετανοέω), involving a radical change of front (ἐπιστρέφω). The response of the will to revealed duty is the 'Yea' or 'Nay' to God's call. With the 'Yea' his eyes open, and he gets new vision. Sin can shut out even the sight of God and blind the soul to the difference between good and evil (Mt 12²⁴). Purity of intent and purpose cleanses the lens of the intellectual telescope so that one can see God; and when one sees God, many other things previously obscured become visible (Jn 4²³ 5⁴⁰).

Saving faith, according to the Gospels, centres in Christ. It is not faith in one's self or in one's own salvation, present, past, or future; it is a loyal surrender to Him who represents the soul's highest ideal of right, as Lord. Having accepted Him as Lord, the soul then finds Him to be Saviour (Jn 5²³⁻²⁴). In the Synoptics the words πίστις, πιστεύω do not mean as much as with St. John and St. Paul, because the words 'Christ' and 'Saviour' did not mean as much; but in every case the surrender is to Jesus up to the level of all the light received. Whosoever 'wills to do his will' shall know at least this, that Jesus can be trusted (7¹⁷, cf. 9³⁶). The testimonies to conscious personal trust in Jesus Christ as the supreme standard of right and the never-failing and ever-present Helper of all sin-sick souls, fill every page of the NT. The result of the exercise of faith is not infrequently a change of opinion and judgment; it is always a change of affection and volitional relation to God. The man's whole nature changes. Jn. states this by the strongest possible figure—that of a second birth (3¹⁰); but the Synoptics hint prophetically at the same thing. The man must make a new beginning, as radical as if he had become a child again (Mt 5⁴⁵ 18³, cf. Mk 10¹⁵). A new seed of personality must be planted within him (Lk 8⁴⁻¹⁵ 17²¹). There must be a change of the life passion (Mt 6²⁵ 10³⁹). New-born thoughts and feelings and powers must develop until the vital functions are practically reversed (Mk 8³⁵ 12³⁰⁻³⁵, Mt 5³⁻¹⁰ 16²⁵, Lk 17³⁵).

St. Paul constantly dwells upon this. The new life which one consciously obtains through faith in Jesus Christ is likened to that which would be needed in quickening a corpse or bringing about a resurrection from the dead (1 Co 15²², Col 2¹³, Eph 2⁵). The man obtains a new self, as if he had been re-created (2 Co 5¹⁷). Christ has started a new race, as truly as did Adam (1 Co 15²²⁻⁴⁵), and the result is a new manhood, a new humanity (τὸν καινὸν [τὸν νῦν] ἄνθρωπον, Eph 4²⁴, Col 3¹⁰), governed by a new law of life.

All the Gospel writers mention, though incidentally or prophetically, the liberty and the new strength and courage to will and to do the right which come with trust in Jesus, as well as the new and glad sense of love for both man and God (e.g. Mk 12³⁰⁻³¹, Mt 11³⁰ 25⁴⁰, Lk 6³² 11²¹⁻²², Jn 8³⁶). One is not merely conscious of his own sincerity; he can testify that a Father's welcome has been given him, and that Christ has 'manifested' Himself to him (Lk 15²⁰, Jn 14²¹). Perhaps the Gospel doctrine most fully developed in the later writings of the NT is that of spiritual unity with Christ, through self-surrender to become one with Him. This doctrine is found in germ in every Gospel, but comes to complete flower in the profound teachings of St. John. Unity with Christ does not, however, mean identity. The disciple may be perfectly like his Lord, but magnitudes differ. The best experience has in it a good hope of a better experience. Unity with the Divine does not make man a god, but splendidly and fully human. The Ego not only finds peace when it turns to God, but finds itself (Mt 10³⁹ 15¹⁶⁻²⁵, Lk 15¹⁶⁻¹⁷). Progress is now possible. The man can now 'win' his own soul (Lk 21¹⁹). Jesus lifts life out of the 'tragedy of the commonplace' by offering to it a perfect ideal and the highest possible impulse to reach it. This guarantees never-ending development. He who takes the Perfect for his ideal, and strives for an experience to match his vision, must have grace and more grace, life and more life (Jn 1¹⁶ 10¹⁰).

RENDING OF GARMENTS.—The practice of signifying grief by tearing the clothes. There were four occasions on which rending of garments was enjoined by the Jewish Law: (1) death; (2) the apostasy of a member of the family; (3) the destruction, during persecution, of a copy of the Law; (4) blasphemy. In the case of a member of the family becoming apostate the clothes were rent as for his death, and the mourners sat for one hour on the ground and ate bread and ashes. The לכות קריעה (Laws of Rending) are very minute, and embrace no fewer than thirty-nine rules. For the dead the rending was to be performed just before the body was finally hid from view, and it was to be done standing. Both sexes were ordered to rend the clothes 'to the heart,' i.e. to the skin, but in supposed obedience to Jl 2¹³ it was to be 'no farther than the navel.' For father or mother all the garments were rent till the breast was exposed, but a woman was enjoined to rend her under garment in private, and to wear it reversed. This was for the sake of decorum, and the outer garment was then rent in public without her skin being exposed. For other relations (brothers and sisters) the outer garment only was rent. For father and mother the rent was over the heart, but in the case of others on the right side. The rent garment was worn for thirty days. The rent was ordered to be of the size of a fist (כפף). It was not to be repaired in the case of mourning for parents till the time of mourning was past, but for others it might be loosely drawn together, leaving a ragged tear, after seven days, and properly repaired after thirty days. A woman, however, might in all cases repair after seven days. The rending of clothes was not to take place on the Sabbath, but if it were done on that day in excess of grief, it was excusable on account of the piety it betokened. No rending of garments was obligatory unless news of the death were received within thirty days, except in the case of the death of parents.

The action of Caiaphas (Mt 26⁶⁵, Mk 14⁶³) is an instance of the rending of garments for blasphemy. In this case the high priest was enjoined to rend 'both his outer and his inner garments with a rent that could never be repaired.'

RENUNCIATION.—Ideas of renunciation in the teaching of Jesus may be classed under three heads: (1) renunciation of what is sinful, (2) surrender of worldly possessions, (3) special self-abnegation. It may not be possible to draw clear lines of demarcation, but these divisions are nevertheless distinct. The cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches and the lusts of other things (Mk 4¹⁹), that check the life of the soul as weeds choke the growth of the grain, may be said to indicate them in the reverse order.

1. Sin, of course, is to be renounced without qualification or compromise; and whatsoever leads to sin. The 'thou shalt not' of the Decalogue is carried into the inner sphere with an extent and thoroughness of application not known to the law-givers of the world. 'We have renounced,' says St. Paul, 'the hidden things of dishonesty' (2 Co 4²). But Christ's commands go farther. 'If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out' (Mt 5^{29, 30} 18^{3, 9}). These laws require not only the renunciation of whatever desire, impulse, aim, or intention is contrary to the will of God, but also of things innocent that might tend to 'lead into temptation'; the renunciation of that trebly manifested evil (1 Jn 2¹⁶) by which the world is placed in antagonism to the Father.

2. Renunciation in its bearing on temporal possessions is expounded in the address that followed the rebuke of covetousness (Lk 12¹³⁻³⁴, Mt 6¹⁹⁻³⁴). Here Jesus emphasizes the distinction of the inward and the outward, the primary and the subordinate, the essential and the accidental. The life is a far greater thing than the material means of sustenance, the body by which we live is much more important than its protecting garment. 'A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.' If what is primary and essential is made secure, what is secondary will follow as a matter of course. The error of the Gentiles is that they devote themselves to the secondary and neglect the fundamental. Men feed the outward life and starve the soul, or they adorn the body and disregard its real dignity. They store up wealth, but are not 'rich toward God.' But 'treasure in heaven' is the true riches. The spiritual is supreme. Our prayer should be for 'daily bread' or the satisfaction of necessary requirements. We should seek the Kingdom of God, in the assurance that temporal matters will find adjustment according to providential law.

3. Special self-abnegation has its clearest statement in Mt 19¹². Whether that passage is literal or figurative is immaterial. The value is in the principle. The duty of abandoning good may be laid on men of hesitating disposition who need to be untrammelled, or on special ministers such as the disciples, who forsook all and followed their Master that they might give undivided effort to the preaching of the gospel. The things surrendered may be possessions, kindred, or even life (Lk 18²⁹). An important lesson on the subject is found in the interview of the rich ruler with Jesus (Lk 18¹⁸ etc.). This man was outwardly perfect, yet conscious of imperfection. He had rank, position, wealth, manners, and he had kept the Law. Jesus called on him to surrender his property and become a disciple. The first reflexion here is that formal is not real excellence; that not the outward life only, but the heart, and soul, and spirit are to be judged. Hence it is that not the righteousness of the Law, but the righteousness by faith is the hope of the Christian. With this youth may be contrasted his contemporary St. Paul, who attained to the mind of Christ, and for the sake of the higher life counted all things but loss. The second reflexion (which is virtually the same) is the ethical principle that benevolence precedes prudence, that the cause of the community is prior to that of the individual. The command to 'sell . . . and give to the poor' was the form adapted to the individual case in which the principle of renunciation was expressed in the shape of social duty. In a religion which begins with the requirement of repentance and renovation of life, and which in all aspects exalts the spiritual, subordinating the temporal and earthly, nothing is more fitting than the childlike spirit; the graces of humility, meekness, and gentleness belong to the new conception of the beautiful; while the strain of public duty requires the propelling motive of philanthropy and the ready acceptance of self-sacrifice. But renunciation is not without reward. The individual is one in a large family of brethren, and his own good is promoted by the health of the community. He who subordinates the self-regarding virtues to the altruistic, who abandons rights and possessions while he cherishes the love of God and of man, will find even in this life 'manifold more.' Sharing the life of others, he will receive from them more than he gives. By the frustration of false developments the basis of his personal life is strengthened; and by fellowship and service his life becomes richer, nobler, more blessed. Thus is realized the paradox (Mk 8³⁵) that the Christian loses his life to save it. The dethronement of self is the beginning of moral victory and power. The path of renouncement leads to spiritual wealth.

These principles derive strength from a study of Christ's own life. The Son of Man had no possessions, no fixed abode. He toiled for the relief of the suffering. The project of kingship He recognized as the temptation of Satan. He saved others—He could not save Himself. The model life was at all points a life of renunciation; a life, too, of uncomplaining endurance of wrong. But from the date when the cross came distinctly into view, renunciation was inculcated as a necessary condition of membership in His community. 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross' (Mt 16²⁴ etc.). Victory through cross-bearing, life through death, became the final maxims of duty. And the disciples were required at once to behold the career of their Master, and to be prepared to undergo a similar experience. The principle of renunciation took the form of a courageous facing of difficulties, a steadfast endurance of ills, a heroic encountering of persecution, and a submission even unto death. Perhaps the typical Christian is St. Paul. To him crucifixion is the image of his relation to established society. 'The world is crucified to me and I to the world' (Gal 6¹⁴). For Christians in general his language is more restricted but not substantially different: 'they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh' (Gal 5²⁴). But, nevertheless, his tones are triumphant: 'all things are yours' (1 Co 3²²). The cross is the centre of history, and cross-bearing is the soul of virtue; and the afflicted are 'more than conquerors' (Ro 8³⁷).

The law of Renunciation has been repeatedly restated in modern literature. 'Die and re-exist' was a maxim of Goethe. Self-renouncement was expounded by Matthew Arnold (Lit. and Dogma) as the secret of Jesus. 'Die to live' is a principle of Hegelianism. This latter axiom has been expounded by Dr. E. Caird (Hegel, ad fin. ; Evolution of Religion, ii. 6-8) as the fundamental principle of a universal ethic. According to this authority, it is a law of the spiritual world, as contra-distinguished from the natural, that self-realization is to be attained by self-sacrifice. The theorem 'die to live' involves on the one hand absolute surrender of self and of every good to the Father of spirits, and on the other hand restoration in another form through the possession of an enlarged life filled with deeper and wider interests. The sacrifice of selfishness proves the birth of the true self, the individual deriving from the universal the good for which it exists. The death of Christ was no accidental phenomenon, but the highest revelation of the Divine in conflict with the world's evil. The surrender of a life as a sacrifice to a cause tends to give a universal value to the life so sacrificed. This, of course, does not differentiate the death of Christ from ordinary martyrdom; but we may agree with Caird that paramount moral doctrine must accord both with the lessons of history and with the highest reason of a universal spiritual philosophy. By such tests we distinguish the true from the false renunciation, and arrive at a clearer comprehension of the Divine intuition of Jesus.

On the other side, the reverse doctrine, that self-assertion is the essence of sin, has been rightly accepted as a fundamental truth of the moral sphere. The term so used includes the exaltation of the lower nature over the higher, and the placing of the individual or particular before the social or universal. This principle denies equality of right, repudiates the primary law of love, and treats with scorn the consciences of men. Its essential manifestation is in the lust of power and pride of life, though every other selfish gratification may be included. In mediæval ideas pride held the dark pre-eminence, and conceptions of Satan were formed therefrom. But in modern times, and especially since Milton, the historic view is modified. In the career of the master-fiend whose history is the history of evil (as that career is in Paradise Lost portrayed for all time), it is 'pride and, worse, ambition' that rule. True it is that down the Christian ages, and even within the Church, self-assertion has been as prominent (though not so abundant) as self-denial. But it is equally true that where such egotism has flourished spiritual life has died. See, further, art. SELFISHNESS.

REPENTANCE.—In Christ's own life repentance has no place. The four Gospels contain no expression, direct or incidental, of any feeling of penitence or of regret for anything He ever did or left undone, for anything He ever said or left unsaid. He never prays for forgiveness. He never knows of a time when He was not in peace and harmony with God; He never speaks of coming into peace and harmony with God. Though He teaches insistently that all others must repent and become sons, and even then must pray for the forgiveness of their sins, yet He Himself knows nothing but that He is the Son of His Heavenly Father, and He never loses by any act the consciousness of the Father's approval. See, further, art. SINLESSNESS.

1. Christ's teaching on repentance.—In the teaching of Jesus the fundamental category was the Kingdom of God (βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ), i.e. the spiritual rule of God in the heart of a man or in the hearts of men. This βασιλεία simply means God's authority established, God exercising His will and having His way, whether it be in a single human soul, or in a Church, or in a Christian community (as in the primitive Church of Pentecost), or in the Church universal, or in the world. God's Kingdom has come, that is, His rule is established, when and where His will is done as it is supposed to be done 'in heaven,' that is, ideally, whether that be in a single heart or 'on (the whole) earth.'

This enables us to understand why Jesus has so much to say about righteousness. Righteousness was another name for the fulfilling of the will of God; it was doing what God wanted done; it was the realizing of the rule of God. Hence men were called on to repent and become righteous. Repentance, as conceived and taught by Jesus, meant a change of the whole life, so as to subject it and to conform it to God, a radical and complete revolution of one's view of God and attitude toward God. This involved a change of the whole of life in its inlook as well as in its outlook; a change, in short, of one's self, one's motives, aims, pursuits.

Jesus' primary thought was of a change to. For His starting-point was God. Hence the burden of His message was God and righteousness. But this implies that there was something to change from. Men were to free their mind from one thing and to fix it on another. They were to exchange one habitual, fixed state of mind for another—for its opposite, namely, for one that recognized, preferred, hungered after and sought for righteousness as the fulfilment of the will of God, as the realization of the rule (Kingdom) of God.

What was it then that they were to change from? Naturally it was from that which was the opposite of righteousness, that which refuses the rule of God and excludes Him from life. In other words, it was from sin. In turning to God it was necessary, in the nature of the case, to turn from that which is opposed to God, from that state of mind which loves, chooses, enjoys sin, which is permeated and dominated by sin, and which brings about the inevitable consequence of living in the practice of sin. So that, while Jesus had much to say about righteousness, He had much to say, and inevitably, about sin. We are now better prepared to understand what He meant when He called on people to repent. Popularly, repentance is understood to be a sense of regret and self-abasement, looking to the forgiveness of the wrong-doings of the past. This is one part of repentance, but it is the least part. Sin lies deeper than the act. It is in the unrenewed, perverse nature behind the act. So repentance goes deeper than the act. Sin has its root in the inherent condition of man's nature; repentance contemplates a change in this condition. And until this change is effected, sin will inevitably continue to rule. Repentance then, while it is a sense of regret and sorrow for the wrong-doings of the past, is far more. It is an agonizing desire, leading to an agonizing and persistent effort, to realize such a radical change in the state of the mind as will secure and ensure against wrong-doing in the future. Born of a realization, more or less clear and pungent, of our natural sinward tendency and of our hopeless inability to correct it or control it, it impels us to desire above all things and to seek before all things that change of mind and moral condition which will not only lead us to choose righteousness, but also enable us triumphantly to realize righteousness. Repentance goes to the root of the matter. The very word goes to the root of it. For what is μετάνοια but a 'change of mind'? That this was the meaning of the word in the thought and intent of Jesus, the whole drift of His teaching implies. But it is specifically shown in those sayings of His which reveal His view of the inherent sinfulness of human nature: 'If ye being evil' (πονηροὶ ὄντες, Mt 7¹¹); 'a corrupt tree cannot (οὐ δύναται, v. 18) bring forth good fruit'; and that terse statement of the whole situation which in one epigrammatic sentence sums up all that St. Paul says in the seventh and eighth chapters of Romans: 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit' (Jn 3⁶). It is what St. Paul calls 'the mind of the flesh,' and as good as calls the mind of sin (see Ro 7^{17, 20}).

Repentance, as used in the Synoptic Gospels, covers, as a rule, the whole process of turning from sin to God (as in Lk 24⁴⁷). So that in the broad, comprehensive sense of the Synoptics, it includes faith, which is a part of the process, the last step of it. It is so used also in the discourses of the early chapters of the Book of Acts. There the comprehensive condition of admission to the brotherhood of believers and of participation in the life of the Spirit is repentance (Ac 2³⁸ 3¹⁹ 5³¹). Faith is not mentioned, though, in the nature of the case, it is included.

In the Fourth Gospel the reverse is the case. There faith is the condition of salvation (Jn 3¹⁵. 16. 36). But while repentance is not specifically mentioned, it is included in the notion of faith. Faith is the trustful commitment of one's self to God for forgiveness of sins, and deliverance from sin; but it is psychologically impossible to commit one's self thus to God without renouncing and turning away from all that is contrary to God. And this impossibility is expressed or implied in the discourses of the Fourth Gospel. For they clearly set forth the moral conditionality of faith. A man cannot exercise faith whose heart is not right, whose moral condition and attitude of will are opposed to the right (5⁴⁴). And this moral conditionality of faith is exactly what is meant by repentance, in its narrower sense. Faith is the condition of entrance into the experience of salvation, the enjoyment of eternal life; but repentance is the psychological and moral condition of faith. As eternal life is unattainable without faith, faith is unattainable without repentance.

But Jesus was a preacher, not a theologian. Consequently His call to repentance is, as a rule, in the form of those exquisite parables that speak to the heart. Such is the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18⁹⁻¹⁴), and that of the Prodigal Son (15¹¹⁻²⁴). The latter of these is the truest, the humanest, and the tenderest picture of repentance to be found in the Bible. The essential elements in the repentance of the Prodigal are (1) a realization of his desperate condition: 'He came to himself'; (2) a definite mental determination to reverse his course and retrace his steps at any risk: 'I will arise and go to my father'; (3) the decisive act of breaking away from his surroundings and going straight into the presence of his much wronged father: 'He arose and came to his father'; (4) his absolute, abject, self-effacing humility: 'I am no more worthy to be called a son of thine; make me as a servant'; (5) his open, outspoken, unreserved, unqualified confession: 'I have sinned to the very heaven, and my sin is against thee, O thou best of fathers.'

2. How Christ leads men to repentance.—If repentance means what we have seen, namely, the change from the self-centred life to the God-centred life, then Jesus is the author and inspiration of repentance. No other was ever able to reach down deep enough into human nature to effect this change. And He does it (1) by means of the revelation which He gives of the beauty and blessedness of righteousness in contrast with the ugliness and wretchedness of sin. This revelation makes one 'hunger and thirst after righteousness.' (2) By means of the revelation which He has given of God and the Fatherly compassion of God toward alienated and sinning men. (3) By means of the surpassing and compelling exhibition of His own love in renouncing self and enduring such suffering as He did for the reconciliation and redemption of men. (4) By working in man through His Spirit that sorrow for sin and hatred of sin which lead men to renounce it and to turn away from it, seeking forgiveness and deliverance. (5) By holding out to men and giving to men the power to forsake sin and to overcome the tendency to sin. (6) Through the convincing effect of examples of that moral transformation which He is continually working in men and women of all sorts and conditions. In short, the history of Christianity in the past and the Christendom of the present both form a solid commentary of fact on the pregnant and potent words of St. Peter: 'Him hath God exalted as Prince and Saviour, to give repentance and forgiveness of sins' (Ac 5³¹).

REPETITIONS.—The word 'repetitions' is found in the Gospels only in the phrase 'vain repetitions' in Mt 6⁷ 'When ye pray (RV 'in praying'), use not vain repetitions, as the heathen (RV 'the Gentiles') do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking.' The original word (βατταλογέω, written by modern scholars with a in the second syllable, after NB) seems to be unknown to classical Greek, occurring only in the comment of Simplicius on Epictetus (c. 530 A.D.), and in Christian literature influenced by the Gospels.

Its origin has been explained in three ways: (1) as a word related to βατταρίζω, and derived from Battus (Βάττος), the name of a Libyan stammerer said to be associated with the early history of Cyrene, or a wordy poet; (2) as an onomatopoeic word imitating the utterance of a stammerer (Grimm, H. Holtzmann, Meyer); (3) as a hybrid composed of a Semitic element—New Hebrew batál, Aram. b'tal, 'to be idle,' 'vain,' 'worthless,' represented in modern Arabic by batál, a term of contempt (ExpT xii. 60), and λεγίω. The last derivation, which may have been in the minds of some of the Syriac translators (Syr^{sc} and Pal. Lect.), has the powerful support of Blass (ExpT xii. 60), and apparently of Zahn. It is not wholly new, for some earlier scholars regarded the word as a hybrid, but found a different Semitic element. Zahn suggests that it was coined by Greek-speaking Semites, who, in writing the word with rr, thought of βατταρίζω, and wished to connect their new formation with it. This ingenious explanation is not absolutely certain, but may be safely pronounced more probable than the first, and is, on the whole, preferable to the second.

The meaning of the word, or at least part of the meaning, is suggested by πολυλογία in the latter part of the verse. What our Lord condemns is clearly verbosity, the unthinking use of many words, and perhaps also the formal, careless use of expressions which are in themselves appropriate. The reference to Gentile errors in this respect is well illustrated by the cry of the priests of Baal on Carmel (1 K 18²⁶), and the shout of the Ephesian mob, kept up for more than an hour (Ac 19⁴). Additional illustrations are supplied by Hindu practice (Ward, cited by Rosenmüller, Das alte und neue Morgenland, v. 38 f.) and Tibetan Buddhism (Rhys Davids, Buddhism, 209 f.). For an Egyptian condemnation of the practice, see ExpT vi. 537. That the later Jews were liable to wordiness in prayer might be inferred from the Lord's warnings, and is put beyond doubt by a number of passages in the Talmud. It is noted with approval (Berakh. 32b) that the righteous of an earlier age used to devote three hours a day to prayer and six hours to waiting, an hour before and an hour after each hour of prayer. R. Meir (of 2nd cent. A.D.) is reported to have said that a man ought to utter a hundred benedictions in a day (Menahoth, 43b). R. Shimeon ben Nathanael, one of the disciples of R. Jochanan ben Zakai, warned his hearers against formalism: 'When thou prayest, make not thy prayer an ordinance, but an entreaty before God' (Abóth, ii. 17, ed. Taylor). The threefold repetition of the 'Eighteen Blessings,' a custom the germ of which may have begun to develop in our Lord's day, was of itself calculated to encourage formal repetition. Some of the Rabbis recognized the peril and tried to check the tendency. An instance of verbosity which elicited a rebuke from a Rabbi is given in Berakh. 33b, 'O God, great, mighty, awful, glorious, strong, terrible,' etc. Vain repetitions are still in favour in the East, in Islam and its sects (Robinson Lees, *Village Life in Palestine*², pp. 48, 51 f.; John P. Brown, Dervishes, p. 57).

REPOSE.—1. It seems superfluous to labour (e.g. as Liddon, Bampton Lecture, p. 20; Edersheim, LT i. 599 f.) the point that Jesus needed repose, bodily rest, relaxation, as witnessing to His real human nature. This feature of His experience, along with others, appears as a quite simple and natural thing in the picture of the Prophet of Nazareth as presented by the primitive Evangelical tradition. The Synoptics repeatedly speak of the crowds that gathered about Jesus in the course of His work. The brief story is full of movement, press, and popular excitement. Withdrawal from time to time for rest and prayer was simply imperative. Mark conspicuously calls attention (as in 6³¹ δευτε . . . κ. ἀναπαύσασθε ὀλίγον) to the various occasions when Jesus sought escape and relief from the crush. The Fourth Gospel, too, for all its peculiar portrayal of Jesus, accords with the Synoptics in this description of His ministry: see especially the mention of popular excitement in Jerusalem and elsewhere in chs. 6, 7 and 10. Nor must we overlook in another connexion the homely picture of Jesus resting, tired out with His journey, given in Jn 4⁶. This in a way matches the memorable picture found in the threefold Synoptic narrative, in which the Master beats a speedy retreat after one busy and exhausting day, and sleeps like a child through the storm (Mk 4³⁵⁻³⁸ ||). At the same time it is to be noted that undoubtedly Jesus sought by such withdrawals from public life not only repose and relief, but also opportunities for the special instruction of the Twelve. As particular instances of this, Mk 3¹³ and 7²⁴⁻³⁷ may be cited (see Bruce, art. 'Jesus,' § 11, in EBi, vol. ii.).

2. Repose of spirit as a trait in the character of Jesus abundantly appears in the Gospels. If in doing the works of Him that sent Him (Jn 9⁴) He often seems 'ohne Rast,' He is always in manner and spirit 'ohne Hast.' Suppliants for His help in healing the sick are often frantic in their appeals; He in responding ever displays composure and deliberation. Contrast, e.g., the entreaties of Jairus (Mk 5^{22f.}) and the calmness of the whole attitude of Jesus (v. 36); the quiet response, 'I will come and heal him' (Mt 8⁷), and the hurried, eager request of the Roman captain on behalf of his servant. These are typical instances. John presents the same feature in the description of our Lord's behaviour on hearing of the sickness of Lazarus (ch. 11). The paroxysm of grief which shakes Him when He comes to His friend's grave (vv. 33-38) only throws into relief the normal composure which recovers itself in v. 41¹. Such, too, is the relation of Gethsemane's agony to the calm dignity which shows itself through all the rest of the Via Dolorosa. It is also a characteristic of the teaching of Jesus that there is an entire absence of the impatience, fuss, and strain which so often characterize the schemes of social and religious work launched by His well-meaning followers. With all the zeal and diligence that His sayings lay stress on, He always speaks with the accent of one who can afford to wait. It is not a mere matter of chance that serenity sits on the face of the Lord, as He is represented in the unbroken tradition of Christian art.

3. In the well-known passage Mt 11²⁸⁻³⁰ Jesus offers the gift of repose (ἀνάπαυσις, EV rest) to those who will learn of Him. It is true, ἀνάπαυσις strictly speaking denotes relief from labour, a break to afford rest to tired toilers (see Trench, NT Synonyms, § 41); and it seems also to imply the resumption of labour. The words of Jesus, however, teach that to take His yoke and bear His burden, to live and serve as He teaches and as He lived and served Himself, will itself be ἀνάπαυσις as compared with other modes of living and serving, the yoke of which is never to be resumed. 'A Christi corde manat quies in animas nostras' (Bengel, in loc.). Tranquillity of soul, then, is a promised accompaniment of true Christian discipleship. A temper eagerly cultivated by Stoics (Æquanimitas was the last watchword given by Antoninus Pius to his bodyguard) is also a precious Christian grace.

'Drop Thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease:
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace.' (Whittier).

J. S. CLEMENS.

REPROACH.—The word is found in EV as a rendering of four Gr. terms that either occur in the Gospels or are used in the NT with reference to Christ Himself—the nouns δνειδος, δνειδισμός, and the vbs. δνειδίζω, ὕβριζω. δνειδος = 'shame,' as the ground of reproach (whereas δνειδισμός is the actual reproaching), is found only in Lk 1²⁵ (of Elisabeth's barrenness). ὕβριζω is once rendered 'reproach' (11⁴⁶), but properly means to 'insult,' δνειδισμός and δνειδίζω are the terms with which we are specially concerned. The subject comes before us in three forms: (1) reproach as uttered by Christ; (2) reproach as borne by Him; (3) reproach as falling upon His people.

1. As uttered by Christ.—The language of rebuke (ἐπιτιμῶν) is several times ascribed to Jesus (see art. REBUKE), but seldom the language of reproach. When we distinguish between the two, the difference seems to be that rebuke denotes the simple censure of a fault, while reproach carries with it some emphasis upon the personal shame (δνειδος) attaching to it. And so it seems to be part of the method of Jesus, as understood by the Evangelists, to point out faults rather than to fasten the stigma of disgrace upon the culprit; He was more anxious to effect improvement than to inflict punishment—His eyes being ever towards the future rather than towards the past (cf. 'Neither do I condemn thee: go thy way; from henceforth sin no more,' in the Pericope Adulteræ, Jn 8¹¹). Once in EV (Lk 11⁴⁶) the word 'reproach' is used with reference to our Lord's utterances, but there by a misrendering; for the Gr. vb. is ὕβριζω, which means to 'insult,' not to reproach. But the Evangelist, it is to be noted, does not say that Jesus insulted any one; it is 'one of the lawyers' who accuses Him of insulting the legal class. It was not our Lord's way, however, to insult people, even though they were His enemies; and, on examination, the charge of this lawyer serves only to illustrate the tendency of offended pride to regard a declaration of the honest truth as a ground of personal offence.

Only on two occasions is the vb. δνειδίζω employed to describe the language of Jesus, and both times AV renders 'upbraid,' which RV rather inconsistently retains. In Mt 11²⁰ Jesus reproaches the cities in which most of His mighty works were done, because they repented not; and in the Appendix to Mk. (16¹⁴) He reproaches the Eleven for their slowness to receive the testimony of His resurrection. These cases suggest that Jesus did not hesitate to add reproach to rebuke when He thought it deserved. Capernaum was 'his own city' (Mt 9¹, cf. 4¹³); Chorazin and Bethsaida had shared with it in the fullest manifestations of His power and grace. The men whom He is said to have reproached for their unbelief and hardness of heart were those whom He had specially chosen to be the depositaries and messengers of His gospel, and whom He had trained through long months for this very purpose, lavishing upon them all the wealth of His Divine treasures of knowledge and love. No wonder that in these cases the censure of Jesus became reproachful. And indeed His reproach was more frequent than we might gather from the occurrence of the word in the Gospel narratives, and was most frequent when He was dealing with those of whom, loving them the best, He expected the most. Was He not speaking reproachfully when He said, 'How is it that ye do not understand?' (Mt 16¹¹); 'How long shall I be with you? how long shall I bear with you?' (17¹⁷); 'Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip?' (Jn 14⁹). Was there not a more piercing reproach in His voice when He said to the traitor, 'Judas, with a kiss dost thou betray the Son of Man?' (Lk 22⁴⁸); and in His eyes when, as the cock crew, He turned and looked upon Peter (vv. 60, 61)?

2. Reproach as borne by Christ.—So far as the term is concerned, it is only by the two robbers who were crucified along with Him that our Lord is said to have been reproached (ὀνειδίζω, Mt 27⁴⁴, Mk 15³²; see RV). This reproach by the robbers belongs to the general subject of the reviling of Jesus Christ in connexion with His trial and crucifixion, for which see art. MOCKERY.

In the Epistles the word 'reproach' receives a much wider meaning, as denoting generally the shame and contempt, the hardships and suffering which Christ endured in the days of His flesh. In Ro 15³ St. Paul exhorts Christians to a life of unselfish consideration for others by pointing to the example of the Master, and quotes in this connexion the exact words of the LXX tr. of Ps 69⁹ (68¹⁰) 'The reproaches of them that reproached (οἱ ὀνειδισμοὶ τῶν ὀνειδίζόντων) thee fell upon me.' The Psalm describes the sufferings of the righteous man at the hands of the ungodly, and the verse quoted represents him as telling how he has to bear the reproaches directed against God Himself. The Apostle, however, transfers the words to Christ, and makes them describe how He bore the burden of reproach for others, and so serve to give point to an exhortation against self-pleasing.

In two passages the author of Hebrews uses the expression 'the reproach (ὀνειδισμὸς) of Christ,' or 'his reproach,' to denote the earthly shame and sorrow of Jesus. In the first case (11²⁶), Moses is described as 'esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt.' The writer's idea appears to be, not only that by identifying himself with his despised people Moses took upon himself a burden of contempt and suffering resembling that which was afterwards borne by Christ on our behalf, but that he had Christ prophetically in view—saw Him afar off, even as Father Abraham did (Jn 8⁵⁶), and was strengthened by the vision to run his own race with patience (cf. He 12²⁻³). In the second passage (13¹³), the Jewish-Christian readers are exhorted to a fellowship with the sufferings of Christ, in the words, 'Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach.' The allusion apparently is to the sin-offering on the Day of Atonement without the camp of Israel, and to the suffering of Jesus without the city gate; and the meaning is that those Jewish-Christians must forsake the sphere of the OT religion, break off the old ties of national fellowship, and face all the pain and contumely that this would involve, so that they might share in the better blessings of the great Sin-offering.

3. Reproach as falling upon Christ's people.—

Both in Mt. (5¹¹) and Lk. (6²²) reproach forms a part of the last Beatitude—the Beatitude of Persecution. There are, we have seen, two kinds of reproach—a reproach that is just, and one that is unjust; such reproach as Christ uttered, and such reproach as He endured. In deserved reproach there lies great sorrow and shame. The Lord's backward look through the open door of the hall sent Peter out into the night to weep bitterly (Lk 22⁶¹); the remembrance of the last words addressed to him by his Master must have been as a barb to the arrow of remorse that sank so deep into the soul of Judas (Mt 26⁵⁰, Lk 22⁴⁸). On the other hand, both honour and blessing belong to undeserved reproach falling upon Christ's people for their Master's sake. Jesus frequently forewarned His disciples that persecution would come upon them through following Him (Mt 5¹⁰, 44 10^{23, 38} 13²¹ 16²⁴, Mk 10^{30, 38}, Lk 6²² 21¹², Jn 15²⁰). And in this Beatitude He specially forewarns them of the persecution of false and bitter tongues—more trying to some natures than the stones of the mob or the tyrant's scourge and sword.

The Apostles and the early Church had their full share of the reproach of evil tongues (cf. Ac 2¹³ 6¹¹ 17³² 21²⁸ 22²² 24^{5, 6}, Ro 3⁸, Ja 2⁷, 1 P 4⁴). But the glory that lies in being reproached for Christ's sake, and the Lord's great promise regarding this experience, were never forgotten. It was this that taught St. Paul to bless when he was reviled (1 Co 4¹²). It was evidently with the very words of Jesus echoing in his ears that St. Peter wrote, 'If ye be reproached (ὀνειδίζεσθε) for the name of Christ, blessed are ye' (1 P 4¹⁴). And when the author of Hebrews speaks of the 'reproach of Christ'—telling of the manner in which it was esteemed by Moses, and urging his fellow-believers of the Jewish race to go forth without the camp with that reproach upon them—it may be that he also is recalling how Jesus taught His disciples to rejoice in reproach because their reward in heaven was great (Mt 5¹², Lk 6²²). For in the one case he represents Moses as forming his estimate of the reproach of Christ from his respect unto the recompense of the reward (He 11²⁶), and in the other he exhorts Christians to the bearing of the same reproach, on the ground that they look for the abiding city which is to come (13¹⁴).

RESERVE.—In Mt 7⁶ Jesus counsels reserve in the communication of religious truth. That maxim, which has had great and sinister developments in the Church, stands alone, both in its place in the Sermon on the Mount and in His teaching. Its meaning, then, can be gathered only from His practice.

1. It was never Jesus' custom to meet religious curiosity or speculation. As He was teaching, one said unto Him, 'Lord, are there few that be saved?' (Lk 13²²⁻²⁵). He did not answer; He said, 'Strive to enter in at the strait gate . . .' He turned His hearers' attention from that speculation, which has no saving power in it, to the clear duty and wisdom of the moment. When Peter asked if the parable of the Servants waiting for their Lord was addressed to the disciples specially, or to all, Jesus did not answer (12⁴¹). He painted, instead, another picture for the inward eye of the heart. In both cases it was the practical and most imperative needs of the soul's relation to God that He considered. That directing purpose shown in these cases, explains the silences of His teaching, the reserves of His revelation. When He spoke of those on whom the tower fell, and of the Galileans whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices (13¹⁻⁵), the old problem of the suffering of the innocent was suggested; but He shed no light upon it. He made practical use of it, instead, as a call to repentance. The immortality of the soul is the presupposition of all His teaching about the love of the Heavenly Father for men, His children. 'The life after death, Lightfoot and I agreed, is the cardinal point of Christianity' (In Memoriam, Author's Notes, p. 227 n.). But Jesus, of His own impulse, only enunciates this truth at the end of His mission. And a practical need then impelled Him. His disciples needed consolation for the days after His death, and He left them the hope which would strengthen their faith and loyalty (Jn 14). With Jesus, the declaration of any truth depended wholly upon the needs of faith in the heart.

2. Jesus practised reserve as to His personal claims. The Jews came and asked Him, 'How long dost thou make us doubt: if thou be the Christ, tell us plainly' (Jn 10²⁴). They were surprised at His silence about what seemed to them so important. And His blessing of Peter (Mt 16¹³⁻¹⁷) shows that He had been silent also in private, even among the inner circle of His disciples. His reserve is explained, not by the slow growth of His own conception of His Messiahship, but by the method of establishing the Kingdom of God which He had set before Him from the beginning. The weapons of His warfare were to be purely spiritual. His aim was to set up the Kingdom within men's hearts, to win their heart's love and trust in the Father. And for that end the appeal of all His activities, miracles of help and healing and words of teaching, was single. He aimed at the heart, the seat and source of faith, where the vision and the love of goodness, with their dynamic impulse, are. And Peter's confession was a joy to Him, because it came from his heart's assurance that Jesus had the words of eternal life (Jn 6⁶⁸, Mt 16¹⁷). It was faith in goodness asserting itself against the appearance of things. To this faith Jesus confessed His greatness and Divine mission. He did so, because then He was merely certifying the Divine supremacy of that goodness which had, in its lowliness and simplicity, won the love and trust of their hearts. Through their faith they reached His authority. Jesus recognized no other path to faith in Him as Messiah, the revealer of the Father, and the founder of the Kingdom of God upon the earth. He sent the inquiring Jews back to this road (Jn 10²⁵⁻²⁷); He withdrew from the people who, from material ideas and expectations, would have made Him king (6¹⁵); and He declined to answer the chief priests and elders, who came inquiring for His authority, because they were not simple-hearted or honest inquirers (Mt 21²³⁻²⁷). This single regard for the interests of faith in the heart explains also His reserve with the messengers of John (11²⁻⁶). John belonged to the old economy (11¹¹); his prophecy of the Messiah's coming had been a prophecy of judgment (3¹²). The simple acknowledgment by Jesus that He was the Messiah could never have brought to him enlightenment and faith as to that Kingdom of heaven whose least disciple was greater than he. Its inevitable consequence would have been to confirm him in his old expectations of judgment; it would have appeared to him a call to wait in patience the good time of the Messiah, when He would play the stern part John had foretold. Therefore Jesus gave no direct answer to John's question. He pointed rather to all the gracious activities which were partly the causes of John's doubting impatience. These were the signs of that Kingdom of love which Jesus was establishing; and if John were ever to gain the higher and richer conceptions of God and of man manifested there, he must see the Messiah through these quiet and lowly activities of loving helpfulness, and believe in Him as Him that should come, because of them and not despite them.

3. The sufferings of the Messiah.—It was immediately upon Peter's confession that Jesus began to teach the necessity of suffering and death for Himself (Mt 16²¹, Mk 8³¹). There are a precision and a fulness of detail in the account of this teaching, which are probably reflected back upon it from later experience. But the tragic note enters then and dominates the later teaching both in public and private. Its emergence at that time does not prove that Jesus entered then upon a new conception of His mission, taught by the progress of events. It is more probable that this tragic note was in His conception of the task of establishing the Kingdom from the beginning. His wilderness temptation argues that (Mt 4⁸⁻⁹); it is implicit in His Beatitudes upon the meek and the persecuted, and in His teaching of the earthly rewards of hypocrisy (6^{2-5, 16}); and the deeper spirit of the OT, with its history of religious growth through the sufferings of the saints and the long-suffering patience of Jehovah's love, could not be veiled from the insight of His meditation thereon in the years of His preparation. The joy of the early days does not contradict this. It was the natural answer of the heart to those new thoughts of the love of the Father which Jesus preached. And in Jesus' own thought this tragic element was not in contradiction with that instinctive, buoyant joy in His gospel, though then He had many things to say to them which they could not bear (Jn 16¹²). Peter's confession brought the opportunity of revealing further the depths of the riches of the wisdom and love of God.

Reserve, as practised by Jesus, was never a politic means of leading men's minds gradually to doctrines which might startle or offend them at first sight; it consisted only in seeking, with a single aim, the practical needs of faith in the heart—belief in that Divine Love whose outgoings are redemptive, and in whose fellowship and service stands eternal life.

RESISTANCE.—See RETALIATION.

REST.—1. There is in the Gospels frequent allusion to the value of rest as the purchase of preceding effort, the compensation that is provided for sore afflictions. The Sermon on the Mount, as the proclamation of the new Kingdom, guarantees such rest and peace to those who serve and suffer for the sake of that Kingdom (Mt 5¹⁻¹²). Prosperity in the world can make no such promises (Lk 12²⁰ 16²⁵).

2. As rest, physical, social, and religious, is an organic necessity of life, and is protected by conditions of time and place, it should not be set aside for effort that is uncalled for, or that confuses the lower and higher forms of rest. Such was the lesson given in the home at Bethany (Lk 10⁴²). Similarly, the lilies of the field, while developing to the full their own character in their own place, are content to remain lilies (Mt 6^{28, 29}).

3. There is an ignoble state of rest that may slothfully or blindly oppose the call to a higher and truer contentment (Mt 11^{17, 22}, Lk 19⁴⁰). Christ's gift is life abundant (Jn 10¹⁰), but the bestowal involves asking, and faith's exertion of knocking is expected at the entrance into life (Mt 7⁷).

4. In the parable of the Sower, the recompense is in the abundant harvest. This increase is the way of nature where hindering things cease to operate. The list of obstacles typifies the things that impoverish or prevent altogether the fruitfulness of discipleship. In the Kingdom of heaven the instinct of citizenship is to be rich toward God.

Its gratification is not toil but rest (Mt 11²⁸; see art. REPOSE).

RESTORATION.—Round this word gather some of the most fascinating problems of our thought in regard to the possibilities of human destiny. Every lover of his kind, and everyone who has caught something of the spirit of the Lord Christ, is compelled, for his own mental and spiritual satisfaction, to ask, What is to be the issue of all this complex life of man, the beginnings of which we see on the earth, the final issue when the Divine purpose concerning the race is accomplished? And naturally the Scriptures of the NT are eagerly scanned to discover what declarations are there made, or hints given, respecting the issue. Above all, has the Master of Truth left us any definite teaching on which a fair and inspiring hope may be built? At first sight it must be confessed that to those who look for express statements of our Lord and His Apostles in regard to future destiny, the results of a restrained exegesis are disappointing. Isolated expressions and passages may be, and often have been, pressed into the service of preconceived hopes; but, on the whole, the statements of Scripture afford too slender a basis on which to raise a structure of dogmatic assertion, and do not throw light very far into the great mystery of the future. The disappointment, however, is modified by two considerations: (1) Many of the references to the future life are quite incidental, and occur in writings which are themselves obviously of the most occasional character, in which, therefore, the immediate doctrinal or ethical concern is paramount, and no intention of dealing with the problems of Eschatology was before the writer's mind. (2) The mysteriousness which everywhere surrounds our human existence is an essential part of life's discipline. If all the mystery concerning the future were dispelled, the race would be without one of its most refining and sanctifying influences, much of life's interest would vanish and its finest essence evaporate. The Evangelists, the Apostles, and even our Lord Himself in His earthly life, were required to vindicate to themselves the Divine purpose in this mortal career without having all the future destiny of mankind revealed to them. Limitation of knowledge here seems to be essential to the very being of human nature.

In considering the Scripture intimations regarding the hope of a universal Restoration of humanity, it must be clearly seen that whatever hopes may, more or less distinctly, emerge in the expressed thought of the Apostles, are all clearly based upon, and inspired by, an enlarging thought concerning the Person of Jesus Christ, and the revelation given in Him and recorded in the Gospels.

The word 'restoration' (ἀποκατάστασις, AV 'restoration') is found only once in the Gospels, and in its verbal form, in Mt 17³¹, in connexion with a hope current in our Lord's time of a moral renovation of the nation under the leadership of Elijah (cf. Mal 3¹ 4⁵⁻⁶), and declared by our Lord to be fulfilled in the great spiritual movement initiated by John the Baptist (Mt 17¹⁰⁻¹²). The noun is employed in Ac 3²¹, where it would be extremely interesting if we could believe that St. Peter, in his anticipation of the χρόνος ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων, had in his mind any thought of the universal restoration of mankind, and its final up-raising to the life of fellowship with God. His need of mental enlargement, given later by means of the vision (Ac 10⁹⁻³³), to enable him to believe in the possibility of Gentile salvation, is decisive against such an interpretation. We may well inquire, however, how far the expression, calculated to express so much, was due to the writer of the Acts, St. Luke, to whom such a pregnant phrase and such a large hope for humanity would naturally commend itself.

But the question remains, Does the larger idea of the restoration of humanity as a whole to obedience, and to the condition of blessedness for which it was created, receive a warrant from the words and thoughts of Scripture?

1. In examining, first, our Lord's own teaching, which we take as fundamental in the consideration of the question, it must be clearly understood what we are to ask concerning it. We desire to know if we have any evidence from the words of Jesus reported in the Gospels, that He Himself held the faith of the final restoration of all men. Was it for Him included in the possibilities of the future? or have we any express declaration that in this life only is there a possibility of right moral decision being made, with the consequent attainment to a right and saving relation to God? The last question stands on the threshold of the inquiry; for if it be unmistakably answered in the affirmative, it must determine the whole problem for those who accept His authority as final; while, if no such declaration is found, the way is left open for a redeeming process beyond the bounds of this brief mortal life.

Our Lord is reported to have spoken of everlasting or eternal punishment (κόλασις αἰώνιον), apparently as the opposite of life everlasting or eternal (ζωὴν αἰώνιον, Mt 25⁴⁶). The use of the same term αἰώνιος of both life and punishment has inclined many to regard the passage as decisive on this momentous question; but the majority of modern scholars consider that the æonian (literally 'age-long') life or suffering is to be understood as at least possibly terminable, and that the expression applied is qualitative rather than quantitative, referring to the relation of both life and death to God rather than to duration of time. 'Eternal' and not 'everlasting' is its true equivalent. It may also be said that even if the expressions are meant to refer to the endlessness of the punishment or of the blessedness, they may properly be understood as a very strong assertion of the undoubted fact that the suffering that comes of sin is eternally, endlessly bound up with the sin, even as the blessedness of the righteous is necessarily involved in their obedience. The hopelessness of the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is summed up in the words 'he is guilty of eternal sin' (Mk 3²⁹). The latter possibility, however, is nowhere asserted of all who 'die in their sins' (Jn 8²⁴), and leave this world unrepentant. See ETERNAL SIN.

Similarly, the same fact of the eternal and necessary association of suffering with sin is expressed in Mk 9⁴³⁻⁴⁸ 'the worm that dieth not,' and 'the fire that never shall be quenched.' But in neither case is it declared that those who are sent away into that searching experience are doomed to abide there endlessly. The fire of the Divine wrath against sin is essential to the Divine Being, and while God is God it cannot but burn. Both passages convey a most solemn warning to men against being caught into that holy wrath, the fiery trial of suffering and remorse that inevitably waits upon all disobedience, against that dissolution of the life which elsewhere our Lord describes as the cutting of man asunder, and as that terrible portion of the unbeliever or hypocrite which is weeping and gnashing of teeth (Mt 24⁵¹, cf. Lk 12⁴⁶).

Unspeaking horror of the world to come for the impenitent and disobedient reveals itself in all that He teaches us regarding it; in His sense of sin, and the mischief, corruption, and agony which it works; in His urging that it were 'profitable,' good for a man, to make the utmost sacrifice of all that makes life good to live, even to the plucking out of the eye or the cutting off of the hand, rather than to be cast into that loathly Gehenna which our Lord glances at, rather than depicts (Mt 5^{29, 30}); but of the duration of that state of woe He gives no hint. Although it may with much force be maintained that the images He employs—the worm, the fire, the salting with fire—are all most naturally interpreted as purifying and cleansing agencies, yet it is wiser to see that He leaves the Divine purpose in all that mysterious process of retribution to be inferred from the whole revelation of God which He had given in His earthly life. See, further, ETERNAL FIRE, ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

Due weight must be assigned to the remarkable reticence maintained by Jesus regarding the world to come, both concerning the nature of the blessedness of heaven, and the future destiny of the unrepentant. In His incarnate condition, under the limitations necessarily involved in the taking of a veritable human nature, much of that future was hidden from His view as from ours. The discipline of mystery concerning the future world, which is so salutary for our nature, was not without its value in the perfecting of the Redeemer. And therefore, while He possessed absolute knowledge of the moral conditions of that life, kindred as they were with the moral conditions of life here, He was not privileged to see all that future unfolded. And it is surely most significant that of the course of events in that 'sequestered state,' in that world to which the sinful pass at death, He speaks no word. And He nowhere precludes the possibility of moral growth and betterment in that vast Unseen; the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16¹⁹⁻³¹) speaks of 'a great gulf fixed' prohibiting a passage from either of the two contrasted states of being to the other, but it was not a gulf across which there could come no communication or redeeming influence, for Dives and Abraham can hold converse; and the parable hints not obscurely at some betterment of the selfish rich man who begins to have a genuine concern for his brethren (unless it must be interpreted as a subtle form of self-exuse).

The Gospels contain no word of this life as being absolutely and finally decisive of all human destiny, and remembering the complexity of life not for the heathen only, and for nations chosen to play another part than a religious one, in the great purpose of God, but for men living in full gospel light, yet doomed from their birth and before it to an almost hopeless incapacity for truth and virtue, our moral nature shrinks irresistibly from such a thought. On the contrary, we have certain indications, not beyond question and yet full of hopeful suggestion, that the mind of Jesus reached out beyond all the complexity and travail to a glorious issue and consummation worthy of being called 'the glory of the Father.' He speaks in Mt 19²⁸ of a coming Regeneration (παλιγγενεσία) in which those who have faithfully followed Him shall share His rule; but we have no clue as to whether His words are intended to reach beyond the definite establishment of His Kingdom as an actual fact among men. But in that Kingdom once established He placed His hope, and He taught us to pray for its coming as the equivalent of the Divine will being done on earth as it is in heaven.

In Jn 12³² (cf. Jn 3¹⁴) He declares that His 'lifting up' shall be the means of 'drawing all men' to Himself, and His words are naturally interpreted as expressing His hope and expectation of a com-

On the whole, while it must be confessed that we have no certain statement from our Lord as to the final issue of things, we have yet much to encourage a hopeful attitude, in harmony as that attitude is with the intuitions of the human heart, and with the whole disclosure of God's love 'in the face of Jesus Christ.' The Son of Man and Son of God has 'thrown light' not only upon the intimations of immortality which existed in the heart of man, but also upon the problem as to future restoration, not so much by what He says as by His whole Personality, His revelation of and abiding relation to the unseen Father.

2. Upon that revelation in the actual Jesus of Nazareth, and upon their increasing sense of the infinite importance of the Christ who ever liveth, the Apostles found their thought and speculation, so far as these find place in their writings, regarding the larger and ultimate issues of redemption. Whatever hopes they permit themselves to express, all centre in His Personality and power. The vagueness which characterizes most of the references to the question is due to the fact that the writings are all casual. In no case are the authors specifically or systematically dealing with the problem, being not theologians so much as practical Apostles, dealing with the ethical questions of the Churches and with individual salvation.

(a) In the Johannine writings are found many principles of truth on which far-reaching inferences may legitimately enough be founded, such as the assertion that 'God is light, and in him is no darkness at all' (1 Jn 1⁵); but there is no evidence that the writer had apprehended these logical inferences.

(b) In the First Epistle of Peter two important passages are 1 P 3¹⁸⁻²⁰ and 4⁶, which, in spite of a considerable weight of adverse exegesis which forbids any dogmatic assertion based upon the words, may fairly be taken as suggesting that the scope of redemption is not limited to the present scene. The Apostle has the conception of an underworld from which a moral process is not excluded.

(c) In the Pauline writings the most conservative exegesis reads a clear declaration of the Divine purpose that all men shall be saved, but denies that any certain hope as to the final issue can be built upon the fact. Here many will naturally diverge in judgment, and feel that they can raise their hope so securely nowhere else as upon the expressed purpose and will of God (Ro 11³², 1 Ti 2^{3, 4}, cf. 2 P 3⁹). When once the holy will of the Father, in its might and energy and Divine persistence, is realized, the Christian man may at least 'rest in hope' of an issue beyond our farthest vision. Martensen (Christian Dogmatics, Eng. tr. 474-484) is a type of those who regard Scripture as presenting two sides of the truth respecting future destiny which are at present unreconcilable; but the antinomy which no doubt exists will largely disappear if the process of development in Apostolic and especially in Pauline thought be allowed for. In his earlier Epistles (1 and 2 Thess.), St. Paul is largely influenced by the apocalyptic ideas of traditional Judaism (1 Th 4¹⁵⁻¹⁷, 2 Th 2⁸⁻¹⁰). But in the later stages of his writing a larger conception of the Divine purpose begins to find expression. In Ro 8¹⁹ he anticipates a glorious 'revelation of the sons of God'—and in 11³² he expresses the widest design in the Divine mind, determining all the mysterious process of redemption, as 'that he might have mercy upon all.' And, as his thought matures, his hope expands under an enlarged sense of the central position of the ever-living

Christ in this world and in all worlds, and under his feeling of the larger spaces in the Divine purpose and working—the 'ages upon ages' (Eph 2⁷ 3²¹). In Col 1^{16,17} the Son is declared to be the creator of all things visible and invisible. All things (τὰ πάντα) find their cohesive principle in Him (συνέστηκεν), and their final consummation (εἰς αὐτόν). In Eph 1¹⁰ He is the Head of all, in which the whole creative and redeeming process is to be summed up (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι τὰ πάντα ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ), and in Ph 2¹⁰ His is the Name at which the whole created universe is to bow with undivided acclamation. In Col 1²⁰ the blessings of redemption are extended to the whole system of things (cf. Eph 1^{21,22}), on which Toy (Judaism and Christianity, pp. 407-408) says: 'If we are to see here the conception of a final reconciliation between God and His creatures, a blotting out of evil in the sense that it shall be transformed into good, a complete harmonizing of the universe so that neither angel nor man shall be found to set himself against the Divine ethical order, then we must hold this view to spring out of a philosophical thought which does not find support elsewhere in the NT, and which did not afterward meet with wide approval in the Church.' And though this may be conceded, and though we must not be blind to the fact that the issues thus gloriously expressed were not fully thought out by the Apostle or applied to the question of Restoration, yet, based as they are upon the Person of Christ and supplemented by the principles of His teaching and revelation, they may be taken to express a sober and restrained hopefulness for the ultimate issue, which shall never for a moment be suffered to lessen the evangelic urgency that 'Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation' (2 Co 6²).

The hope of a final completion of the Divine purpose in the restoration from sin's dominion of all mankind must derive much of its force from a contemplation of the alternatives; from the difficulty of supposing a Divine purpose and will eternally active yet never attaining to its desire, or of conceiving of any human soul as eternally incapable of responding to the all-pervasive Love of God, or of thinking of any eternal felicity of the blessed which can be undisturbed by the knowledge of living souls abiding in a hopeless doom. Alleviations of the idea of eternal punishment such as that of 'Conditional Immortality' offend almost equally against the fundamental instincts of the human heart, which cannot think that the All-wise and All-loving has created any soul in His own image to prove but a waste and an abortion.

'Which else He made in vain—which must not be!'

Such thoughts are in the human intuition, and they are based upon the nature of God as made known to us in Christ Jesus, and upon the eternal Personality of Him 'who was dead, and is alive for evermore; and hath the keys of death and the unseen world' (Rev 1¹⁸). They are reinforced by the human love for its own kind, which at its highest finds voice in Browning (Saul):

'Would I fain in my impotent yearning do all for this man,
And dare doubt He alone shall not help him, who yet alone can?'

And on these rests the conviction that 'faith in the exceeding grandeur of reality shall never be confounded' (Sir O. Lodge, Life and Matter).

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.—1. St. Paul's summary of the Resurrection appearances (1 Co 15) is, says Godet (Com. ii. 435), the most ancient and most official of the records we possess. If Harnack's chronology be made our basis (Gesch. der Altchristl. Lit. vol. ii. (i.) 236 ff.), our Lord's death was in A.D. 29 or 30; St. Paul's conversion in 30; his correspondence with Corinth, 53. His visit to St. Peter at Jerusalem would be in 33. Thus he had known this tradition for nearly 20 years, and recorded it within 23 years of the Resurrection. On St. Paul's list of the witnesses we note:—(1) That it is a list and not a narrative. It is the barest summary, expressed with the utmost conciseness (cf. Cambr. Theol. Essays, p. 331). (2) It is derived and not original (1 Co 15³ 'I received' [παρέλαβον], 'I delivered unto you' [παρέδωκα]). If we here possess a primitive tradition orally communicated to St. Paul by the older Apostles, then it would be uncritical to infer that St. Paul 'knows nothing' of any appearance which he does not record. (3) The order of the list is chronological. This is shown by the use of εἶτα, ἐπειτα: 'then to the Twelve; then . . . to above 500; then . . . to James; then to all the apostles.' (4) The purpose is not primarily apologetic (cf. Cambridge Theol. Essays, 395, 329, 330). The Resurrection of Christ was not disputed at Corinth. The introduction of the list here is due to that instinct for systematic completeness, that determination to go down to first principles, which is eminently characteristic of St. Paul, rather than to any apologist's desire to convince men who do not believe that Christ is risen. (5) The selection is evidently official (cf. Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul, p. 301)—St. Peter as the first of the Apostles, St. James head of the Church at Jerusalem. 'Peter and James were at the time of writing the two most prominent persons in the Christian Society, St. Paul himself not being excepted' (Ch. Quart. Rev., Jan. 1906, p. 330). The same applies to the Apostles in a body. The other appearance is recorded for its numerical importance. Thus the omission of the Women from this official list is not surprising. It is noticeable that the Fourth Gospel, although recording the appearance to Mary Magdalene, yet omits it from the official enumeration (Jn 21¹⁴). Thus the Fourth Gospel supports St. Paul's procedure, and demonstrates that omission is not necessarily due to ignorance.

On St. Paul's list of the witnesses, see, further, Ch. Quart. Rev., Jan. 1906, 327-331; Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul; Géss, Das Dogma von Christi Person und Werk, xvii.

2. The personal testimony of St. Paul to Christ's Resurrection.—A comparison of the three accounts of St. Paul's conversion in Ac 9. 22. 26, which may be respectively denoted A, B, and C, shows certain variations.

(1) The intervention of Ananias, contained in A and B, is omitted in C; the instruction given by him being in substance transferred in C to Christ. It may be, as Blass considers (Act. Apost. ix.), that the historic order is maintained in A and B rather than in C, since such instruction as to the Apostle's duty would come more naturally under calmer circumstances and at a later time. It should also be noted that of these three accounts the first is the historian's narrative in the course of the events, where Ananias would necessarily be mentioned. The second was spoken to the Jewish throng on the ascent to the Prætorium, where the mention of Ananias and his orthodoxy would be reassuring to the hearers (cf. Knowling, op. cit.). The third, spoken before the magistrates, omits him, because the reference would not in any degree strengthen the Apostle's case, nor be desirable on Ananias' account. Again, it is noteworthy that the incident of Ananias is, as Blass says, separable from the main event. Its omission by St. Paul in 1 Cor. shows this. It does, however, entail the important loss of reference to St. Paul's baptism given in A and B. It may be psychologically difficult to separate Ananias' instructions from St. Paul's own reflexions. But this again is distinct from the momentous issue.

(2) The effect upon the attendants is recorded with variations. In A they are described as ἀκούοντες μὲν τῆς φωνῆς μετέπειτα δὲ θεωροῦντες. In B, τὸν δὲ φανὸν οὐκ ἤκουσαν τοῦ λαλοῦντός μοι. In C the attendants are not mentioned. It is usually said that the distinction of case after ἀκούειν implies that the attendants heard the sound (genitive) but could not distinguish the substance (accusative) of the message (cf. Grimm-Thayer, Lex.).

But, taking the extreme case that these details cannot be reconciled, do they vitally alter the central affirmation? Is not some confusion between the effect on St. Paul and that upon the attendants very readily accounted for on the religious principle that receptiveness varies with spirituality? Zeller (followed by Pfeleiderer, Urchristentum, i. 61) has, indeed, made the most of these differences (Acts, vol. i. p. 287), on the ground that for the objective character of the appearance great importance must attach to the testimony of St. Paul's companions. But the essential points are perfectly clear; that the attendants were bewildered and confused by an external incident whose nature they evidently took for supernatural but could not further explain.

On the three narratives in Acts, see, further, Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul; Sabatier, L'apôtre Paul; Goguel, L'apôtre Paul et Jésus Christ; Chase, Credibility of Acts; Rackham, Acts.
